

THE ROUGH GUIDE to

France

About this book

Rough Guides are designed to be good to read and easy to use. The book is divided into the following sections and you should be able to find whatever you need in one of them.

The introductory colour section is designed to give you a feel for France, suggesting when to go and what not to miss, and includes a full list of contents. Then comes basics, for pre-departure information and other practicalities.

The guide chapters cover France's regions in depth, each starting with a highlights panel, introduction and a map to help you plan your route.

The contexts section fills you in on history, art, architecture, cinema and books, while further colour sections introduce where to eat, festivals and walking, and language gives you an extensive menu reader and enough French to get by.

The book concludes with all the small print, including details of how to send in updates and corrections, and a comprehensive index.

This tenth edition published May 2007

The publishers and authors have done their best to ensure the accuracy and currency of all the information in The Rough Guide to France, however, they can accept no responsibility for any loss, injury, or inconvenience sustained by any traveller as a result of information or advice contained in the guide.

ISBN 978-1-84353-797-7

US $23.99 CAN$29.99

5 2 3 9 9

The Rough Guide to

France

written and researched by

David Abram, Andrew Benson, Ruth Blackmore, Brian Catlos, Hugh Cleary, Belinda Dixon,
Jan Dodd, Marc Dubin, Kevin Fitzgerald,
Sarah Gear, Daniel Lund, James McConnachie, Neville Walker, Greg Ward and Nick Woodford

NEW YORK • LONDON • DELHI

www.roughguides.com

Contents

Colour section 1–24

Introduction	6
Where to go	8
When to go	12
Things not to miss	14

Basics 25–80

Getting there	27
Getting around	35
Accommodation	45
Food and drink	50
The media	55
Sports and outdoor activities	59
Living in France	65
Culture and etiquette	67
Shopping	68
Travelling with children	69
Travel essentials	70

Guide 81–1264

1 Paris and around	83
2 The north	217
3 Alsace and Lorraine	293
4 Normandy	337
5 Brittany	407
6 The Loire	489
7 Burgundy	561
8 Poitou-Charentes and the Atlantic coast	615
9 The Dordogne, Limousin and Lot	679
10 The Pyrenees	755

11 Languedoc	839
12 The Massif Central	899
13 The Alps and Jura	957
14 The Rhône valley and Provence	1023
15 The Côte d'Azur	1119
16 Corsica	1201

Contexts 1265–1337

History	1267
Art	1291
Architecture	1305
Cinema	1313
Books and maps	1328

Language 1339–1355

Travel store 1357–1360

Small print & Index 1361–1384

Cafés, bistros and brasseries colour
section following p.168

Walking in France
colour section following
p.808

Festive France
colour section following
p.1048

Introduction to France

The sheer physical diversity of France would be hard to exhaust in a lifetime of visits. Landscapes range from the fretted coasts of Brittany and the limestone hills of Provence to the canyons of the Pyrenees and the half-moon bays of Corsica, and from the lushly wooded valleys of the Dordogne and the gentle meadows of the Loire valley to the glaciated peaks of the Alps. Each region looks and feels different, has its own style of architecture, its own characteristic food and often its own dialect. Though the French word pays is the term for a whole country, people frequently refer to their own region as mon pays – my country – and this strong sense of regional identity has persisted despite centuries of centralizing governments, from Louis XIV to de Gaulle.

Industrialization came relatively late to France, and for all the millions of French people that live in cities, the idea persists that theirs is a rural country. The importance of the land reverberates throughout French culture, manifesting itself in areas as diverse as regional pride in local cuisine and the state's fierce defence of Europe's agricultural subsidies. Perhaps the most striking feature of the French countryside is the sense of space. There are huge tracts of woodland and undeveloped land without a house in sight, and, away from the main urban centres, hundreds of towns and villages have changed only slowly and organically over the years, their old houses and streets intact, as much a part of the natural landscape as the rivers, hills and fields.

Despite this image of pastoral tranquillity, France's history is notable for its extraordinary vigour. For more than a thousand years the country has been in the vanguard of European development, and the accumulation of wealth and experience is evident everywhere in the astonishing variety of things to see, from the Dordogne's prehistoric cave-paintings and the Roman monuments of the south, to the Gothic cathedrals of the north, the châteaux of the Loire, and the cutting-edge architecture of the grands projets in Paris. This legacy of history and culture – la patrimoine – is so widely dispersed across the land that even the briefest of stays will leave the visitor with a powerful sense of France's past.

The importance of these traditions is felt deeply by the French state, which fights to preserve and develop its national culture perhaps harder than any other country in the world, and private companies, who also strive to maintain French traditions in arenas as diverse as haute couture, pottery and, of course, food. The fruits of these efforts are evident in the subsidized arts, notably the film industry, and in the lavishly endowed and innovative museums and galleries.

▲ Café, St-Germain, Paris

Fact file

- With a land area of 547,000 square kilometres, France is the second largest country in Europe; its population of around 60 million is less only than its European neighbours, Germany and the UK.

- Now in its Fifth Republic, France has a long secular republican tradition dating back to the Revolution of 1789. Yet the majority of the population is Roman Catholic – notionally, at least – and there's a substantial Muslim minority of around 5–10 percent.

- The Government consists of a directly elected president and a two-house parliament. As a nuclear power and G8-member, and with a permanent seat on the United Nations Security Council, France retains a strong international profile.

- Annual GDP per capita is around US$30,000, making France one of the world's richer countries, but unemployment is a persistent problem, at around 9 percent. Taxes are high, at around 45 percent of GDP, but so is social spending, at almost 30 percent.

- France remains by far the most popular tourist destination in the world, with some 75 million visitors each year.

From colonial history to fishing techniques, aeroplane design to textiles, and migrant shepherds to manicure, these collections can be found across the nation, but, inevitably, first place must go to the fabulous displays of fine art in Paris, a city which has nurtured more than its share of the finest creative artists of the last century and a half, both French – Monet and Matisse for example – and foreign, such as Picasso and Van Gogh.

There are all kinds of pegs on which to hang a holiday in France: a city, a region, a river, a mountain range, gastronomy, cathedrals, châteaux. All that open space means there's endless scope for outdoor activities – from walking, canoeing and cycling to skiing and sailing – but if you need more urban stimuli – clubs, shops, fashion, movies, music – then the great cities provide them in abundance.

Where to go

Travelling around France is easy. Restaurants and hotels proliferate, many of them relatively inexpensive when compared with other developed Western European countries. Train services are admirably efficient, as is the road network – especially the (toll-paying) autoroutes – and cyclists are much admired and encouraged. Information is highly organized and available from tourist offices across the country, as well as from specialist organizations for walkers, cyclists, campers and so on.

As for specific destinations, Paris, of course, is the outstanding cultural centre, with its impressive buildings and atmospheric back-streets, its art, trendy nightlife and ethnic diversity, though the great provincial cities – Lyon, Bordeaux, Toulouse, Marseille – all now vie with the capital and each other for prestige in the arts, ascendancy in sport and innovation in attracting visitors.

Hundreds of towns and villages have changed only slowly and organically over the years... as much a part of the natural landscape as the rivers, hills and fields.

For most people, however, it's the unique characters of the regions – and not least their cuisines – that will define a trip. Few holiday-makers stay long in the largely flat, industrial north, but there are some fine cathedrals and energetic cities to leaven the mix. The picture is similar in Alsace-Lorraine where Germanic influences are strong, notably in the food. On the northern Atlantic coast, Normandy has a rich heritage of cathedrals, castles, battlefields and beaches – and, with its cream-based sauces, an equally rich cuisine. To the west, Brittany is more renowned for its Celtic links, beautiful coastline, prehistoric sites and seafood, while the Loire valley, extending inland towards Paris, is famed for soft, fertile countryside and a marvellous parade of châteaux. Further east, the green valleys of Burgundy shelter a wealth of Romanesque churches, and the wines and food are among the finest in France. More Romanesque churches follow the

▲ Métro sign outside the Pompidou Centre, Paris

Food and drink

The power and influence of French culture is evident anywhere that people read, wear clothes, vote or go to the cinema, but nowhere is the country's contribution greater than in culinary affairs. In France, a picnic could be a simple crusty baguette with cheese, washed down by an inexpensive red wine, or a gourmet feast of cold meats and prepared salads, as available from practically any charcuterie; either way it's likely to be as good as you'll find anywhere in the world. The same is true of eating out, whether that means a perfect steak-frites at a railway-station brasserie, a lovingly prepared set menu in a provincial restaurant, featuring the homeliest of regional specialities, or the most exquisite refinements of a Parisian chef.

There's an endless variety of cheeses, cakes and pastries to match, as well as wines – and not just those from the renowned vineyards of Bordeaux, Burgundy and Champagne. Whether choosing a good local vintage or pondering some obscure regional speciality, never be afraid to ask advice – most French people are true enthusiasts, ever ready to convert the uninitiated.

pilgrim routes through rural Poitou-Charentes and down the Atlantic coast to Bordeaux, where the wines rival those of Burgundy. Inland from Bordeaux, visitors flock to the gorges, prehistoric sites and picturesque fortified villages of the Dordogne and neighbouring Limousin, drawn too by the truffles and duck and goose dishes of Périgord cuisine. To the south, the great mountain chain of the Pyrenees rears up along the Spanish border, running from the Basque country on the Atlantic to the Catalan lands of Roussillon on the Mediterranean; there's fine walking and skiing to be had, as well as beaches at either end. Further along the Mediterranean coast, Languedoc offers dramatic landscapes, medieval towns and Cathar castles, as well as more beaches, while the Massif Central, in the centre of the country, is undeveloped and little visited, but beautiful nonetheless, with its rivers, forests and the wild volcanic uplands of the Auvergne. The Alps, of course, are prime skiing territory, but a network of signposted paths makes walking a great way to explore too; to the north, the wooded mountains of the Jura provide further scope for outdoor pursuits. Stretching down from the Alps to the Mediterranean is Provence, which, as generations of travellers have discovered, seems to have everything: Roman ruins, picturesque villages, vineyards and lavender fields – and legions of visitors. Its cuisine is similarly diverse, encompassing fruit, olives, herbs, seafood, lamb and an unusual emphasis on vegetables. Along the Provençal coast, the beaches, towns and chic resorts of the Côte d’Azur form a giant smile extending from the down-at-heel but vibrant city of Marseille to the super-rich Riviera hotspots of Nice and Monaco. For truly fabulous beaches, however, head for the rugged island of Cor-sica, birthplace of Napoleon and home to an Italian-leaning culture and cuisine and some fascinating Neolithic sculptures.

▼ Horses in the Camargue

The French

According to the clichés, the French are stylish, romantic and passionate. They also have a reputation for rudeness – and yet they are courteous with each other to the point of formality. It’s common for someone entering a shop to wish customers and shopkeeper alike a general “good morning”, and foreigners on business quickly learn the importance of shaking hands, asking the right questions and maintaining respectful eye contact. At the same time, if they want something, many French people can be direct in ways that are disconcerting for Anglo-Saxons. To foreigners stumbling over the language, never mind the cultural gap, this can seem like rudeness; it isn’t. It’s fairer to say that the French are proud. Opinions tend to be held and argued strongly – it’s not for nothing that so many revolutions have shaken the political landscape. Culture, too, is a source of great pride, and artists, writers and thinkers are held in high esteem even beyond elite circles. And French people everywhere are proud of their locality. Whether it’s for a village shopfront, a civic floral display or another landmark building for the French state, no effort is too great.

View over Nice

When to go

The single most important factor in deciding when to visit France is tourism itself. As most French people take their holidays in their own country, it's as well to consider avoiding the main French holiday periods – mid-July to the end of August. It's at this time that almost the entire country closes down, except for the tourist industry itself. You can easily walk a kilometre and more in Paris, for example, in search of an open boulangerie, and the city sometimes seems deserted by all except fellow tourists. Prices in the resorts rise to take full advantage and often you can't find a room for love nor money, and on the Côte d'Azur not even a space in the campsites. The seaside is the most crowded, but the mountains and popular regions like the Dordogne are not far behind. Easter, too, is a bad time for Paris: half of Europe's schoolchildren seem to descend on the city. For the same reasons, ski buffs should keep in mind the February school ski break. And no one who values life, limb, and sanity should ever be caught on the roads during the last weekend of July or August, and least of all on the weekend of August 15.

Generally speaking, climate needn't be a major consideration in planning when to go. If you're a skier, of course, you wouldn't choose the mountains between May and November; and if you want a beach holiday, you wouldn't head for the seaside out of summer – except for the Mediterranean coast, which is at its most attractive in spring. Northern France, like nearby Britain, is wet and unpredictable. Paris has a marginally better climate than New York, rarely reaching the extremes of heat and cold of that city, but only south of the Loire does the weather become significantly warmer. West coast weather, even in the south, is tempered by the proximity of the Atlantic, subject to violent storms and close thundery days even in summer. The centre and east, as you leave the coasts behind, have a more continental climate, with colder winters and hotter summers. The most reliable weather is along and behind the Mediterranean coastline and on Corsica, where winter is short and summer long and hot.

The great provincial cities – Lyon, Bordeaux, Toulouse, Marseille – all now vie with the capital and each other for prestige in the arts, ascendancy in sport and innovation in attracting visitors.

Average daily maximum temperatures

For a recorded weather forecast you can phone the main forecasting line on ☎08.92.68.08.08, or check online at 🌐www.meteofrance.com. Temperatures below are given in degrees Celsius.

	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec
Paris	7.5	7	10.2	15.7	16.6	23.4	25	25.6	21	16.5	11.7	7.8
Strasbourg	5.5	5.3	9.3	13.7	15.8	23	24	26.3	21	14.9	7.6	4.7
St-Malo	9	8.6	11	17	16	22.7	25	24	21.2	16.5	12	9.3
Tours	7.8	6.8	10.3	16	16.4	23.6	25.8	24.5	21	16.2	11.2	7
Lyon	7.4	6.7	10.8	15.8	17.3	25.6	27.6	27.6	23.5	16.5	10.4	7.8
Bordeaux	10	9.4	12.2	19.5	18	23.7	27	25.7	24	19.7	15.4	11
Toulouse	12.4	11.5	12.5	17.6	20	26.5	28.4	28	26	21	15.8	13.5
Avignon	12	12	14	18.5	20.8	26.6	28	28.4	25.2	22.2	16.8	14
Nice	12	12	14	18.5	20.8	26.6	28	28.4	25.2	22.2	16.8	14
Calvi	13	14	16	18	21	25	27	28	26	22	17	14

34

things not to miss

It's not possible to see everything that France has to offer in one trip – and we don't suggest you try. What follows is a selective taste of the country's highlights: natural wonders and outstanding sights, plus the best activities and experiences. They're arranged in five colour-coded categories, so you can browse through to find the very best things to see and do. All highlights have a page reference to take you straight into the guide, where you can find out more.

02 Mont St-Michel Page 389
• Second only to the Eiffel Tower as France's best-loved landmark, the merveille of Mont St-Michel is a splendid union of nature and architecture.

03 Bastille Day Page 56 & Festive France colour section

• July 14 sees national celebrations commemorating the beginning of the French Revolution, with fireworks and parties across the whole country.

04 Canal du Midi Page 874 • A calm, watery avenue, stretching from beyond Toulouse to the Mediterranean. Cycling, walking or drifting along its tree-shaded course is the most atmospheric way of savouring France's southwest.

05 Avignon Page 1060 • Great city of the popes, and once one of France's artistic centres, picturesque Avignon offers spectacular monuments and museums, countless places to eat and drink, and a superb annual summer festival.

06 Carnac Page 472 • Archeologically, Brittany is one of the richest regions in the world and the alignments at Carnac rival Stonehenge.

07 Amiens cathedral Page 242 • The largest Gothic building in all France, this lofty cathedral has a clever evening light show that gives a vivid idea of how the west front would have looked when it rejoiced in coloured paint.

08 Tour de France Page 59 • One of the world's greatest sporting events, this gruelling, three-week bike race follows a different route around the country every year, always ending on the Champs-Élysées.

09 Beaches

Page 1220

• France's coasts have many beautiful beaches with some of the best being found on Corsica, including the plage de Saleccia, with its soft white shell sand, turquoise water and not a building or road in sight.

10 The Issenheim altarpiece

Page 317

• The village of Colmar might be excessively twee, but it's still worth a visit for Grünewald's amazing altarpiece, one of the most extraordinary works of art in the country.

11 Les Gorges du Verdon

Page 1104

• The mighty gorges are Europe's answer to the Grand Canyon, and offer stunning views, a range of hikes, and colours and scents that are uniquely, gorgeously Provençal.

12 Cheese

Page 52

• For serious cheese-lovers, France is paradise. Not so for politicians: as an exasperated de Gaulle once commented, "How can you govern a country that has 245 kinds of cheese?"

13 Châteaux of the Loire Page 500 • The River Loire is lined with gracious châteaux, of which Chambord is surely the most staggeringly impressive, both for its size and the double-spiral staircase designed by Leonardo da Vinci.

14 Bordeaux Page 657 • Stylish and lively Bordeaux became the principal English stronghold in France for three hundred years, and is still known for the refined red wines – claret – which the English popularized.

15 The GR20 Page 1226 & Walking in France colour section

• Arguably France's most dramatic – and most demanding – long-distance footpath climbs through and over Corsica's precipitous mountains for some 170km.

16 Les Calanques Page 1136
 • The limestone cliffs on the stretch of coast between Marseille and Cassis offer excellent hiking, and you can scramble down to isolated coves that are perfect for swimming.

17 Cafés See Cafés, bistros and brasseries colour section • Taking your time over a glass of wine or cup of coffee in a café is a quintessentially French experience.

18 War memorials Page 263 & 375
 • World Wars I and II left permanent scars on the French countryside – and on its psyche. The dead are remembered in solemn, sometimes overwhelming cemeteries, such as the one at Ryes in Normandy.

19 Fontenay Abbey
 Page 576 • One of the most complete monastic complexes anywhere, this Burgundian monastery has a serene setting in a stream-filled valley.

20 Bayeux Tapestry Page 379
 This 70-metre-long tapestry is an astonishingly detailed depiction of the 1066 Norman invasion of England, and one of the finest artistic works of the early medieval era.

21 Outdoor activities Page 61
 From surfing off Biarritz and skiing in Val d'Isère to climbing in the Pyrenees and canoeing on the Loire, France has energetic pursuits to suit everyone.

22 Medieval Provençal villages Page 1090
 Provence's hilltop villages attract visitors by the score. Though Gordes is one of the most famous, there are others less well known but equally beautiful.

23 Bastide towns Page 694 • Monpazier is one of the best preserved of the fortified towns – bastides – built in the Dordogne region during the turbulent medieval period when there was almost constant conflict between the French and English.

24 Jardin du Luxembourg Page 141 • Paris's most beautiful park, in the heart of the laid-back Left Bank, is the ideal spot for relaxing.

25 Aix-en-Provence Page 1094

• Marseille may be the biggest city in Provence, but aristocratic Aix is the region's capital, and it's a wonderful place to shop, eat and linger under the plane trees with a pastis.

26 Champagne tasting at Épernay Page 279

• Dom Pérignon might be the most famous, but there are plenty of other bubbly to try in the atmospheric cellars of Épernay's maisons.

27 Strasbourg cathedral

Page 302 • Visible throughout Strasbourg is the magnificent filigree spire of the pink sandstone cathedral, dominating not just the city but much of Alsace.

22 28 Cathar castles Page 821 • Languedoc's mountains are dotted with these gaunt fortresses, grim but fascinating relics of the brutal crusade launched by the Catholic church and northern French nobility against the heretic Cathars.

29 The Louvre Page 115 • The palace of the Louvre cuts a grand Classical swathe through the centre of Paris and houses what is nothing less than the gold standard of France's artistic tradition.

30 Winter sports in the Alps Page 981 • The French Alps are home to some of the world's most prestigious ski resorts, offering a wide range of winter sports.

31 Gorges de l'Ardèche

Page 947 • The fantastic gorges begin at the Pont d'Arc and cut their way through limestone cliffs before emptying into the Rhône valley.

32 Annecy Page 988

• One of the prettiest towns in the Alps, Annecy has a picture-postcard quality which even the crowds can't mar.

33 Prehistoric cave art

Page 704 • Prehistoric art can be seen in several places around France, but perhaps the most impressive paintings are those at Lascaux in the Dordogne.

34 Carcassonne Page 872 • So atmospheric is this medieval fortress town, that it manages to resist even relentless commercialization and summer's throng of visitors.

Basics

Basics

Getting there	27
Getting around	35
Accommodation.....	45
Food and drink.....	50
The media	55
Sports and outdoor activities.....	59
Living in France.....	65
Culture and etiquette	67
Shopping.....	68
Travelling with children.....	69
Travel essentials.....	70

Getting there

The quickest way of reaching France from most parts of the United Kingdom and Ireland is by air. The budget airlines offer a vast array of flights to destinations all over the country, whilst the more traditional carriers such as British Airways and Air France also cover much of the country between them. From southeast England, however, the Channel Tunnel rail link provides a viable alternative, making the journey from London to Paris in just three hours. The Tunnel is the most flexible option if you want to take your car to France, though cross-Channel ferries are often cheaper. It's also worth bearing in mind that if you live west of London, or are heading to Brittany or to southwest France, the ferry services to Roscoff, St-Malo, Cherbourg, Caen and Le Havre can save a lot of driving time. From the US and Canada a number of airlines fly direct to Paris, from where you can pick up onward connections. You can also fly direct to Paris from South Africa, whilst the best fares from Australia and New Zealand are to be found if you fly via Asia.

Whether you are travelling by air, sea or rail, prices generally depend on the season, and are at their highest from around early June to the end of August, when the weather is best; fares drop during the "shoulder" seasons – roughly September to October and April to May – and are at their cheapest during the low season, November to March (excluding Christmas and New Year when prices are hiked up and seats are at a premium) and if you book well in advance. Note also that flying at weekends can be more expensive; price ranges quoted below assume midweek travel.

If you prefer to have everything organized for you, and especially if your visit is going to be geared around special interests, such as walking, cycling, art or wine, you may want to consider a package tour (see "Agents and operators" p.33). They may organize your entire trip for you or amount to no more than a flight plus car or train pass and accommodation. Taking a tour may work out cheaper than organizing the same arrangements on arrival in France and can help you make the most of your time if you're on a tight schedule.

Flights from the UK and Ireland

With the rapid increase in the number of budget airlines between the UK, Ireland and France, flying is becoming an ever cheaper and more attractive option, particularly if you're leaving from or heading to one of the regional airports. The largest of the budget airlines are brimababy, easyJet, flyBE and Ryanair, which between them cover a total of thirty airports across France, including Avignon, Bergerac, Chambéry, La Rochelle, Nantes, Pau, Rennes, Toulon and Tours, as well as more established hubs such as Paris, Lyon and Nice. Bear in mind though that routes and destinations change regularly, so it's wise to keep an eye on the airlines' websites (see p.32). It's also worth double-checking exactly where the airport is in relation to where you want to be; Ryanair claim to fly to Paris, for example, but in reality fly to the airport in Beauvais, a ninety-minute coach drive from the city centre. Tickets work on a quota system, and it's wise to book as early as possible for the really cheap seats, which can if you're lucky work out as little as a penny, with airport taxes and surcharges on top often coming to only £16–20/€25–30 each way. To keep costs down, be as flexible as possible – flying midweek at an ungodly hour will probably secure the cheapest tickets.

It's worth checking out the traditional carriers, such as Air France, British Airways, bmi and Aer Lingus, who have lowered their prices in recent years in the face of stiff competition from the budget airlines. The further ahead you book the better, but low-season return fares to Paris (including tax) start at around £70 from London, £110 from Edinburgh and €200 from Dublin; to Nice you'll pay upwards of £110, £160 and €300 respectively.

Air France, along with its partners, offers the widest regional coverage. It flies to Paris Charles-de-Gaulle (CDG) several times daily from London Heathrow, Dublin and regional airports such as Birmingham, Manchester, Southampton and Glasgow. It also operates flights from Heathrow and other UK airports direct to French regional airports such as Bordeaux, Lyon, Nantes, Nice and Strasbourg. Flights to Corsica – into Ajaccio, Bastia or Calvi – involve a change in Paris.

British Airways has several flights a day to Paris CDG from London Gatwick and Heathrow and at least one daily from Birmingham, Manchester, Aberdeen, Edinburgh and Glasgow. BA also operates flights from London to Bordeaux, Lyon, Marseille, Montpellier, Nantes, Nice, Toulon and Toulouse. In Northern Ireland, BA flies directly from Belfast City Airport to Paris CDG on weekdays. Bmi flies from Heathrow to Paris CDG at least three times daily and to Nice twice daily; it also flies to Paris CDG at least once daily from Leeds-Bradford, and daily from Manchester to Toulouse. In Ireland, Aer Lingus offers direct flights from Dublin and Cork to Paris CDG, and from Dublin to Lyon, Nice and Toulouse.

In the summer months, charter flights represent the best value for getting to Ajaccio or Bastia in Corsica, with prices from £30 including tax one way. They are also worth bearing in mind during the ski season to hubs such as Grenoble, Geneva and Toulouse; one-way prices start at around £50 including tax.

Flights from the US and Canada

Most major airlines operate scheduled flights to Paris from the US and Canada. Air France has the most frequent service, with good onward regional connections, but their fares tend to be on the expensive side. Other airlines offering nonstop services to Paris from a variety of US cities include: American Airlines from New York, Boston, Chicago, Dallas and Miami; Continental from Newark and Houston; Delta from Atlanta, Boston, Cincinnati, Miami and New York; Northwest from Detroit; and United from Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, New York and Washington DC. Air Canada offers nonstop services to Paris from Montréal and Toronto, while Air Transat offers good-value charter flights from a number of bases. Another option is to take one of the other European carriers, such as British Airways, bmi, Iberia, or Lufthansa, from the US or Canada to their home base and then continue on to Paris or a regional French airport. If you have a specific French destination in mind outside Paris and you're in a hurry – and are prepared to pay extra – it's possible to be ticketed straight through to any of more than a dozen regional airports. Most of these entail changing planes in Paris, and check to make sure there's no inconvenient transfer between the city's two main airports, Charles-de-Gaulle and Orly.

Thanks to intense competition, transatlantic fares to France are very reasonable. A typical return fare for a midweek flight to Paris is around US$650 from New York (7hr), US$750 from Los Angeles (13hr) and US$850 from Houston (8hr). From Canada, prices to Paris are in the region of CAN$850 from Montréal and Toronto (14hr), and CAN$1100 from Vancouver (16hr).

Flights from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa

Most travellers from Australia and New Zealand choose to fly to France via London, although the majority of airlines can add a Paris leg (or a flight to any other major French city) to an Australia/New Zealand–Europe ticket. Flights via Asia or the Middle East, with a transfer or overnight stop at the airline's home port, are generally the cheapest option; those routed through the US tend to be slightly pricier. Return fares start at around AUS$1500 from Sydney (30hr), AUS$1600 from Perth (25hr), AUS$1700 from Darwin (25hr) and NZ$1800 from Auckland (30hr).

From South Africa, Johannesburg is the best place to start, with Air France flying Fly less – stay longer! Travel and climate change

Climate change is a serious threat to the ecosystems that humans rely upon, and air travel is among the fastest-growing contributors to the problem. Rough Guides regard travel, overall, as a global benefit, and feel strongly that the advantages to developing economies are important, as is the opportunity of greater contact and awareness among peoples. But we all have a responsibility to limit our personal impact on global warming, and that means giving thought to how often we fly, and what we can do to redress the harm that our trips create.

Flying and climate change

Pretty much every form of motorized travel generates CO₂ – the main cause of human-induced climate change – but planes also generate climate-warming contrails and cirrus clouds and emit oxides of nitrogen, which create ozone (another greenhouse gas) at flight levels. Furthermore, flying simply allows us to travel much further than we otherwise would do. The figures are frightening: one person taking a return flight between Europe and California produces the equivalent impact of 2.5 tonnes of CO₂ – similar to the yearly output of the average British car.

Fuel-cell and other less harmful types of plane may emerge eventually. But until then, there are really just two options for concerned travellers: to reduce the amount we spend travelling by air (take fewer trips – stay for longer!), and to make the trips we do take “climate neutral” via a carbon offset scheme.

Carbon offset schemes

Offset schemes run by @climatecare.org, @carbonneutral.com and others allow you to make up for some or all of the greenhouse gases that you are responsible for releasing. To do this, they provide “carbon calculators” for working out the global-warming contribution of a specific flight (or even your entire existence), and then let you contribute an appropriate amount of money to fund offsetting measures. These include rainforest reforestation and initiatives to reduce future energy demand – often run in conjunction with sustainable development schemes.

Rough Guides, together with Lonely Planet and other concerned partners in the travel industry, are supporting the carbon offset scheme run by climatecare.org. Please take the time to view our website and see how you can help to make your trip climate neutral.

@www.roughguides.com/climatechange

direct to Paris from around R6140 return; from Cape Town, they fly via Amsterdam and are more expensive at around R7600. BA, flying via London, are pricier still, with fares at around R10,000 from Cape Town and R8600 from Johannesburg. Other, though pricier options, are to fly via Frankfurt with Lufthansa, or via Dubai with Emirates. Flight times are around ten hours from Johannesburg to Paris, and 14 hours from Cape Town including a stopover in Amsterdam.

Trains

Eurostar operates high-speed passenger trains daily from Waterloo International to France via the Channel Tunnel; most but not all services stop at Ashford in Kent (40min from London). Services depart roughly every hour (from around 6am to 7.30pm) for Paris Gare du Nord (2hr 40min), a few of which stop at Calais (1hr 20min) and Lille (1hr 40min), where you can connect with TGV trains heading south to Bordeaux, Lyon and Nice. In addition, Eurostar runs direct trains from London to Disneyland Paris (daily; 2hr 40min), to Avignon (mid-July to mid-Sept daily Mon–Sat; mid-Sept to mid-July daily Mon–Fri; 6hr), and a special twice-weekly ski service to Moutiers, Aime-la-Plagne and Bourg-St-Maurice in the French Alps (Dec–March; around 8hr); skis are carried free.

Standard “Leisure” fares from London to Paris start at £59 (£55 to Lille and £99 to Avignon) for a non-refundable, non-exchangeable return purchased up to fourteen days before departure and including a Saturday night away. The next option is the changeable “Semi-flexible” ticket (from £125/£120/£189 respectively), which again must include a Saturday night. All these deals have limited availability, so it pays to plan ahead; tickets go on sale three months before the date of travel. Otherwise, you’re looking at £298/£250/£250 for a fully refundable “Business” ticket with no restrictions. Return “Leisure” fares to Disneyland Paris start at £59 for adults (£44 for children aged 4–11) and those on the Eurostar ski train at £179 (£130 for children). Under-4s travel for free.

There is plentiful parking at Ashford station, just off the M20, at £9.50 per day; at Waterloo, Eurostar passengers pay £17 for 24 hours’ parking. You can get through-ticketing from stations around Britain – including the tube journey across London to Waterloo – from Eurostar, many travel agents and mainline stations. InterRail and Eurail rail passes (see below for more) give discounts on Eurostar trains. For information about taking your bike on Eurostar, see p.43. For rail contacts, see p.34.

By car via the Channel Tunnel

The simplest way of taking your car across to France from the UK is to load it on one of the drive-on drive-off shuttle trains operated by Eurotunnel through the Channel Tunnel. The service runs continuously between Folkestone and Coquelles, near Calais, with up to four departures per hour (only 1 per hour midnight–6am) and takes 35 minutes (45 minutes for some night departures). It is possible to turn up and buy your ticket at the toll booths (exit the M20 at junction 11a), though at busy times booking is advisable; if you have a booking, you must arrive at least thirty minutes before departure. Inside the carriages, you can get out of your car to stretch your legs; there are toilets but no shops or refreshments. Note that Eurotunnel is not allowed to transport cars fitted with LPG or CNG tanks.

In general, the amount you pay depends on the time of year, time of day, length of stay, how long in advance you book and how flexible you need your ticket to be. Standard single, non-flexible fares start at £49, though to get the cheapest price, you have to travel early morning or late at night, and book well in advance. Alternatively, if you want to be fully flexible and refundable, a “standard” fare purchased on the spot can be as much as £330. There’s a specially adapted carriage for bicycles that makes the crossing twice a day – it costs £32 return for a bike plus rider if you are staying more than five days, or £16 for a shorter stay.

Rail passes

There are a number of international rail passes useful for travel within France, many of which need to be bought in your home country (for details of railcards that you can buy in France, see “Discounts”, p.38). Rail Europe, the umbrella company for all national and international rail purchases, is the most useful source of information on which rail passes are available, and have all the current prices. For information on where to buy InterRail, Eurail, and France Rail passes, see p.34.

InterRail Pass

InterRail Passes are only available to European residents, and you will be asked to provide proof of residency before being allowed to purchase one. They come in over-26 and (cheaper) under-26 versions, and cover 29 European countries, grouped together in zones, of which France is in zone E along with Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

The passes are available for 16 days (one zone only; £145 for under-26s/£215 for over-26s), 22 days (two zones; £205/295) or one month (£285/405) for all zones. InterRail Passes do not include travel within your country of residence, though pass holders are eligible for discounts on rail fares to and from the border of the relevant zone as well as reductions on Eurostar and cross-Channel ferries.

Eurail Pass

A Eurail Pass, which is not available to European residents and must be purchased before arrival in Europe, is not likely to pay for itself if you're planning to stick to France alone. The pass allows unlimited free first-class train travel in France and seventeen other countries, and is available in increments of fifteen days, 21 days, one month, two months and three months. The pass comes in different forms, but the most useful is likely to be the Eurailpass Youth, which is valid for second-class travel for under-26s, and costs US$394 for 15 days, and up to US$1108 for three months.

France Rail Pass

Non-Europeans can buy the France Rail Pass before arriving in France. This entitles the holder to three days' unlimited train travel over a one-month period for US$238/AUS$300/NZ$350/R1670 (first class) or US$202/AUS$260/NZ$290/R1415 (second class), with the option of buying up to six additional days' travel at US$36/31, AUS$46/40, NZ$52/45 or R250/217 per day. There are discounts for travellers under 26, those over 60 and for two or more people travelling together.

Ferries

Though slower than travelling by plane or via the Channel Tunnel, the ferries and catamarans plying between Dover and Calais offer the most frequent services to France from the UK and are particularly convenient if you live in southeast England. Even if your starting point is west of London, it may still be worth heading to one of the south-coast ports and catching a ferry to Brittany or Normandy, though some routes have been cut following stiff competition from the Channel Tunnel. If you're coming from the north of England or Scotland, you could consider the overnight crossings from Hull (14hr) and Rosyth (18hr) to Zeebrugge in Belgium operated by P&O Ferries and Superfast Ferries respectively. Heading to southwest France, there's also the option of taking a ferry to Santander (with Brittany Ferries; 20hr) or Bilbao (P&O Ferries; 11hr) in northern Spain. From Ireland, putting the car on the ferry from Cork or Rosslare (near Wexford) to Cherbourg or Roscoff (13hr) in Brittany cuts out the drive across Britain to the Channel.

Ferry prices are seasonal and, for motorists, depend on the size of your vehicle. In general the further you book ahead, the cheaper the fare and it's well worth playing around with dates and times to find the best deals: midweek, midday sailings are usually cheapest. Return fares are now available for as little as £60 (if you book online) for a car and five passengers with SpeedFerries on the Dover–Boulogne route, while companies offering the Dover–Calais route charge in the region of £100. Return fares from Ireland (Cork–Roscoff) start at around €450.

Most ferry companies also offer fares for foot passengers, from £15 one way; accompanying bicycles can usually be carried free in low season, though there may be a small charge during peak periods.

Buses

Eurolines, a network of European bus companies, offers services from London Victoria to most major French cities, crossing the Channel by ferry or Eurotunnel depending on the time of day. Prices are lower than for the same journey by train, with standard adult return fares starting at around £44 to Paris, £52 to Lille and £66 each to Lyon, Bordeaux and Toulouse; there are discounts for return journeys booked a month in advance. Regional return fares from the rest of England and from Wales are available, as are student and youth discounts. Eurolines also offers a pass for Europe-wide travel, for fifteen or thirty days. Prices range from £135 for an adult fifteen-day pass in low season

Travelling with pets from the UK

If you wish to take your dog (or cat) to France, the Pet Travel Scheme (PETS) enables you to avoid putting it in quarantine when re-entering the UK as long as certain conditions are met. Current regulations are available on the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) website www.defra.gov.uk/animalh/quarantine/index.htm or through the PETS Helpline (☎0870 241 1710).

(£115 for under-26s and over-60s) to £299 for a peak-season thirty-day pass (£245 for under-26s and over-60s).

Also worth investigating is Busabout, a hop-on, hop-off bus network which runs on three cross-continental circuits ("loops") between May and October. Loops depart from Paris every two to three days, heading north, south or west. The western loop covers Paris, Nice, Avignon, Bordeaux and Tours, taking in some of Switzerland and passing through Spain on its way. If you want to start in London, you can also add on a London-Paris link for £25 single, £39 return. Passes are valid for the entire season, and cost £275 for one loop, £450 for two, and £575 for all three. Alternatively, you can buy a flexipass which allows you to choose six stops for £225. See p.34 for contact details.

Airlines, agents and operators

There are a vast number of travel agents and tour operators offering holidays in France, with options varying from luxury, château-based breaks to adventure trips involving skiing and hiking. The following pages list the most useful contacts.

Online booking

Many airlines and discount travel websites offer you the opportunity to book your tickets, hotels and holiday packages online, cutting out the costs of agents and middlemen. These are worth investigating, as long as you don't mind the inflexibility of non-refundable, non-changeable deals. There are some bargains to be had on auction sites too, if you're prepared to bid keenly. Also, almost all airlines have their own websites (see below), offering tickets that can be just as cheap and which may be more flexible.

🌐 www.expedia.co.uk (in UK), 🌐 www.expedia.com (in US), 🌐 www.expedia.ca (in Canada)

🌐 www.lastminute.com (in UK), 🌐 www.lastminute.com.au (in Australia)

🌐 www.opodo.co.uk (in UK)

🌐 www.orbitz.com (in US)

🌐 www.travelocity.co.uk (in UK), 🌐 www.travelocity.com (in US), 🌐 www.travelocity.ca (in Canada)

🌐 www.zuji.com.au (in Australia),

🌐 www.zuji.co.nz (in New Zealand)

Airlines

Aer Lingus UK ☎ 0870 876 5000, Republic of Ireland ☎ 0818/365 000, US and Canada ☎ 1-800-IRISH-AIR; 🌐 www.aerlingus.com.

Regular flights from Dublin and Cork to eight French destinations, plus direct flights to Dublin from Chicago, LA, New York and Boston.

Air Canada ☎ 1-888-247-2262, 🌐 www.aircanada.com. Direct flights to Paris from Toronto and Montréal.

Air France UK ☎ 0870 142 4343, US ☎ 1-800-237-2747, Canada ☎ 1-800-667-2747, Australia ☎ 1300 390 190, South Africa ☎ 0861 340 340; 🌐 www.airfrance.com. Flights from the UK, US, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa to airports across France.

Air Tahiti Nui US ☎ 1-877-824-4846, Australia ☎ 02/9244 2799, New Zealand ☎ 09/308 3360; 🌐 www.airtahitinui-usa.com. Direct flights to Paris from New York and LA, and from Sydney and Auckland via the US.

Air Transat Canada ☎ 1-877-872-6728, 🌐 www.airtransat.com. Charter flights from Montréal, Ottawa, Québec and Toronto to Paris, and from Montréal to six other French cities.

American Airlines US ☎ 1-800-433-7300, Australia ☎ 1300 650 7347, New Zealand ☎ 0800 887 997; 🌐 www.aa.com. Flights from the US and Australasia to Paris.

Austrian Airlines US ☎ 1-800-843-0002, Australia ☎ 1800 642 438; 🌐 www.aa.com. From New York, Washington, Toronto, Melbourne and Sydney to Paris via Vienna.

bmi UK ☎ 0870 607 0555, Republic of Ireland ☎ 01/407 3036, US ☎ 1-800-788-0555; 🌐 www.flybmi.com. Direct to Paris, Nice and Toulouse from the UK and Ireland, and from across the US via the UK.

bmi baby UK ☎ 0870 264 2229, Republic of Ireland ☎ 1890 340 122; 🌐 www.bmibaby.com. Budget flights from UK and Ireland to Paris, Lyon, Bordeaux, Toulouse, Nice and Perpignan.

British Airways UK ☎ 0870 850 9850, Republic of Ireland ☎ 1890 626 747, US and Canada ☎ 1-800-AIRWAYS, Australia ☎ 1300 767 177, New Zealand ☎ 09/966 9777, South Africa ☎ 011/441 8600; 🌐 www.ba.com. Direct flights from UK to France, with connections via London from the US, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

Cathay Pacific Australia ☎ 13 1747, New Zealand ☎ 09/379 0861; 🌐 www.cathaypacific.com. From Australia and New Zealand via Hong Kong to Paris.

Continental Airlines ☎ 1-800-231-0856, 🌐 www.continental.com. Direct flights from New York JFK to Paris.

Delta US and Canada ☎1-800-221-1212, 🌐www.delta.com. Direct flights to Paris from New York, LA, Boston and Chicago.

easyJet UK 🌐www.easyjet.com. Budget flights to Bordeaux, Geneva, Grenoble, La Rochelle, Lyon, Marseille, Nice, Paris and Toulouse from across the UK.

Emirates Australia ☎02/9290 9700, New Zealand ☎09/968 2200, South Africa ☎0861/364 728; 🌐www.emirates.com. From Johannesburg, Brisbane, Melbourne, Perth, Sydney, Auckland and Christchurch to Paris via Dubai.

flyBE UK ☎0870 889 0908, Republic of Ireland ☎1890/925 532; 🌐www.flybe.com. Budget flights from across the UK to Angers, Avignon, Bergerac, Bordeaux, Brest, Chambéry, Geneva, Limoges, Nice, Paris, Perpignan, Rennes and Toulouse.

Gulf Air Australia ☎1300 366 337, South Africa ☎011/202 7626; 🌐www.gulfairco.com. Sydney and Johannesburg to Paris via Bahrain or Muscat.

Iberia US ☎1-800-772-4642, 🌐www.iberia.com. Flights from the US and Canada to airports across France via Madrid, Spain.

JAL (Japan Airlines) Australia ☎02/9272 1111, New Zealand ☎09/379 9906; 🌐www.jal.com. From Australia and New Zealand to Paris via Japan.

Jet2 UK ☎0871 226 1737, 🌐www.jet2.com. Budget flights to Paris, Nice and Chambéry from the north of England.

KLM Australia ☎1300 303 747, New Zealand ☎09/309 1782, South Africa ☎082/2345 747; 🌐www.klm.com. Flights from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa via Amsterdam.

Korean Air Australia ☎02/9262 6000, New Zealand ☎09/914 2000; 🌐www.koreanair.com. To Paris via Korea from Australia and New Zealand.

Lufthansa US ☎1-800-645-3880, Canada ☎1-800-563-5954, Australia ☎1300 655 727, New Zealand ☎09/303 1529, South Africa ☎0861/842538; 🌐www.lufthansa.com. From major cities in the US, plus Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, to airports across France, all via Frankfurt.

Malaysia Airlines Australia ☎03/2979 9997, New Zealand ☎0800 777 747; 🌐www.malaysia-airlines.com. From Australia and New Zealand to Paris via Kuala Lumpur.

MyTravelLite UK ☎0870 241 5333, 🌐www.mytravellite.com. From across the UK to Grenoble for the ski season.

Northwest Airlines US ☎1-800-225-2525, 🌐www.nwa.com. Flights from across the US to France via Amsterdam.

Qantas Australia ☎13 13 13, New Zealand ☎0800 808 767; 🌐www.qantas.com. Airports across Australia to Paris via Singapore.

Ryanair UK ☎0871 246 0000, Republic of Ireland ☎0818 303 030; 🌐www.ryanair.com. Budget flights to 18 French destinations from the UK and Ireland, including Biarritz, Carcassonne, Limoges, Lyon, Nantes, Paris and Rodez.

Singapore Airlines Australia ☎13 1011, New Zealand ☎0800 808 909; 🌐www.singaporeair.com. From Australia and New Zealand to Paris via Singapore.

South African Airways South Africa ☎0861 359 722, 🌐www.flysaa.com. Flights from South Africa to Paris, Lyon and Nice. Code shares with Lufthansa.

Thai Airways Australia ☎1300 651 960, New Zealand ☎09/377 3886; 🌐www.thaiair.com. Paris via Bangkok from Australia and New Zealand.

Thomsonfly.com UK ☎0870 1900 737, Republic of Ireland ☎01247 77723; 🌐www.thomsonfly.com. Budget flights from Doncaster and Coventry to Paris, and Coventry and Bournemouth to Grenoble.

United Airlines US ☎1-800-241-6522, 🌐www.united.com. Nonstop to Paris from Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, New York and Washington DC.

US Airways US and Canada ☎1-800-428-4322, 🌐www.usair.com. Direct from Philadelphia to Paris.

Agents and operators

Belle France UK ☎0870 405 4056, 🌐www.bellefrance.co.uk. Walking, cycling and boating holidays throughout France.

Bonnes Vacances Direct UK ☎0870 7607 071, 🌐www.bvdirect.co.uk. Agent for property owners in France for self-catering and B&B accommodation.

Canvas Holidays UK ☎0870 192 1154, 🌐www.canvas.co.uk. Tailor-made caravan and camping holidays.

Château to Château France ☎+33 (0)6.19.75.30.23, 🌐www.chateautochateau.com. Upmarket wine and perfume tours, cycling holidays and spa and golfing breaks.

Chez Nous UK ☎0870 197 1000, 🌐www.cheznous.com. Search over 4000 self-catering and B&B properties online.

Corsican Places UK ☎0845 330 2059, 🌐www.corsica.co.uk. Corsica specialists.

Crown Blue Line UK ☎0870 160 5634, 🌐www.crownblue.com. Good-value self-drive canal holidays all over France.

Cycling for Softies UK ☎0161/2488 282, 🌐www.cycling-for-softies.co.uk. Easy-going cycle holiday operator to rural France.

ebookers UK ☎0800/082 3000, Republic of Ireland ☎01/488 3507; 🌐www.ebookers.com. Low fares on an extensive selection of scheduled flights and package deals.

Euro-Bike & Walking Tours US & Canada
☎ 1-800-321-6060, 🌐 www.eurobike.com. Good range of bike and walking tours all over France for family groups or solo travellers.

Eurocamp UK ☎ 0870 901 9410, 🌐 www.eurocamp.co.uk. Camping holidays with kids' activities and single-parent deals.

Fields Fairway France ☎ +33 (0)3.21.33.65.64, 🌐 www.fieldsfairway.co.uk. British-run, France-based company offering all-inclusive golfing holidays.

France Afloat UK ☎ 0870 011 0538, 🌐 www.franceafloat.com. Canal and river cruises across France.

France Holiday Store 🌐 www.fr-holidaystore.co.uk. Wide range of holidays.

French Life Ski UK ☎ 0870 336 2886, 🌐 www.frenchlifeski.co.uk. Skiing package deals and accommodation across France.

French Travel Connection Australia ☎ 02/9966 1177, 🌐 www.frenchtravel.com.au. Offers large range of holidays to France.

Headwater UK ☎ 01606/720033, USA & Canada through Breakaway Adventures ☎ 1-800-567-6286, Australia & New Zealand through Adventure World, Australia ☎ 02/8913 0700, New Zealand ☎ 09/524 5118; 🌐 www.headwater.com. UK-based operator offering walking, cycling and canoeing tours throughout France.

Holiday France 🌐 www.holidayfrance.org.uk. Website that allows you to search for French tour operators by holiday type and location.

Keycamp Holidays UK ☎ 0870 700 0740, 🌐 www.keycamp.com. Caravan and camping holidays, including transport to France.

Locaboat France ☎ +33 (0)3.86.91.72.72, 🌐 www.locaboat.com. France-based company specializing in holidays on pénichettes (scaled-down replicas of commercial barges).

North South Travel UK ☎ 01245/608 291, 🌐 www.northsouthtravel.co.uk. Friendly, competitive travel agency, offering discounted fares worldwide. Profits are used to support projects in the developing world, especially the promotion of sustainable tourism.

Rascals in Paradise US ☎ 415/921-7000, 🌐 www.rascalsinparadise.com. Customized itineraries built around activities for kids.

STA Travel UK ☎ 0870 1630 026, US ☎ 1-800-781-4040, Canada ☎ 1-888-427-5639, Australia ☎ 1300 733 035, New Zealand ☎ 0508/782 872, South Africa ☎ 0861/781 781; 🌐 www.statravel.com. Worldwide specialists in independent travel; also student IDs, travel insurance, car rental, rail passes, and more. Good discounts for students and under-26s.

Trailfinders UK ☎ 0845 058 5858, Republic of Ireland ☎ 01/677 7888, Australia ☎ 1300 780 212;

🌐 www.trailfinders.com. One of the best-informed and most efficient agents for independent travellers.

Winetrails UK ☎ 01306/712 111, 🌐 www.winetrails.co.uk. Walking, cycling and gourmet holidays in the main French wine regions.

Rail, Channel Tunnel and bus contacts

Busabout UK ☎ 020/7950 1661, 🌐 www.busabout.com. In the US, Busabout passes are available from STA Travel (see above).

Eurolines UK ☎ 0870 580 8080, Republic of Ireland ☎ 01/836 6111; 🌐 www.nationalexpress.com/eurolines. For all Eurolines tickets and passes.

European Rail UK ☎ 020/7387 0444, 🌐 www.europeanrail.com. Provides itineraries and booking for a £5 fee which you can redeem against any tickets you buy.

Eurostar UK ☎ 0870 160 6600, 🌐 www.eurostar.com.

Eurotunnel UK ☎ 0870 535 3535, 🌐 www.eurotunnel.com.

International Rail UK ☎ 0870 751 5000, 🌐 www.international-rail.com. Sell InterRail and France Rail Pass.

Rail Europe (SNCF French Railways) UK ☎ 0870 584 8848, 🌐 www.raileurope.co.uk; US ☎ 1-877-257-2887, Canada ☎ 1-800-361-RAIL, 🌐 www.raileurope.com. Discounted rail fares for under-26s; also agents for Eurostar, and sell InterRail (UK only), Eurail and France Rail Pass.

Rail Plus Australia ☎ 1300 555 003 or 03/9642 8644, 🌐 www.railplus.com.au. Sells Eurail passes and tickets.

Trainseurope UK ☎ 0900 195 0101, 🌐 www.trainseurope.co.uk. InterRail passes, as well as other train tickets.

Ferry contacts

Brittany Ferries UK ☎ 0870 366 5333, 🌐 www.brittanyferries.co.uk; Republic of Ireland ☎ 021/4277 801, 🌐 www.brittanyferries.ie. Plymouth to Roscoff, Cherbourg and St-Malo and Santander (March–Nov/Dec only); Poole to Cherbourg; Portsmouth to Caen, Cherbourg and St-Malo; and Cork to Roscoff (March–Oct only).

Condor Ferries UK ☎ 0870 243 5140, 🌐 www.condorferries.co.uk. Poole to Cherbourg and St-Malo (both May–Sept); Portsmouth to Cherbourg (May–Sept); and Weymouth to St-Malo via the Channel Islands.

EuroDrive UK ☎ 0870 423 5540, 🌐 www.eurodrive.co.uk. Cut-price fares for people taking their cars across the Channel.

Ferry Savers UK ☎ 0870 990 8492, 🌐 www.ferrysavers.com. Useful for price comparisons between operators.

Irish Ferries UK ☎0870 517 1717, Republic of Ireland ☎0818/300 400; 🌐 www.irishferries.com. Rosslare to Cherbourg and Roscoff (March–Sept).
Norfolkline UK ☎0870 870 1020, 🌐 www.norfolkline.com. Dover to Dunkerque.
P&O Ferries UK ☎0870 598 0333, 🌐 www.poferries.com. Dover to Calais and Portsmouth to Bilbao.

Sea France UK ☎0870 443 1653, 🌐 www.seafrance.com. Dover to Calais.
SpeedFerries UK ☎0870 220 0570, 🌐 www.speedferries.com. Dover to Boulogne.
Superfast Ferries UK ☎0870 234 0870, 🌐 www.superfast.com. Rosyth to Zeebrugge (Belgium).
Transmanche Ferries UK ☎0800 917 1201, 🌐 www.transmancheferries.com. Newhaven to Dieppe.

Getting around

With the most extensive train network in Western Europe, France is a great country in which to travel by rail. The nationally owned French train company, SNCF (Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer), runs fast, efficient trains between the main towns. Buses cover the rural areas, but services can be rather sporadic, with departures often at awkward times. If you really want to get off the beaten track, by far the best option is to have your own transport.

Flying within France has the obvious advantage of speed, but is only recommended for those with deep pockets who are short on time. Aside from Corsica, which can also be reached by air, France's islands are serviced only by ferries, some of which are seasonal and not all of which are equipped to carry vehicles.

For independent transport, by car, motor-bike or bicycle, you'll need to be aware of a number of French road rules and peculiarities. The extensive network of inland waterways in France makes boating a very pleasant way of exploring the country. Long-distance walking is also extremely popular; for information on walking, canoeing and other similar activities, see "Sports and outdoor activities".

Approximate journey times and frequencies of the main train, bus, plane and ferry services can be found in the "Travel details" at the end of each chapter.

By train

SNCF (☎08.92.35.35.35, 🌐 www.voyages-sncf.com) has pioneered one of the most efficient, comfortable and user-friendly railway systems in the world. Its staff are generally courteous and helpful, and its trains – for the most part, fast, clean and reliable – continue, in spite of the closure of some rural lines, to serve the vast part of the country.

Trains

Pride and joy of the French rail system is the high-speed TGV (train à grande vitesse), capable of speeds of over 300kph, and its offspring Eurostar. The continually expanding TGV network has its main hub at Paris, from where a main line heads north to Lille, and two other trunk routes head south: one down the east side of the country to Marseille and the Mediterranean, the other west to Tours, Bordeaux and the Spanish frontier. Spur lines service Brittany and Normandy, the Alps, Pyrenees and Jura, while from June 2007 a brand new line should be up and running east from Paris to Reims, Nancy and Strasbourg.

As well as the traditional TGV, a new style high-speed train, the iDTGV (🌐 www.idtgv.com) was introduced in 2004 in order to compete with the budget airlines. The trains come with all mod cons, such as facilities to watch DVDs and play computer games onboard. Currently available on routes from Paris to Marseille, Montpellier, Nice and Bordeaux, tickets are sold online only and non-refundable. SNCF's Corail Téo trains run from Paris to Strasbourg, Bordeaux and Nice and, although not as fast as the TGV, have good facilities such as child-friendly carriages with extra space, roomy changing areas, and bottle warmers. Meanwhile, if you're travelling overnight, the Corail Lunéa are comfortable sleeper trains. The lowest class train running in France is the TER, or regional express train, which you'll find away from all the major routes.

MAIN FRENCH RAIL ROUTES

Aside from the regular lines there are a number of special tourist trains, usually not part of the SNCF system or covered by normal rail passes, though some offer a discount to rail pass holders. One of the most popular is the spectacular Train Jaune which winds its way up through the Pyrenees (see p.836).

Tickets and fares

Tickets for all SNCF trains can be bought online (see p.35) or at any train station (gare SNCF). It's easiest to use the counter service, though if there are language problems or long queues, there is a touch-screen computerized system which gives instructions in English available in most stations. All tickets – but not passes – must be validated in the orange machines located beside the entrance to the platforms, and it's an offence not to follow the instruction, Composez votre billet ("validate your ticket").

Regional timetables and leaflets covering particular lines are available free at stations. The word Autocar (often abbreviated to car) at the top of a column signifies that the route is covered by an SNCF bus service, on which rail tickets and passes are valid. Timetables are divided into période blanche (normal or white period), and période bleue (off-peak or blue period), the latter being the cheapest times to travel.

Prices are reasonable, at least compared with the UK, with sample one-way fares from Paris to Toulouse by TGV coming in at around €80/£55/$102, and from Paris to Nice €100/£69/$127, though cheaper fares are available on some routes with the new iDTGV (see p.35). The only differences between TGV and other train fares are that a reservation charge is included in the ticket price (seat reservations are obligatory) and you have to pay a supplement on certain peak-hour trains (période de pointe), generally on Friday and Sunday evenings, Monday mornings and public holidays. On night trains an extra €15 or so will buy you a couchette – well worth it if you're making a long haul and don't want to waste a day recovering from a sleepless night.

Discounts and rail passes

There are plenty of discounts available on rail travel, with a certain number of discounted fares allocated to each service. The Découverte fares offer 25 percent discounts to a whole range of people: couples travelling on return tickets; adults travelling with children under the age of 12; 12 to 25-year-olds; and over-60s. There is also a Découverte Séjour discount available on return tickets for journeys over 200km which include a Saturday night away. As well as the Découverte fares, there are usually a limited number of tickets on each service available at up to 50 per cent less if you book at least two weeks in advance. Check online for details.

SNCF also offers a range of travel cards, which are valid for one year, and can be purchased from a number of sources: on their website; through Rail Europe; through most travel agents in France and from main gares SNCF. These cost from €50 and apply to the same groups as the Découverte fares listed above, but guarantee the reduction (useful in case all the cheaper fares have already been sold). In addition, those aged between 26 and 59 can purchase a Carte Escapades (€85), which entitles the holder up to a 40 percent reduction on normal, white-period fares.

Non-Europeans also have the option of picking up the France Rail Pass before arriving in France. For information on this and other passes available outside the country, see "Getting there" (p.30).

By bus

The most convenient bus services are those run by SNCF, which join train stations and serve areas not accessible by rail. In addition to SNCF buses, private, municipal and departmental buses can be useful for local and some cross-country journeys, though if you want to see much outside the main towns be prepared for early starts and careful planning – the timetable is often constructed to suit working, market and school hours. As a rule, all buses are cheaper and slower than trains.

Larger towns usually have a gare routière (bus station), often next to the gare SNCF. However, the private bus companies don't always work together and you'll frequently find them leaving from an array of different points (the local tourist office should be able to help locate them).

In addition to the SNCF, Eurolines (see p.31) runs a number of routes through the country with prices starting at around €30.

By ferry

The majority of France's coastal islands, which are concentrated around Brittany and the Côte d'Azur, can only be reached by ferry. Small local companies run services, with timetables and prices varying according to season. Some routes have a reduced schedule or cease to operate completely in winter months, while in high season booking ahead is recommended on all but the most frequent services. Information on these local companies is listed in the Brittany and Normandy and Côte d'Azur chapters in the Guide. For details of ferry services from the mainland to Corsica, see p.1206.

By air

Unless you're travelling from the mainland to Corsica, you're unlikely to need to use any of France's domestic air services, though if you've come from outside Europe you may be able to get a good deal on add-on flights (see p.28). Air France operates the most routes within the country, although competition is hotting up, with the likes of easyJet running internal cut-price flights from Paris to Toulouse, Nice and Geneva. You may also be able to pick up an internal flight on some of the foreign airlines (such as Lufthansa) whose routes include intermediate stops within France. For details of airlines operating within France, see "Getting there" p.32.

By car

Driving in France can be a real pleasure, with a magnificent network of autoroutes

which provide huge, sweeping views of the countryside. Happily, because of the size and shape of the country, congestion is rarely a problem. This is equally true of the older main roads, or routes nationales (marked RN116 or just N116, for example, on signs and maps), and the minor routes départementales or itinéraire bis (marked with a D). Do not shun these latter: you can often travel for kilometres across country, seeing few other cars, on a road as broad and well maintained as a major road. These alternative routes are usually signposted with special green "Bison Futé" road signs.

Of course, there are times when it's wiser not to drive: most obviously in big urban agglomerations; around major seaside resorts in high season; and at peak holiday migrations such as the beginning and end of the month-long August holiday, and the notoriously congested weekends nearest July 14 and August 15.

Practicalities

US, Canadian, Australian, New Zealand, South African and all EU driving licences are valid in France, though an International Driver's Licence makes life easier. The minimum driving age is 18 and you must hold a full (not a provisional) licence. Drivers are required to carry their licence with them when driving, and you should also have the insurance papers with you in the car. If the vehicle is rented, its registration document (carte grise) must also be carried.

All the major car manufacturers have garages and service stations in France, which can help if you run into mechanical difficulties. You can find them listed in the Yellow Pages of the phone book under "Garages d'automobiles"; for breakdowns, look under "Dépannages". If you have an accident or break-in, you should contact the local police – keeping a copy of their report – in order to make an insurance claim. Within Europe, most car insurance policies cover taking your own car to France; check with your insurer while planning your trip. However, you're advised to take out extra cover for motoring assistance in case your car breaks down.

Note that petrol stations in rural areas tend to be few and far between, and those

Driving distances (in km)

	Avignon	Biarritz	Bordeaux	Calais	Dijon	Grenoble	La Rochelle	Le Havre	Lyon
Avignon		630	576	990	424	220	751	889	235
Biarritz	630		203	174	851	830	387	887	846
Bordeaux	576	203		871	641	679	184	686	593
Calais	990	174	871		569	867	702	272	751
Dijon	424	851	641	569		274	568	504	187
Grenoble	220	830	679	867	274		658	742	108
La Rochelle	751	387	184	702	568	658		464	552
Le Havre	889	887	686	272	504	742	464		643
Lyon	235	846	593	751	187	108	552	643
Marseille	118	702	645	1062	507	268	771	948	313
Montpellier	101	550	486	993	492	293	617	872	301
Nice	265	874	818	1144	598	322	934	1049	426
Paris	693	787	582	268	311	547	453	197	452
Perpignan	253	510	443	1098	635	431	610	964	448
Reims	715	938	730	262	274	554	597	327	461
St Malo	1034	730	539	506	633	807	321	240	695
Strasbourg	734	1146	948	591	310	514	843	637	441
Toulouse	334	312	253	937	617	521	409	768	471
Tours	713	551	344	476	394	530	232	285	427

that do exist usually open only during normal shop hours – don't count on being able to buy petrol at night and on Sunday. An increasing number of stations are equipped with automated 24-hour pumps, but many of these only work with French bank cards. Petrol prices have risen steadily in recent years and at the time of writing were around €1.29 a litre for unleaded (sans plomb), €1.25 a litre for four-star (super) and €1 a litre for diesel (gazole or gasol); you'll find prices lowest at out-of-town supermarkets.

Most autoroutes have tolls: rates vary, but to give you an idea, travelling only by motorway from Calais to Montpellier would cost you roughly €64; pay in cash or by credit card at the frequent tollgates (péages). You can work out routes and costs of both petrol and tolls online at the useful @ www.viamichelin.com.

Rules of the road

Since the French drive on the right, drivers of right-hand-drive British cars must adjust their headlights to dip to the right. This is most easily done by sticking on black glare deflectors, which can be bought at most motor accessory shops, and at the Channel ferry ports or the Eurostar terminal. It is more complicated if your car is fitted with modern High-Intensity Discharge (HID) or halogen-type lights; check with your dealer about how to adjust these well in advance.

It is a legal requirement that cars not fitted with flashing warning lights must carry a red warning triangle (and it's highly recommended to carry one in any case, since lights can fail or you might break down on a blind corner). You are also strongly advised to carry a spare set of bulbs, a fire extinguisher and a first-aid kit. Seat belts are compulsory and children under 10 years are not allowed to sit in the front of the car. It is illegal to use a hand-held mobile phone while driving.

The law of priorité à droite – giving way to traffic coming from your right, even when it is coming from a minor road – is being slowly phased out as it's a major cause of acci-

Marseille	Montpellier	Nice	Paris	Perpignan	Reims	St Malo	Strasbourg	Toulouse	Tours
118	101	265	693	253	715	1034	734	334	713
702	550	874	787	510	938	730	1146	312	551
645	486	818	582	443	730	539	948	253	344
1062	993	1144	268	1098	262	506	591	937	476
507	492	598	311	635	274	633	310	617	394
268	293	322	547	431	554	807	514	521	530
771	617	934	453	610	597	321	843	409	232
948	872	1049	197	964	327	240	637	768	285
313	301	426	452	448	461	695	441	471	427
	162	190	769	308	775	982	758	388	704
162		326	724	148	761	882	743	231	627
190	326		872	471	874	1131	740	558	857
769	724	872		823	147	370	441	660	228
308	148	471	823		883	931	890	197	682
775	761	874	147	883		501	327	789	367
982	882	1131	370	931	501		808	728	280
758	743	740	441	890	327	808		912	637
388	231	558	660	197	789	728	912		491
704	627	857	228	682	367	280	637	491

dents. However, it still applies on some roads in built-up areas and the occasional roundabout, so it pays to be vigilant at junctions. A sign showing a yellow diamond on a white background indicates that you have right of way, while the same sign with a diagonal black slash across it warns you that vehicles emerging from the right have priority. Stop signs mean you must stop completely; Cédez le passage means "Give way".

If you have an accident while driving, you must fill in and sign a constat d'accident (declaration form) or, if another car is also involved, a constat amiable (jointly agreed declaration); these forms should be provided with the car's insurance documents. For minor driving offences such as speeding, the police can impose on-the-spot fines. For anything more serious, you could lose your licence.

Unless otherwise indicated speed limits are: 130kph (80mph) on autoroutes; 110kph (68mph) on dual carriageways; 90kph (55mph) on other roads; and 50kph (31mph) in towns. In wet weather, and for drivers with less than two years' experience, these limits are 110kph (68mph), 100kph (62mph) and 80kph (50mph) respectively; the town limit is the same. The police are cracking down hard on speeding in a bid to reduce the shock-

Road information

For up-to-the-minute information regarding traffic jams and road works on autoroutes throughout France, ring ☎08.92.68.10.77 (€0.34/min; French only) or consult the bilingual website 🌐www.autoroutes.fr. Traffic information for other roads can be obtained from the Bison Futé recorded information service (☎08.26.02.20.22; €0.15/min; French only) or their website 🌐www.bison-fute.equipement.gouv.fr.

ingly high accident rate in France. Radars are being installed along main roads and there are stiff penalties for driving violations, which can mean fines of up to €9000 and a suspended licence. The standard fine for exceeding the speed limit by 20kph (12mph), for example, is €90; above 40kph (25mph) you will not only be fined but will also have to go to court. The alcohol limit is 0.05 percent (50 mg per litre of blood) and random breath tests are increasingly common.

Car rental

Car rental in France costs upwards of €70 a day and €250 for a week, but can be cheaper if arranged before you leave home or online. You'll find the big firms represented at airports and in most major towns and cities; addresses are detailed throughout the Guide. Renting from airports normally includes a surcharge. Local firms can be cheaper but most don't offer one-way rentals and you need to check the small print carefully.

The cost of car rental includes car insurance, though this will only cover the basic legal requirement. Under the standard contract you are liable for an excess (franchise) of around €500 (for the smallest car) for any damage to the vehicle – most firms accept a valid credit card rather than cash. You should return the car with a full tank of fuel to avoid paying an exorbitant fuel charge.

North Americans and Australians in particular should be forewarned that it's difficult to arrange the rental of a car with automatic transmission; if you can't drive a manual you should try to book an automatic well in advance, possibly before you leave home, and be prepared to pay a much higher price for it.

Most rental companies will only deal with people over 25 unless an extra insurance premium, typically around €20–23 per day, is paid (and you still must be over 21 and have driven for at least one year). OTU Voyages (☎01.55.82.32.32, 🌐www.otu.fr), the student travel agency, can arrange car rental for drivers under 25, with prices beginning at €110 for a weekend.

Car rental agencies

Alamo US ☎1-800-462-5266, 🌐www.alamo.com.

Apex New Zealand ☎0800 939597 🌐www.apexrentals.co.nz.

Auto Europe US and Canada ☎1-888-223-5555, 🌐www.autoeurope.com.

Avis UK ☎08706 060100, Republic of Ireland ☎021/428 1111, US ☎1-800-230-4898, Canada ☎1-800-272-5871, Australia ☎13 63 33 or 02/9353 9000, New Zealand ☎09/526 2847 or 0800 655111, South Africa ☎0861 113 748; 🌐www.avis.com.

Budget UK ☎08701 565656, Republic of Ireland ☎09/0662 7711, US ☎1-800-527-0700, Canada ☎1-800-268-8900, Australia ☎1300 362 848, New Zealand ☎0800 283438; 🌐www.budget.com.

Dollar US ☎1-866-434-2226, 🌐www.dollar.com.

Enterprise Rent-a-Car US ☎1-800-261-7331, 🌐www.enterprise.com.

Europcar UK ☎08706 075000, Republic of Ireland ☎01/614 2888, US & Canada ☎1-877-940 6900, Australia ☎1300 131 390; 🌐www.europcar.com.

Europe by Car US ☎1-800-223-1516, 🌐www.europebycar.com.

Hertz UK ☎020/7026 0077, Republic of Ireland ☎01/870 5777, US ☎1-800-654-3131, Canada ☎1-800-263-0600, Australia ☎08/9921 4052, New Zealand ☎0800 654321, South Africa ☎021 935 4800; 🌐www.hertz.com.

Holiday Autos UK ☎0871 222 3200, Republic of Ireland ☎01/872 9366, Australia ☎1300 554 432, New Zealand ☎0800 144040; 🌐www.holidayautos.co.uk.

Buy-back leasing schemes

If you are not resident in an EU country and will be touring France for between 17 days and six months, it's worth investigating the special buy-back leasing schemes operated by Peugeot ("Peugeot Open Europe") and Renault ("Renault Eurodrive"). Under these deals, you purchase a new car tax-free and the manufacturer guarantees to buy it back from you for an agreed price at the end of the period. In general, the difference between the purchase and repurchase price works out considerably less per day than the equivalent cost of car hire. Further details are available from Peugeot and Renault dealers and online at 🌐www.peugeot-openeurope.com and 🌐www.eurodrive.renault.com.

Canal and river trips

With over 7000km of navigable rivers and canals, boating can be one of the best and most relaxed ways of exploring France. Except on parts of the Moselle, there's no charge for use of the waterways, and you can travel without a permit for up to six months in a year. For information on maximum dimensions, documentation, regulations and so forth, contact Voies Navigables de France (VNF) (☎03.21.63.24.24, 🌐www.vnf.fr), which has information (in French) on boating throughout France, and details of firms that rent out boats. Expect to pay between €800 and €2000 per week, depending on the season and level of comfort, for a four- to six-person boat. Details of firms offering canal and river holidays can be found on p.33. For a full list of rental firms operating in France contact the Fédération des Industries Nautiques (☎01.44.37.04.00, 🌐www.france-nautic.com).

The principal areas for boating are Brittany, Burgundy, Picardy-Flanders, Alsace and Champagne. Brittany's canals join up with the Loire, but this is only navigable as far as Angers. Other waterways permit numerous permutations, including joining up via the Rhône and Saône with the Canal du Midi in Languedoc and then northwestwards to Bordeaux and the Atlantic. The eighteenth-century Canal de Bourgogne and 300-year-old Canal du Midi are fascinating examples of early canal engineering. The latter, together with its continuation the Canal du Sète à Rhône, passes within easy reach of several interesting areas.

The through-journey from the Channel to the Mediterranean requires some planning. The Canal de Bourgogne has an inordinate number of locks, while other waterways demand considerable skill and experience – the Rhône and Saône rivers, for example, have tricky currents. The most direct route is from Le Havre to just beyond Paris, then south along either Canal du Loing et de Briare or Canal du Nivernais to the Canal Latéral à la Loire, which you follow as far as Digoin in southern Burgundy, where it crosses the River Loire and meets the Canal du Centre. You follow the latter as far as Châlon, from where you continue south on the Saône and Rhône until you reach the Mediterranean at Port St-Louis in the Camargue.

National UK ☎08704 004581, US ☎1-800-CAR-RENT, Australia ☎02/131045, New Zealand ☎03/366 5574; 🌐www.nationalcar.com.

SIXT Republic of Ireland ☎1850 206088, 🌐www.irishcarrentals.ie.

Suncars UK ☎08705 005566, Republic of Ireland ☎1850/201416; 🌐www.suncars.com.

Thrifty UK ☎01494/751600, Republic of Ireland ☎0800 2728728, US & Canada ☎1-800-847-4389, Australia ☎1300 367 227, New Zealand ☎0800 737070; 🌐www.thrifty.com.

By bicycle

Bicycles (vélos) have high status in France, where cyclists are given respect both on the roads and as customers at restaurants and hotels. In addition, local authorities are actively promoting cycling, not only with city cycle lanes, but comprehensive networks linking rural areas (frequently utilizing disused rail-ways). Most towns have well-stocked repair shops, where parts are normally cheaper than in Britain or the US. However, if you're using a foreign-made bike with non-standard metric wheels, it's a good idea to carry spare tyres.

The train network runs various schemes for cyclists, all of them covered by the free leaflet, Train et Vélo, available from most stations. A number of TGVs and other trains (marked with a bicycle in the timetable) allow you to take a bike free either in the dedicated bike racks or in the luggage van as long as there's space; in the latter case, it's a good idea to reserve a slot several days in advance during busy periods, though this will cost you €10. Otherwise, you can take your dismantled bike, packed in a carrier, on TGVs and other trains with sufficiently large luggage racks. Another option is to send your bike parcelled up as registered luggage for a fee of €39; delivery should take two days (though the service doesn't operate at weekends). Eurostar allows you to take your bicycle as part of your baggage allowance provided it's dismantled and packed in a bag no more than 120cm by 90cm (phone ☎08702 649899 for further details). If you're already travelling with more than two pieces of luggage, however, they encourage you to send your bike unaccompanied with their registered baggage service, Esprit Europe (☎08705 850850, 🌐www.espriteurope.co.uk), which costs £20 one way and has a guaranteed arrival time of 24 hours; you can register up to 24 hours before departure. Ferries usually take bikes free (though you may need to register first), as do airlines such as British Airways and Air France, though some no-frills airlines charge – remember to check when making your booking.

Bikes – usually mountain bikes (vélos tout terrain or VTT) – are often available to rent from campsites and hostels, as well as from specialist cycle shops and some tourist offices; they usually cost around €15 per day. The bikes are often not insured, however, and you will be presented with the bill for a replacement if it's stolen or damaged; check your travel insurance policy for cover.

As for maps, a minimum requirement is the IGN 1:100,000 series (see p.75) – the smallest scale that carries contours. The UK's national cyclists' association, the CTC (☎08708 730060, 🌐www.ctc.org.

uk), can suggest routes and supply advice for members (£33 a year or £53 for a family of four, and £12 for under 26 years). They run a particularly good insurance scheme. Companies offering specialist bike touring holidays are listed on p.33.

By scooter and motorbike

Scooters are relatively easy to find and, though they're not built for long-distance travel, are ideal for pottering around local areas. Places that rent out bicycles often also rent out scooters; expect to pay in the region of €40 a day for a 50cc machine, less for longer periods. No licence is needed for bikes of 50cc and under, but for you'll need a valid motorbike licence for anything larger.

Rental prices for a motorbike are around €55 a day for a 125cc bike; expect to leave a hefty deposit by cash or credit card too – over €1000 is the norm – which you may lose in the event of damage or theft. Remember to take along your passport or some other form of photographic identity. Crash helmets are compulsory on all bikes, whatever the size, and the headlight must be switched on at all times. You are recommended to carry a first-aid kit and a set of spare bulbs.

French addresses

Addresses in France are pretty straightforward, beginning with the house name or number, street name and town, followed by region and postal code. Occasionally you'll come across the name of a town followed by the word cedex; this means simply that the recipient collects their mail from the post office rather than having it delivered. The terms bis and ter following a house number indicate a subdivision of the building, equivalent to A or B in the UK or the US.

Accommodation

At most times of the year, you can turn up in any French town and find a room or a place in a campsite. Booking a couple of nights in advance can be reassuring, however, as it saves you the effort of trudging round and ensures that you know what you'll be paying; many hoteliers, campsite managers and hostel managers speak at least a little English. In most places, you'll be able to get a simple double for €30 or so, though expect to pay around €45 for a reasonable level of comfort. Paris is more expensive, however, with equivalent rates of roughly €40 and €80. We've detailed a selection of hotels throughout the Guide, and given a price range for each (see box below); as a general rule the areas around train stations have the highest density of cheap hotels.

Problems may arise between mid-July and the end of August, when the French take their own vacations en masse. During this period, hotel and hostel accommodation can be hard to come by, particularly in the coastal resorts, and you may find yourself falling back on local tourist offices for help. In addition, big cities can be difficult throughout the year: we've given a greater range of possibilities for them in the Guide and very detailed accommodation listings for Paris, the worst case of all.

All tourist offices can provide lists of hotels, hostels, campsites and bed-and-breakfast possibilities, and some offer a booking service, though they can't guarantee rooms at a particular price. With campsites, you can be more relaxed about finding an empty space, unless you're touring with a caravan or camper van or looking for a place on the Côte d'Azur.

Hotels

Most French hotels are graded from zero to five stars. The price more or less corresponds to the number of stars, though the system is a little haphazard, having more to do with ratios of bathrooms per guest and

Accommodation price categories

All the hotels and guesthouses listed in this book have been price coded according to the scale below. The prices quoted are for the cheapest available double room in high season, including tax (7 percent), and without breakfast, although remember that many of the cheap places will also have more expensive rooms with en-suite facilities. For accommodation in the ① bracket, expect simple rooms, with communal (dans le palier) showers (douches) and toilets (WC or toilettes); there may also be a charge to use them. At ②, rooms tend to come with their own bath or shower, though not necessarily a toilet, whilst ③ will probably guarantee you a separate bathroom (salle de bain) and TV. At around ④, accommodation will be comfortable and en suite, if not state-of-the-art; anything from ⑤ upwards tends towards luxury, with all the mod cons you would expect, except in the larger cities, where luxury rooms tend to start at around ⑥. Rooms from ⑦ upwards will be increasingly plush, and there will be decent breakfast buffets. By the time they get to a ⑧, sumptuous rooms will often be accompanied by a sauna, gym, swimming pool and many other services.

- ① Under €30
- ② €30–40
- ③ €40–55

- ④ €55–70
- ⑤ €70–85
- ⑥ €85–100

- ⑦ €100–125
- ⑧ €125–150
- ⑨ Over €150

handpicked
hotels...
perfect prices!

...in France

2 star
from £21*

inc. breakfast

3 star
from

£28*
inc. breakfast

4 star
from

£31*
inc. breakfast

lowest prices
GUARANTEED
highest quality

2 star to deluxe, hotels and apartments handpicked, vetted and honestly reviewed city info, map and hotel brochure provided award winning service from our knowledgeable staff book now on:

www.hotelconnect.co.uk

0845 230 8888

*prices are per person per night based on a twin/double room, subject to availability

hotelconnect.co.uk

so forth than genuine quality, and some unclassified and single-star hotels can actually be very good. What you get for your money varies enormously between establishments; for a general guide see the box on p.45. Single rooms – if the hotel has any – are only marginally cheaper than doubles, so sharing always slashes costs, especially since most hotels willingly provide rooms with extra beds for three or more people at good discounts.

Big cities tend to have a good variety of cheap establishments; in small towns or villages, you may not be so lucky. Swanky resorts, particularly those on the Côte d'Azur, have very high prices in July and August, but even these are still cheaper than Paris, which is far more expensive than the rest of the country. If you're staying for more than three nights in a hotel it's often possible to negotiate a lower price, particularly out of season.

Breakfast, which is not normally included in the quoted price, will add between €5 and €15 per person to a bill, sometimes more – though there is no obligation to take it. The cost of eating dinner in a hotel's restaurant can be a more important factor to bear in mind when deciding where to stay. It's actually illegal for hotels to insist on your taking half board (demi-pension), though you'll come across some that do, especially during the summer peak. This is not always such a bad thing, however, since the food may be excellent and you can sometimes get a real bargain.

Note that many family-run hotels close for two or three weeks a year in low season. In smaller towns and villages they may also close for one or two nights a week, usually Sunday or Monday. Details are given where relevant in the Guide, but dates change from year to year and some places may decide to close for a few days in low season if they have no bookings. The best precaution is to phone ahead to be sure.

A very useful option, especially if you're driving and are looking for somewhere late at night, are the chain hotels located at motorway exits and on the outskirts of major towns. They may be soulless, but you can count on a decent and reliable standard. Among the cheapest (from around €26 for a three-person room with communal toilets and showers) and biggest is the one-star Formule 1 chain (☎08.92.68.56.85, @www.hotelformule1.com). Other budget chains include B&B (☎08.92.78.29.29, @www.hotel-bb.com), the slightly more comfortable Première Classe (☎08.25.00.30.03, @www.premiereclasse.fr) and Etap Hôtel (☎08.92.68.89.00, @www.etaphotel.com). More upmarket but still affordable chains are Ibis (☎08.92.68.66.86, @www.ibishotel.com) and Campanile (☎01.64.62.46.00, @www.campanile.fr), where en-suite rooms with satellite TV and direct-dial phones cost from around €40–50.

There are a number of well-respected hotel federations in France. The biggest and most useful of these is Logis de France (☎01.45.84.83.84, @www.logis-de-france.fr), an association of over 3500 hotels nationwide. They produce a free annual guide, available in French tourist offices (see p.79), from Logis de France itself and from member hotels. Two other, more upmarket federations worth mentioning are Châteaux & Hôtels de France (☎01.72.72.92.02, @www.chateauxhotels.com) and the Relais du Silence (☎01.44.49.90.00, @www.silencehotel.com), both of which offer high-class accommodation in beautiful older properties, often in rural locations. Over thirty cities in France participate in the "Bon Weekend en Villes" programme, whereby you get two nights for the price of one at participating hotels. In most cases the offer is restricted to the winter period (Nov–March). Further details are available from tourist offices or online at @www.bon-week-end-en-villes.com.

Bed and breakfast and self-catering

In country areas, in addition to standard hotels, you will come across chambres d'hôtes – bed-and-breakfast accommodation in someone's house, château or farm. Though the quality varies widely, on the whole standards have improved dramatically in recent years and the best can offer more character and greater value for money than an equivalently priced hotel. If you're lucky, the owners may also provide traditional home-cooking and a great insight into

Apres De L'eglise

French country villa in Champagne

For further information regarding this property

www.champagnevilla.com

For reservation please contact Glenis Foster
enquiries@apresdeleglise.com

French life. In general, prices range between €30 and €70 for two people including breakfast; payment is almost always expected in cash. Some offer meals on request (tables d'hôtes), usually evenings only.

If you're planning to stay a week or more in any one place it might be worth considering renting self-catering accommodation. This will generally consist of self-contained country cottages known as gîtes. Many gîtes are in converted barns or farm outbuildings, though some can be quite grand. "Gîtes Panda" are gîtes located in a national park or other protected area and are run on environmentally friendly lines.

You can get lists of both gîtes and chambres d'hôtes from the government-funded agency Gîtes de France (☎01.49.70.75.75, @www.gites-de-france.fr); on the website you can search for accommodation by type or theme as well as by area (for example, you could select a gîte near fishing or riding opportunities). In addition, every year the organization publishes a number of national guides, such as Nouveaux Gîtes Ruraux (listing new addresses), Chambres et Tables d'Hôtes and Chambres d'Hôtes de Charme, all of which cost around €20, and more comprehensive departmental guides which include photos (around €10–20). All these guides are available online or from departmental offices of Gîtes de France, as well as from bookstores and tourist offices. Tourist offices will also have lists of places in their area which are not affiliated to Gîtes de France.

Hostels and student accommodation

At between €10 and €15 per night for a dormitory bed, sometimes with breakfast thrown in, youth hostels – auberges de jeunesse – are invaluable for single travellers of any age on a budget. Some now offer rooms, occasionally en suite, but they don't necessarily work out cheaper than hotels – particularly if you've had to pay a taxi fare to reach them. However, many allow you to cut costs by eating in the hostels' cheap canteens, while in a few you can prepare your own meals in the communal kitchens. In the Guide we have given exact prices for the cost of a dormitory bed.

In addition to those belonging to the two French hostelling associations listed below, there are now also several independent hostels, particularly in Paris. At these, dorm beds cost €15–20 with breakfast included, though these tend to be party places with an emphasis on good times rather than a good night's sleep.

A few large towns provide hostel accommodation in Foyers des Jeunes Travailleurs, residential hostels for young workers and students, where you can usually get a private room for upwards of €10. On the whole they are more luxurious than youth hostels and normally have a good cafeteria or canteen. These are listed in the Guide, or ask at local tourist offices. During July & August, there's also the possibility of staying in student accommodation in university towns and cities at prices similar to hostels. Contact CROUS (☎01.40.51.55.55, @www.crous-paris.fr) for further information.

Youth hostel associations

Slightly confusingly, there are two rival French hostelling associations – the Fédération Unie des Auberges de Jeunesse and the much smaller Ligue Française (see below). Normally, to stay at FUAJ or LFAJ hostels you must show a current Hostelling International (HI) membership card. It's usually cheaper and easier to join before you leave home, provided your national youth hostel association is a full member of HI. Alternatively, you can purchase an HI card in certain French hostels for €15.25 (€10.70 for those under 26), or buy individual "welcome stamps" at a rate of €2.90 per night; after six nights you are entitled to the HI card.

France

Fédération Unie des Auberges de Jeunesse

(FUAJ) ☎01.44.89.87.27, 🌐www.fuaj.org.

Ligue Française pour les Auberges de

Jeunesse (LFAJ) ☎01.44.16.78.78, 🌐www.auberges-de-jeunesse.com.

UK and Ireland

Youth Hostel Association (YHA) England and

Wales ☎0870 770 8868, 🌐www.yha.org.uk.

Scottish Youth Hostel Association

☎01786/891 400, 🌐www.syha.org.uk.

Irish Youth Hostel Association Republic of Ireland ☎01/830 4555, 🌐www.irelandyha.org.

Hostelling International Northern Ireland

☎028/9032 4733, 🌐www.hini.org.uk.

US and Canada

Hostelling International-American Youth

Hostels US ☎1-301-495-1240, 🌐www.hiayh.org.

Hostelling International Canada ☎1-800-663-

5777, 🌐www.hihostels.ca.

Australia, New Zealand and South Africa

Australia Youth Hostels Association Australia

☎02/9565 1699, 🌐www.yha.com.au.

Youth Hostelling Association New Zealand

☎0800 278 299 or 03/379 9970, 🌐www.yha.co.nz.

Gîtes d'étape and refuges

In the countryside, an alternative hostel-style option exists in the form of gîtes d'étape. Aimed primarily at hikers and long-distance bikers, gîtes d'étape are often run by the local village or municipality and are less formal than hostels, providing bunk beds and primitive kitchen and washing facilities from around €10 per person. They are marked on the large-scale IGN walkers' maps and listed in the individual GR Topo-guides (see "Walking and climbing" p.61). In addition, mountain areas are well supplied with refuge huts, mostly run by the Club Alpin Français (CAF), or the Fédération Française des Clubs Alpins et de Montagne (FFCAM; ☎01.53.72.87.00, 🌐www.ffcam.fr). These huts, generally only open in summer, offer dorm accommodation and meals, and are the only available shelter once you are above the villages. Costs range from €10 to €15 for the night, or half of this if you're a member of a climbing organization affiliated to FFCAM. Meals – invariably four courses – cost around €12, which is good value when you consider that in some cases supplies have to be brought up by mule or helicopter.

More information can be found either online or in the guides Gîtes d'Étape et de Séjours (€10), published by Gîtes de France (see opposite).

Camping

Practically every village and town in France has at least one campsite to cater for the thousands of people who spend their holiday under canvas. Most sites open from some time in April to September or October. The vast majority are graded into four categories, from one to four stars, by the local authority. One- and two-star sites are very basic, and tend to be quite crowded. There are usually toilets and showers (not necessarily with hot water) but little else, and standards of cleanliness are not always brilliant. At the other extreme, four-star sites are far more spacious, have hot-water showers and electrical hook-ups. Most will have a swimming pool (sometimes heated), washing machines, a shop and sports facilities, and will provide refreshments or meals in high season. At three-star sites you can expect a selection of these facilities and less spacious plots. A further designation, Camping Qualité (🌐www.campingqualite.com), has been introduced to indicate those campsites with particularly high standards of hygiene, service and privacy, while the Clef Verte (🌐www.laclefverte.org) label is awarded to sites run along environmentally friendly lines. For those who really like to get away from it all, camping à la ferme – on somebody's farm – is a good, simple option. Lists of sites are available at local tourist offices or from Gîtes de France (see p.48).

The Fédération Française de Camping et de Caravaning (☎01.42.72.84.08, 🌐www.fcc.fr) publishes an annual guide (€16) covering 11,000 campsites, details of which can also be found online on the excellent Camping France website (🌐www.camping-france.com). If you'd rather have everything organized for you, a number of companies specialize in camping holidays; see "Getting there" p.33 for details.

Though charging systems vary, most places charge per site and per person, usually including a car, while others apply a global figure. As a rough guide, a family of four with a tent and car should expect to pay from €10 per day at a one-star site, rising to €30 or more at a four-star. In peak season it's wise to book ahead, and note that many of the big sites now have caravans and even chalet bungalows for rent.

If you're planning to do a lot of camping, buying an international camping carnet

before you leave is a good investment. The carnet gives discounts at member sites and serves as useful identification. Many campsites will take it instead of making you surrender your passport during your stay, and it covers you for third-party insurance when camping. It costs £6.50/$18, and is available to members of the following; RAC (🌐www.rac.co.uk), the Camping and Caravanning Club (☎0845 130 7631, 🌐www.campingandcaravanningclub.co.uk), and members of the major motoring organizations in the US, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

Lastly, a word of caution: never camp rough (camping sauvage) on anyone's land without first asking permission. If the dogs don't get you, the guns might – farmers have been known to shoot first, and ask later. On the other hand, a politely phrased request for permission will as often as not get positive results. Camping on public land is not officially permitted, but is widely practised by the French, and if you're discreet you're unlikely to have problems. On beaches, it's best to camp out only where other people are doing so.

Food and drink

France is famous for producing some of the most sublime food in the world, whether you're talking about the rarefied delicacies of haute cuisine or the robust, no-nonsense fare served up at country inns. Nevertheless, French cuisine has taken a bit of a knocking in recent years. The wonderful ingredients are still there, as every town and village market testifies, but those little family restaurants serving classic dishes that celebrate the region's produce – and where the bill is less than €15 – are increasingly hard to find. Don't be afraid to ask locals for their recommendations; this will usually elicit strong views and sound advice. For more on where to eat in France, see the "Cafés, bistros and brasseries" colour section.

In the rarefied world of haute cuisine, where the top chefs are national celebrities, a battle has long been raging between traditionalists, determined to preserve the purity of French cuisine, and those who experiment with different flavours from around the world to create novel combinations. At this level, French food is still brilliant – in both camps – and the good news is that prices are continuing to come down.

Many gourmet places offer weekday lunch-time menus where you can sample culinary genius for under €40.

France is also a great place for foreign cuisine, in particular North African, Caribbean (known as Antillais) and Asiatic. Moroccan, Thai or Vietnamese restaurants are not necessarily cheap options but they are usually good value for money.

Breakfast and lunch

A croissant or pain au chocolat (a chocolate-filled, light pastry) in a café or bar, with tea, hot chocolate or coffee, is generally the best-value way to eat breakfast, costing around €4 to €5. If there are no croissants left, it's perfectly acceptable to go and buy your own at the nearest baker or pâtisserie. The standard hotel breakfast comprises bread and/or pastries, jam and a jug of coffee or tea, and orange juice if you're lucky, from around €5 or €6. More expensive places might offer a buffet comprising cereals, fruit, yoghurt and the works.

The main meal of the day is traditionally eaten at lunchtime, usually between noon and 2pm. Midday, and sometimes in the evening, you'll find places offering a plat du jour (daily special) for €8–12, or formules, limited menus typically offering a main dish and either a starter or a dessert for a set price. Crêpes, or pancakes with fillings, served up at ubiquitous crêperies, are popular lunchtime food. The savoury buckwheat variety (galettes) provide the main course; sweet, white-flour crêpes are dessert. They can be very tasty, but are generally poor value in comparison with a restaurant meal; you need at least three, normally at over €5 each (€3 for the sweet variety), to feel full. Pizzerias, usually au feu du bois (baked in wood-fired ovens), are also very common. They are somewhat better value than crêperies, but quality and quantity vary greatly.

For picnics, the local outdoor market or supermarket will provide you with almost everything you need from tomatoes and avocados to cheese and pâté. Cooked meat, prepared snacks, ready-made dishes and assorted salads can be bought at charcuteries (delicatessens), which you'll find even in most small villages, and at supermarket cold-food counters. You purchase by weight, or you can ask for une tranche (a slice), une barquette (a carton) or une part (a portion) as appropriate.

Snacks

Food snobs may say this is where French cuisine falls short, and where American-influenced fast food culture is creeping in. There is, however, a large range of choice when it comes to eating on the run, or snacking between meals. Croques-monsieur or croques-madame (variations on the toasted cheese-and-ham sandwich) are on sale at cafés, brasseries and many street stands, along with frites (potato fries), crêpes, galettes, gauffres (waffles), glaces (ice creams) and all kinds of fresh-filled baguettes (which usually cost between €3 and €5 to take away). For variety, in main towns and cities you can find Tunisian snacks like brik à l'œuf (a fried pastry with an egg inside), merguez (spicy North African sausage), Greek souvlaki (kebabs) and Middle Eastern falafel (deep-fried chickpea balls in flat bread with salad). Wine bars are good for regional sausages and cheese, usually served with brown bread (pain de campagne).

Regional dishes

French cooking is as varied as its landscape, and differs vastly from region to region. In Provence, in close proximity to Italy, local dishes make heavy use of olive oils, garlic and tomatoes, as well as Mediterranean vegetables such as aubergines (eggplant) and peppers. In keeping with its proximity to the sea, the region's most famous dish is without doubt bouillabaisse, a hearty fish stew from Marseille. To the southwest in Languedoc and Pays Basque, hearty cassoulet stews and heavier meals are in order, more in common with Spanish cuisine. Alsace, in the northeast, features Germanic influences in its cuisine, specializing in dishes such as choucroute (sauerkraut), and a hearty array of sausages. Burgundy, famous for its wines, is the home of what many people consider classic French dishes such as coq au vin and boeuf bourguignon. In the northwest, Normandy and Brittany are about the best places you could head for seafood, as well as for sweet and savoury crêpes and galettes. Finally, if you're in the Dordogne, make sure to sample its famous foie gras or pricey truffles (truffles).

For more on which regional dishes to try, see the boxes at the start of each chapter in the Guide.

Vegetarian food

On the whole, vegetarians can expect a somewhat lean time in France. Most cities now have at least one specifically vegetarian restaurant, but elsewhere your best bet will probably be a crêperie or pizzeria. Failing that you may have to fall back on an omelette or a plate of vegetables (often tinned) in an ordinary restaurant. Sometimes restaurants are willing to replace a meat dish on the fixed-price menu (menu fixe); at other times you'll have to pick your way through the carte. Remember the phrase Je suis végétarien(ne); est-ce qu'il y a quelques plats sans viande? ("I'm a vegetarian; are there any non-meat dishes?"). Vegans, however, should probably forget all about eating in restaurants and stick to self-catering.

Drink

Wherever you can eat you can invariably drink, and vice versa. Drinking is done at a leisurely pace whether it's a prelude to food (apéritif) or a sequel (digestif), and café-bars are the standard places to do it. By law the full price list, including service charges, must be clearly displayed. You normally pay when you leave, and it's perfectly acceptable to sit for hours over just one cup of coffee, though in this case a small tip will be appreciated.

Wine

French wines (vin), drunk at just about every meal or social occasion, are unrivalled in the world for their range, sophistication, diversity and status. With the exception of the north-west of the country and the mountains, wine is produced just about everywhere. The great wine-producing regions are Champagne, Bordeaux and Burgundy, closely followed by the Loire and Rhône valleys. Alsace also has some great wines, and there are some beautiful ones to be had in the lesser wine regions of Bergerac, Languedoc, Roussillon, Provence and Savoie. Even within each region, there's enormous diversity, with differences generated by the varying types of soil, the lie of the land, the type of grape grown – there are over sixty varieties – the ability of the wine to age, and the individual skills of the producer.

The quality of wine can also vary enor-

Cheese

Charles de Gaulle famously commented that "You can unite the French only through fear. You cannot simply bring together a country that has over 265 kinds of cheese". For serious cheese-lovers, France is the ultimate paradise. Other countries may produce individual cheeses which are as good as, or even better than, the best of the French, but no country offers a range that comes anywhere near them in terms of sheer inventiveness. In fact, there are officially over 300 types of French cheese, and the way they are made are jealously guarded secrets. Many cheese-makers have successfully protected their products by gaining the right to label their produce AOC (appellation d'origine contrôlée), covered by laws similar to those for wines, which – among other things – controls the amount of cheese that a particular area can produce. As a result, the subtle differences between French local cheeses have not been overwhelmed by the industrialized uniformity that has plagued other countries.

The best, or most traditional, restaurants offer a well-stocked plateau de fromages (cheeseboard), served at room temperature with bread, but not butter. Apart from the ubiquitous Brie, Camembert and numerous varieties of goat's cheese (chèvre), there will usually be one or two local cheeses on offer – these are the ones to go for. If you want to buy cheese, local markets are always the best bet, while in larger towns you'll generally find a fromagerie, a shop with perhaps 200 varieties or more to choose from. We've indicated the best regional cheeses throughout the Guide.

mously. Vin de table or vin ordinaire – table wine – is generally drinkable and always cheap, although it may be disguised and priced-up as the house wine, or cuvée. Local vins de pays can vary in quality but they are still exceptional for the price. The best-quality wines are denoted by the AOC (appellation d'origine contrôlée) label, which means that the wine comes from an area (known in this case as an appellation) where the amount of wine produced is strictly controlled. The price of AOC wines starts at around €4, and you can buy a very decent bottle in a shop for €6; €10 and over will get you something worth savouring. By the time restaurants have added their considerable mark-up, wine can constitute an alarming proportion of the bill. A glass of wine in a bar will typically cost around €3–6.

Choosing wine is an extremely complex business and it's hard not to feel intimidated by the seemingly innate expertise of all French people. Many individual wines and appellations are mentioned in the text, but trusting your own taste is the best way to go. Knowing the grape types that you particularly like (or dislike), whether you like wines very fruity, dry, light or heavy, is all useful when discussing your choice with a waiter, producer or wine merchant. The more interest you show, the more helpful advice you're likely to receive. The only thing the French cannot tolerate is people ordering Coke or the like to accompany a gourmet meal.

The best way of buying wine is directly from the producers (vignerons), either at vineyards, at Maisons or Syndicats du Vin (representing a group of wine-producers), or at Coopératifs Viticoles (producers' co-ops) – at all these places you can usually sample the wines first. It's best to make clear at the start how much you want to buy (particularly if it's only one or two bottles) and you'll not be popular if you drink several glasses and then fail to buy at least one bottle. The most economical option is to buy en vrac, which you can also do at some wine shops (caves), filling an easily obtainable plastic five- or ten-litre container (usually sold on the premises) straight from the barrel. In cities, supermarkets are the best places to buy your wine, often at very competitive prices.

The basic wine terms are: brut, very dry; sec, dry; demi-sec, sweet; doux, very sweet; mousseux, sparkling; méthode champenoise, mature and sparkling.

Beer and spirits

Familiar light Belgian and German brands, plus French brands from Alsace, account for most of the beer you'll find. Draught beer (à la pression) – usually Kronenbourg – is the cheapest drink you can have next to coffee and wine; un pression or un demi (0.33 litre) will cost around €3. For a wider choice of draught and bottled beer you need to go to the special beer-drinking establishments such as the English- and Irish-style pubs found in larger towns and cities. A small bottle at one of these places can set you back double what you'd pay in an ordinary café-bar. In supermarkets, however, bottled or canned beer is exceptionally cheap.

Spirits, such as cognac and armagnac, and liqueurs are consumed at any time of day, though in far smaller quantities these days thanks to the clampdown on drink-driving. Pastis – the generic name of aniseed drinks such as Pernod and Ricard – is served diluted with water and ice (glace or glaçons). It's very refreshing and not expensive. Among less familiar names, try Poire William (pear brandy), or Marc (a spirit distilled from grape pulp). Measures are generous, but they don't come cheap: the same applies for imported spirits like whisky (Scotch). Two drinks designed to stimulate the appetite – un apéritif – are pineau (cognac and grape juice) and kir (white wine with a dash of Cassis – blackcurrant liqueur – or with champagne instead of wine for a Kir Royal). Cognac, armagnac and Chartreuse are among the many aids to digestion – un digestif – to relax over after a meal. Cocktails are served at most late-night bars, discos and clubs, as well as upmarket hotel bars and at every seaside promenade café; they usually cost at least €5.

Soft drinks, tea and coffee

You can buy cartons of unsweetened fruit juice in supermarkets, although in cafés the bottled (sweetened) nectars such as apricot (jus d'abricot) and blackcurrant (cassis) still hold sway. Fresh orange (jus d'orange) or lemon juice (citron pressé) are a much more refreshing choice on a hot day – for the latter, the juice is served in the bottom of a long ice-filled glass, with a jug of water and a sugar bowl to sweeten it to your taste. Other soft drinks to try are syrups (sirops) – mint or grenadine, for example, mixed with water. The standard fizzy drinks of lemonade (limonade), Coke (coca) and so forth are all available, and there's no shortage of bottled mineral water (eau minérale) or spring water (eau de source) – whether sparkling (gazeuse) or still (plate) – either, from the big brand names to the most obscure spa product. But there's not much wrong with the tap water (l'eau de robinet) which will always be brought free to your table if you ask for it. The only time you shouldn't drink the tap water, is if the tap is labelled eau non potable.

Coffee is invariably espresso – small, black and very strong. Un café or un express is the regular; un crème is with milk; un grand café or un grand crème are large versions. In the morning you could also ask for un café au lait – espresso in a large cup or bowl topped up with hot milk. Un déca is decaffeinated, now widely available. Ordinary tea (thé) – Lipton's nine times out of ten – is normally served black (nature) or with a slice of lemon (limon); to have milk with it, ask for un peu de lait frais (some fresh milk). Chocolat chaud – hot chocolate – unlike tea, lives up to the high standards of French food and drink and can be had in any café. After meals, herb teas (infusions or tisanes), offered by most restaurants, can be soothing. The more common ones are verveine (verbena), tilleul (lime blossom), menthe (mint) and camomille (camomile).

The media

French newspapers and magazines are available from any of the ubiquitous street-side kiosks, or tabacs, whilst TV, satellite and otherwise, is easy to track down in most forms of accommodation. Even if you can't read or speak French, you can still get your news fix by getting hold of an international edition of a British or American newspaper or an international news magazine to keep up with current events.

Newspapers and magazines

Of the French national daily papers, Le Monde (@www.lemonde.fr) is the most intellectual; it's widely respected, and somewhat austere, though it does now carry such frivolities as colour photos, Conservative, and at times controversial. Le Figaro (@www.lefigaro.fr) is the most respected of the more right-wing papers. Libération (@www.liberation.com), founded by Jean-Paul Sartre in the 1960s, is moderately left-wing, pro-European, independent and more colloquial, whilst rigorous left-wing criticism of the French government comes from L'Humanité (@www.humanite.presse.fr), the Communist Party paper. The other nationals are all tabloids; predictably more readable and a good source of news, is Aujourd'hui (published in Paris as Le Parisien), followed by the much troubled France Soir, whilst L'Équipe (@www.lequipe.fr) is dedicated to sports coverage. The widest circulations are enjoyed by the regional dailies, of which the most important is the Rennes-based Ouest-France (@www.ouest-france.fr). For visitors, these are mainly of interest for their listings.

Weekly magazines of the Newsweek/Time model include the wide-ranging and socialist-inclined Le Nouvel Observateur (@www.nouvelobs.com), its right-wing-counterpoint L'Express (@www.lexpress.fr) and the centrist with bite Marianne (@www.marianne-en-ligne.fr). Comprising mainly translated articles, Courier International (@www.courierinternational.com) offers an overview of what's being discussed in media around the globe. The best investigative journalism is to be found in the weekly satirical paper Le Canard Enchaîné (@www.lecanardenchaine.fr), while Charlie Hebdo is roughly equivalent to the UK's Private Eye. Monthlies include the young and trendy Nova (@www.novaplanet.com), which has excellent listings of cultural events. There are also, of course, the French versions of Vogue, Elle and Marie-Claire, and the relentlessly urban Biba, for women's fashion and lifestyle.

English-language newspapers, such as the European, Washington Post, New York Times, the Guardian and the International Herald Tribune, are on sale on the day of publication in the main cities and the day after elsewhere, although they tend to cost from around €3.

Moral censorship of the press is rare. On the newsstands you'll find pornography of every shade alongside knitting patterns and DIY. You'll also find French comics (bandes dessinées), many of which are aimed at the adult market, with wild and wonderful illustrations; they're considered to be quite an art form and whole museums are devoted to them.

Radio

The publicly-owned radio provider is Radio France (@www.radio-france.fr), which operates seven stations; these include France Bleu, its regional radio station network, France Culture for arts, France Info for news, and music channels France Musique and Le Mouv', which have wide-ranging playlists. Other major private stations include Europe 1 (@www.europe1.fr) for news, debate and sport. English-language broadcasts are available from the BBC (@www.bbc.co.uk/worldservice), Radio Canada (@www.rcinet.ca), and Voice of America (@www.voia.gov); see

Festivals

It's hard to beat the experience of arriving in a small French village, expecting no more than a bed for the night, to discover the streets decked out with flags and streamers, a band playing in the square and the entire population out celebrating the feast of their patron saint. As well as nationwide celebrations such as the Fête de la Musique (June 21, the summer solstice; 🌐 www.fetedelamusique.culture.fr), Bastille Day (July 14) and the Assumption of the Virgin Mary (August 15), there are any number of festivals – both traditional and of more recent origin – held in towns and villages throughout France. For a detailed account of some of the major ones, see the Festive France colour section. Below is a list of the main festivals; alternatively, see 🌐 www.culture.fr and 🌐 www.viafrance.com.

January

Nantes La Folle Journée (late Jan to early Feb; 🌐 www.follejournee.fr).

Nice Carnival (Jan–Feb; 🌐 www.nicecarnaval.com).

February to April

Menton Fête du Citron (two weeks following Mardi Gras, forty days before Easter); 🌐 www.feteducitron.com) Parades, concerts and fireworks.

Nîmes La Féria de Nîmes (Pentecost, seven weeks after Easter) Bullfights.

Orcival Procession of Notre-Dame d'Orcival (Ascension Day, forty days after Easter).

May

Cannes Festival de Cannes (🌐 www.festival-cannes.com) International film festival.

Les Saintes-Maries-de-la-Mer Fête de Ste Sarah (May 24–25) Romany festival.

Paris Festival de St-Denis (May–June; 🌐 www.festival-saint-denis.fr) Classical music festival.

Angoulême Musiques Metisses (late May; 🌐 www.musiques-metisses.com) Afro-Caribbean and Latin American music.

June

Châlons-en-Campagne Festival Furies (early June; 🌐 www.festival-furies.com) Street theatre.

Lyon Les Nuits de Fourvière (early June to early Aug; 🌐 www.nuitsdefourviere.fr) Performance arts.

Paris Festival Django Reinhardt (🌐 www.django.samois.free.fr) Jazz.

Strasbourg Festival de Musique de Strasbourg (🌐 www.festival-strasbourg.com) Classical music.

Uzès Uzès Danse (🌐 www.uzesdanse.fr) Contemporary dance.

Grenoble Rencontres du Jeune Théâtre Européen (late June) Contemporary theatre.

Bordeaux Fête le Vin (late June in even-numbered years; 🌐 www.bordeaux-fete-le-vin.com).

Paris La Marche des Fiertés Lesbienne, Gai, Bi & Trans (late June; 🌐 www.inter-lgbt.org).

Sotheville-lès-Rouen Viva Cité (late June) Street theatre.

Montpellier Montpellier Danse (late June to early July; 🌐 www.montpellierdanse.com).

Vienne Jazz à Vienne (late June to mid-July; 🌐 www.jazzavienne.com).

July

Alès Cratère/Surfaces (early July; 🌐 www.lecratere.fr) Street theatre.

Belfort Eurockéennes (early July; 🌐 www.eurockeennes.fr) Contemporary music.

Mont-de-Marsan Arte Flamenco (early July) Flamenco music.

- Reims Flâneries Musicales d'Été (early July to early Aug) Open-air concerts.
- Beaune Festival International d'Opéra Baroque (early July to early Aug; 📞 www.festivalbeaune.com).
- La Rochelle Festival International du Film (early July; 📞 www.festival-larochelle.org).
- Rennes Les Tombées de la Nuit (early July; 📞 www.lestdnuit.com) Concerts, cinema and performance arts.
- Nice Jazz Festival (📞 www.nicejazzfest.com).
- Aix-en-Provence Festival International d'Art Lyrique (📞 www.festival-aix.com) Classical music.
- Avignon Festival d'Avignon (📞 www.festival-avignon.com) Contemporary dance and theatre.
- Colmar Festival International de Colmar (📞 www.festival-colmar.com) Classical music.
- Carhaix Festival des Vieilles Charrues (📞 www.vieillescharrues.asso.fr) Contemporary music festival.
- Saintes Académies Musicales de Saintes (📞 www.festival-saintes.org) Classical music.
- La Rochelle Francofolies (mid-July; 📞 www.francofolies.fr) Contemporary French music.
- La Roque d'Anthéron Festival International de Piano (mid-July to mid-Aug; 📞 www.festival-piano.com).
- Arles Les Suds à Arles (mid-July; 📞 www.suds-arles.com). World music.
- Juan-les-Pins Jazz à Juan (mid-July).
- Vaison-la-Romaine Vaison Danse (mid-July; 📞 www.vaison-festival.com) Contemporary dance.
- Chalon-sur-Saône Chalon dans la Rue (third week July; 📞 www.chalondanslarue.com) Street theatre.
- Annecy Les Noctibules (late July) Street theatre.
- Gannat (near Vichy) Les Cultures du Monde (late July; 📞 www.gannat.com).
- Aix-en-Provence Danse à Aix (late July/early Aug; 📞 www.aix-en-provence.com/danse-a-aix).
- Prades Festival Pablo Casals (late July to mid-Aug; 📞 www.prades-festival-casals.com) Chamber music.
- Orange Chorégies d'Orange (July–Aug; 📞 www.choregies.asso.fr) Opera.
- August
- Aurillac Festival International de Théâtre de Rue (📞 www.aurillac.net) Street theatre.
- Quimper Semaines Musicales (📞 www.semaines-musicales-quimper.org) Classical, jazz and folk music.
- Lorient Festival Interceltique (early Aug; 📞 www.festival-interceltique.com) Celtic folk festival.
- Marcillac Jazz in Marcillac (early Aug; 📞 www.jazzinmarciac.com).
- Périgueux Mimos (early Aug; 📞 www.mimos.fr) International mime festival.
- Menton Festival de Musique de Chambre (📞 www.festivalmusiquementon.com) Chamber music.
- St-Malo La Route du Rock (mid-Aug; 📞 www.laroutedurock.com).
- Mulhouse Festival du Jazz (mid- to late Aug; 📞 www.jazz-mulhouse.org).
- Paris Rock en Seine (late Aug; 📞 www.rockenseine.com).

Festivals (continued)

September

Lyon Biennale de la Danse (next in 2008; www.biennale-de-lyon.org).

Paris Biennial des Antiquaires (next in 2008) Antiques fair; Jazz à la Villette (www.villette.com); Festival d'Automne (mid-Sept to mid-Dec; www.festival-automne.com) Theatre, concerts, dance, films and exhibitions.

Puy-en-Velay Fête Renaissance du Roi de l'Oiseau (mid-Sept; www.roideloiseau.com) Historical pageants, fireworks and re-creations.

Perpignan Visa pour l'Image (mid-Sept; www.visapourlimage.com) International photojournalism.

Amiens Festival des Cathédrales de Picardie (Sept–Oct; www.festivaldescathedrales.com) Baroque and Renaissance music.

Strasbourg Musica (Sept–Oct; www.festival-musica.org) Contemporary music.

Limoges Les Francophonies en Limousin (end Sept to mid-Oct; www.lesfrancophonies.com) Contemporary theatre.

October

Nancy Jazz Pulsations (www.nancyjazzpulsations.com).

Paris Foire International d'Art Contemporain.

Bastia Les Musicales (www.musicales-de-bastia.com) Sacred and world music.

Montpellier Festival International Cinéma Méditerranéen (late Oct to early Nov; www.cinemed.tm.fr).

November to December

Strasbourg Jazz d'Or (Nov; www.jazzdoor.com).

Les Saintes-Maries-de-la-Mer Festival d'Abrivado (Nov 11) Bull-running.

Rennes Rencontres Transmusicales (early Dec; www.lestrans.com) Contemporary music.

their websites for local frequencies. In the Paris region, you can listen to the news in English on Radio France International (RFI, www.rfi.fr) at 7am, 2.30pm and 4.30pm on 738 kHz.

Television

French terrestrial TV has six channels: three public (France 2, France 3 and Arte/France 5); one subscription (Canal Plus – with some unencrypted programmes); and two commercial (TF1 and M6). Of these, TF1 and France 2 are the most popular channels: TF1 is home to dubbed US comedies and the inevitable reality shows, while France 2 has decent news coverage and a number of chat and debate shows. M6 follows closely in the popularity stakes with a large range of American series. Arte/France 5 (also known as La Cinquième) offers slightly more highbrow programming, including daily documentaries, art criticism, serious French and German movies and complete operas. During the daytime (7am–7pm), France 5 uses the frequency to broadcast educational programmes. Canal Plus is the main movie channel, with repeats of foreign films usually shown at least once a day in the original language. France 3 is strong on regional news and more heavyweight movies, including a fair number of undubbed foreign films. The main French news broadcasts are at 8pm on France 2 and TF1.

In addition there are any number of cable and satellite channels, which include CNN, BBC World and BBC Prime, Eurosport, MTV, Planète, which specializes in documentaries, Ciné Première, and Canal Jimmy (Friends and the like in French). The main French-run music channel is MCM.

Sports and outdoor activities

France has a wide range of sports on offer, both for the spectator and the participant. It's not difficult to get tickets for domestic and international football and rugby matches, while the biggest event of all, the Tour de France, is free. And if you're interested in expending some energy yourself, there's a whole host of activities and adventure sports available.

Spectator sports

More than any of the cultural jamborees, it's sporting events that really excite the French – particularly cycling, football, rugby and tennis. In the south, bullfighting and the Basque game of pelota are also popular. At the local, everyday level, the rather less gripping game of boules is the sport of choice, played in every town and village.

Cycling

The sport the French are truly mad about is cycling. It was, after all, in Paris's Palais Royale gardens in 1791 that the precursor of the modern bicycle, the célerifière, was presented, and in the same city seventy years later that father and son team Pierre and Ernest Michaux constructed the vélocipède (from which comes the French term vélo for bicycle), the first really efficient bicycle. The French can also legitimately claim the sport of cycle racing as their own, with the first event, a 1200-metre sprint, held in Paris's Parc St-Cloud in 1868 – sadly for national pride, however, the first champion was an Englishman.

That most French of sporting events, and the world's premier cycling race, is the Tour de France, held in July. Covering around 3500 kilometres, the course of the three-week event changes every year, sometimes including foreign countries in its itinerary (Britain and Ireland, among others, have hosted stages). Wherever, it's held, some truly arduous mountain stages and some time trials are always part of the action. An aggregate of each rider's times is made daily, the overall leader wearing the coveted yellow jersey (maillot jaune). Huge crowds turn out to cheer on the cyclists on the Champs-Élysées, where the ultimate stage is completed. The French president himself presents the jersey to the overall winner, though the crowds have been waiting for a French cyclist to win the Tour since Bernard Hinault's victory in 1985.

Over recent years the event has been rocked by drug scandals, beginning in 1998 when evidence of systematic doping within the cycling teams came to light, and casting a shadow over the American rider Lance Armstrong's monumental achievement of becoming the first man to have won seven consecutive races. More recently, in 2006, fellow American Floyd Landis' spectacular win was brought into doubt when drugs testing revealed higher than normal amounts of testosterone in his system.

Other classic long-distance bike races include the Paris-Roubaix, instigated in 1896 and held in April, which is reputed to be the most exacting one-day race in the world, parts of it over cobblestones; the Paris-Brussels (Sept), held since 1893; and the rugged seven-day Paris-Nice event (March), covering over 1100km. The Grand Prix des Nations (Sept), which takes place in the Seine-Maritime département, is the world's foremost time trial; the Palais Omnisport de Bercy in Paris (see p.191) holds other time trials and cycling events. Details for all the above can be found at @www.letour.fr.

Football

In France, as in most countries, football is the number-one team sport. Football fever reached a pitch in the late 1990s, when the French team won the 1998 World Cup in front of their home crowd and in 2000

Sporting calendar

January Monte Carlo Car Rally (📍 www.acm.mc).

February Six Nations rugby tournament (Paris; 📍 www.6-nations-rugby.com).

April Paris Marathon (📍 www.parismarathon.com); Le Mans 24-hour motorcycle rally (📍 www.lemans.org).

May Roland Garros International Tennis Championship (Paris; 📍 www.rolandgarros.com); Monaco Formula 1 Grand Prix (📍 www.monaco-formula1.com).

June Le Mans 24-hour car rally (📍 www.lemans.org).

July Tour de France; (📍 www.letour.fr); Nevers French Formula 1 Grand Prix (📍 www.magnyf1.com).

October Grand Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe (Paris; 📍 www.france-galop.com).

became the first side ever to add a European Championships title to the world crown. Despite the occasional high point, the team has perhaps inevitably found it hard to live up to expectations since then, despite boasting some of the world's top players. A low point was the 2002 World Cup, when they were eliminated in the first round without scoring a single goal. They performed slightly better in the 2004 European Championships, but were unexpectedly knocked out by Greece, the eventual winner, in the quarter-finals. The 2006 World Cup, hosted by Germany, saw the national team's fortunes improve dramatically. Despite a slow start, France advanced to the final, even beating tournament favourites Brazil, only to lose out to Italy on penalties. Sadly the game will probably be best remembered for national hero Zinedine Zidane, representing France for the last time, being sent from the pitch for headbutting an Italian defender.

Buoyed by the success of the national team, the domestic game has been on the up in recent years, and average attendances have improved. Almost all clubs now have sound financial backing, and the biggest clubs, such as Monaco, Marseille and Paris St-Germain (PSG), have all performed well in European competitions. For the latest information visit the website of the Ligue de Football Professionnel at 📍 www.lfp.fr.

Tickets to see domestic clubs are available either from specific club websites, or in the towns where they are playing; ask at local tourist offices. To watch the national team, you can get tickets online at 📍 www.fff.fr (Fédération Française de Football), or try 📍 www.francebillet.com. Prices tend to start at around €10–15.

Rugby

Although most popular in the southwest of the country, rugby enjoys a passionate following throughout France. The French have a rich rugby heritage and are renowned throughout the world for the flair with which they play the game. French rugby's greatest moment to date came in the semi-finals of the 1999 World Cup, when they stunned the world by trouncing favourites New Zealand, though they blew cold in the final, losing to an Australian side that never had to rouse itself out of second gear. In 2003 France made it as far as the semi-final, only to be thrashed by an England team en route to the podium. It remains to be seen what will happen when France plays host to the 2007 World Cup (📍 www.rugbyworldcup.com).

More international fare is provided by the Six Nations tournament – the other five nations being England, Wales, Scotland, Ireland and Italy – which takes place every year between February and April. Matches are played alternately at home and away. Over the past few years, France has been the most consistent team, clinching Grand Slams in 2002 and 2004, and winning again in 2006, despite a surprise defeat to Scotland.

Domestically, the French clubs have ridden out rugby's occasionally fraught transition from amateur to professional status and look to be in good shape. Though France has lost some of its stars to predatory English clubs, unlike in football the majority of the national side still plays at home. Sides to watch for are Stade Français from Paris (winners of the French Championship in 2006), Toulouse, Perpignan and Brive (past winners of the Europe-wide Heineken Cup), Agen, and the Basque teams of Bayonne and Biarritz, which still retain their reputation as keepers of the game's soul, despite the latter's poor performances in recent years.

Tickets for local games can be bought through the clubs themselves, with prices starting around €10. For bigger domestic and international games, they are available online at www.francebillet.com; prices start at around €20. Information can be found on the Fédération Française de Rugby's website (www.ffr.fr).

Pelota

In the Basque country (and also in the nearby Landes), the main draw for crowds is the national ball game of pelota, a lethally (sometimes literally) fast variety of team handball or racketball played in a walled court with a ball of solid wood. The most popular form today is played with bare hands in a two-walled court called a fronton. In other varieties wooden bats are used or wicker slings strapped to the players' arms. Ask at local tourist offices for details of where to see the game played.

Bullfighting

In and around the Camargue, the number-one sport is bullfighting. Different from the Spanish version, the course camargaise involves variations on the theme of removing cockades from the base of the bull's horns, and it's generally the fighters, rather than the bulls, who get hurt. Further west, particularly in the Landes département, you'll come across the similar courses landaises, where men perform acrobatics with the by-no-means docile local cows.

Spanish bullfights, known as corridos, do take place – and draw capacity crowds – in southern France. The major events of the year are the Féria de Nîmes (see p.845) at Pentecost (Whitsun) and the Easter féria at Arles (p.1080). See the local press or ask at tourist offices for details of where to pick up tickets.

Boules

In every town or village square, particularly in the south, you'll see beret-clad men playing boules or its variant, pétanque (in which contestants must keep both feet on the ground when throwing). Although more women are taking up boules, at competition level it remains very male-dominated: there are café or village teams and endless championships. There's even talk – not all of it in jest – of getting boules recognized as an Olympic sport.

Outdoor activities

In addition to the perennial favourites – walking, cycling and skiing – France provides a fantastically wide range of outdoor activities. Most have a national federation (listed in the text where relevant), which can provide information on local clubs.

Walking and climbing

Long-distance walkers are well served in France by a network of some 60,000km of long-distance marked footpaths, known as sentiers de grande randonnée or, more commonly, simply as GRs. They're fully signposted and equipped with campsites, refuges and hostels (gîtes d'étape) along the way. Some are real marathons, like the GR5 from the coast of Holland to Nice, the trans-Pyrenean GR10, the Grande Traversée des Alpes (the GTA), and, best of all, the GR20 in Corsica (see box, pp.1226–27). Other famous hikes include the Chemin de St-Jacques (GR65), which follows the ancient pilgrim route from Le Puy in the Auvergne to the Spanish border above St-Jean-Pied-de-Port and on to the shrine of Santiago de Compostela, and the GR3, which traces the Loire from source to sea. There are also thousands of shorter sentiers de promenade et de randonnée, the PRs, as well as nature walks and many other local footpaths.

Each GR and many PRs are described in the Topo-guide series (available outside France in good travel bookshops), which give a detailed account of each route, including maps, campsites, refuges, sources of provisions, and so on. In France, the guides are available from bookshops and some tourist offices, or direct from the principal French walkers association, the Fédération Française de la Randonnée Pédestre (☎01.44.89.93.90, 🌐www.ffrandonnee.fr). In addition, many tourist offices can provide guides to local footpaths.

Climbing is possible all year round, although bear in mind that some higher routes will be snowbound until quite late in the year, and require special equipment such as crampons and ice axes; these shouldn't be attempted without experience or at least a local guide. No matter where you are walking, make sure you have your own water supplies, or find out locally if you'll be able to fill up your water bottles on the way. You'll also need decent footwear, waterproofs and a map, compass and possibly GPS system. Unless staying in mountain refuges (see "Accommodation", p.49) you'll also need warm clothes, a tent, sleeping bag and ground mat, not to mention supplies. Finally, especially if walking at high altitudes, don't forget sunblock, sunglasses and a hat.

In mountain areas there are associations of professional mountain guides, often located in the tourist office, who organize walking and climbing (escalade) expeditions for all levels of experience. For more information you could also contact the Fédération Française de la Montagne et de l'Escalade (☎01.40.18.75.50, 🌐www.ffme.fr).

Details of tour operators specializing in walking holidays are listed on p.33.

Cycling

Cyclists have around 50,000km of marked cycle paths (pistes cyclables) in France. Many towns and cities have established cycle lanes, while in the countryside there are an increasing number of specially designated mountain-bike tracks. Aquitaine, in southwest France, is particularly well provided for: there are extensive routes through the Landes forest and south to the Spanish border. The Fédération Française de Cyclisme (☎01.49.35.69.00, 🌐www.ffc.fr) produces a guide to mountain-biking sites, and tourist offices can provide details of local cycle ways; the Fédération Française de Cyclotourisme (☎01.56.20.88.88, 🌐www.ffct.org) provides links to local cycling clubs, and lists local trips. IGN's 1:100,000 maps are the best for cyclists (see p.75).

For information on the practicalities of cycling in France, see "Getting around", p.43. You'll find details of tour operators specializing in cycling holidays on p.33.

Skiing and snowboarding

Millions of visitors come to France to practise skiing and snowboarding; whether downhill, cross-country or mountaineering, it's also enthusiastically pursued by the French. It can be an expensive sport to practise independently, however, and the best deals are often to be had from package operators (see p.33). These can be arranged in France or before you leave (most travel agents sell all-in packages). Though it's possible to ski from early November through to the end of April at high altitudes, peak season is February and March.

The best skiing and boarding is generally to be had in the Alps. The higher the resort the longer the season, and the fewer the anxieties you'll have about there being enough snow. Resorts such as Tignes, Les Deux-Alpes or Val Thorens are almost all modern, with the very latest in lift technology. They're terrific for full-time skiing, but they lack the cachet, charm or the nightlife of the older, lower resorts such as Megève and Morzine. For a brief rundown of all the main Alpine skiing areas, see the box on p.981. The foothills of the Alps in Provence have the same mix of old and new on a smaller scale. The clientele are Riviera residents and prices are not cheap, though at least you can nip down to the coast when you're bored with snow. The Pyrenees are a friendlier range of mountains, less developed (though that can be a drawback if you want to get in as many different runs as possible per day) and warmer, which means a shorter season and less reliable snow.

Cross-country skiing (ski de fond) is being promoted hard, especially in the smaller ranges of the Jura and Massif Central. It's easier on the joints, but don't be fooled into thinking it's any less athletic a sport. For the really experienced and fit, though, it can be a good means of transport, using snowbound GR routes to discover villages still relatively uncommercialized. Several independent operators organize ski-mountaineering courses in the French mountains (see p.33).

Practicalities

Lift passes start at around €20 a day in most resorts, but can reach around €50 in the pricier spots; passes for a week will set you back anything from €80 to over €300.

Equipment hire is available at most resorts, and comes in at around €20 per day all in, whilst a week's hire will set you back anything from €100. Although there are plenty of tour operators offering cheap all-in deals, don't forget to check out local hotels and B&Bs who offer independent ski deals; see the Guide for details.

The Fédération Française de Ski (☎04.50.51.40.34, 🌐www.ffc.fr) and the Association Française de Snowboard (☎04.92.41.80.00, 🌐www.afs-fr.com) can provide links to local clubs, whilst 🌐www.skifrance.fr is a good overall source of information, with links to all the country's ski resorts.

Adventure sports

Hang-gliding and paragliding (a cross between parachuting and hang-gliding) are popular in the Hautes-Alpes of Provence, the Pyrenees and Corsica. Prices start at around €80 for a single trip; contact local tourist offices for more information.

Caving is popular in the limestone caverns of southwest France and in the gorges and ravines of the Pyrenees, the Alps and the Massif Central. You'll need to make an arrangement through a local club, which usually organize beginner courses as well as half- or full-day outings. For more information, contact the Fédération Française de Spéléologie (☎04.72.56.09.63, 🌐www.ffspeleo.fr).

As for all adventure sports, it is important to make sure that your insurance covers you for these rather more risky activities. See p.74 for details.

Horse riding

Horse riding is an excellent way to explore the French countryside. The most famous and romantic region for riding is the flat and windswept Camargue at the Rhône Delta, but practically every town has an equestrian centre (centre équestre) where you can ride with a guide or unaccompanied. Mule- and donkey-trekking are also increasingly popular, particularly along the trails of the Pyrenees and Alps. A day's horse- or donkey- trekking will cost upwards of €30.

Lists of riding centres and events are available in French only from the Comité National de Tourisme Équestre (☎01.53.26.15.50, 🌐www.tourisme-equestre.fr), or from local tourist offices.

Water sports and activities

France's extensive coastline has been well developed for recreational activities, especially in the south. Although in summer you can swim just about anywhere, from Normandy to the Mediterranean, the Côte d'Azur and Corsica are justly reputed as the best for beaches.

In the towns and resorts of the Mediterranean coast, you'll find every conceivable sort of beachside activity, including boating, sea-fishing and diving, and if you don't mind high prices and crowds, the too-blue waters and sandy coves are unbeatable. The wind-battered western Mediterranean is where windsurfers head to enjoy the calm of the broad saltwater inlets (étangs) that typify the area. The Atlantic coast is good for sailing, particularly around Brittany, while the best conditions for surfing (Fédération Française de Surfing; 🌐www.surfingfrance.com) are to be found off Biarritz, something of a Mecca for the sport; north up the coast from Biarritz, Anglet, Hossegor and Lacanau are also excellent surf spots and regularly host international competitions. Corsica is the most popular destination for diving and snorkelling; contact the Fédération Française d'Études et de Sports Sous-Marins (☎04.91.33.99.31, 🌐www.ffessm.com) for more information.

Most towns have a swimming pool (piscine), though outdoor pools tend to open only in the height of summer. You may be requested to wear a bathing cap, so come prepared. You can also swim at many river beaches (usually signposted) and in the real and artificial lakes that pepper France. Many lakes have leisure centres (bases de plein airs or centres de loisirs) at which you can rent pedaloes, windsurfers and dinghies, as well as larger boats and, on the bigger reservoirs, jet-skis.

Canoeing (Fédération Française de Canoë-Kayak; ☎01.45.11.08.50, 🌐www.ffck.org) is hugely popular in France, and in summer practically every navigable stretch of river has outfits renting boats and organizing excursions. The rivers of the southwest (the Dordogne, Vézère, Lot and Tarn) in particular offer tremendous variety.

Another relatively placid inland activity is fishing on permitted lakes and rivers. Brittany is one of the biggest areas for carp fishing; salmon and trout can be caught in several rivers in Brittany and Normandy, and in the River Loire, but by far the most varied – and scenic – salmon rivers are those of the western Pyrenees; and the rivers Lot, Tarn and Garonne, in the southwest, and the Saône are well stocked with bass. Local tourist offices and fishing shops will assist you in obtaining a licence. Sea-fishing in the Mediterranean or off the Atlantic coast offers grey mullet, bass, mackerel, bream or sardines as well as lobster, crayfish and scallops. Night-fishing expeditions are becoming increasingly popular.

For information on canal-boating, see the box on p.43 in “Getting around”.

Practicalities

Tourist offices will be able to put you in touch with local companies to help you arrange activities, or contact the national federations listed in the text. For tour operators organizing holidays around these activities, see p.33.

Golf

France has over 500 golf courses, of which several are ranked among the world's best. At the top of this list is the challenging – and absolutely immaculate – Les Bordes course (🌐www.lesbordes.com), near Orléans, which boasts Europe's largest putting green and excellent practice facilities. Other first-class courses include Kemperhof (🌐www.golf-kemperhof.com), outside Strasbourg; Royal Park Evian (🌐www.royalparcevian.com), near Geneva and home to the Evian Masters women's tournament; and Spérone (🌐www.sperone.net) in Corsica. This last is a technically difficult course made even more demanding by strong winds, but boasting superb views – on a clear day you can see Sardinia. You'll find plenty more scenic courses in Provence and all along the Côte d'Azur, where the Monte-Carlo Golf Club (☎04.93.41.09.11) stands out for its setting perched 800m up on the slopes of Mont Agel.

Down in the southwest, Pau Golf Club (🌐www.paugolfclub.com) was the first course to be opened in continental Europe, in 1856, followed three decades later by Biarritz Le Phare (🌐www.golf-biarritz.com); both are still excellent and challenging courses. Also near Biarritz, the Chiberta Golf Club (☎05.59.52.51.10) is a traditional links, alternating between pine forest and seashore, which rates as one of the top ten in France. In fact, the whole area stretching north along the coast from Biarritz to Bordeaux is a golfer's paradise.

Practicalities

Green fees are usually in the range of €40 to €60. Alternatively, you can buy a “Golf Pass” which allows entry to several courses in a particular region at reduced rates. Contact the Fédération Française de Golf (☎01.41.49.77.00, 🌐www.ffg.org) or the departmental tourist office for further details. There are also plenty of tour operators specializing in golfing holidays, with prices starting at around £300/US$550 for a week's accommodation and green fees.

Living in France

Specialists aside, most non-EU citizens who manage to survive for long periods of time in France do it on luck, brazenness and willingness to live in pretty basic conditions. In the cities and larger towns, bar or club work, teaching English, translating or working as an au pair are some of the ways people scrape by; in the countryside, the options come down to seasonal fruit- or grape-picking, teaching English, busking or DIY oddjobbing. Remember that unemployment is high – the current rate stands at around nine percent and is on the rise.

EU citizens are free to work in France on the same basis as a French citizen. This means that you don't have to apply for a residence or work permit except in very rare cases – contact your nearest French consulate for further information (see “Entry requirements”, p.72). Non-EU citizens, however, will need both a work permit (autorisation de travail) and a residence permit; again, contact your nearest French consulate or, if already in France, your local mairie or préfecture to check what rules apply in your particular situation.

When looking for a job, a good starting point is to get hold of one of the books on working abroad published by Vacation Work (📧 www.vacationwork.co.uk). In France, check out the “Offres d'Emploi” (job offers) in Le Monde, Le Figaro and the International Herald Tribune; and try the youth information agency CIDJ (📧 www.cidj.com), or CIJ (Centre d'Information Jeunesse) offices in main cities, which sometimes have information about temporary jobs for foreigners and produce all sorts of useful information about working in France. The national employment agency, ANPE (Agence Nationale pour l'Emploi; 📧 www.anpe.fr), with offices all over France, advertises temporary jobs in all fields and, in theory, offers a whole range of services to job-from all over the EU, but is not renowned for its helpfulness to foreigners. Non-EU citizens will have to show a work permit to apply for any of jobs they list. In Paris, it's worth looking out for the free English-language magazine, FUSAC (📧 www.fusac.fr), published every two weeks, which carries ads for employment and housing among other things.

Teaching English

Applying for a job teaching English should be done in advance; late summer is usually the best time. You don't need fluent French to get a post, but a degree and a TEFL (Teaching English as a Foreign Language) or similar qualification are normally required. The British Council (☎ 0161/957 7755, 📧 www.britishcouncil.org), which recruits and trains TEFL teachers for work abroad, is worth contacting. The annual EL Gazette Guide to English Language Teaching Around the World (📧 www.elgazette.com) gives a thorough breakdown of TEFL courses available and provides all sorts of practical information, including lists of schools. Other useful resources are Teaching English Abroad published by Vacation Work and the TEFL website (📧 www.tefl.com), with its database of English-teaching vacancies. If you apply for jobs from home, most schools will fix up the necessary papers for you.

It's just feasible to find a teaching job when you're in France, but you may have to accept semi-official status and no job security. You'll find more choice and better pay outside Paris and the main tourist centres; look under “Enseignement: Langues” in the local yellow pages (📧 www.pagesjaunes.fr) for addresses of schools, or ask in the local Chambre de Commerce et d'Industrie (Chamber of Commerce). Offering private lessons (via university noticeboards or classified ads, for example), is always worth a try, though you'll have lots of competition.

Au pair work

Au pair work is usually arranged through an agency, who should sort out any necessary paperwork; you'll find agencies listed in The Au Pair & Nanny's Guide to Working Abroad published by Vacation Work (see p.65) and on the International Au Pair Association (IAPA) website, www.iapa.org. The Lady (www.lady.co.uk), published in Britain, is the magazine for classified adverts for au pairs.

Terms and conditions are never very generous, but should include board, lodging and pocket money. Prospective employers are required by law to provide a written job description, so there is protection on both sides. Even so, it's wise to have an escape route (such as a ticket home) in case you find the conditions intolerable and your employers insufferable.

Other work opportunities

The American/Irish/British bars and restaurants in the main cities and resorts sometimes have vacancies. You'll need to speak French, look smart and be prepared to work very long hours. Some people find jobs selling magazines on the street and leafleting by asking people already doing it for the agency address.

For temporary jobs in the travel industry, you should preferably write to tour operators in early spring, and have good French (and another European language will help). Jobs revolve around courier work – supervising and working on bus tours or summer campsites. The latter jobs are slightly easier to get, and usually involve putting up tents at the beginning of the season, taking them down again at the end and general maintenance and troubleshooting work in the months between; Canvas Holidays (see p.33) is often worth approaching. Travel magazines such as the reliable Wanderlust (www.wanderlust.co.uk) have a "Job Shop" section which often advertises job opportunities with tour companies.

Study programmes

It's relatively easy to be a student in France. Foreigners pay no more than French nationals to enrol for a course, and you'll be eligible for subsidized accommodation, meals and all the student reductions. In general, French universities are fairly informal, but there are strict entry requirements, including an exam in French, for undergraduate degrees (though not for postgraduate courses). For full details and prospectuses, contact the Cultural Service of any French embassy or consulate (see p.73).

Embassies and consulates can also provide details of language courses at French universities and colleges, which are often combined with lectures on French "civilization" and usually very costly. Alternatively, you can sign up to one of the hundreds of language-learning courses offered by private organizations – contact the tourist board for details. It's also worth noting that if you're a full-time non-EU student in France, you can get a non-EU work permit for the following summer so long as your visa is still valid.

Further contacts

American Institute for Foreign Study US ☎ 1-800-727-2437, www.aifs.com. Language study and cultural immersion for the summer or school year.
Council on International Educational Exchange (CIEE) US ☎ 1-800-40-STUDY, www.ciee.org. A non-profit organization with summer, semester and academic-year programmes in France.

Erasmus UK ☎ 01227/762712, www.erasmus.ac.uk. EU-run student exchange programme enabling students at participating EU universities to study in another European member country. Mobility grants available from three months to a full academic year. Contact your university's international relations office for details.

Experiment in International Living US ☎ 1-800-345-2929, www.usexperiment.org. Summer programmes for high-school students.

Culture and etiquette

With over 60 million inhabitants, France is a diverse country culturally as well as geographically. While you may find that money-minded Paris lives up to the French reputation for pride and stand-offishness, travel to the Alsatian east, the Celtic west, or the laid-back Catalan- or Italian-influenced south, and any preconceptions you've held will be turned on their heads. And even so, France has plenty to be proud of, from food to its fabled patrimoine, and wherever you decide to travel, a certain "Frenchness" pervades.

Social life and etiquette

If you're invited to someone's house for a meal, you should bring a gift of some kind, such as a decent bottle of wine or flowers. Mealtimes tend to be late, and slow, so allow yourself a good few hours even if meeting someone for lunch. At restaurants you only need to leave an additional cash tip if you feel you have received service out of the ordinary, since restaurant prices almost always include a service charge. It's customary to tip porters, tour guides, taxi drivers and hairdressers between one and two euros.

Smoking was banned (fumer interdit) in all public places, including public transport, stations and museums, in February 2007. In 2008, it will also be made illegal in all cafés, restaurants and nightclubs. Surprisingly, in a country where it's estimated that about 40 percent of the population smoke, there's been a deal of support for the ban, although it remains unclear how it will work in practice. In the meantime, feel free to ask someone to stop smoking next to you, but don't expect to get much of a result.

What you wear will vary little from what you would wear at home. Do bear in mind though that in the swankier restaurants, people will dress up. On the beaches, especially on the Riviera, women young and old tend to go topless. Be sensitive though; if on the rare occasion you find you're the only one baring all on the beach, do cover up.

If you're looking for a toilet, ask for les toilettes or look for signs to the WC (pronounced "vay say"). Standards of cleanliness in public toilets are often poor and many tend not to have toilet paper. Toilets in railway stations and department stores are usually okay; most have an attendant and charge a small sum. You'll occasionally come across automated toilet booths in town centres; note that children under 10 aren't allowed in them on their own. Also, don't be surprised to come across squat toilets, even at busy tourist sites.

Greetings

Just a few words in French will do much to improve your standing even with the most grumpy of Parisian shopkeepers (see the Language section, pp.1339–1355, for vocabulary). When meeting someone for the first time, it's customary to shake hands. This often (usually only among women and between women and men) progresses quickly to kisses (la bise) on the cheek – a custom which can be quite complicated, and embarrassing, if you're not sure how many kisses to expect. As a rule, in Paris you should expect one on each side and no more. In the rest of the country, especially in the south, you can't be so sure, as three kisses are common, and four kisses are used among family members and close friends. In all but the south of the country, la bise is not common between men, and a handshake will usually suffice. Bear in mind too that the kiss isn't exactly a kiss, but more a touching of cheeks whilst kissing into the air. It's usually enough to follow the French person's lead, and accept that from time to time you're bound to make a mistake, though be aware that a single kiss on the cheek is deemed somewhat flirtatious.

Women

Despite a relatively strong feminist movement, France can still feel like a very male-dominated country, with the male population still in possession of a rather strong set of chauvinist ideas. Change is in the air, with female politicians starting to take a higher profile and giving the male ruling class a run for their money but for the moment, women very much suffer under the double burden of being housewife and earner.

French men tend to be on the predatory side, but are usually easily brushed off if you don't want the attention. It's not unusual, however, to be chatted up on a regular basis, or have men (more often boys) call at you from cars in the street, and make comments as they pass you. The best way to deal with this is simply to avoid making eye contact and fail to react, and they'll soon get the message.

Contraception

Condoms (préservatifs) are sold in all local pharmacies, and often in coin-operated dispensers in métro stations, outside pharmacies, and in bar and restaurant toilets. The pill (la pilule), and the morning-after pill (la pilule du lendemain) are also available over the counter from pharmacies.

Shopping

France in general is a paradise for shoppers. Even outside of Paris, which is crammed with international clothing chains, fashion boutiques and antique shops (see pp.194–195) most main towns have a range of excellent department stores, such as Printemps and Galeries Lafayette, as well as a host of independent shops which make superb targets for window-shopping (known as lèche-vitrines, or literally “window-licking” in French).

Food is a particular joy to shop for; well-stocked supermarkets are easy to find, whilst on the outskirts of most towns of any size you'll come across at least one hyper-marché, enormous supermarkets selling everything from food to clothes and garden furniture. The most well-known chains include Carrefour, Leclerc and Casino. Every French town worth its salt holds at least one market (marché) a week; these are listed in the Guide, but asking locals or at tourist offices will also find them out. Markets tend to be vibrant, mostly morning affairs when local producers gather to sell speciality goods such as honey, cheese and alcohol, alongside excellent quality vegetable, meat and fish stalls. Boulangeries are the best places to buy bread. These usually open early in the morning, and again around 6pm, and sell freshly baked bread and pastries; some will also open at lunchtime for sandwiches.

Regional specialities are mostly of the edible kind. If you're travelling in Brittany, be sure to pick up some of the local cider (cidre), whilst Normandy is famous for its calvados, and the south for its pastis. Provence is well known for its superb olive oil (huile d'olive), and pricey truffles (truffes), as is the Dordogne. No matter where you go, each region will produce at least one local cheese (see p.52), and wine of course also varies from region to region (see p.52). Cognac (pp.651–53) and the Champagne region (pp.271–81) are also obvious stop-offs if you're looking to stock up.

Other items to look out for include lace (dentelle) in the north of the country, pottery in Brittany and ceramics in Limoges, whilst in Normandy, the small town of Villedieu-les-Poêles (p.404) is well known for its copperwork. The northeast, especially Lorraine, is renowned for its crystal production, whilst Provence, particularly the town of Grasse (pp.1169–71), is the place in France to buy perfume.

Non-EU residents are able to claim back VAT (TVA) on purchases that come to over €175. To do this, make sure the shop you're buying from fills out the correct paperwork, and present this to customs before you check in at the airport for your return flight.

Travelling with children

France is a relatively easy country in which to travel with children. They're generally welcome everywhere and young children and babies in particular will be fussed over. There are masses of family-oriented theme parks and no end of leisure activities geared towards kids, while most public parks contain children's play areas.

Local tourist offices will have details of specific activities for children, which might include anything from farm visits, nature walks or treasure hunts to paintball and forest ropeways for older children. In summer most seaside resorts organize clubs for children on the beach, while bigger campsites put on extensive programmes of activities and entertainments. Children under 4 years travel free on trains and buses, while those between 4 and 12 pay half-fare. Museums and the like are generally free to under-12s and half-price up to the age of 18.

Hotels charge by the room, with a small supplement for an additional bed or cot, and family-run places will usually babysit or offer a listening service while you eat or go out. In addition, some youth hostels are now starting to offer family rooms. Eating out is easy enough, although you may be restricted by late meal times, and the children's menus that do exist tend to be of the steak-and-chips and ice cream variety. Disposable nappies/diapers (couches à jeter) are available at most pharmacies and supermarkets, as is milk powder, although this tends to be rich, and you'd be advised to bring enough of the brand you are used to at home. You'll also find a wide range of baby foods in the same outlets, though you should be aware that nearly all have added sugar and salt; again bring your own if this is likely to be a concern. Most medicines are available over the counter at pharmacies. Note that it is rare to see women breastfeed in public, and you may encourage disapproving stares if you try it.

One final thing to be aware of – not that you can do much about it – is the difficulty of negotiating a child's buggy over cobbled streets in the medieval town centres. Also, lawns in parks are often out of bounds, so sprawling on the grass with toddlers and napping babies is usually not an option; look out for signs saying pelouse interdite.

For details of tour operators specializing in travel with kids, see "Getting there" p.33.

Further information

Baby Centre @ www.babycentre.co.uk/baby/travel. Covers everything you need to know about going on holiday with young babies, including the most family-friendly tour operators and airlines, and country-specific reports.

Family Travel @ www.family-travel.co.uk. Excellent website covering all aspects of traveling with young children and babies. Includes information on where to go, health and what to pack.

Travel essentials

Costs

France is not an expensive place to visit, at least compared to other northern European countries, largely because of the relatively low cost of accommodation and eating out. When and where you go, however, will make a difference: in prime tourist spots hotel prices can go up by a third during July and August, while places like Paris and the Côte d'Azur are always more expensive than other regions.

For a reasonably comfortable existence – staying in hotels, eating lunch and dinner in restaurants, plus moving around, café stops and museum visits – you need to allow a budget of around £69/$127/€100 a day per person. By counting the pennies – staying at youth hostels or camping and being strong-willed about extra cups of coffee and doses of culture – you could manage on £35/$64/€50 a day, or even less if you're surviving on street snacks and market food.

Admission charges to museums and monuments can also eat into your budget, though many state-owned museums have one day of the week when they're free or half-price. Reductions are often available for those over 60 and under 18 (for which you'll need your passport as proof of age) and for students under 26 (see p.76), while many are free for children under 12, and almost always for kids under 4. Several towns and regions offer multi-entry tickets covering a number of sights (detailed in the Guide).

For more on costs see the "Getting around", "Accommodation" and "Food and drink" sections of Basics; for advice on tipping, see p.66.

Crime and personal safety

Theft

While violent crime involving tourists is rare in France, petty theft is endemic in all the big cities, along the Côte d'Azur, on beaches and at major tourist sights. In Paris, be especially wary of pickpockets at train stations and on the métro and RER lines; RER line B, serving Charles de Gaulle airport and Gare du Nord, and subway line number 1 are particularly notorious. Cars with foreign number-plates face a high risk of break-ins; vehicles are rarely stolen, but car radios and luggage – even if locked out of sight – make tempting targets. Motorbike thieves operate in big cities and along the Mediterranean coast, often stealing from cars at traffic lights or in jams; don't leave valuables on the seats and keep car windows shut and doors locked at all times.

It obviously makes sense to take the normal precautions: don't flash wads of notes or travellers' cheques around; carry your bag or wallet securely and be especially careful in crowds; never leave cameras and other valuables lying around; and park your car overnight in a monitored parking, garage or within sight of a police station. It's wise to keep a separate record of cheque and credit card numbers and the phone numbers for cancelling them (see p.76). Finally, make sure you have a good insurance policy (see p.74).

Contacting the police

There are two main types of police in France – the Police Nationale and the Gendarmerie Nationale. The former deals with all crime, parking and traffic affairs within large and mid-sized towns, where you'll find them in the Commissariat de Police, while the Gendarmerie Nationale covers the rural areas. In the Alps or Pyrenees, you may come across specialized mountaineering sections of the police force. These are unfailingly helpful, friendly and approachable, providing rescue services and guidance. Note that the police have the right to stop you at any time to ask for your ID and can also search you or your car without a warrant; if it happens to you, it's not worth being difficult.

If you need to report a theft, go to the local gendarmerie or Commissariat de Police (addresses are given in the Guide for the major cities), where they will fill out a constat de vol. The first thing they'll ask for is your passport, and vehicle documents if relevant. Although the police are not always as cooperative as they might be, it's their duty to assist you if you've lost your passport or all your money, and will usually be able to find someone who speaks English if they don't themselves.

Drugs

Drug use is just as prevalent in France as anywhere else in Europe – and just as risky. People caught smuggling or possessing drugs, even just a few grams of marijuana, are liable to find themselves in jail. Should you be arrested on any charge, you have the right to contact your consulate (addresses given in the Guide), though don't expect much sympathy.

Racism

Though the self-proclaimed home of "liberté, égalité, fraternité", France has an unfortunate reputation for racism and anti-Semitism. The majority of racist incidents are focused against the Arab community and occur largely, but by no means exclusively, within the cities. As a result, particularly Arab, but also black and Asian visitors may encounter an unwelcome degree of curiosity or suspicion from shopkeepers, hoteliers and the like. It is not unknown for hotels to claim they are fully booked when they're not, for example, and the police are far more likely to stop Arab and black people and demand to see their ID. In the worst cases, you might be unlucky enough to experience outright hostility. If you suffer a racial assault, contact the police, your consulate or one of the local anti-racism organizations (though they may not have English-speakers): SOS Racism (@www.sos-racisme.org) and Mouvement contre le Racisme et pour l'Amitié entre les Peuples (MRAP; @www.mrap.asso.fr) have offices in most regions of France. Alternatively, you could contact the English-speaking helpline SOS Help (☎01.46.21.46.46, daily 3–11pm; @www.soshelpline.org). The service is manned by trained volunteers who not only provide a confidential listening service, but also offer practical information for foreigners facing problems in France.

Safety

Pedestrians should take great care when crossing roads. Although the authorities are trying to improve matters, French drivers pay little heed to pedestrian/zebra crossings. Never step out onto a crossing assuming that drivers will stop. Also be wary at traffic lights: check cars are not still speeding towards you even when the green man is showing.

Disabled travellers

The French authorities have been making a concerted effort to improve facilities for disabled travellers. Though haphazard parking habits and stepped village streets remain serious obstacles for anyone with mobility problems, ramps or other forms of access are gradually being added to hotels, museums and other public buildings. All but the oldest hotels are required to adapt at least one room to be wheelchair accessible and a number of theatres now display the text for the deaf and hard-of-hearing during certain performances.

For getting to France, Eurotunnel (see p.30) offers the simplest option for travellers from the UK, since you can remain in your car. Alternatively, Eurostar trains have

Emergency numbers

Police ☎17

Medical emergencies/ambulance ☎15

Fire brigade/paramedics ☎18

Rape crisis (SOS Viol) ☎08.00.05.95.95

All emergency numbers are toll-free.

a limited number of wheelchair spaces in first class for the price of the regular second-class fare; it's wise to reserve well in advance, when you might also like to enquire about the special assistance that Eurostar offers. If you're flying, it's worth noting that, while airlines are required to offer access to travellers with mobility problems, the level of service provided by some discount airlines may be fairly basic. All cross-Channel ferries have lifts for getting to and from the car deck, but moving between the different passenger decks may be more difficult.

Within France, most train stations now make provision for travellers with mobility problems. Spaces for wheelchairs are available in first-class carriages of all high-speed TGVs for the price of the regular second-class fare; note that these must be booked in advance. For other trains, a wheelchair symbol in the timetable indicates services offering special on-board facilities, though it's best to double check when booking. SNCF (see p.35) also produces a free guide, Le Mémento du Voyageur Handicapé, detailing all its services, which is available from main stations.

Drivers of taxis are legally obliged to help passengers in and out of the vehicle and to carry guide dogs. Specially adapted taxi services are available in some towns: contact the local tourist office for further information, or one of the organizations listed below. The big car rental agencies such as Hertz and Europcar provide automatic cars and cars with hand controls, but only in certain locations and you'll need to reserve well in advance.

As for finding suitable accommodation, guides produced by Logis de France (see p.47) and Gîtes de France (see p.48) indicate places with specially adapted rooms, though it's advisable to double-check when booking that the facilities meet to your needs.

Up-to-date information about accessibility, special programmes and discounts is best obtained before you leave home from the organizations listed below. French readers might want to get hold of the Handitourisme guide, published by Petit Futé (www.petitfute.com), available online or from major bookstores. You should also visit the French tourist board website at www.franceguide.com.

Useful contacts

Association des Paralysés de France (APF)

France ☎ 01.40.78.69.00, 🌐 www.apf.asso.fr. National association which can answer general enquiries and put you in touch with their departmental offices.

Fédération Française Handisport France

☎ 01.40.31.45.00, 🌐 www.handisport.org. Amongst other things, this federation provides information on sports and leisure facilities for people with disabilities.

Holiday Care UK ☎ 0845 124 9971, 🌐 www.holidaycare.org.uk. Provides a comprehensive travel pack on France with details of facilities in hotels, resorts and so on.

Mobile en Ville France 🌐 www.mobile-en-ville.com. Information on getting around Paris (French only).

Wheels Up! US ☎ 1-888-38-WHEELS, 🌐 www.wheelsup.com. Provides discounted airfares, tours and cruises for disabled travellers; also publishes a free monthly newsletter.

Electricity

Voltage is almost always 220V, using plugs with two round pins. If you need a transformer, it's best to buy one before leaving home, though you can find them in big department stores in France.

Entry requirements

Citizens of EU countries can enter France freely, while those from many non-EU countries, including Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United States, among other countries, do not need a visa for a stay of up to ninety days. South African citizens require a short-stay visa for up to ninety days, which should be applied for in advance, and costs €35. You'll need to have a return ticket, and provide evidence that you have accommodation in France, as well as family or private connections for a longer stay.

All non-EU citizens who wish to remain longer than ninety days must apply to the local mairie or town hall for a residence permit (a titre de séjour, also known as a carte de séjour), for which you will have to show proof of – among other things – a regular income or sufficient funds to support yourself, evidence of medical insurance and the appropriate visa (such as a business or study visa, if required). Be aware, however, that the situation can change and it's advisable to check with your nearest French embassy or consulate before departure. For further information about visa regulations consult the Ministry of Foreign Affairs website: @www.diplomatie.gouv.fr.

French embassies and consulates

Australia Canberra ☎02/6216 0100, Sydney ☎02/9261 5779, @www.ambafrance-au.org.

Britain London ☎020/7073 1200, @www.ambafrance-uk.org, Edinburgh ☎0131/220 6324; @www.consulfrance-edimbourg.org.

Canada Montréal ☎1-514/878 4385, @www.consulfrance-montreal.org; Québec ☎1-418/694 2294, @www.consulfrance-quebec.org; Toronto ☎1-416/925 8041, @www.consulfrance-toronto.org; Vancouver ☎1-604/681 4345, @www.consulfrance-vancouver.org.

Ireland Dublin ☎01/260 1666, @www.ambafrance-ie.org.

New Zealand Wellington ☎04/384 2555, @www.ambafrance-nz.org.

South Africa Johannesburg ☎011/778 5600, @www.consulfrance-jhb.org; Cape Town ☎21/423 1575, @www.consulfrance-lecap.org.

USA Atlanta ☎1-404/495 1660, @www.consulfrance-atlanta.org; Boston ☎1-617/542 7735, @www.consulfrance-boston.org; Chicago ☎1-312/787 5359, @www.consulfrance-chicago.org; Houston ☎1-713/572 2799, @www.consulfrance-houston.org; Los Angeles ☎1-310/235 3200, @www.consulfrance-losangeles.org; Miami ☎1-305/372 9798, @www.consulfrance-miami.org; New Orleans ☎1-504/523 5772, @www.consulfrance-nouvelleorleans.org; New York ☎1-212/606 3600, @www.consulfrance-newyork.org; San Francisco ☎1-415/616 4910, @www.consulfrance-sanfrancisco.org; Washington ☎1-202/944 6200, @www.ambafrance-us.org.

Gay and lesbian travellers

France is more liberal on homosexuality than most other European countries. The age of consent is 16, and same-sex couples have been able to form civil partnerships, called PACs, since 1999. Gay marriage, however, along with the right to adopt, remains illegal, despite the fact that the controversial mayor of Bègles, near Bordeaux, conducted the country's first and only gay marriage in 2004 (it was later declared invalid).

Gay male communities thrive, especially in Paris and southern towns such as Toulouse and Nice. Lesbian life is rather less upfront, although Toulouse has a particularly lively lesbian community. Nevertheless, gays tend to keep a low profile outside communities and specific gay venues, parades, and the prime gay areas of Paris and the coastal resorts. The biggest annual event is the Gay Pride march in Paris (@www.gaypride.fr), which takes place every June.

In Corsica, attitudes remain much more conservative than on the mainland. Women can get away with holding hands and walking with arms around each other, but gay men can expect hostile comments if they do the same. At the same time, the island has long been a popular destination for discreet gay couples and no one is likely to raise much more than an eyebrow when checking in to a hotel. Addresses of local gay and/or lesbian establishments are listed in the Guide. Also useful is the French tourist board website with their online magazine Franceguide for the Gay Traveller.

Useful contacts

Dykeplanet @www.dykeplanet.com. Sells Le dykeGuide, a guidebook listing lesbian-friendly places across France. Published annually, in French only, it's also available from FNAC and other bookstores.

Spartacus @www.spartacusworld.com. Site selling the English-language Spartacus International Gay Guide, which has an extensive section on France and contains some information for lesbians.

Têtu @www.tetu.com. Highly rated French gay/lesbian magazine with events listings and contact addresses; you can buy it in bookshops or through their website, which is also an excellent source of information.

Health

Visitors to France have little to worry about as far as health is concerned. No vaccinations are required, there are no nasty diseases to be wary of and tap water is safe to drink. The worst that's likely to happen to you is a case of sunburn or an upset stomach from eating too much rich food. If you do need treatment, however, you should be in good hands: the French healthcare system is rated one of the best in the world.

Under the French health system, all services, including doctors' consultations, prescribed medicines, hospital stays and ambulance call-outs, incur a charge which you have to pay upfront. EU citizens are entitled to a refund (usually between 70 and 100 percent) of medical and dental expenses, providing the doctor is government-registered (un médecin conventionné) and provided you have the correct documentation (the European Health Insurance Card – EHIC; application forms available from main post offices in the UK). This can still leave a hefty shortfall, however, especially after a stay in hospital, so you might want to take out some additional insurance. All non-EU visitors should ensure they have adequate medical insurance cover.

For minor complaints go to a pharmacie, signalled by an illuminated green cross. You'll find at least one in every small town and even some villages. They keep normal shop hours (roughly 9am–noon & 3–6pm), though some stay open late and in larger towns at least one (known as the pharmacie de garde) is open 24 hours according to a rota; details are displayed in all pharmacy windows, or the local police will have information.

For anything more serious you can get the name of a doctor from a pharmacy, local police station, tourist office or your hotel. Alternatively, look under “Médecins” in the Yellow Pages of the phone directory. The consultation fee is in the region of €20 to €25, and you'll be given a Feuille de Soins (Statement of Treatment) for later insurance claims. Any prescriptions will be fulfilled by the pharmacy and must be paid for; little price stickers (vignettes) from each medicine will be stuck on the Feuille de Soins.

In serious emergencies you will always be admitted to the nearest general hospital (centre hospitalier). Phone numbers and addresses of hospitals in all the main cities are given in the Guide. The national number for calling an ambulance is ☎15.

Insurance

Though EU citizens are entitled to health-care privileges in France, even they would do well to take out an insurance policy before travelling in order to cover against theft, loss, illness or injury. Before paying for a new policy, however, it's worth checking whether you are already covered: some all-risks home insurance policies may cover your possessions when overseas, and many private medical schemes include cover when abroad. In Canada, provincial health plans usually provide partial cover for medical mishaps overseas, while holders of official student, teacher or youth cards in Canada and the US are entitled to meagre accident coverage and hospital in-patient benefits. Students will often find that their student health coverage extends during the vacations and for one term beyond the date of last enrolment.

After checking out the possibilities above, you might want to contact a specialist travel insurance company, or consider the travel insurance deal we offer (see below). A typical travel insurance policy usually provides cover for the loss of baggage, tickets and – up to a certain limit – cash or cheques, as well as cancellation or curtailment of your journey. Most of them exclude so-called dangerous sports unless an extra premium is paid; in France this can mean skiing, whitewater rafting, rock-climbing and potholing. Many policies can be chopped and changed to exclude coverage you don't need – for example, sickness and accident benefits can often be excluded or included at will.

If you do take medical coverage, ascertain whether benefits will be paid as treatment proceeds or only after you return home, and if there is a 24-hour medical emergency number. When securing baggage cover, make sure that the per-article limit – typically under £500/$750 and sometimes as little as £250/$400 – will cover your most valuable possession. If you need to make a claim, you should keep receipts for medicines and medical treatment, and in the event you have anything stolen, you must obtain an official statement from the police (called a constat de vol; see p.71).

Rough Guides has teamed up with Columbus Direct to offer you travel insurance that can be tailored to suit your needs. Products include a low-cost backpacker option for long stays; a short break option for city getaways; a typical holiday package option; and others. There are also annual multi-trip policies for those who travel regularly. Different sports and activities (trekking, skiing, etc) can be usually be covered if required.

See our website (@www.roughguides.com) for eligibility and purchasing options. Alternatively, UK residents should call ☎08700 339988; US citizens should call ☎1-800-749-4922; Australians should call ☎1300 669 999. All other nationalities should call ☎+44 870 890 2843.

Internet

Internet access is relatively easy to come by; you'll find Internet cafés in most towns and cities, as well as points (point internet) in hotels, hostels, and many of the larger post offices. Wifi is becoming more common in cafes and bars, and ISDN access is available in many hotels. Internet cafés tend to charge €4–10 per hour, whilst you'll pay around €8 an hour at a post office, and invariably more in your hotel.

Laundry

Laundries are common in French towns – just ask in your hotel or the tourist office, or look in the phone book under “Laveries automatiques” or “Laveries en libre-service”. They are often unattended, so come armed with small change. Machines are graded for different wash sizes; a 7kg will cost in the region of €4–5. Most hotels forbid doing laundry in your room, though you should get away with just one or two items.

Mail

French post offices, known as La Poste and identified by bright yellow-and-blue signs, are generally open from around 8.30am to 6 or 7pm Monday to Friday, and 8.30am to noon on Saturday. However, these hours aren't set in stone: smaller branches tend to keep shorter hours and may close for an hour or so at lunch, while in Paris the main post office is open 24 hours.

You can receive letters using the poste restante system available at the central post office in every town. They should be addressed (preferably with the surname first and in capitals) “Poste Restante, Poste Centrale, Town x, post code”. You'll need your passport to collect your mail and there'll be a charge of €0.50 per item. Items are usually only kept for fifteen days.

For sending letters, remember that you can buy stamps (timbres) with less queuing from tabacs and newsagents. Standard letters (20g or less) and postcards within France and to other European Union countries cost €0.53; to North America, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa they cost €0.90. Inside larger post offices you'll find rows of yellow-coloured guichets automatiques – automatic stamp machines with instructions available in English where you can weigh letters and packages and buy the appropriate stamps; sticky labels and tape are also dispensed. To post your letter on the street, look for the bright yellow postboxes.

Small packages (paquet) can be sent from any post office with relative ease, and you'll be able to buy the necessary boxes and envelopes on site. For large items you may be better off using the services of companies such as Fedex (@www.fedex.com) who will pick up your package for you. Alternatively, if you're buying a large item that you wish to post back home, shops will often be able to ship it for you, though there will usually be a substantial charge.

For further information on postal rates, among other things, log on to the post office web site @www.laposte.fr.

Maps

In addition to the maps in this guide and the various free town plans and regional maps you'll be offered along the way, the one extra map you might want is a good, up-to-date road map of France. Michelin (@www.viamichelin.fr) and the Institut Géographique National (IGN; @www.ign.fr) produce the best ones, both at a scale of 1:100,000. Both companies also issue good regional maps at 1:25,000, either as individual sheets or in one large spiral-bound atlas routier; Michelin's version is available in English as the France Tourist & Motoring Atlas (£13.99).

If walking or cycling, it's worth investing in the more detailed IGN maps. Their Carte de Randonnée series (1:25,000) is specifically designed for walkers, while the Carte de Promenade (1:25,000) is good for cyclists. See “Contexts” (p.1336) for details of walking guides.

Rough Guides also produces a national map of France, a city map of Paris, and regional maps of Brittany, Corsica and the Pyrenees.

Money

Currency

France's currency is the euro, which is divided into 100 cents (often still referred to as centimes). There are seven notes – in denominations of 5, 10, 20, 50, 100, 200 and 500 euros – and eight different coins – 1, 2, 5, 10, 20 and 50 cents, and 1 and 2 euros. At the time of writing, the exchange rate for the euro was around €1.49 to the pound sterling (or £0.66 to €1) and €1.30 to the dollar (or $0.77 to €1). See @www.xe.com for current rates.

Currency exchange

Banks will have a sign outside if they offer currency exchange. Rates and commission vary from bank to bank, so it's worth shopping around; some will change travellers' cheques for "free" but then make up for it by offering a poor exchange rate, while others levy up to three percent commission, with a minimum charge that can go as high as €8 (or they may simply charge a flat rate whatever the amount). Post offices also change money and travellers' cheques, and sometimes offer a better rate of exchange.

There are money-exchange counters (bureaux de change) at French airports, major train stations and usually one or two in town centres as well. You'll occasionally also find them in tourist offices. These services are handy when the banks are closed though don't always offer the best exchange rates.

ATMs

By far the easiest way to access money in France is to use your credit or debit card to withdraw cash from an ATM (known as a distributeur or point argent); most machines give instructions in a variety of European languages. Note that there is often a transaction fee, so it's more efficient to take out a sizeable sum each time rather than making lots of small withdrawals.

Credit and debit cards

Credit and debit cards are also widely accepted in shops, hotels and restaurants, although some smaller establishments don't accept cards, or only for sums above a certain threshold. Visa – called Carte Bleue in France – is almost universally recognized, followed by MasterCard (also known as EuroCard). American Express ranks a bit lower. Be aware that French cards are equipped with a chip and require the user to provide a PIN when making a purchase. If your card is not a chip and pin, and you're asked to tap in a PIN or are told that your card has been rejected, you may need to explain that that yours is a carte à piste and not a carte à puce.

Another option is a pre-paid debit card; you load up the account with funds before you leave, and then just throw the card away when it's finished. In the US they are available through Travelex (☎1-877-394-2247, @www.cashpassportcard.com) and in the UK through American Express (☎0870 600 1060, @www.americanexpress.com/uk).

To cancel lost or stolen cards, call the following 24-hour numbers: American Express ☎01.47.77.72.00; Diners' Club ☎08.10.31.41.59; MasterCard ☎01.45.67.84.84; Visa ☎08.00.90.11.79.

Discount cards

Once obtained, various official and quasi-official youth/student ID cards soon pay for themselves in savings. Full-time students are eligible for the International Student ID Card (ISIC, @www.isiccard.com, or @www.isic.org in the US and Canada), which entitles the bearer to special air, rail and bus fares and discounts at museums, theatres and other attractions. For Americans there's also a health benefit, providing up to $3000 in emergency medical coverage and $100 a day for 60 days in the hospital, plus a 24-hour hotline to call in the event of a medical, legal or financial emergency. The card costs US$22 in the US; Can$16 in Canada; AUS$16.50 in Australia; NZ$21 in New Zealand; £7 in the UK; and €12.70 in the Republic of Ireland.

You only have to be 26 or younger to qualify for the International Youth Travel Card (IYTC), which costs £7/US$22 and carries the same benefits. Teachers qualify for the International Teacher Card (ITIC), offering similar discounts and costing US$22, Can$16, AUS$16.50 and NZ$21. See www.istc.com or www.isic.org for further details, and your nearest outlet. Several other travel organizations and accommodation groups also sell their own cards, good for various discounts. A university photo ID might open some doors, but is not always as easily recognizable as the above cards.

Most museums and other tourist sites give discounts to the over-60s (usually the same as the student reduction) while SNCF offers special deals on train tickets (see p.38), although proof of age will usually be required.

Opening hours and public holidays

Basic hours of business are Monday to Saturday 9am to noon and 2 to 6.30pm. In big cities, shops and other businesses stay open throughout the day, and in July and August most tourist offices and museums don't close for lunch. In rural areas and throughout southern France places tend to close for at least a couple of hours at lunchtime. Small food shops may not reopen till halfway through the afternoon, closing around 7.30 or 8pm, just before the evening meal. The standard closing day is Sunday, even in larger towns and cities, though some food shops and newsagents are open in the morning. Some shops and businesses, particularly in rural areas, also close on Mondays.

Core banking hours are Monday to Friday 9am to noon and 2 to 4.30pm. Some branches, especially those in rural areas, close on Monday, while those in big cities may remain open at midday and may also open on Saturday morning. All are closed on Sunday and public holidays.

Museums tend to open from 9 or 10am to noon and from 2 or 3pm to 5pm or 6pm, though in the big cities some stay open all day and opening hours tend to be longer in summer. Museum closing days are usually Monday or Tuesday, sometimes both. Churches and cathedrals are generally open from around 8am to dusk, but may close at lunchtime and are reserved for worshippers during services (times of which will be posted on the door). Country churches are increasingly kept locked; there will usually be a note on the door telling you where to get the key, usually from the priest's house (presbytère) or someone else living nearby.

France celebrates twelve public holidays (jours fériés), when most shops and businesses (though not necessarily restaurants), and some museums, are closed. May is a particularly busy month for holidays: as well as May Day and VE Day, Ascension Day normally falls then, as sometimes does Pentecost (Whitsun).

Phones

You can make domestic and international phone calls from any telephone box (cabine) and can also receive calls – look for

Public holidays

January 1 New Year's Day

Easter Sunday

Easter Monday

Ascension Day (forty days after Easter)

Pentecost or Whitsun (seventh Sunday after Easter)

May 1 Labour Day

May 8 Victory in Europe (VE) Day 1945

July 14 Bastille Day

August 15 Assumption of the Virgin Mary

November 1 All Saints' Day

November 11 Armistice Day

December 25 Christmas Day

the number in the top right-hand corner of the information panel. The vast majority of public phones require a phone card (télécarte), available from post offices, tabacs, newsagents and railway stations; they come in units of 50 and 120 units (€7.50 and €15 respectively). You can also use credit cards in many call boxes. Coin-operated phones have almost completely disappeared except in cafés and bars.

Calling within France

For calls within France – local or long distance – simply dial all ten digits of the number. Numbers beginning with 08.00 up to 08.05 are free-dial numbers; those beginning 08.10 and 08.11 are charged as a local call; anything else beginning 08 is premium-rated (typically €0.34 per minute). Note that none of these 08 numbers can be accessed from abroad. Calls to mobile phones (numbers starting with 06) are also charged at premium rates.

Calling home from France

One of the most convenient ways of phoning home from abroad is via a telephone charge card from your phone company back home. Using a PIN number, you can make calls from most hotel, public and private phones that will be charged to your account. Since most major charge cards are free to obtain, it's certainly worth getting one at least for emergencies; bear in mind though that rates aren't necessarily cheaper than calling from a public phone. In the UK and Ireland, British Telecom (0800 345 144, www.payphones.bt.com) will issue the BT Charge Card free to all customers.

In the US and Canada, AT&T, MCI, Sprint, Canada Direct and other North American long-distance companies all enable their customers to make calls while overseas, billed to your home number. Call your company's customer service line to set up this service. In Australia and New Zealand, similar schemes are offered by Telstra, Optus, and Telecom NZ.

Another option is one of the pre-paid phone cards (cartes à codes) on sale at tabacs, newsagents and post offices which you can use with any public or private telephone. The €15 "L'Astuce Internationale" marketed by Tiscali (www.prepaye.tiscali.fr), for example, gives you roughly three and a half hours to the UK, USA or Canada.

Mobile phones

If you want to use your mobile/cell phone, contact your phone provider to check whether it will work in France and what the call charges are – they tend to be pretty exorbitant, and remember you're likely to be charged extra for receiving calls. French mobile phones operate on the European GSM standard, so US cellphones won't work in France unless you have a tri-band phone.

If you are going to be in France for any length of time and will be making and receiving a lot of local calls, it may be worth your while buying a French SIM card (which will give you a local phone number) and pre-paid recharge cards (mobicartes). You can buy a SIM card from any of the big mobile providers (France Télécom's Orange, SFR and Bouygues Telecom), all of which have high-street outlets. They cost from around €30,

Calling home from abroad

Note that the initial zero is omitted from the area code when dialling the UK, Ireland, Australia and New Zealand from abroad.

UK international access code + 44 + city code

Republic of Ireland international access code + 353 + city code.

US and Canada international access code + 1 + area code

Australia international access code + 61 + city code

New Zealand international access code + 64 + city code

South Africa international access code + 27 + city code.

and you'll need to have an address in France to register – that of your hotel or a friend will usually suffice.

Time

France is in the Central European Time Zone (GMT+1). This means it is one hour ahead of the UK, six hours ahead of Eastern Standard Time and nine hours ahead of Pacific Standard Time. Between March and October France is eight hours behind eastern Australia and ten hours behind New Zealand; from October to March it is ten hours behind southeastern Australia and twelve hours behind New Zealand. Daylight Saving Time (GMT+2) in France lasts from the last Sunday in March to the last Sunday in October.

Tourist information

The French Government Tourist Office (Maison de la France; www.franceguide.com) increasingly refers you to their website for information, though they still produce a useful practical guide for young travellers to France, and dispense items including maps and the Logis de France book (see "Accommodation" p.47). For more detailed information, such as hotels, campsites, activities and festivals in a specific location, it's best to contact the relevant regional or departmental tourist offices; contact details can be found online at www.fncr.com and www.fncdt.net respectively.

In France itself you'll find a tourist office – usually an Office du Tourisme (OT) but sometimes a Syndicat d'Initiative (SI, run by local businesses) – in practically every town and many villages (addresses, contact details and opening hours are detailed in the Guide). All these offices provide specific local information, including hotel and restaurant listings, leisure activities, car and bike rental, bus times, laundries and countless other things; many can also book accommodation for you. If asked, most offices will provide a town plan (for which you may be charged a nominal fee), and will have maps and local walking guides on sale. In mountain regions they display daily meteorological information and often share premises with the local hiking and climbing organizations. In the big cities you can usually pick up free What's On guides.

Tourist offices and government sites

Australia Level 20, 25 Bligh St, Sydney, NSW 2000
 ☎ 02/9231 5244, au.franceguide.com.

Britain 178 Piccadilly, London W1J 9AL ☎ 09068 244123 (60p/min), uk.franceguide.com.

Canada 1981 Ave McGill College, Suite 490, Montréal, QC H3A 2W9 ☎ 1-514/288 2026, ca-en.franceguide.com.

Ireland ☎ 1560 235 235, ie.franceguide.com.

New Zealand Contact the office in Australia.

South Africa ☎ 11/880 8062, za.franceguide.com.

USA 9454 Wilshire Blvd, Suite 715, Beverly Hills, CA 90212 ☎ 1-514-288-1904; 444 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022 ☎ 1-410-286-8310; us.franceguide.com.

Other useful websites

Bibliothèque Pompidou www.bpi.fr. Good links to media and a very comprehensive list of arts and humanities sites for France. French-language only.

FNOTSI www.tourisme.fr. Searchable database run by the national association of tourist offices, details of local tourist offices and links to local websites.

France 2 www.france2.fr. The latest news, weather and road conditions from the France 2 TV channel. Also provides an online translation service to/from various European languages.

Ministry of Culture www.culture.fr. Information (in French) on cultural events and a comprehensive list of links to organizations related to the whole gamut of artistic media.

Service-Public www.servicepublic.fr. Multilingual portal sight for the French civil service, containing news, information and masses of useful links.

Guide

Guide

- 1 Paris and around..... 83–216
- 2 The north..... 83–216
- 3 Alsace-Lorraine and the Jura Mountains..... 83–216
- 4 Normandy..... 83–216
- 5 Brittany..... 83–216
- 6 The Loire..... 83–216
- 7 Burgundy..... 83–216
- 8 Poitou Charentes and the Atlantic Coast..... 83–216
- 9 The Dordogne, Limousin and Lot..... 83–216
- 10 The Pyrenees..... 83–216
- 11 Languedoc..... 83–216
- 12 The Massif Central..... 83–216
- 13 The Alps..... 83–216
- 14 Provence..... 83–216
- 15 The Côte d'Azur..... 83–216
- 16 Corsica..... 83–216

Paris and around

CHAPTER 1

Highlights

- * Sainte-Chapelle The stunning stained-glass windows of the Sainte-Chapelle rank among the finest achievements of French High Gothic. See p.108
- * Musée Jacquemart-André One-time sumptuous residence of a wealthy Second-Empire couple, who built up a choice collection of Italian, Dutch and French masters. See p.112
- * The Louvre One of the world's greatest museums, containing a vast display of French and Italian paintings and notable Ancient Egyptian, Roman and Greek collections. See p.115
- * Marais Arguably the city's most lively and attractive district, characterized by narrow streets, fine Renaissance mansions and trendy bars. See p.124 & 168
- * Jardin du Luxembourg The haunt of old men playing boules, children riding donkeys, students reading textbooks and couples kissing, these gardens capture Paris at its most warm-hearted. See p.141
- * Palais de Tokyo This cool 1930s structure houses two of Paris's most exciting art spaces. See p.146
- * Musée Rodin Rodin's intense sculptures are displayed to powerful effect in his eighteenth-century town house. See p.149
- * Puces de St-Ouen Even if it's less of a flea market now, and more of a mega-emporium for arty bric-a-brac and antiques, the St-Ouen market is a wonderful place for relaxed weekend browsing. See p.157

△ The Louvre

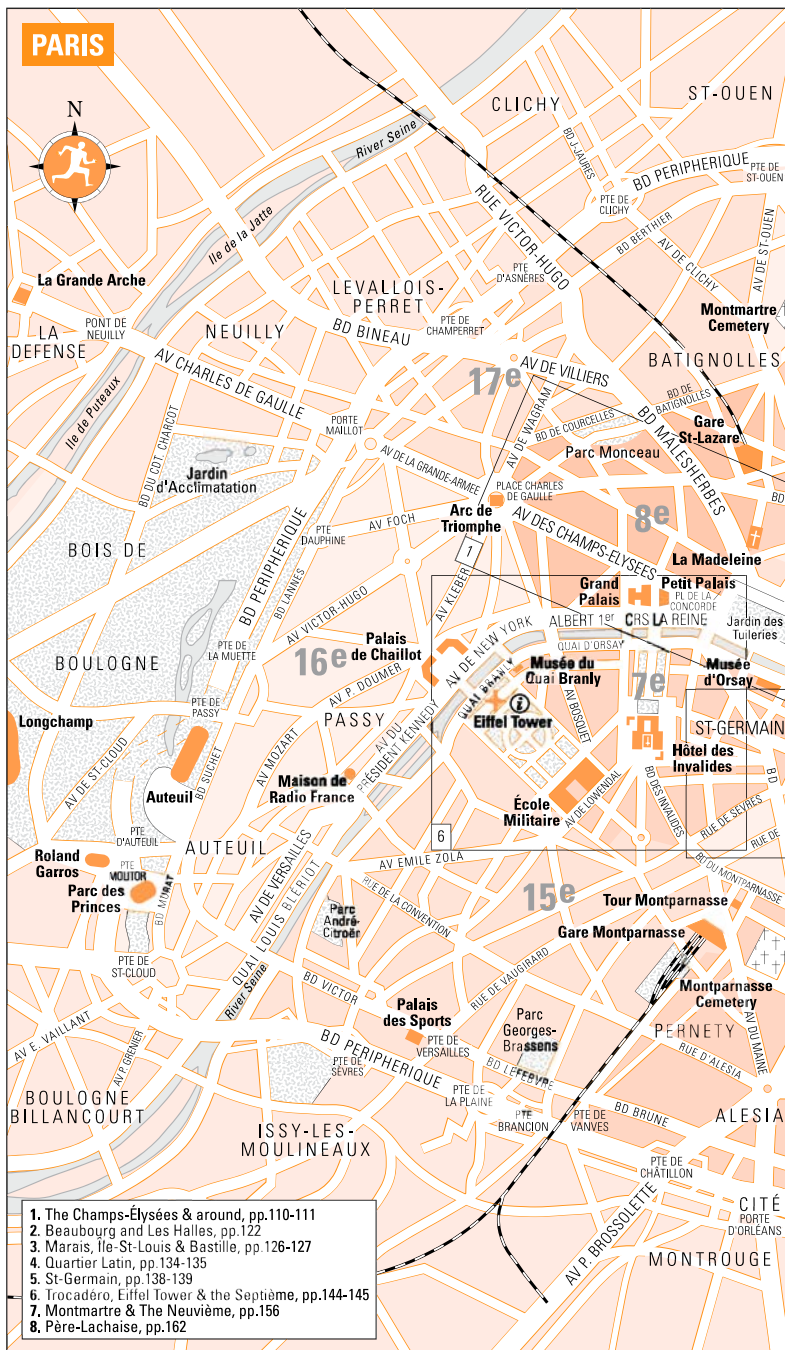

Paris and around

ong considered the paragon of style, PARIS is perhaps the most glamorous city in Europe. It is at once deeply traditional – a village-like metropolis whose inhabitants continue to be notorious for their hauteur – and famously cosmopolitan. The city's reputation as a magnet for writers, artists and dissidents lives on, and it remains at the forefront of Western intellectual, artistic and literary life. At the same time the cultural contributions of its large immigrant populations, particularly from Algeria and West and Central Africa, have sparked unprecedented social transformation in the past few decades. While such contradictions and contrasts may be the reality of any city, they are the makings of Paris: consider the tiny lanes and alleyways of the Quartier Latin or Montmartre against the monumental vistas of the Louvre and La Défense; the multiplicity of markets and old-fashioned pedestrian arcades against the giant underground commercial complexes of Montparnasse, the Louvre and Les Halles; or the obsession with refashioning old buildings and creating ground-breaking architecture against the old ladies who still iron sheets by hand in the laundries of Auteil.

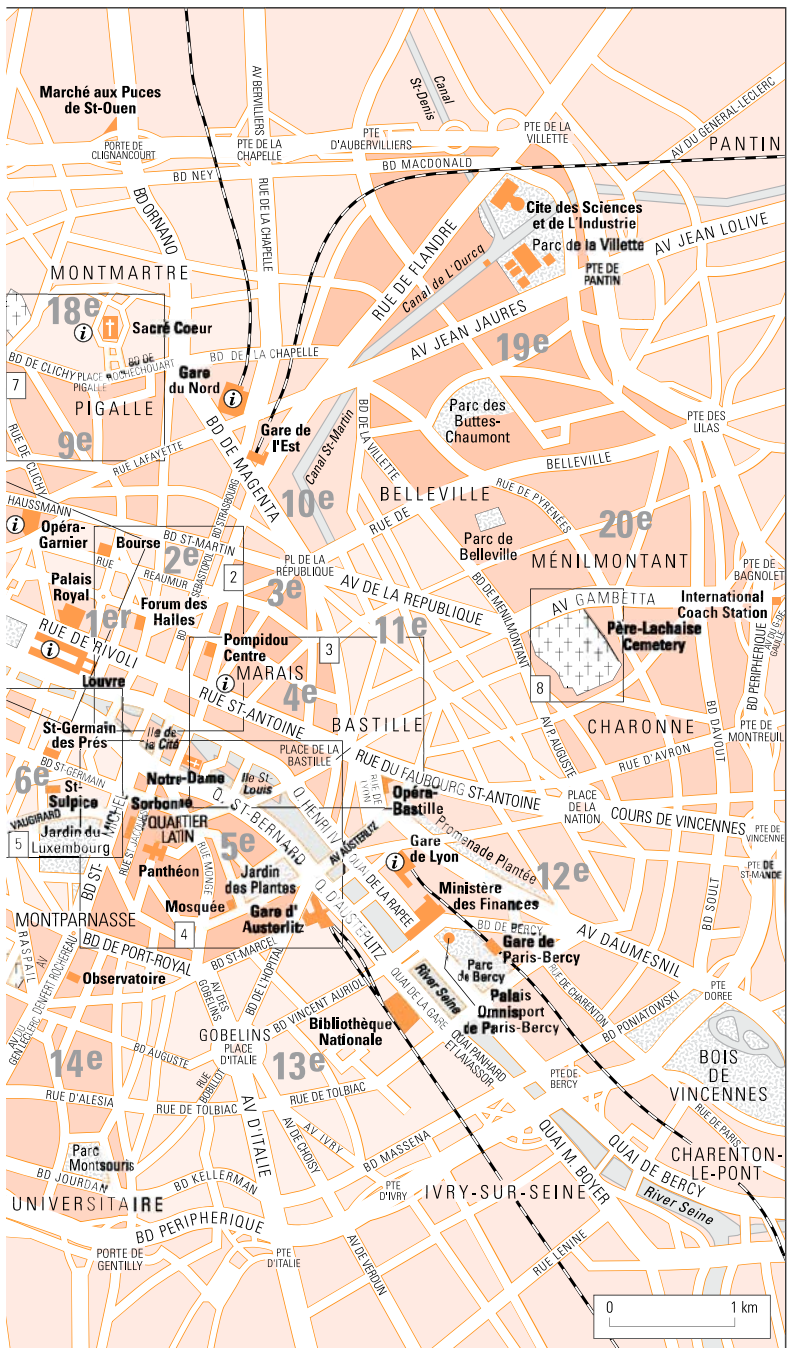

The most tangible and immediate pleasures of Paris are to be found in its street life and along the banks and bridges of the River Seine. Few cities can compete with the cafés, bars and restaurants that line every street and boulevard, and the city's compactness makes it possible to experience the individual feel of the different quartiers. You can move easily, even on foot, from the calm, almost small-town atmosphere of Montmartre and parts of the Quartier Latin to the busy commercial centres of the Bourse and Opéra-Garnier or the aristocratic mansions of the Marais.

The city's lack of open space is redeemed by unexpected havens like the Mosque, Arènes de Lutèce and the place des Vosges, and courtyards of grand houses like the Hôtel de Sully. The gravelled paths and formal beauty of the Tuileries create the backdrop for the ultimate Parisian Sunday promenade, while the islands and quaysides of the Left and Right Banks of the River Seine and the Quartier Latin's two splendid parks, the Luxembourg and the Jardin des Plantes, make for a wonderful wander.

Paris's architectural spirit resides in the elegant streets and boulevards begun in the nineteenth century under Baron Haussmann. The mansion blocks that line them are at once grand and perfectly human in scale, a triumph in city planning proved by the fact that so many remain residential to this day. Rising above these harmonious buildings are the more arrogant monuments that define the French capital. For centuries, an imposing Classical style prevailed with great set pieces such as the Louvre, Panthéon and Arc de Triomphe, but the last hundred years or so has seen the architectural mould repeatedly broken in a succession

1. The Champs-Élysées & around, pp.110-111
2. Beaubourg and Les Halles, pp.122
3. Marais, Île-St-Louis & Bastille, pp.126-127
4. Quartier Latin, pp.134-135
5. St-Germain, pp.138-139
6. Trocadéro, Eiffel Tower & the Septième, pp.144-145
7. Montmartre & The Neuvième, pp.156
8. Père-Lachaise, pp.162

of ambitious structures, the industrial chic of the Eiffel Tower and Pompidou Centre contrasting with the almost spiritual glasswork of the Louvre Pyramide and Institut du Monde Arabe.

Paris is remarkable, too, for its museums – there are over 150 of them, ranging from giants of the art world such as the Louvre, Musée d'Orsay and Pompidou Centre to lesser-known gems like the Picasso, Rodin and Jewish museums – and the diversity of entertainment on offer. Paris is a real cinema capital, with a large percentage of films on show in the original version. And although French rock is notoriously awful, it is compensated for by the quality of current Parisian music, from jazz and avant-garde to West African and Arab sounds – the vibrant cultural mix putting Paris at the forefront of the world music scene. Classical concerts in fine architectural settings – particularly chapels and churches – are also frequent, and sometimes free.

Some history

Paris's history has conspired to create a sense of being apart from, and even superior to, the rest of the country. To this day, everything beyond the capital is known quite ordinarily as province – the provinces. Appropriately, the city's first inhabitants, the Parisii, a Celtic tribe that arrived in around the third century BC, had their settlement on an island: Lutetia, probably today's Île de la Cité. The Romans conquered the city two centuries later, and preferred the more familiar hilly ground of the Left Bank. Their city, also called Lutetia, grew up around the hill where the Panthéon stands today.

This hill, now known as the Montagne Ste-Geneviève, gets its name from Paris's first patron saint, who, as legend has it, saved the town from the marauding army of Attila in 451 through her exemplary holiness. Fifty years later Geneviève converted another invader to Christianity: Clovis the Frank, the leader of a group of Germanic tribes, went on to make the city the capital of his kingdom. His newly founded Merovingian dynasty promptly fell apart under his son Childéric II.

Power only returned to Paris under Hugues Capet, the Count of Paris. He was elected king of France in 987, although at the time his territory amounted to little more than the Île de France, the region immediately surrounding Paris. From this shaky start French monarchs gradually extended their control over their feudal rivals, centralizing administrative, legal, financial and political power as they did so, until anyone seeking influence, publicity or credibility, in whatever field, had to be in Paris – which is still the case today. The city's cultural influence grew alongside its university, which was formally established in 1215 and swiftly became the great European centre for scholastic learning.

The wars and plagues of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries left Paris half in ruins and more than half abandoned, but with royal encouragement, the city steadily recovered. During the Wars of Religion the capital remained staunchly Catholic, but Parisians' loyalty to the throne was tested during the mid-seventeenth-century rebellions known as the Frondes, in which the young Louis XIV was forced to flee the city. Perhaps this traumatic experience lay behind the king's decision, in 1670, to move the court to his vast new palace at Versailles. Paris suffered in the court's absence, even as grand Baroque buildings were thrown up in the capital.

Parisians, both as deputies to the Assembly and mobs of sans-culottes, were at the forefront of the Revolution, but many of the new citizens welcomed the return to order under Napoleon I. The emperor adorned the city with many of its signature monuments, Neoclassical almost-follies designed to amplify his majesty: the Arc de Triomphe, Arc du Carrousel and the Madeleine. He also instituted the Grandes Écoles, super-universities for the nation's elite administrators, engineers and teachers. At the fall of the Empire, in 1814, Paris was saved from destruction by the arch-diplomat Talleyrand, who delivered the city to the Russians with hardly a shot fired. Nationalists grumbled that the occupation continued well into the Restoration regime, as the city once again became the playground of the rich of Europe, the ultimate tourist destination.

The greatest shocks to the fabric of the city came under Napoléon III. He finally completed the Louvre, rebuilding much of the facade in the process, but it was his Prefect of the Seine, Baron Haussmann, who truly transformed the city, smashing through the slums to create wide boulevards that could be easily controlled by rifle-toting troops – not that it succeeded in preventing the 1871 Commune, the most determined insurrection since 1789. In the process of slum clearance, Haussmann created the uniquely Parisian aesthetic that survives today, of long geometrical boulevards lined with rows of grey bourgeois residences. It was down these boulevards that Nazi troops paraded in June 1940, followed – after a relatively uneventful war for many, if not all, Parisians – by the Allies, led by General Leclerc, in August 1944.

Although riotous street protests are still a feature of modern Parisian life – most famously in May 1968, when students burst onto the streets of the Quartier Latin – the traditional barricade-builders have long since been booted into the suburban factory-land or depressing satellite towns, alongside the under-served populations of immigrants and their descendants. Many Parisians see the economic and cultural integration of these communities as the greatest challenge facing the contemporary city, and there's a strong undercurrent of racism in Paris, as throughout France.

The city continues to expand outward, but offices are steadily elbowing out apartments in the centre, even in this most village-like of cities. Housing remains a problem – trying to find an apartment in Paris is a notoriously difficult affair – and yet the decaying parts of the city, especially in the east and north, are gradually being rebuilt, and grand-scale new developments such as La Défense and the Paris Rive Gauche area attest to the vitality of the city's commercial life.

The interests of business and the bourgeoisie – not to mention those of the mayor's family and friends – flourished under the rule of Jacques Chirac, Paris's mayor from 1977 to 1995, and his successor Jean Tiberi, but in March 2001, a socialist politician called Bertrand Delanoë took over. It was the first time the Left had controlled Paris since the 1871 Commune, and the first time that city had had an openly gay mayor – not that many Parisians seem to think it matters. Delanoë promised to restore life to Paris by taking on the traffic problem, creating new green spaces and fighting the “museumification” of the city. To date, however, the most visible projects have been more populist and superficial: “Paris Plages” sees a swathe of the Seine's quais converted into a beach every summer, while the “Nuit Blanche” keeps Parisians up all night with city-wide art and cultural events.

Arrival

Many British travellers to Paris arrive by Eurostar at the central Gare du Nord train station, while more far-flung visitors are likely to land at one of Paris's two main airports: Charles de Gaulle and Orly. Trains from other parts of France or continental Europe draw in at one of the six central mainline stations. Almost all the buses coming into Paris – whether international or domestic – arrive at the main gare routière at 28 av du Général-de-Gaulle, Bagnolett, at the eastern edge of the city; métro Gallieni (line 3) links it to the centre. If you're driving in yourself, don't try to go straight across the city to your destination. Use the ring road – the boulevard périphérique – to get around to the nearest porte: it's much quicker, except at rush hour, and far easier to navigate, albeit pretty terrifying.

By air

The two main Paris airports that deal with international flights are Roissy-Charles de Gaulle and Orly, both well connected to the centre. Detailed information in English can be found online at www.adp.fr. The more distant Beauvais airport is used by some budget airlines, including Ryanair.

Roissy-Charles de Gaulle Airport

Roissy-Charles de Gaulle Airport (24hr information in English ☎01.48.62.22.80), usually referred to as Charles de Gaulle and abbreviated to CDG or Paris CDG, is 23km northeast of the city. The airport has two main terminals, CDG 1 and CDG 2. A third terminal, CDG 3 (sometimes called CDG-T3), handles various low-cost airlines, including easyJet. Make sure you know which terminal your flight is departing from when it's time to leave Paris, so you take the correct bus or get off at the right train station. A TGV station links the airport (CDG 2) with Bordeaux, Brussels, Lille, Lyon, Nantes, Marseille and Rennes, among other places.

The least expensive and probably quickest way into the centre of Paris is to take the suburban train line RER B3, sometimes called Roissyrail, which runs every ten to fifteen minutes from 5am until midnight; the journey time is thirty minutes and tickets cost €8.10 one way (no return tickets). To get to the RER station from CDG 1 you have to take a free shuttle bus (navette) to the RER station, but from CDG 2 and CDG-T3 it's simpler to take the pedestrian walkway, though the station is also served by a shuttle bus. The RER train stops at stations including Gare du Nord, Châtelet-Les Halles and St-Michel, at all of which you can transfer to the ordinary métro system – your ticket is valid through to any métro station in central Paris.

Various bus companies provide services from the airport direct to various city-centre locations, but they're slightly more expensive than Roissyrail, and may take longer. A more useful alternative is the Blue Vans door-to-door mini-bus service (€65 one way for four people, or €58 return for two people on a shared basis; no extra charge for luggage). Bookings must be made at least 24 hours in advance on ☎01.30.11.13.00 or, for the best rates, online at www.paris-blue-airport-shuttle.fr/.

Taxis into central Paris from CDG cost around €50 on the meter, plus a small luggage supplement (€0.90 per item), and should take between fifty minutes and one hour. Note that if your flight gets in after midnight your only means of transport is a taxi.

Orly Airport

Orly Airport (information in English daily 6am–11.30pm; ☎01.49.75.15.15), 14km south of Paris, has two terminals, Orly Sud and Orly Ouest, linked by shuttle bus but easily walkable; Ouest (West) is used for domestic flights while Sud (South) handles international flights.

The easiest way into the centre is via Orlyval, a fast train shuttle link to the suburban RER station Antony, where you can pick up RER line B trains to the central RER/métro stations Denfert-Rochereau, St-Michel and Châtelet-Les Halles; Orlyval runs every four to eight minutes from 6.10am to 11pm (€9.10 one way; 35min to Châtelet). A useful alternative is the Orlybus: a shuttle bus takes you direct to RER line B station Denfert-Rochereau, on the Left Bank, with good onward métro connections; Orlybus runs every fifteen to twenty minutes from roughly 6am to 11.20pm (€6 one way; total journey around 30min). Taxis take about 35 minutes to reach the centre of Paris and cost around €35.

Beauvais Airport

Ryanair passengers arrive at Beauvais Airport (☎08.92.68.20.66, 🌐www.aeroportbeauvais.com), some 65km northwest of Paris. Coaches (€13 one way) shuttle between the airport and Porte Maillot, at the northwestern edge of Paris, where you can pick up métro line 1 to the centre. Coaches take about an hour, and leave between fifteen and thirty minutes after the flight has arrived and about three hours before the flight departs on the way back. Tickets can be bought online via the airport's web address (see above), at Arrivals or from the Beauvais shop at 1 bd Pershing, near the Porte Maillot terminal.

By train

Paris has six mainline train stations. Eurostar (☎08.92.35.35.39, 🌐www.eurostar.com) terminates at the busy Gare du Nord, rue Dunkerque, in the northeast of the city. Coming off the train, turn left for the métro and the RER, and right for taxis (expect to pay around €10 to central Paris). Just short of the taxi exit, head down the escalators for left luggage (consignes) and the various car rental desks. Two bureaux de change (neither offer a good deal) allow you to change money at the station, or you can use your card in one of the ATM cash machines. The Gare du Nord is also the arrival point for trains from Calais and other north-European countries.

Nearby, the Gare de l'Est (place du 11-Novembre-1918, 10^e) serves eastern France and central and eastern Europe. The Gare St-Lazare (place du Havre, 8^e), serving the Normandy coast and Dieppe, is the most central, close to the Madeleine and the Opéra-Garnier. Still on the Right Bank but towards the southeast corner is the Gare de Lyon (place Louis-Armand, 12^e), for trains to Italy and Switzerland and TGV lines to southeast France. South of the river, Gare Montparnasse (bd de Vaugirard, 15^e) is the terminus for Chartres, Brittany, the Atlantic coast and TGV lines to Tours and southwest France. Gare d'Austerlitz (bd de l'Hôpital, 13^e) serves the Loire Valley and the Dordogne. The motorail station, Gare de Paris-Bercy, is down the tracks from the Gare de Lyon on boulevard de Bercy, 12^e.

All the stations are equipped with cafés, restaurants, tabacs, banks, left-luggage facilities and bureaux de change, and all are connected to the métro system; Gare du Nord and Gare de Lyon have tourist offices which book same-day accommodation (see p.92). For information on national train services and reservations, phone ☎08.36.35.35.39 (if you dial extension 2 you should get through to an English-speaking operator) or consult the website 🌐www.sncf.fr. For information on suburban lines call ☎01.53.90.20.20. You can buy tickets at any train station, online at the SNCF website and from travel agents.

Orientation

1

PARIS AND AROUND

Orientation • Information

Finding your way around Paris is remarkably easy, as the centre is fairly small for a major capital city, and very walkable. The city proper is divided into twenty arrondissements, or districts. These are marked on the map on pp.86–87 and are included as an integral part of addresses throughout the chapter. Arrondissements are abbreviated as 1^{er} (premier = first), 2^e (deuxième = second), 3^e, 4^e and so on; the numbering is confusing until you work out that it spirals out from the centre.

The Seine flows in a downturned arc from east to west, cutting the city in two. In the middle of the Seine lie two islands, while north of the river is the busy, commercial Right Bank, or rive droite. Most of the city's sights are found here, within the historic central arrondissements (1^{er} to 4^e). South of the river is the relatively laid-back Left Bank, or rive gauche (5^e to 7^e). The outer arrondissements (8^e to 20^e) were mostly incorporated into the city in the nineteenth century. Generally speaking, those to the east accommodated the working classes while those to the west were, and still are, the addresses for the aristocracy and new rich. For a brief rundown of Paris's different quarters, see the introduction to the city on p.107.

Paris proper is encircled by the boulevard périphérique ring-road. The sprawling conurbation beyond is known as the banlieue, or suburbs. There are few sights for the tourist here, and only one of significant interest: St-Denis, with its historic cathedral.

Information

At Paris's tourist offices (☎08.92.68.30.00, 🌐www.parisinfo.com) you can pick up maps and information, book hotel accommodation and buy the Paris Museum Pass (see box below). The most usefully located branches are at 25 rue Pyramides, 1^{er} (June–Oct daily 9am–7pm; Nov–May Mon–Sat 10am–7pm, Sun 11am–7pm; M^o Pyramides), and in the Carrousel du Louvre, accessed from 99 rue de Rivoli, 1^{er} (daily 10am–6pm; M^o Palais Royal–Musée du Louvre). The last also has information on the region around Paris, the Île de France. There are smaller offices at the Gare du Nord (daily 8am–6pm) and Gare de

Reductions and the Museum Pass

The permanent collections at all municipal museums are free all year round, while all national museums (including the Louvre, Musée d'Orsay and Pompidou Centre) are free on the first Sunday of the month – see 🌐www.rmn.fr for a full list – and to under-18s. Elsewhere, the cut-off age for free admission varies between 18, 12 and 4. Reduced admission is usually available for 18 to 26-year-olds and for those over 60 or 65; you'll need to carry your passport or ID card around with you as proof of age. Some discounts are available for students with an ISIC Card (International Student Identity Card; 🌐www.isiccard.com). If you're planning to visit a great many museums in a short time, it might be worth buying the Paris Museum Pass (€30 two-day, €45 four-day, €60 six-day; 🌐www.parismuseumpass.fr). Available from the tourist office and participating museums, it's valid for 35 of the most important museums and monuments including the Louvre (but not special exhibitions) inside Paris, and allows you to bypass ticket queues (though not the security checkpoints).

Lyon (Mon–Sat 8am–6pm), and on place du Tertre, in Montmartre, 18^e (daily 10am–6pm; M^o Anvers).

For what's-on information it's worth buying one of Paris's inexpensive weekly listings magazines from a newsagent or kiosk. The best and glossiest is Zurban (@www.zurban.com), although Pariscope has a comprehensive section on films. For more detail, French speakers should check out the monthly Nova magazine, while the free English-language monthly magazines Paris Voice (@www.parisvoice.com) and GoGo Paris (@gogoparis.com), available from Anglo bars and bookshops, have good listings and small ads.

If you feel the need for a separate map, the Rough Guide Map: Paris is detailed and produced on waterproof paper. For a comprehensive A–Z, your best bet is one of the pocket-sized “L'indispensable” series booklets, sold everywhere in Paris.

City transport

While walking is undoubtedly the best way to discover Paris, the city's integrated public transport system of bus, métro and trains – the RATP (Régie Autonome des Transports Parisiens) – is cheap, fast and meticulously signposted. Free métro and bus maps of varying sizes and detail are available at most stations, bus terminals and the tourist office: the largest and most useful is the Grand Plan

Tickets and passes

For a short stay in the city, carnets of ten tickets can be bought from any station or tabac (€10.90, as opposed to €1.40 for an individual ticket). The city's integrated transport system, the RATP (@www.ratp.fr), is divided into five zones, and the métro system itself more or less fits into zones 1 and 2. The same tickets are valid for the buses (including the night bus), métro and, within the city limits and immediate suburbs (zones 1 and 2), the RER express rail lines, which also extend far out into the Île de France. Only one ticket is ever needed on the métro system, and within zones 1 and 2 for any RER or bus journey, but you can't switch between buses or between bus and métro/RER on the same ticket. For RER journeys beyond zones 1 and 2 you must buy an RER ticket. In order to get to La Défense on the RER rather than on the métro, for example, you need to buy a RER ticket, as La Défense is in zone 3. Children under 4 travel free and from ages 4 to 10 at half-price. Don't buy from the touts who hang round the main stations – you may pay well over the odds, quite often for a used ticket – and be sure to keep your ticket until the end of the journey as you'll be fined on the spot if you can't produce one.

If you're doing a fair number of journeys in one day, it might be worth getting a Mobilis day pass (from €5.50 for the city), which offers unlimited access to the métro, buses and, depending on which zones you choose, the RER. Other possibilities are the Paris Visite passes (@www.parisvisite.com), one-, two-, three- and five-day visitors' passes at €8.50, €13.95, €18.60 and €27.20 for Paris and close suburbs, or €17.05, €27.15, €38.10 and €46.60 to include the airports, Versailles and Disneyland Paris (make sure you buy this one when you arrive at Roissy-Charles de Gaulle or Orly to get maximum value). A half-price child's version is also available. You can buy them from métro and RER stations, tourist offices and online from @www.allofrance.co.uk. Paris Visite passes can begin on any day and entitle you to unlimited travel (in the zones you have chosen) on bus, métro, RER, SNCF and the Montmartre funicular; they also allow you discounts at certain monuments and museums.

THE MÉTRO

1

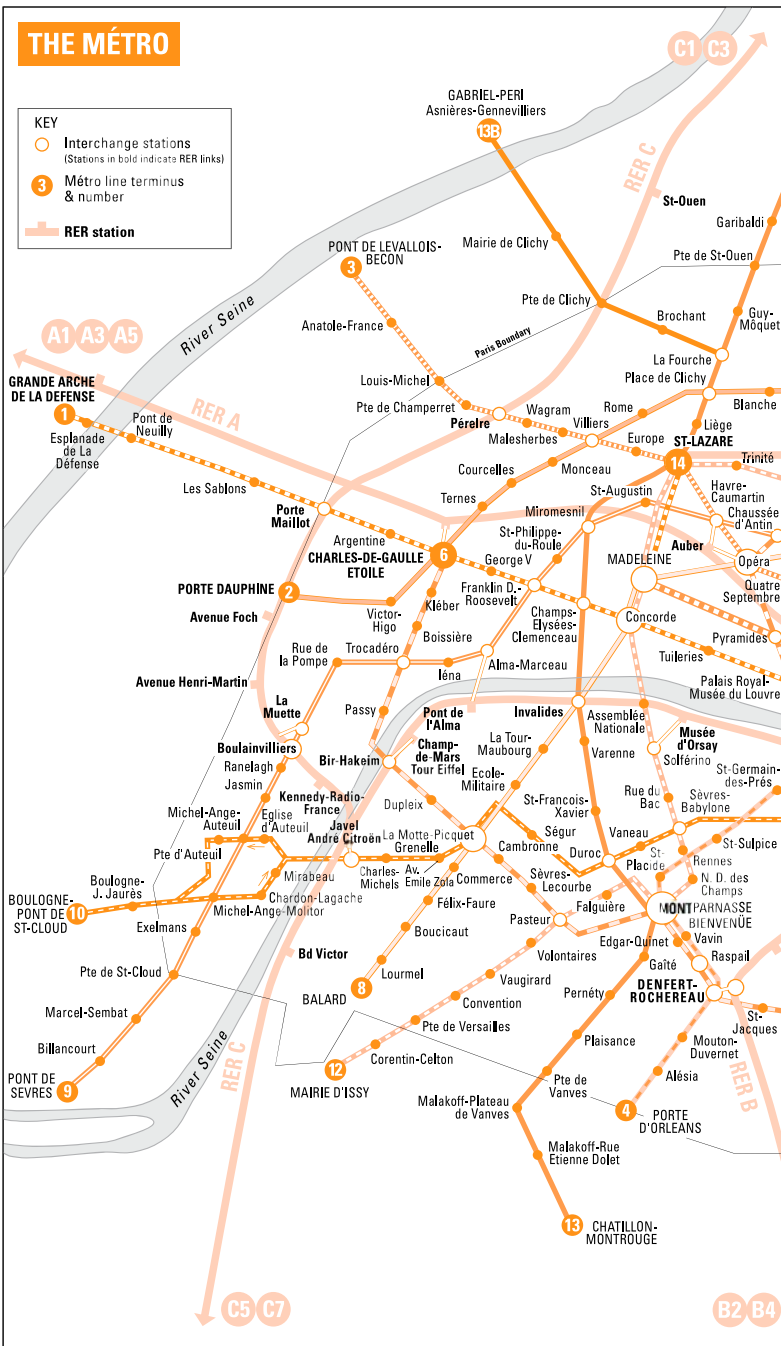

PARIS AND AROUND

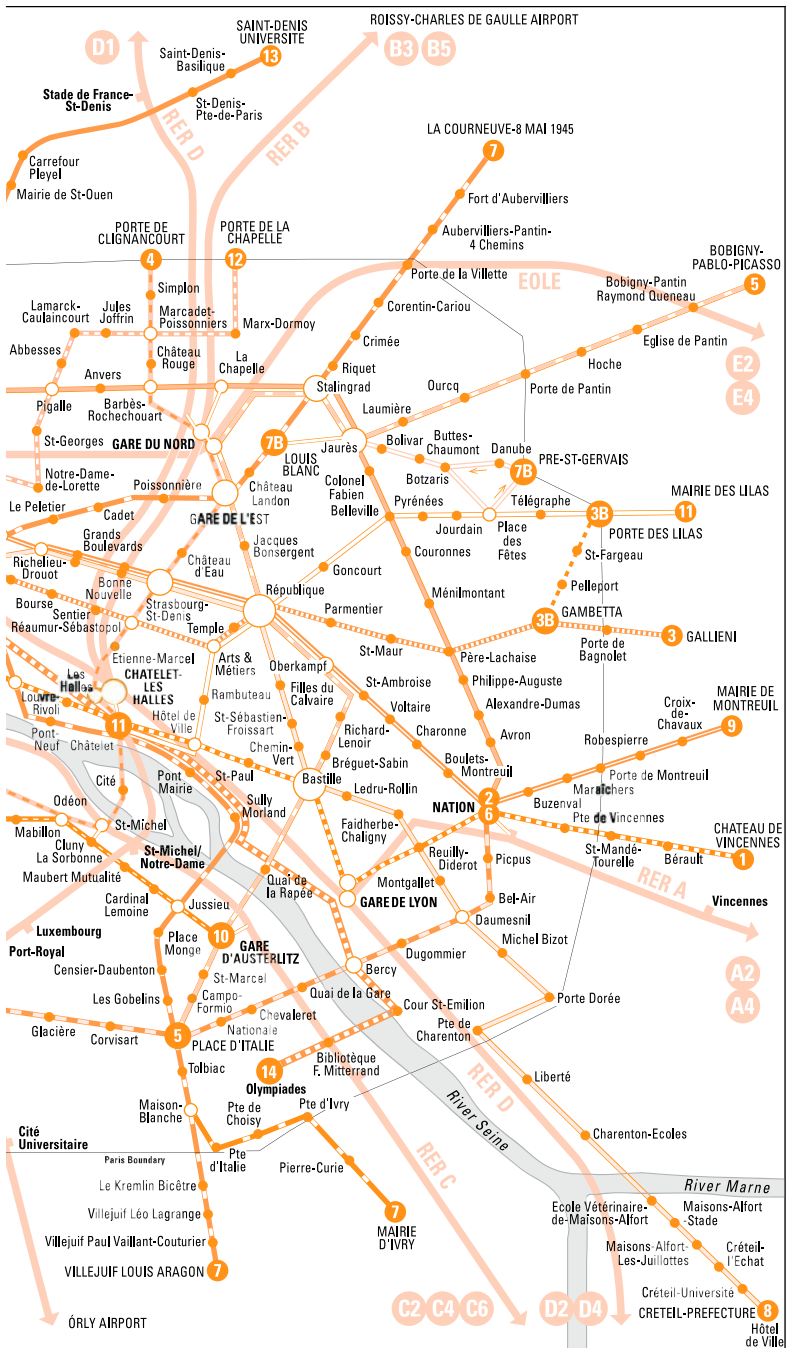

KEY

○ Interchange stations
(Stations in bold indicate RER links)

③ Métro line terminus
& number

— RER station

de Paris numéro 2, which overlays the métro, RER and bus routes on a map of the city so you can see exactly how transport lines and streets match up. If you just want a handy pocket-sized métro/bus map ask for the Petit Plan de Paris or the smaller Paris Plan de Poche.

The métro and RER

The métro, combined with the RER (Réseau Express Régional) suburban express lines, is the simplest way of getting around. The métro runs from 5.30am to 12.30am, RER trains from 5am to 12.30am. Stations (abbreviated: M° Concorde, RER Luxembourg, etc) are evenly spaced and you'll rarely find yourself more than 500m from one in the centre, though the interchanges can involve a lot of legwork, including many stairs. In addition to the free maps available (see above), every station has a big plan of the network outside the entrance and several inside, as well as a map of the local area. The lines are colour-coded and designated by numbers for the métro and by letters for the RER, although they are signposted within the system with the names of the terminus stations: for example, travelling from Montparnasse to Châtelet, you follow the sign "Direction Porte-de-Clignancourt"; from Gare d'Austerlitz to Grenelle on line 10 you follow "Direction Boulogne-Pont-de-St-Cloud". The numerous interchanges (correspondances) make it possible to travel all over the city in a more or less straight line. For RER journeys beyond the city, make sure the station you want is illuminated on the platform display board.

Buses

It would be a shame to use the métro to the exclusion of the city's buses. They are not difficult to use and you do see much more. Every bus stop displays the numbers of the buses that stop there, a map showing all the stops on the route, and the times of the first and last buses. You can buy a single ticket (€1.40 from the driver), or use a pre-purchased carnet ticket or pass (see box p.93); remember to validate your ticket by inserting it into one of the machines on board. Press the red button to request a stop and an arrêt demandé sign will then light up. More and more buses these days are easily accessible for wheelchairs and prams. Generally speaking, buses run from 6.30am to 8.30pm with some services continuing to 1.30am. Around half the lines don't operate on Sundays and holidays – the Grand Plan de Paris (see above) lists those that do.

From mid-April to mid-September, a special orange-and-white Balabus service (not to be confused with Batobus, see p.98) passes all the major tourist sights between the Grande Arche de la Défense and Gare de Lyon. These buses run on Sundays and holidays every fifteen to thirty minutes from 1.30 to 8.30pm. Bus stops are marked "Balabus", and you'll need one to three bus tickets, depending on the length of your journey: check the information at the bus stop or ask the driver. The Paris Visite and Mobilis passes are all valid too.

Night buses (Noctilien; @www.noctilien.fr) ply 35 routes at least every hour from 12.30am to 5.30am. Among the most useful are N01 and N02, which run a circular route linking the main nightlife areas (Champs-Élysées, Bastille, Pigalle etc) and a number of train stations; they run every ten minutes on weekends (Fri night to Sun morning) and every twenty minutes during the rest of the week.

Taxis

Taxi charges are fairly reasonable: between €7 and €12 for a central daytime journey, though considerably more if you call one out. Before you get into the taxi you can tell which of the three rates is operating from the three small indicator lights on its roof: “A” (passenger side; white) indicates the daytime rate (7am–7pm) for Paris within the boulevard périphérique (around €0.60 per km); “B” (orange) is the rate for Paris at night, on Sunday and on public holidays, and for the suburbs during the day (around €1 per km); “C” (blue) is the night rate for the suburbs (€1.25 per km). The minimum charge for a journey is €5.20; there’s a time charge of around €25 an hour for when the car is stationary, an extra charge of €0.75 if you’re picked up from a mainline train station, and a €0.90 charge for each piece of luggage carried. Tippling is not mandatory, but ten percent will be expected. Taxi drivers do not have to take more than three passengers (they don’t like people sitting in the front); if a fourth passenger is accepted, an extra charge of €2.70 will be added.

Waiting at a taxi rank (arrêt taxi – there are around 470 of them) is usually more effective than hailing one from the street. The large white light signals the taxi is free; the orange light means it’s in use. You can also call a taxi out directly: phone numbers are shown at the taxi ranks, or try Taxis Bleus (☎08.91.70.10.10, 🌐www.taxis-bleus.com), Alpha Taxis (☎01.45.85.85.85) or Artaxi (☎01.42.03.50.50). Taxis can, however, be rather thin on the ground at lunchtime and any time after 7pm.

Disabled travellers

If you’re disabled, taxis are obliged by law to carry you and help you into the vehicle – and to carry your guide dog if you are blind or visually impaired. A number of taxi firms, such as G7 Taxis (☎01.47.39.00.91, 🌐www.taxisg7.fr), offer specially adapted taxis; many more are listed on the Paris tourist office website (🌐www.parisinfo.com). For travel on the buses, métro or RER, the RATP offers accompanied journeys for disabled people not in wheelchairs (Les compagnons du voyage; 🌐www.compagnons.com), which is available daily from 6.30am until 8pm and costs €25 an hour. You have to book on ☎01.53.11.12. (Mon–Fri 6am–7pm, Sat & Sun 9am–6pm) at least a day in advance. Blind and visually impaired passengers can request a free companion from the volunteer organization Auxiliaires des Aveugles (☎01.43.06.39.68). A Braille métro map costing €2.80 and a separate bus map are obtainable from L’Association Valentin Haüy (AVH), 5 rue Duroc, 7^e (☎01.44.49.27.27, 🌐www.avh.asso.fr).

The new métro line 14 and an increasing number of RER and métro stations on other lines are readily accessible to wheelchair users. A detailed list of all accessible stations and routes is available from RATP ticket offices or on 🌐www.ratp.fr. More extensive information on getting around the city can be found on 🌐www.infomobi.com, in French only. A useful publication, Access in Paris by Gordon Couch and Ben Roberts, published in Britain by Quiller Press, is available for £6.95, though bear in mind that it was published in 1993 and some of the information will be out of date.

Driving and parking

Travelling around by car – in the daytime at least – is hardly worth it because of the difficulty of finding parking spaces. You’re better off finding a motel-style place on the edge of the city and using public transport. But if you’re determined to use the pay-and-display parking system you must first buy a Paris Carte (€10) from a tabac, then look for the blue “P” signs alongside grey parking meters. Put the card into the meter – in the centre you’ll pay €3 an hour for a maximum of two hours. Covered car parks cost around €2.50 per hour.

△ The Seine

Whatever you do, don't park in a bus lane or the Axe Rouge express routes (marked with a red square). Should you be towed away, you'll find your car in the pound (fourrière) belonging to that particular arrondissement – check with the local mairie for the address.

In the event of a breakdown, call SOS Dépannage (☎01.47.07.99.99) for round-the-clock assistance. Alternatively, ask the police.

See p.199 for details of car rental.

Boats

There remains one final mode of transport, Batobus (🌐www.batobus.com), which operates all year round, apart from January, stopping at eight points along the Seine, from the Eiffel Tower to the Jardin des Plantes. Boats run every 25

Boat trips

A less conventional way to see Paris is to take a boat trip on the Seine. The faithful old Bateaux-Mouches are the best-known operator. Their embarkation point is the Embarcadère du Pont de l'Alma on the Right Bank in the 8^e (reservations and information ☎01.42.25.96.10; M^o Alma-Marceau). The rides last one hour ten minutes, cost €8 (€4 for children and over-65s) and take you past the major Seine-side sights, such as Notre-Dame and the Louvre. Departures are at 11am, noon, 1pm, and every 45 minutes from 1.45 to 7pm, then every half an hour from 7 to 9.30pm; winter departures are less frequent. The night-time cruises use lights to illuminate the streetscapes that are so bright they almost blind passers-by – much more fun on board than off – and at all times a narration in several languages blares out. The outrageously priced lunch and dinner trips, for which “correct” dress is mandatory, are probably best avoided. Bateaux-Mouches has many competitors, all much of a muckness and detailed in Pariscope under “Croisières” in the “Visites et Promenades” section.

A more unusual way of seeing less-visited sights are the canal boat trips run by Canauxrama (reservations ☎01.42.39.15.00) between the Port de l'Arsenal, opposite 50 bd de la Bastille, 12^e (M^o Bastille), and the Bassin de la Villette, 13 quai de la Loire, 19^e (M^o Jaurès), on the Canal St-Martin. Departing daily at 9.45am and 2.45pm from the Bassin de la Villette and at 9.45am and 2.30pm from the Bastille, the ride lasts nearly three hours and costs €14 (children €8). A more stylish vessel for exploring the canal is the catamaran of Paris-Canal, which runs two-and-a-half-hour trips between the Musée d'Orsay, quai Anatole-France, 7^e (M^o Musée d'Orsay), and the Parc de la Villette (“Folie des Visites du Parc”; M^o Porte-de-Pantin); boats operate in both directions daily from the end of March to mid-November, leaving the museum at 9.30am and the park at 2.30pm (reservations ☎01.42.40.96.97; €16, children €9).

minutes (Jan to mid-March & Nov to early Jan 10.30am–4.30pm; mid-March to May, Sept & Oct 10am–7pm; June–Aug 10am–9pm). The total journey time from one end to the other is around thirty minutes and you can hop on and off as many times as you like – a day pass costs €11 (there are no single tickets).

Accommodation

Paris has some two thousand hotels offering a wide range of comfort, price and location. Hotels in the budget and mid-range category are reasonably priced and are cheaper than those in many other European capitals. By contrast, its four- and five-star hotels, some of them truly luxurious, are among Europe's most expensive. Smaller two-star hotels often charge between €55 and €85 (3–6) for a double room, though for something with a bit of style you'll probably have to pay upwards of €85 (6), and €110 or more (7) in swankier areas. However, it's possible to find a double room with a shower, in a decent central location, for around €45 (5), and bargains exist in the 10^e and 11^e, especially around place de la République. You can get good deals in quieter areas further out, in the 13^e and 14^e, south of Montparnasse, and the 17^e, around Place de Clichy.

If you want to secure a really good room it's worth booking a couple of months or more in advance, as even the nicer hotels often leave their pokiest rooms at the back for last-minute reservations, and the best places will sell out well in advance in all but the coldest months. If you find yourself stuck on arrival, the main tourist office at rue des Pyramides and the branches at the Gare de Lyon and Eiffel Tower will find you a room in a hotel or hostel free of charge.

Our hotel recommendations are divided by area (see map on pp.86–87). Prices are divided into nine categories: where there are only very few rooms in a hotel in the lower price categories, we show the complete price range on offer. Hostels and campsites are listed separately on pp.105–106.

The Champs-Élysées and around

See map, pp.110–111.

Brighton 218 rue de Rivoli, 1^{er} ☎01.47.03.61.61, @hotel.brighton@orange.fr; M° Tuileries. An elegant hotel dating back to the late nineteenth century and affording magnificent views of the Tuileries gardens from the front-facing rooms on the upper floors. Most of the 65 rooms have recently been renovated; the standard of the others varies, though many retain period charm and ambience. ⑥

Des Champs-Élysées 2 rue Artois, 8^e ☎01.43.59.11.42, ☎01.45.61.00.61; M° St-Philippe-du-Roule. The rooms at this two-star hotel are small but nicely decorated in warm colours and come with shower or bath, plus satellite TV, minibar, hairdryer and safe. Breakfast is served in a cool, relaxing converted stone cellar. ⑦

Chopin 46 passage Jouffroy, entrance on bd Montmartre, near rue du Faubourg-Montmartre, 9^e ☎01.47.70.58.10, ☎01.42.47.00.70; M° Grands-Boulevards. A lovely period building hidden away at the end of an elegant passage, with quiet and pleasantly furnished rooms, though the cheaper ones are on the small side and a little dark. ⑤

De L'Élysée 12 rue des Saussaies, 8^e ☎01.42.65.29.25, www.france-hotel-guide.com/h75008efsh.htm; M° Champs-Élysées-Clemenceau. This comfy three-star, a mere chandelier swing from the Élysée Palace, has sixty rooms decorated in traditional style, with toile de jouty wallpaper, solid mahogany furniture and jacquard bedspreads. ⑤

Lancaster 7 rue de Berri, 8^e ☎01.40.76.40.76, www.hotel-lancaster.fr; M° George-V. Once the pied-à-terre for the likes of Garbo, Dietrich and Sir Alec Guinness, this elegantly restored nineteenth-century town house is still a favourite hide-out today for those fleeing the paparazzi. The rooms retain original features and are chock-full of Louis XVI and rococo antiques, but with a touch of contemporary chic. To top it all off, there's a super-lative restaurant and zen-style interior garden. Doubles start at €470. ⑥

Pergolèse 3 rue Pergolèse, 16^e ☎01.53.64.04.04, www.hotelpergolese.com. A classy four-star

boutique hotel in a tall, slender building on a quiet side street near the Arc de Triomphe. The decor is all contemporary – wood floors, cool colours, chic styling – but without chilliness: sofas and friendly service add a cosy touch. Plenty of special deals bring prices well below the advertised rate of €250 for a double. ⑥

Relais St-Honoré 308 rue St-Honoré, 1^{er} ☎01.42.96.06.06, sainthonore.free.fr; M° Tuileries. A snug little hotel set in a stylishly renovated seventeenth-century town house. The pretty wood-beamed rooms are decorated in warm colours and rich fabrics. Facilities include free broadband Internet access and flat-screen TVs. Doubles from €196. ⑥

Vivienne 40 rue Vivienne, 2^e ☎01.42.33.13.26, paris@hotel-vivienne.com; M° Grands-Boulevards. Ideally located for the Opéra-Garnier and the Grands Boulevards, this is a friendly place, with good-sized, cheery rooms done up with rather nice woods and prints. ⑤

Beaubourg and Les Halles

See map, p.122.

Agora 7 rue de la Cossonnerie, 1^{er} ☎01.42.33.46.02, www.123france.com/hotel-agora; M° Châtelet-Les Halles. A well-located two-star on a pedestrianized street right in the heart of Les Halles. The thirty cosy en-suite rooms are all different and adorned with antique furnishings and floral wallpaper. ⑥

Henri IV 25 place Dauphine, 1^{er} ☎01.43.54.44.53; M° Pont-Neuf/Cité. In an old building on handsome place Dauphine, right in the centre of Paris, this is arguably the best-located hotel in the city. It's also one of the cheapest, and for a reason: most of the rooms are pretty run-down and come with nothing more luxurious than a cabinet de toilette, with shared showers on the landing; a handful have been renovated, however, and have en-suite facilities. It's advisable to book well in advance. No credit cards. ②–④.

Marais, Île St-Louis & the Bastille

See map, pp.126–127.

Beaumarçais 3 rue Oberkampf, 11^e
 ☎ 01.43.38.16.16, 🌐 www.hotelbeaumarçais.com; M^o Filles-du-Calvaire/Oberkampf. A fashionable, gay-friendly hotel with personal service and colourful Fifties-inspired decor; all rooms are en suite with air conditioning, individual safes and cable TV. 7

 Caron de Beaumarçais 12 rue Vieille-du-Temple, 4^e ☎ 01.42.72.34.12, 🌐 www.carondebeaumarçais.com; M^o Hôtel-de-Ville. Named after the eighteenth-century French playwright Beaumarçais, who lived just up the road, this fine hotel has only nineteen rooms. Everything – down to the original engravings and Louis XVI-style furniture, not to mention the pianoforte in the foyer – evokes the refined tastes of high-society pre-Revolutionary Paris. Rooms overlooking the courtyard are small but cosy, while those on the street are more spacious, some with a balcony 8–9.

 Grand Hôtel Jeanne d'Arc 3 rue de Jarente, 4^e ☎ 01.48.87.62.11, 🌐 www.hoteljeannedarc.com; M^o St-Paul. An excellent-value hotel in a Marais town house, just off pretty place du Marché Sainte-Catherine. The rooms are a decent size, with nice individual touches, plus cable TV. It's very popular, so booking well in advance is advised. 5

Grand Hôtel du Loiret 8 rue des Mauvais Garçons, 4^e ☎ 01.48.87.77.00, 🌐 www.hotel-loiret.fr; M^o Hôtel-de-Ville. A budget hotel, grand in name only, though it has recently renovated its foyer and installed a lift. The rooms are essentially uneventful, but acceptable for the price; cheaper ones have washbasin only, all have TV and telephone. The two triples on the top floor have distant views of Sacré-Coeur. 3

De Lutèce 65 rue St-Louis-en-l'Île, 4^e
 ☎ 01.43.26.23.52, 🌐 www.paris-hotel-lutece.com; M^o Pont-Mairie. Twenty-three tiny but appealing rooms, recently renovated in contemporary style and equipped with sparkling-white bathrooms, are eked out of this old wood-beamed town house situated on the most desirable island in France. 9

Marais Bastille 36 bd Richard-Lenoir, 11^e
 ☎ 01.48.05.75.00, 🌐 www.paris-hotel-marais-bastille.com; M^o Bréguet-Sabin. A pleasant three-star, part of the Best Western chain, located on a fairly quiet road near the Bastille. Rooms are equipped with minibar, TV and Internet point and are attractively furnished in light oak and pastel colours. 8

De Nevers 53 rue de Malte, 11^e
 ☎ 01.47.00.56.18, 🌐 www.hoteldenevers.com; M^o République/Oberkampf. A hospitable one-star with simple but cheerfully decorated rooms – the best

are the en-suite doubles at the front; courtyard-facing rooms are dark and poky. 2

 De Nice 42bis rue de Rivoli, 4^e
 ☎ 01.42.78.55.29, ☎ 01.42.78.36.07, 🌐 www.hoteldenic.com; M^o Hôtel-de-Ville. A delightful old-world atmosphere pervades this six-storey town house, its pretty rooms hung with old prints and furnished with deep-coloured fabrics and Indian-cotton bedspreads. Double-glazing helps block out the traffic on rue de Rivoli. 7

Pavillon de la Reine 28 place des Vosges, 3^e
 ☎ 01.40.29.19.19, 🌐 www.pavillon-de-la-reine.com; M^o Bastille. A perfect honeymoon or romantic-weekend hotel in a beautiful ivy-covered mansion secreted away off the place des Vosges. It preserves an intimate ambience, with friendly, personable staff. The rooms mostly have a distinctly 1990s "hip hotel" feel, and could probably use another makeover. Doubles from €350. 9

Du Petit Moulin 29–31 rue du Poitou, 3^e
 ☎ 01.42.74.10.10, 🌐 www.paris-hotel-petitmoulin.com; M^o Saint-Sébastien-Froissart/Filles du Calvaire. A stylish boutique hotel, set in an old bakery and designed top to bottom by Christian Lacroix. Each room bears the designer's hallmark flamboyancy and is a fusion of different styles, from elegant Baroque to Sixties kitsch. Doubles from €180. 6

De Roubaix 6 rue Greneta, 3^e ☎ 01.42.72.89.91, 🌐 www.hotel-de-roubaix.com; M^o Réaumur-Sébastopol or M^o Arts-et-Métiers. An old-fashioned two-star hotel run by a pleasant elderly couple, who don't speak much English. The 53 rooms are small and done out with floral wallpaper and rickety furniture, but they're pretty good value when you consider the location, just five minutes' walk from the Pompidou Centre. Breakfast (€4) – a hunk of crusty bread and a hot drink – is included in the price whether you want it or not. 4

Quartier Latin

See map, pp.134–135.

Le Central 6 rue Descartes, 5^e ☎ 01.46.33.57.93; M^o Maubert-Mutualité/Cardinal-Lemoine. Plain but decent backpacker-oriented rooms in a typically Parisian house above a café-restaurant on the Montagne Ste-Geneviève. 3

Du Commerce 14 rue de la Montagne-Ste-Geneviève, 5^e ☎ 01.43.54.89.69, 🌐 www.commerce-paris-hotel.com; M^o Maubert-Mutualité. Professionally run budget hotel in the heart of the Quartier Latin, with newly redecorated rooms. Rooms with en-suite showers cost €10 more (4) than those just with a WC. 3

Esmeralda 4 rue St-Julien-le-Pauvre, 5^e
 ☎ 01.43.54.19.20, ☎ 01.40.51.00.68; M^o

St-Michel/Maubert-Mutualité. Nestling in an ancient house on square Viviani, this ancient hotel has cosy and deeply unmodernized rooms, some with superb views of nearby Notre-Dame. A trio of faintly decrepit singles (€40) come with washbasin only. 6

Familia 11 rue des Ecoles, 5^e ☎ 01.43.54.55.27, www.hotel-paris-familia.com; M° Cardinal-Lemoine/Maubert-Mutualité/Jussieu. Friendly, family-run hotel in the heart of the quartier. Rooms are small but full of character. Some have views of nearby Notre-Dame; others have their own balcony. The three-star Minerva next door has the same owners. 6

Des Grandes Écoles 75 rue du Cardinal-Lemoine, 5^e ☎ 01.43.26.79.23, www.hotel-grandes-ecoles.com; M° Cardinal-Lemoine. This welcoming three-star in the heart of the Quartier Latin has an extraordinary setting around a peaceful courtyard garden. Rooms are bright, if rather heavy on the floral wallpaper. 7

Marignan 13 rue du Sommerard, 5^e ☎ 01.43.54.63.81, www.hotel-marignan.com; M° Maubert-Mutualité. One of the best bargains in town, with a free breakfast thrown in. Totally sympathetic to the needs of rucksack-toting foreigners, with free laundry and ironing facilities, plus a room to eat your own food in – plates, fridge and microwave provided – and rooms for up to five people. 4

Médicis 214 rue St-Jacques, 5^e ☎ 01.43.54.14.66; RER Luxembourg. Basic, tatty old hotel, but the low prices make it very popular with hard-up backpackers. 2

Select 1 place de la Sorbonne, 5^e ☎ 01.46.34.14.80, www.selecthotel.fr; RER Luxembourg/M° Cluny-La Sorbonne. This designer-styled but un-snooty three-star sits right on the place. Standard room prices begin at €150, but it's probably worth paying the extra thirty-odd euros for a supérieure. 9

De la Sorbonne 6 rue Victor-Cousin, 5^e ☎ 01.43.54.58.08, www.hotelsorbonne.com; RER Luxembourg/M° Cluny-La Sorbonne. Housed in an attractive old building close to the Luxembourg gardens, this is a quiet, comfortable and professional hotel. 6

St-Germain

See map, pp.138–139.

De l'Angleterre 44 rue Jacob, 6^e ☎ 01.42.60.34.72, www.hotel-dangleterre.com; M° St-Germain-des-Prés. Classy and elegant hotel, in a building that once housed the British Embassy and, later, Ernest Hemingway, although in those days he only paid three francs a night. The luxury rooms (€260) are huge, and many have beautiful original roof beams. Standard rooms start at €185. 9

Bersoly's St-Germain 28 rue de Lille, 6^e ☎ 01.42.60.73.79, www.bersolyshotel.com; M° Rue-du-Bac. Small but exquisite rooms, each named after an artist. Impeccable service, and a good location near the shopping areas of St-Germain. 7

Ferrandi St-Germain 92 rue du Cherche-Midi, 6^e ☎ 01.42.22.97.40, hotel.ferrandi@orange.fr; M° Vaneau/St-Placide. Genteel, independent two-star with a distinctly old-fashioned feel, hidden away in a charming residential corner of St-Germain. Rooms are sunny, homely and fairly large by Parisian standards, but don't expect all mod cons. 8

Du Globe 15 rue des Quatre-Vents, 6^e ☎ 01.43.26.35.50, www.hotel-du-globe.fr; M° Odéon. Welcoming hotel in a tall, narrow, seventeenth-century building decked out with four-posters, stone walls, roof beams and the like. 8

Grand Hôtel des Balcons 3 rue Casimir-Delavigne, 6^e ☎ 01.46.34.78.50, www.balcons.com; M° Odéon. An attractive and comfortable hotel with a few Art Deco motifs in the modern rooms. Lovely location near the Odéon and Luxembourg gardens. 7

L'Hôtel 13 rue des Beaux-Arts, 6^e ☎ 01.44.41.99.00, www.l-hotel.com; M° Mabilon/St-Germain-des-Prés. This extravagant four-star place is a destination in itself, with twenty sumptuously decorated, almost kitsch rooms. Prices start at €280 in high season and soar well above – notably for the room Oscar Wilde died in. 9

Des Marronniers 21 rue Jacob, 6^e ☎ 01.43.25.30.60, www.hotel-marronniers.com; M° St-Germain-des-Prés. A romantic hotel, with small rooms swathed in expensive fabrics. The dining room looks out on a courtyard garden. 8

De Nesle 7 rue de Nesle, 6^e ☎ 01.43.54.62.41, www.hoteldenesleparis.com; M° St-Michel. Friendly, offbeat hotel with themed rooms decorated with cartoon murals that you'll either love or hate. 6

Récamiér 3bis place St-Sulpice, 6^e ☎ 01.43.26.04.89, ☎ 01.46.33.27.73; M° St-Sulpice/St-Germain-des-Prés. Comfortable, if plain and old-fashioned hotel in a fantastic situation on the corner of the square. 8

Relais Christine 3 rue Christine, 6^e ☎ 01.40.51.60.80, www.relais-christine.com; M° Odéon. Deeply elegant four-star in a sixteenth-century building set around a deliciously hidden courtyard. Standard doubles cost €355, and you can sometimes find weekend offers for the gorgeous supérieure rooms for very little more. 9

Relais Saint-Sulpice 3 rue Garancière, 6°
 ☎ 01.46.33.99.00, 🌐 monsiorange.fr/relaisstulpice; M° St-Sulpice. Set in an aristocratic town house immediately behind St-Sulpice, this is a discreet and classy three-star with well-furnished rooms. ⑤

St-André-des-Arts 66 rue St-André-des-Arts, 6° ☎ 01.43.26.96.16, 🌐 hsaintand@orange.fr; M° Odéon/St-Germain-des-Prés. Friendly, family-run hotel in the heart of St-Germain. Rooms are pleasantly decorated and preserve some features of the seventeenth-century building; the best are on the front, with big floor-to-ceiling windows. ⑥

De l'Université 22 rue de l'Université, 6° ☎ 01.42.61.09.39, 🌐 www.hoteluniversite.com; M° Rue du Bac. gorgeously cosy three-star with two-dozen rooms filled with antique details, including beamed ceilings and fireplaces in the larger rooms. Doubles from €165; €200 with a private terrace. ⑤

Trocadéro, Eiffel Tower and the Septième

See map, pp.144–145.

Du Champs-de-Mars 7 rue du Champs-de-Mars, 7° ☎ 01.45.51.52.30, 🌐 www.hotel-du-champ-de-mars.com; M° École-Militaire. Spotless, prettily decorated and good-value rooms in a friendly hotel just off the rue Cler market. ⑤

Grand Hôtel Lévêque 29 rue Cler, 7° ☎ 01.47.05.49.15, 🌐 www.hotel-leveque.com; M° École-Militaire/La Tour-Maubourg. Located smack in the middle of the posh rue Cler market, this is a large but decent place, run by a friendly family. Book a month ahead for one of the two brighter rooms on the rue Cler. ⑥

Du Palais Bourbon 49 rue de Bourgogne, 7° ☎ 01.44.11.30.70, 🌐 www.hotel-palais-bourbon.com; M° Varenne. This handsome old two-star offers spacious and attractively furnished rooms. Family rooms are available, as well as one tiny but inexpensive double (€68) and some well-priced singles. The immediate area is a bit dead in terms of cafés and restaurants, but it's classy and very quiet. ⑥

Saint Dominique 62 rue Saint-Dominique, 7° ☎ 01.47.05.51.44, 🌐 www.saintdominique.com; M° Invalides/La Tour-Maubourg. Welcoming, well-priced hotel in a classy quarter close to the Eiffel Tower with prettily wallpapered rooms arranged around a bright courtyard. ⑥

De la Tulipe 33 rue Malar, 7° ☎ 01.45.51.67.21, 🌐 www.paris-hotel-tulipe.com; M° Invalides/La Tour-Maubourg. Attractively cottage-like three-star with exposed-stone walls and flagstones, and a small patio. You pay for the third star, and the location. ⑤

Montmartre and the Neuvième

See map, p.156.

André Gill 4 rue André Gill, 18° ☎ 01.42.62.48.48, 🌐 blounis@aol.com; M° Pigalle/Abbesses. This family-run hotel is set in a handsome and quiet cul-de-sac. Warm fabrics and good soundproofing make up for uninspiring furnishings. ⑥

Bonséjour Montmartre 11 rue Burq, 18° ☎ 01.42.54.22.53, 🌐 www.hotel-bonsejour-montmartre.fr; M° Abbesses. Set in a marvellous location on a quiet untouristy street on the slopes of Montmartre, this hotel is run by friendly and conscientious owners, and the rooms, which are clean and spacious, are one of the city's best deals. Ask for a corner room (23, 33, 43 or 53), which have balconies. ②

Caulaincourt 2 square Caulaincourt, by 63 rue Caulaincourt, 18° ☎ 01.46.06.46.06, 🌐 www.caulaincourt.com. An excellent, friendly budget hotel with well-kept, decent-value rooms – en suite or with shared facilities. From the larger dormitory room of the hostel section (€24 a night), the lucky backpackers get a fine view. ③

Ermitage 24 rue Lamarck, 18° ☎ 01.42.64.79.22, 🌐 www.ermitagessacrecoeur.fr; M° Anvers. A discreet, welcoming hotel, hidden away behind Sacré-Coeur. Rooms are slightly chintzy in the classic French manner; some have views out across northern Paris. Approach via the funicular to avoid a steep climb. ⑥

Langlois 63 rue St-Lazare, 9° ☎ 01.48.74.78.24, 🌐 www.hotel-langlois.com; M° Trinité. Superbly genteel hotel that's hardly changed in half a century, with antique furnishings and some unusually large rooms. ⑦

Perfect 39 rue Rodier, 9° ☎ 01.42.81.18.86, ☎ 01.42.85.01.38; M° Anvers. Popular hotel on a lively street lined with restaurants. Simple, clean rooms – some very good value, with shared bathroom facilities – and a warm welcome. ③

Regyns Montmartre 13 place des Abbesses, 18° ☎ 01.42.54.45.21, 🌐 www.paris-hotels-montmartre.com; M° Abbesses. Friendly, tidy rooms with country-style decor, a number of which give onto the quiet place des Abbesses. The more expensive top-floor rooms have grand views. ⑤–⑦

Timhotel Montmartre place Émile-Goudeau, 11 rue Ravignan, 18° ☎ 01.42.55.74.79, 🌐 www.timhotel.com; M° Abbesses. Rooms are modern and comfortable, if nondescript, but the location is the point – so book one of the more expensive rooms with a view. ⑦

Eastern Paris

Gilden-Magenta 35 rue Yves Toudic, 10^e
 ☎ 01.42.40.17.72, 🌐 www.multi-micro.com/hotel.gilden.magenta; M^o République/Jacques-Bonsergent. Friendly hotel, with fresh, colourful decor; rooms 61 and 62, up in the attic, are the best and have views of the Canal St-Martin. Breakfast is served in a pleasant patio area. 5

Jarry 6 rue de Jarry, 10^e ☎ 01.47.70.70.38
 ☎ 01.42.46.34.45; M^o Gare-de-l'Est/Château-d'Eau. Simple, low-budget hotel in a lively immigrant quarter. Distinctly fresher than the cheap dives on the same street. 2

Mondia 22 rue du Grand Prieuré, 10^e
 ☎ 01.47.00.93.44, 🌐 www.hotel-mondia.com; M^o République/Oberkampf. Pastel colours and floral prints hold sway in the simply furnished rooms of this budget hotel; the two attic hideaways (nos. 602 and 603) have a certain charm. For stays of three nights or more in quieter periods you'll get a ten-percent reduction on presentation of your Rough Guide. 4

Nouvel Hôtel 24 av du Bel Air, 12^e
 ☎ 01.43.43.01.81, 🌐 www.nouvel-hotel-paris.com. M^o Nation. A quiet, family-run hotel, with a little garden and patio. The rooms, though tiny, are immaculate and prettily decorated in pastels and white-painted furniture; no. 9, opening directly onto the garden, is the one to go for. 5

Port-Royal 8 bd Port-Royal, 5^e ☎ 01.43.31.70.06, 🌐 www.hotelportroyal.fr; M^o Gobelins. The rooms at this superb budget address are immaculately clean and attractive, though towards the southern edge of the quarter. Fifteen inexpensive rooms (around €55) are available with shared bathroom facilities, though showers cost €2.50. 5

De la Porte Dorée 273 av Daumesnil, 12^e
 ☎ 01.43.07.56.97.04, 🌐 www.paris-hotels-paris.com; M^o Porte-Dorée. Traditional features such as ceiling mouldings, fireplaces and the elegant main staircase have been retained in this welcoming two-star and many of the furnishings are antique. The Bastille is seven minutes away by métro or a pleasant twenty-minute walk along the Promenade Plantée. 4

Tamaris 14 rue des Maraîchers, 20^e
 ☎ 01.43.72.85.48, 🌐 www.hotel-tamaris.fr; M^o Porte-de-Vincennes. An old-fashioned, simply furnished, but clean and quiet hotel, run by nice people. The neighbourhood's a bit dull, but it's only four métro stops from the Bastille and close to the terminus of #26 bus route from Gare du Nord. 3

Southern Paris

Celtic 15 rue d'Odessa, 14^e ☎ 01.43.20.93.53,
 ☎ 01.43.20.66.07; M^o Montparnasse-Bienvenue/

Edgar-Quinet. A garish paint job doesn't quite cover the tattier corners, but there's lots of old-fashioned one-star charm, with fireplaces and other period details in many rooms, and it's very close to Montparnasse. 4

Istria 29 rue Campagne-Première, 14^e
 ☎ 01.43.20.91.82, 🌐 hotel.istria@orange.fr; M^o Raspail. Smartly decorated and very comfortable hotel on a quiet side street near the cafés of Montparnasse. Comes with all mod cons and legendary artistic associations to boot – Duchamp, Man Ray, Aragon, Josephine Baker and Rilke all stayed here. 6

De la Loire 39bis rue du Moulin Vert, 14^e
 ☎ 01.45.40.89.07, 🌐 hoteldelaire@orange.fr; M^o Pernes/Alésia. Behind the pretty blue shutters lies a delightful family hotel with a garden and a genuinely homely feel. Rooms all have charming personal touches and spotless bathrooms. 3

Printemps 31 rue du Commerce, 15^e
 ☎ 01.45.79.83.36, 🌐 hotel.printemps.15e@yahoo.fr; M^o La Motte-Picquet-Grenelle/Émile-Zola. Cheap furnishings and ageing decor don't stop this being a good backpacker choice for its neighbourhood location, welcome and low prices. 2

Résidence Les Gobelins 9 rue des Gobelins, 13^e
 ☎ 01.47.07.26.90, 🌐 www.hotelgobelins.com; M^o Les Gobelins. This quiet and delightfully genteel establishment is well known, so book some time in advance. 5

Tolbiac 122 rue de Tolbiac, 13^e ☎ 01.44.24.25.54, 🌐 www.hotel-tolbiac.com; M^o Tolbiac. Situated on a noisy junction, but all rooms are clean and decently furnished, and very inexpensive, especially those with shared showers. In July and Aug you can rent small studios by the week. 2

Le Vert-Galant 41 rue Croulebarbe, 13^e
 ☎ 01.44.08.83.50, ☎ 01.44.08.83.69; M^o Les Gobelins. Set on a quiet, green square, with a large garden behind and the Auberge Etchagorry below (see p.177), this could be a family-run provincial hotel. Rooms are modern but pleasantly airy; the bigger ones give onto the garden and have kitchenettes. 6

Des Voyageurs 22 rue Boulard, 14^e
 ☎ 01.43.21.08.02, 🌐 hotel.des.voyageurs2@orange.fr; M^o Denfert-Rochereau. A good-value Montparnasse establishment with an original, warm spirit. Rooms are comfortable and modern, with air conditioning and free Internet access. 3

Northern Paris

Eldorado 18 rue des Dames, 17^e ☎ 01.45.22.35.21, 🌐 www.eldoradohotel.fr; M^o Rome/Place-de-Clichy. Idiosyncratic and charming hotel with bright colour schemes and an attractive annexe at the back of the courtyard garden. A few simple shared-bath rooms are also available. ④

Savoy 21 rue des Dames, 17^e ☎01.42.93.13.47; M^o Place-de-Clichy/Rome. Basic but acceptable Paris cheapie. The reception is a bit musty but the rooms are clean and quite large, and the bathrooms recently refurbished. Some rooms have private showers (2). ①

Style Hôtel 8 rue Ganneron, 17^e ☎01.45.22.37.59, ☎01.45.22.81.03; M^o Place-de-Clichy. Wooden floors, marble fireplaces, a secluded internal courtyard, and nice people. Great value, especially the rooms with shared bathrooms (€35). ③

Hostels, student accommodation and campsites

Paris is well supplied with hostel accommodation. You can book in advance for most hostels. The three main hostel groups, charging around €23 for a dorm bed, are the Fédération Unie des Auberges de Jeunesse (FUAJ; ☎www.fuaj.fr), for which you need Hostelling International (HI) membership (available on the spot, no age limit), and UCRIF (Union des Centres de Rencontres Internationaux de France; ☎www.ucrif.asso.fr). We've detailed only the most central of the UCRIF hostels, but a full list is available on their website, or you can contact their main office at 27 rue de Turbigo, 2^e (Mon–Fri 10am–6pm; ☎01.40.26.57.64; M^o Étienne-Marcel). A smaller group is the MiJE (Maison Internationale de la Jeunesse et des Étudiants; ☎www.mije.com), which runs three hostels in historic buildings in the Marais district, with dorm beds from €28. A handful of privately run hostels also exist, most of which cost around €15–20, depending on season. Except where indicated below, there is no effective age limit.

Single and double rooms, where available, generally cost five or ten euros extra. Most hostels impose a stay limit, which can be negotiable, depending on the season, and bear in mind, too, that some places have a curfew – usually around 11pm – though you may be given a key or entry code.

Student accommodation is let out during the summer vacation. Rooms are spartan, part of large modern university complexes, often complete with self-service kitchen facilities and shared bathrooms. Space tends to fill up quickly with international students, school groups and young travellers, so it's best to make plans well in advance. Expect to pay €15–30 per night for a room. The organization to contact for information and reservations is CROUS, Académie de Paris, 39 av Georges-Bernanos, 5^e (Mon–Fri 9.15am–4.30pm; ☎01.40.51.55.55, ☎www.crous-paris.fr; M^o Port-Royal).

The cheapest accommodation option of all is camping. There are three campsites on the outskirts of Paris, which, although pleasant enough, are a bit of a pain to get to on public transport.

Hostels

D'Artagnan 80 rue Vitruve, 20^e ☎01.40.32.34.56; M^o Porte-de-Bagnolet. Colourful, funky, modern HI hostel, with a fun atmosphere and lots of facilities including a small cinema, a restaurant and bar, and a local swimming pool nearby. It's located on the eastern edge of the city near Charonne, which has some good bars. You can reserve online at ☎www.fuaj.org. Beds cost €21.50 a night.

Auberge Internationale des Jeunes 10 rue Trousseau, 11^e ☎01.47.00.62.00, ☎www.aijparis.com; M^o Bastille/Ledru-Rollin; see map, pp.126–127. Despite the official-sounding name, this is a laid-back (though very noisy) independent hostel for under-25s in a great location five minutes' walk from the Bastille. It's clean and professionally run with 24hr reception, generous breakfast (included in the price) and free luggage storage. Rooms for 2, 3 and 4. €14 March–June, Sept & Oct €15, July & Aug €17, €13 Nov–Feb.

VJ Paris/Louvre 20 rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau, 1^{er} ☎01.53.00.90.90, ☎www.bvjhotel.com; M^o Louvre/Châtelet-Les Halles; see map, pp.110–111. Clean, modern and efficiently run independent hostel for 18- to 35-year-olds. Bookings should be made by phone at least fifteen days prior to your stay. Accommodation ranges from single rooms to dorms sleeping eight. From €25 per person, including breakfast.

BVJ Paris Quartier Latin 44 rue des Bernardins, 5^e ☎01.43.29.34.80, @www.bvjhotel.com; M^o Maubert-Mutualité; see map, pp.134–135. Typically institutional UCRIF hostel, but spick and span and in a good location. Dorm beds (€26), plus single or double rooms (€35 and €28 per person, respectively).

Le Fauconnier 11 rue du Fauconnier, 4^e ☎01.42.74.23.45, ☎01.40.27.81.64; M^o St-Paul/Pont-Marie; see map, pp.126–127. A MIJE hostel in a superbly renovated seventeenth-century building with a courtyard. Dorms (€28 per person) sleep four to eight, and there are some single (€45) and double rooms (€33) with ensuite showers. Breakfast is included.

Le Fourcy 6 rue de Fourcy, 4^e ☎01.42.74.23.45; M^o St-Paul; see map, pp.126–127. Another MIJE hostel (same prices as Le Fauconnier, above) housed in a beautiful mansion. This one has a small garden and an inexpensive restaurant. Doubles and triples are available as well as dorms.

Jules Ferry 8 bd Jules-Ferry, 11^e ☎01.43.57.55.60, ☎01.43.14.82.09; M^o République. A fairly central HI hostel, in a lively area at the foot of the Belleville hill. You can't reserve in advance, but if you show up early in the morning you should get a place; if they're full they will help you find a bed elsewhere. Dorm beds cost €20.50, including breakfast.

Maubuisson 12 rue des Barres, 4^e ☎01.42.74.23.45; M^o Pont-Marie/Hôtel-de-Ville; see map, pp.126–127. A MIJE hostel in a medieval timbered mansion on a quiet street. Accommodation is in dorms only, sleeping four (€28 per person). Breakfast is included.

Three Ducks Hostel 6 place Étienne-Pernet, 15^e ☎01.48.42.04.05, @www.3ducks.fr; M^o Commerce/Félix-Faure. A private youth hostel with kitchen and Internet facilities, a cheap bar and no age limit. In high season, beds cost €23 in dorm rooms (four to ten people), and double rooms cost €26; there are discounts in winter. Book ahead between May and Oct. Lockout noon–4pm, curfew at 2am.

Le Village Hostel 20 rue d'Orsel, 18^e ☎01.42.64.22.02, @www.villagehostel.fr; M^o Anvers. Attractive, brand-new hostel in a handsome old building, with good facilities such as phones in the rooms. There's a view of the Sacré-Coeur from the terrace. Dorms cost €23, twins €27 and triples €25 per person, including breakfast. Small discounts in winter.

Woodstock Hostel 48 rue Rodier, 9^e ☎01.48.78.87.76, @www.woodstock.fr; M^o Anvers/St-Georges. Another reliable hostel in the Three Ducks stable, with its own bar, set in a great location on a pretty street not far from Montmartre. Dorm beds €18–21, twin rooms €21–24 per person. Book ahead.

Young and Happy Hostel 80 rue Mouffetard, 5^e ☎01.47.07.47.07, @www.youngandhappy.fr; M^o Monge/Censier-Daubenton; see map, pp.134–135. Noisy, basic and studenty independent hostel in a lively location. Dorms, with shower, sleep four (€21–23 per person), and there are a few doubles (€23–26 per person). Curfew at 2am.

Campsites

Camping du Bois de Boulogne allée du Bord-de-l'Eau, 16^e ☎01.45.24.30.00, @www.abccamping.com/boulogne.htm; M^o Porte-Maillot then bus #244 to Moulins Camping (bus runs 6am–9pm). Much the most central campsite, with space for 436 tents, next to the River Seine in the Bois de Boulogne, and usually booked up in summer. The ground is pebbly, but the site is well equipped and has a useful information office. Prices start at €11 for a tent with two people; there are also bungalows for four to six people, starting at €49 per night. An extra shuttle bus runs every morning from April to October between the campsite and M^o Porte-Maillot.

Camping la Colline rte de Lagny, Torcy ☎01.60.05.42.32, @www.camping-de-la-colline.com; RER line A4 to Torcy, then phone from the station and they will come and collect you, or take bus #421 to stop Le Clos. Pleasant wooded lakeside site to the east of the city near Disneyland (minibus shuttle to Disneyland costs €12.50 return), offering rental of anything from luxury tents to bungalows; erecting your own tent costs €25 per night for two people.

The City

Rather than slavishly following the boundaries of the official twenty arrondissements (see map pp.86–87 and p.92), this book divides Paris into several quarters, each with their own distinct identities. The account begins with the Île de la Cité, the ancient heart of Paris and home of the cathedral of Notre-Dame. Headings north onto the Right Bank, it takes in the Arc de Triomphe and follows the Voie Triomphale through the glamorous Champs-Élysées area to the Louvre palace. Immediately north is the expensive Opéra district, home of the shopping arcades of the passages, ritzy Place Vendôme and the tranquil gardens of the Palais Royal. East, the bustle and tacky shops of Les Halles and Beaubourg give way to the aristocratic and fashionable Marais and still-trendier Bastille quarters. Detouring via the Île St-Louis, Paris's second island, the chapter crosses the Seine onto the (southern) Left Bank, moving west from the studenty Quartier Latin through elegant and international St-Germain and into the aristocratic, museum-rich area around the Eiffel Tower, taking in the Trocadéro quarter, immediately across the river. The account then explores outlying areas of the city, visiting first Montparnasse and southern Paris, then heading out west to the wealthy Beaux Quartiers, the green space of the Bois de Boulogne and the outlying business district of La Défense. Lastly, it moves up to Montmartre and the northern arrondissements before finishing up in the working-class eastern end of the city, which incorporates the vast Père-Lachaise cemetery.

Île de la Cité

The Île de la Cité (see maps pp.126–127 and pp.134–135) is where Paris began. The earliest settlements were built here, followed by the small Gallic town of Lutetia, overrun by Julius Caesar's troops in 52 BC. A natural defensive site commanding a major east–west river trade route, it was an obvious candidate for a bright future. The Romans garrisoned it and laid out one of their standard military town plans. While they never attached any great political importance to the settlement, they endowed it with an administrative centre that became the stronghold of the Merovingian kings in 508, then of the counts of Paris who in 987 became kings of France.

The Frankish kings built themselves a splendid palace at the western tip of the island, of which the Sainte-Chapelle and Conciergerie survive today. At the other end of the island, they erected the great cathedral of Notre-Dame. By the early thirteenth century this tiny island had become the bustling heart of the capital, accommodating twelve parishes, not to mention numerous chapels and convents. It's hard to imagine this today: virtually the whole medieval city was erased by heavy-handed nineteenth-century demolition and much of it replaced by four vast edifices largely given over to housing the law. The warren of narrow streets around the cathedral was swept away and replaced with a huge, rather soulless square, known as the Parvis de Notre-Dame, but it does at least afford uncluttered views of the cathedral.

Pont-Neuf and the quais, Sainte-Chapelle and the Conciergerie

One of the most popular approaches to the island is via the graceful, twelve-arched Pont-Neuf, which despite its name is Paris's oldest surviving bridge, built in 1607 by Henri IV. It takes its name (“new”) from the fact that it was the first in the city to be built of stone. Henri is commemorated with an equestrian statue halfway across, and also lends his nickname to the square du Vert-Galant, enclosed within the triangular stern of the island and reached via steps leading down behind the statue. “Vert-Galant”, meaning a “green” or “lusty gentleman”, is a reference to Henri’s legendary amorous exploits, and he would no doubt have approved of this tranquil, tree-lined garden, a popular haunt of lovers.

Back on Pont-Neuf, opposite the square du Vert-Galant, red-bricked seventeenth-century houses flank the entrance to place Dauphine, one of the city’s most appealing squares. Traffic noise recedes in favour of the gentle tap of boules being played in the shade of the chestnuts. At the further end looms the huge facade of the Palais de Justice, which swallowed up the palace that was home to the French kings until Étienne Marcel’s bloody revolt in 1358 frightened them off to the greater security of the Louvre.

A survivor of the old palace complex is the magnificent Sainte-Chapelle (daily: March–Oct 9.30am–6pm; Nov–Feb 9am–5pm; €6.50, combined admission to the Conciergerie €9.50; M° Cité), accessed from the boulevard du Palais. It was built by Louis IX between 1242 and 1248 to house a collection of holy relics, including Christ’s crown of thorns and a fragment of the True Cross, bought at extortionate rates from the bankrupt empire of Byzantium. Though much restored, the chapel remains one of the finest achievements of French High Gothic. Its most radical feature is its seeming fragility – created by reducing the structural masonry to a minimum to make way for a huge expanse of exquisite stained glass. The impression inside is of being enclosed within the wings of a myriad brilliant butterflies.

Further along boulevard du Palais is the entrance to the Conciergerie (same hours as Sainte-Chapelle; €6.50, combined ticket with Ste-Chapelle €9.50; M° Cité), Paris’s oldest prison, where Marie-Antoinette and, in their turn, the leading figures of the Revolution were incarcerated before execution. Inside are several splendidly vaulted late-Gothic halls, vestiges of the old Capetian kings’ palace. The most impressive is the Salle des Gens d’armes, originally the canteen and recreation room of the royal household staff. The far end, separated off by an iron grille, was reserved during the French Revolution for prisoners who couldn’t afford to bribe a guard for their own cell and were known as the pailleux because all they had to sleep on was hay (paille). Beyond, a number of rooms and prisoners’ cells have been reconstructed to show what they might have been like at the time of the Revolution. Among them is Marie-Antoinette’s cell and the innocent-sounding salle de toilette, the room where the condemned had their hair cropped and shirt collars ripped in preparation for the guillotine.

Back outside, on the corner of boulevard du Palais, you’ll see the Tour de l’Horloge, built around 1350, and so called because it displayed Paris’s first public clock. The original was replaced in 1585 and survives to this day – an ornate affair flanked with classical figures representing Law and Justice. Heading east from here, along the north side of the island, you come to place Lépine, named after the police boss who gave Paris’s cops their white truncheons and whistles. The police headquarters, better known as the Quai des Orfèvres to readers of Georges Simenon’s Maigret novels, stands on one side of the square, while the other side is enlivened by an exuberant flower market, held daily and augmented by a chirruping bird market on Sundays.

Cathédrale de Notre-Dame

One of the masterpieces of the Gothic age, the Cathédrale de Notre-Dame (daily 7.45am–6.45pm; free; M° St-Michel/Cité) rears up from the Île de la Cité’s southeast corner like a ship moored by huge flying buttresses. It was among the first of the great Gothic cathedrals built in northern France and one of the most ambitious, its nave reaching an unprecedented 33m.

Built on the site of the old Merovingian cathedral of Saint-Étienne, Notre-Dame was begun in 1160 under the auspices of Bishop de Sully and completed around 1345. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries it fell into decline, suffering its worst depredations during the French Revolution when the frieze of Old Testament kings on the facade was damaged by enthusiasts who mistook them for the kings of France. It was only in the 1820s that the cathedral was at last given a much-needed restoration, a task entrusted to the great architect-restorer, Viollet-le-Duc, who carried out a thorough – some would say too thorough – renovation, including remaking most of the statuary on the facade (the originals can be seen in the Musée National du Moyen-Âge, see p.133) – and adding the steeple and baleful-looking gargoyles, which you can see close up if you brave the ascent of the towers (daily: April–Sept 9.30am–7.30pm, till 11pm Sat & Sun June–Aug; Oct–March 10am–5.30pm; €7.50). Queues for the towers often start before they open, so it pays to get here early or to come in the evening, when it's often quieter. The same goes for visiting the cathedral itself.

The cathedral's facade is one of its most impressive exterior features; the Romanesque influence is still visible, not least in its solid H-shape, but the overriding impression is one of lightness and grace, created in part by the delicate filigree work of the central rose window and gallery above. Of the facade's magnificent carvings, the oldest, dating from the twelfth century, are those in the right portal, depicting the Virgin Enthroned, elegantly executed and displaying all the majesty of a royal procession.

The interior

Inside Notre-Dame, the immediately striking feature is the dramatic contrast between the darkness of the nave and the light falling on the first great clustered pillars of the choir. It's the end walls of the transepts that admit all this light: they are nearly two-thirds glass, including two magnificent rose windows coloured in imperial purple. These, the vaulting and the soaring columns, are all definite Gothic elements, though there remains a strong sense of Romanesque in the stout round pillars of the nave. Free guided tours (1hr–1hr 30min) take place in English on Wednesdays and Thursdays at 2pm and on Saturdays at 2.30pm; the gathering point is the welcome desk near the entrance. There are free organ concerts every Sunday, usually at 4.30pm, plus four Masses on Sunday morning and one at 6.30pm.

The kilomètre zéro and crypte archéologique

On the pavement by the west door of the cathedral is a spot known as kilomètre zéro, the symbolic heart of France, from which all main road distances in the country are calculated. At the far end of the place is the entrance to the atmospheric crypte archéologique (Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; €3.30), a large excavated area under the square revealing the remains of the original cathedral, as well as remnants of the streets and houses that once clustered around Notre-Dame: most are medieval, but some date as far back as Gallo-Roman times and include parts of a Roman hypocaust (heating system).

Le Mémorial de la Déportation

At the eastern tip of the island is the symbolic tomb of the 200,000 French who died in Nazi concentration camps during World War II – Resistance fighters, Jews and forced labourers among them. The stark and moving Mémorial de la Déportation (daily 10am–noon & 2–7pm, closes 5pm in winter; free) is scarcely visible above ground; stairs hardly shoulder-wide descend into a space like a prison yard and then into the crypt, off which is a long, narrow, stifling corridor, its wall covered in thousands of points of light representing the dead. Floor and ceiling are black, and it ends in a raw hole, with a single naked bulb hanging in the middle. Above the exit are the words “Pardonne, n’oublie pas” (“Forgive, do not forget”).

The Champs-Élysées and around

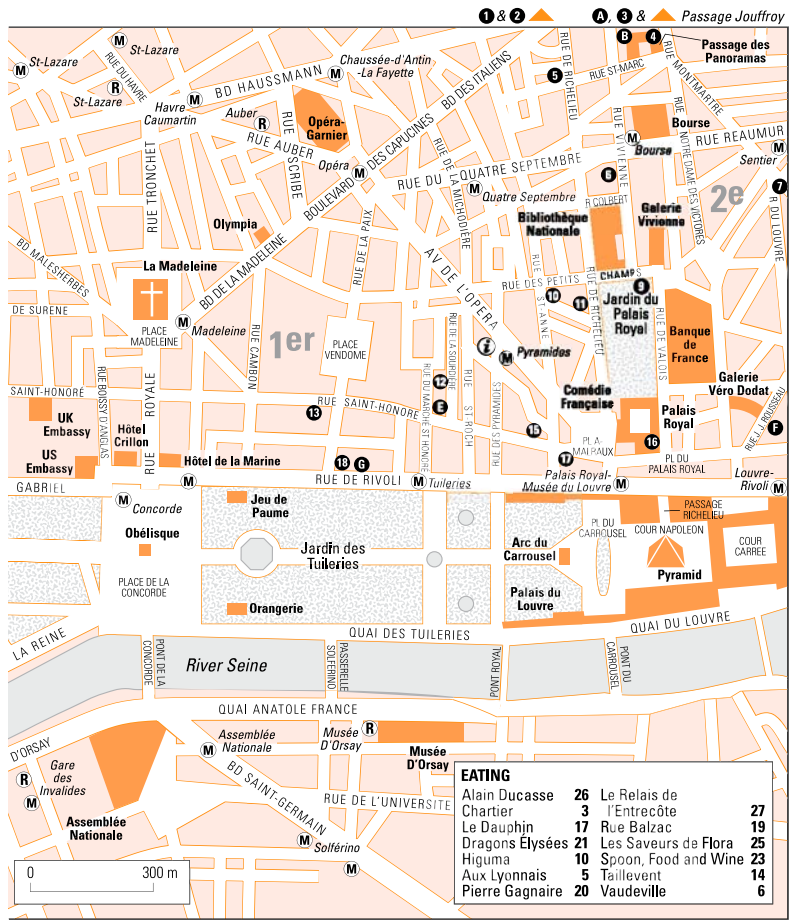

Synonymous with Parisian glitz and glamour, the Champs-Élysées cuts through one of the city’s most exclusive districts, studded with luxury hotels and top fashion boutiques. The avenue forms part of a grand, nine-kilometre axis that extends from the Louvre, at the heart of the city, to the Grande Arche de la Défense, in the west. Often referred to as the Voie Triomphale, or Triumphal Way, it offers impressive vistas all along its length and incorporates some of the city’s most famous landmarks – the Tuileries gardens, place de la Concorde, the Champs-Élysées avenue and the Arc de Triomphe. The whole ensemble is so regular and geometrical it looks as though it was laid out by a single town planner rather than by successive kings, emperors and presidents, all keen to add their stamp and promote French power and prestige.

The Arc de Triomphe

The best view of the Voie Triomphale is from the top of the Arc de Triomphe (daily: April–Sept 10am–11pm; Oct–March 10am–10.30pm; €8; M° Charles-de-Gaulle-Étoile), towering above the traffic in the middle of place Charles-de-Gaulle, better known as l'Étoile ("star") on account of the twelve avenues radiating out from it. Access is via underground stairs from the north corner of the Champs-Élysées. The arch was started by Napoleon as a homage to the armies of France and himself, but it wasn't actually finished until 1836 by Louis-Philippe, who dedicated it to the French army in general. The names of 660 generals and numerous French battles are engraved on the inside of the arch, and reliefs adorn the exterior: the best is François Rude's extraordinarily dramatic Marseillaise, in which an Amazon-type figure personifying the Revolution charges forward with a sword, her face contorted in a fierce rallying cry. A quiet reminder of the less glorious side of war is the tomb of the unknown soldier placed beneath the arch and marked by an eternal flame that is stoked up every evening at 6.30pm by war veterans. If you're up for climbing the 280 steps to the top you'll be amply rewarded by the panoramic views; the best time to come is towards dusk on a sunny day, when the marble of the Grande Arche de la Défense sparkles in the setting sun and the Louvre is bathed in warm light.

The Champs-Élysées

The celebrated avenue des Champs-Élysées, a popular rallying point at times of national crisis and the scene of big military parades on Bastille Day, sweeps down from the Arc de Triomphe towards the place de la Concorde. Seen from a distance it's an impressive sight, but close up can be a little disappointing, with its constant stream of traffic and fast-food outlets, airline offices and chain stores. Over the last few years, however, it's regained something of its former cachet as a chic address: Louis Vuitton and other designer outlets have moved in, once dowdy shops such as the Publicis pharmacy and the Renault car showroom have undergone stylish makeovers and acquired cool bar-restaurants, while new, fashionable cafés and restaurants in the streets around have injected fresh buzz and glamour. Just off the avenue, rue François 1er and avenue Montaigne, part of the "triangle d'or" (golden triangle), are home to the most exclusive names in fashion: Dior, Prada, Chanel and many others.

The Champs-Élysées began life as a leafy promenade, an extension of the Tuileries gardens. It was transformed into a fashionable thoroughfare during the Second Empire when members of the haute bourgeoisie built themselves splendid mansions along its length and high society would come to stroll and frequent the cafés and theatres. Most of the mansions subsequently gave way to office blocks and the beau monde moved elsewhere, but remnants of the avenue's glitzy heyday live on at the Lido cabaret, Fouquet's café-restaurant, the perfumier Guerlain's shop and the former Claridges hotel, now a swanky shopping arcade.

North of the Champs-Élysées

Just north of the Champs-Élysées are a number of hôtels particuliers housing select museums, the best of which is the Musée Jacquemart-André, with its magnificent art collection. North of here is the small and formal Parc Monceau, surrounded by grand residences. Rue de Lévis (a few blocks up rue Berger from M° Monceau) has one of the city's most strident, colourful and appetizing markets every day of the week except Monday, and is also a good restaurant area, particularly around rue des Dames and rue Cheroy.

Musée Jacquemart-André

The Musée Jacquemart-André at 158 bd Haussmann, 8° (daily 10am–6pm; @ www.musee-jacquemart-andre.com; €9.50; M° Miromesnil/St-Philippe-du-Roule) is a splendid mansion laden with the outstanding works of art which its owners, banker Édouard André and his wife Nélie Jacquemart, collected on their extensive trips abroad. Free, informative audioguides (available in English) take you through sumptuous salons, mainly decorated in Louis XV and Louis XVI style, among them a room open to the floor above and surrounded by a carved wooden balcony from which musicians would have entertained guests at the glittering soirees that the Jacquemart-Andrés were renowned for. The library is hung with a number of Van Dycks and three Rembrandts, though the pride of the couple's collection was their early Italian Renaissance paintings, on the upper floor. At the top of the stairs is a huge, animated fresco by Tiepolo depicting the French king Henri III being received by Frederigo Contarini in Venice. Other highlights are Uccello's St George and the Dragon, a haunting Virgin and Child by Mantegna, and another by Botticelli. An excellent way to finish off a visit is a reviving halt at the museum's salon de thé, with its lavish interior and ceiling frescoes by Tiepolo.

South of the Rond-Point des Champs-Élysées

The lower stretch of the Champs-Élysées, between the Rond-Point des Champs-Élysées and place de la Concorde, is bordered by chestnut trees and municipal flower beds and is the most pleasant part of the avenue for a stroll. The gigantic Neoclassical building with exuberant statuary rising above the greenery to the south is the Grand Palais, created with its neighbour, the Petit Palais, for the 1900 Exposition Universelle. The glass of the Grand Palais' dome – some 15,000 square metres – has recently been restored and the ironwork spruced up with a new coat of sea-green paint. Renovation work on the exterior will be fully complete in 2007; meanwhile the building's main exhibition hall, known as the grand nef, is gradually resuming its role as a cultural centre, hosting music festivals and art exhibitions as well as trade fairs and fashion shows. In the Grand Palais' north wing is the Galeries nationales (@www.rmn.fr/galeriesnationalesdugrandpalais), the city's prime venue for blockbuster art exhibitions, while occupying the west wing is the Palais de la Découverte, avenue Franklin-D.-Roosevelt, 8° (Tues–Sat 9.30am–6pm, Sun & hols 10am–7pm; €6.50, combined ticket with planetarium €10; @www.palais-decouverte.fr; M° Champs-Élysées–Clemenceau), a science museum with fun interactive exhibits and a planetarium.

The Petit Palais, facing the Grand Palais on avenue Winston-Churchill, is hardly “petit” but certainly palatial, with beautiful spiral wrought-iron staircases and a grand gallery on the lines of Versailles' Hall of Mirrors. A major renovation, completed in 2005, has returned the building to its original splendour, allowing more natural light to flood in and illuminate the restored stained-glass windows and ceiling frescoes. The revamp has freed up more space for the museum's extensive holdings of paintings, sculpture and decorative artworks, ranging from the ancient Greek and Roman period up to the early twentieth century. At first sight it looks like it's mopped up the leftovers after the other city's galleries have taken their pick, but there are some real gems here, such as Monet's Sunset at Lavacourt and Courbet's Young Ladies on the Bank of the Seine. There's also fantasy jewellery of the Art Nouveau period, Russian icons, effete eighteenth-century furniture and porcelain and a fine collection of seventeenth-century Dutch landscape painting. A newly installed café overlooks the interior garden.

On the other side of the avenue, to the north of place Clemenceau, combat police guard the high walls round the presidential Palais de l'Élysée and the line of ministries and embassies ending with the US in prime position on the corner of place de la Concorde. On Thursdays and at weekends you can see more national branding in the postage-stamp market at the corner of avenues Gabriel and Marigny.

Place de la Concorde and the Tuileries

At the lower end of the Champs is the vast place de la Concorde, where crazed traffic makes crossing over to the middle a death-defying task. As it

▲ Jardin des Tuileries

Jardin des Tuileries, the formal French garden par excellence. It dates back to the 1570s, when Catherine de Médicis had the site cleared of the medieval warren of tilemakers (tuileries) to make way for a palace and grounds. One hundred years later, Louis XIV commissioned renowned landscape artist Le Nôtre to redesign them and the results are largely what you see today: straight avenues, formal flowerbeds and splendid vistas. Shady tree-lined paths flank the grand central alley, and ornamental ponds frame both ends. The much-sought-after chairs strewn around the ponds are a good spot from which to admire the landscaped surroundings and contemplate the superb statues executed by the likes of Coustou and Coysevox, many of them now replaced by copies, the originals transferred to the Louvre.

The two buildings flanking the garden at the Concorde end are the Orangerie, by the river, and the Jeu de Paume (Tues noon–9pm, Wed–Fri noon–7pm, Sat & Sun 10am–7pm; 📍 www.jeudepaume.org; €6; M° Concorde), by rue de Rivoli, once a royal tennis court. The Centre National de la Photographie now resides here and mounts major photographic exhibitions.

The Orangerie (daily except Tues 12.30–7pm, till 9pm Fri; groups only 9am–12.30pm; €6.50; 📍 www.musee-orangerie.fr), a private art collection including eight of Monet's giant water-lily paintings, reopened in 2006 after six years of renovations designed to bring Monet's masterpieces "back into the light". In the 1960s a concrete ceiling had been added to accommodate a new storey; this has now been removed and once again the natural light illumines the water-lilies – exactly how Monet wished them to be seen. These vast, mesmerizing canvases were executed in the last years of the artist's life, a period when he almost obsessively painted the pond in his garden at Giverny, attempting to capture the fleeting light and changing colours. On the lower floor of the museum is a fine collection of paintings by Monet's contemporaries Renoir, Matisse, Cézanne, Utrillo and Modigliani.

happens, some 1300 people did die here between 1793 and 1795, beneath the Revolutionary guillotine – Louis XVI, Marie-Antoinette, Danton and Robespierre among them. The centrepiece of the square is a stunning gold-tipped obelisk from the temple of Luxor, offered as a favour-currying gesture by the viceroy of Egypt in 1829. From here there are sweeping vistas in all directions; the Champs-Élysées looks particularly impressive, and you can admire the alignment of the Assemblée Nationale in the south with the church of the Madeleine – sporting an identical Neoclassical facade – to the north (see p.120).

The symmetry continues beyond place de la Concorde in the formal layout of the

The Louvre

The palace of the Louvre cuts a grand Classical swathe right through the centre of the city, its stately ranks of carved pilasters, arches and pediments stretching west along the right bank of the Seine from the Île de la Cité towards the Voie Triomphale. Inside, the giant collection of the Louvre museum acts as nothing less than the gold standard of France's artistic tradition.

Before becoming a museum during the French Revolution, the Louvre was for centuries the home of the French court, and almost every French ruler with a taste for grandeur has built on the site, right down to President Mitterrand. The original fortress was begun by Philippe-Auguste in 1200 to store his scrolls, jewels and swords, while he himself lived on the Île de la Cité. Charles V was the first French king to make the castle his residence, but not until François I in the mid-sixteenth century were the beginnings of the palace laid and the fortress demolished. François' daughter-in-law, Catherine de Médicis, added the Palais des Tuileries some 500m to the west, and fifty years later Henri IV joined the two together with a long extension along the bank of the Seine. Louis XIV completed the square plan of the Cour Carré, but it wasn't until Napoléon III completed the Richelieu wing and remodelled all the facades of the Cour Napoléon in the 1860s that the Louvre and Tuileries palaces were finally united. It didn't last long – the Tuileries was razed during the Paris Commune of 1871 and the Louvre now opens out onto the lovely gardens (see opposite) that bear its name.

For all its many transformations, the palace remained a surprisingly harmonious building, with a grandeur, symmetry and Frenchness entirely suited to this most historic of Parisian edifices. Then came the controversial Pyramide, designed by I.M. Pei and opened in 1989, erupting from the centre of the Cour Napoléon like a visitor from another architectural planet.

As part of the same late 1980s makeover, Mitterrand managed to persuade the Finance Ministry to move out of the northern Richelieu wing, which then had its two main courtyards dramatically roofed over in glass. A public passageway, the passage Richelieu, cuts through from the Cour Napoléon, opposite the Pyramide, to the rue de Rivoli, outside; it also offers a better view of the sculptures in these courtyards than you get from inside the museum.

Napoleon's pink marble Arc du Carrousel, just east of place du Carrousel, which originally formed a gateway for the former Tuileries Palace, has always looked a bit out of place (though it sits precisely on the Voie Triomphale axis); now it's definitively and forlornly upstaged by the Pyramide.

Quite separate from the Louvre proper, but still within the palace, are three museums under the aegis of the Union Centrale des Arts Décoratifs, dedicated to fashion and textiles, decorative arts and advertising. The entrance to the Musée de la Mode et du Textile, the Musée des Arts Décoratifs and the Musée de la Publicité can be found at 107 rue de Rivoli.

The Musée du Louvre

It's easy to be put off by tales of long queues outside the Pyramide, miles of foot-wearying corridors or multilingual jostles in front of the Mona Lisa, but there are ways around such hassles – you can use a back entrance, stop at one of the cafés or make for a less well-known section – and ultimately, the draw of the mighty collections of the Musée du Louvre is irresistible.

Access and opening hours

The Pyramide is the main entrance to the Musée du Louvre, although the often lengthy lines can be avoided by using one of the alternative entrances: at the Porte des Lions, just east of the Pont Royal; at the Arc du Carrousel; at 99 rue de Rivoli; or directly from the métro station Palais Royal–Musée du Louvre (line 1 platform). If you’ve already got a ticket or a museum pass (see p.92) you can also enter from the passage Richelieu.

The permanent collection is open every day except Tuesday, from 9am to 6pm. On Wednesdays and Fridays, it stays open till 9.45pm – these “nocturnes” are an excellent time to visit. Some less popular parts of the museum are closed one day a week on a rotating basis, so if you’re interested in a particular section it’s worth checking the schedule at www.louvre.fr.

The usual entry fee is €8.50, reduced to €6 for the twice-weekly evening openings. Admission is free on the first Sunday of each month, and to under-18s at all times. Under-26s get in free on the Friday nocturne, ie after 6pm. For a surcharge of a little over €1, tickets can be bought in advance through Ticketnet (☎01.46.91.57.57, www.ticketnet.fr) or from FNAC (☎01.41.57.32.28, louvre.fnacspectacles.com; see p.195 for branches); the advantage is in being able to jump the entrance queue via the passage Richelieu. All tickets allow you to leave and re-enter as many times as you like throughout the day – handy if the crowds (or the artworks) get too much.

Orientation

The museum is divided into three main wings, Denon (south), Richelieu (north) and Sully (east, around the giant quadrangle of the Cour Carré). These wings are further subdivided into seven sections: Antiquities (Oriental, Egyptian and Classical); Sculpture; Painting; the Medieval Louvre; and Objets d’art. Some sections spread across two wings, or two floors of the same wing.

From the Hall Napoléon, under the Pyramide, stairs lead south into the Denon wing, which is by far the grandest and most popular area of the museum, with the must-see Italian masterpieces of the Grande Galerie, the famous nineteenth-century large-scale French paintings and the Mona Lisa, all on the first floor. Denon also houses Classical and Italian sculpture on the two palatial lower floors.

Serious lovers of French art will head north to the Richelieu wing, whose glazed-over courtyards contain a French sculpture collection. The grand chronology of French painting begins on the second floor, while the superb objets d’art collection on the first floor includes everything French that’s not painting or sculpture – furniture, tapestries, crystal and jewels.

Richelieu also houses Middle Eastern antiquities and Islamic art (ground and lower ground floors), and northern European painting (second floor).

Rather fewer visitors begin with the Sully wing, although it’s here that the story begins, with the foundations of Philippe-Auguste’s twelfth-century fortress on the lower ground floor. The floors above mostly continue chronologies begun on other wings, with antiquities from Greece and the Levant (ground floor), and the seventeenth- and eighteenth-century periods from the Objets d’Art (first floor) and French painting (second floor) sections. The complete Pharaonic Egypt collection is here too.

With all that in mind, it’s well worth picking up a floor plan from the information booth in the Hall Napoléon, or at one of the alternative entrances. This makes sense of it all by colour-coding the museum’s seven main sections. A few of the best-known masterpieces are highlighted on the plan, and the whole system is surprisingly painless once you get to grips with it. The plan’s only drawback is that it doesn’t spotlight the magnificently decorated suites and rooms that give such a strong identity to certain sections of the museum.

You can always step outside for a break, but three moderately expensive cafés are enticing and open all day. Café Richelieu (first floor, Richelieu) is elegant and relatively quiet, and on sunny days you can sit outside on the terrace, with spectacular views of the pyramid. Café Denon (lower ground floor, Denon) is cosily romantic, while Café Mollin (first floor, Denon) has a summer terrace and some inexpensive snacks. The various cafés and restaurants under the Pyramide are mostly noisy and overpriced.

Antiquities

Oriental Antiquities covers the sculptures, stone-carved writings, pottery and other relics of the ancient Middle and Near East, including the Mesopotamian, Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian and Phoenician civilizations, plus the art of ancient Persia. The highlight of this section is the boldly sculpted stonework, much of it in relief. Watch out for the statues and busts depicting the young Sumerian prince Gudea, and the black, two-metre-high Code of Hammurabi, which dates from around 1800 BC. Standing erect like a warning finger, a series of royal precepts (the “code”) is crowned with a stern depiction of the king meeting the sun god Shamash, dispenser of justice. The Cour Khorsabad, adjacent, is dominated by two giant Assyrian winged bulls that once acted as guardians to the palace of Sargon II, from which many treasures were brought to the Louvre by the French archeologist Paul-Émilie Botta, in the mid-nineteenth century. The refined Arts of Islam collection is next door.

Egyptian Antiquities contains jewellery, domestic objects, sandals, sarcophagi and dozens of examples of the delicate naturalism of Egyptian decorative technique, such as the wall tiles depicting a piebald calf galloping through fields of papyrus, and a duck taking off from a marsh. Among the major exhibits are the Great Sphinx, carved from a single block of pink granite, the polychrome Seated Scribe statue, the striking, life-size wooden statue of Chancellor Nakhti, a bust of Amenophis IV and a low-relief sculpture of Sethi I and the goddess Hathor.

The collection of Greek and Roman Antiquities, mostly statues, is one of the finest in the world. The biggest crowd-pullers in the museum, after the Mona Lisa, are here: the Winged Victory of Samothrace, at the top of Denon’s great staircase, and the Venus de Milo. Venus is surrounded by hordes of antecedent Aphrodites, from the graceful marble head known as the “Kaufmann Head” and the delightful Venus of Arles – both early copies of the work of the great sculptor Praxiteles – to the strange Dame d’Auxerre. In the Roman section a sterner style takes over, but there are some very attractive mosaics from Asia Minor and luminous frescoes from Pompeii and Herculaneum.

Sculpture

The French Sculpture section is arranged on the lowest two levels of the Richelieu wing, with the more monumental pieces housed in two grand, glass-roofed courtyards: the four triumphal Marly Horses grace the Cour Marly, while Cour Puget has Puget’s dynamic Milon de Crotona as its centrepiece. The surrounding rooms trace the development of sculpture in France from painful Romanesque Crucifixions to the lofty public works of David d’Angers. The startlingly realistic Gothic pieces – notably the Burgundian Tomb of Philippe Pot, complete with hooded mourners – and the experimental Mannerist works are particularly rewarding, but towards the end of the course you may find yourself crying out for an end to all those gracefully perfect nudes and grandiose busts of noblemen. You’ll have to leave the Louvre for Rodin, but an alternative antidote lies in the smaller, more intense Italian and northern European sections, on the lower two floors of Denon, where you'll find such bold masterpieces as two of Michelangelo's writhing Slaves, Duccio's virtuoso Virgin and Child Surrounded by Angels, and some severely Gothic Virgins from Flanders and Germany.

Objets d'Art

The vast Objets d'Art section presents the finest tapestries, ceramics, jewelry and furniture commissioned by France's most wealthy and influential patrons, beginning with an exquisite little equestrian sculpture of Charlemagne and continuing through eighty-one relentlessly superb rooms through to a salon decorated in the style of Louis-Philippe, the last king of France. Walking through the entire chronology is an enlightening experience, and the refined, opulent works give a powerful sense of the evolution of aesthetic taste. The exception is the Middle Ages section, which is of a more pious nature and includes carved ivories and Limoges enamels. Towards the end, the circuit passes through the breathtaking apartments of Napoléon III's Minister of State, full of plush upholstery, immense chandeliers, gilded putti and caryatids and dramatic ceiling frescoes in true Second Empire style.

Painting

The largest section by far is Painting. The main French collection begins on the second floor of the Richelieu wing, and continues right round the Cour Carré, which comprises the Sully wing. It traces the development of French painting from its beginnings as far as Corot, whose airy landscapes anticipate the Impressionists. Surprisingly few works predate the Renaissance, and the preliminary Richelieu section is chiefly of interest for the portraits of French kings, from the Siennese-style Portrait of John the Good to Jean Clouet's François I. As you turn the corner into Sully, look out for the strange Mannerist atmosphere of the two Schools of Fontainebleau, and the luminous paintings of Georges de la Tour and the Le Nain brothers, reminiscent of Caravaggio. It's not until Poussin breaks onto the scene that an obviously French style emerges, and you'll need a healthy appetite for Classical grandeur in the next suite of rooms, with large-scale works by the likes of Lorrain, Le Brun and Rigaud. The more intimate paintings of Watteau come as a relief, followed by Chardin's intense still lifes and the inspired Rococo sketches by Fragonard known as the Figures of Fantasy. From the southern wing of Sully to the end of this section, the chilly wind of Neoclassicism blows through the paintings of Gros, Gérard, Prud'hon, David and Ingres, contrasting with the more sentimental style that begins with Greuze and continues into the Romanticism of Géricault and Delacroix. The final set of rooms takes in Millet, Corot and the Barbizon school of painting.

The nineteenth century is most dramatically represented in the second area of the Louvre devoted to painting, on the first floor of the Denon wing. A pair of giant rooms is dedicated to Nationalism and Romanticism respectively, featuring some of France's best-known works including such gigantic, epic canvases as David's Coronation of Napoleon in Notre Dame, Géricault's The Raft of the Medusa, and Delacroix's Liberty Leading the People, the icon of nineteenth-century revolution.

Denon also houses the frankly staggering Italian collection. The high-ceilinged Salon Carré – which has been used to exhibit paintings since the first “salon” of the Royal Academy in 1725 – displays the so-called Primitives, with works by Giotto, Cimabue and Fra Angelico, as well as one of Uccello's bizarrely theoretical panels of the Battle of San Romano. To the west of the Salon, the famous Grande Galerie stretches into the distance, parading all the great names of the Italian Renaissance – Mantegna, Filippo Lippi, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Coreggio, Titian. The playfully troubled Mannerists kick in about halfway along, but the second half of the Galerie dwindles in quality and representativeness as it moves towards the eighteenth century. Leonardo's Mona Lisa, along with Paolo Veronese's huge Marriage at Cana, hangs in the Salle des États, a room halfway along the Galerie between the two rooms of Nationalist and Romantic French art. If you want to catch La Joconde – as she's known to the French – without a swarm of admirers, go first or last thing in the day. At the far end of Denon, the relatively small but worthwhile Spanish collection has some notable Goya portraits.

The western end of Richelieu's second floor is given over to a more selective collection of German, Flemish and Dutch paintings, with a brilliant set of works by Rubens and twelve Rembrandts, including some powerful self-portraits. Interspersed throughout the painting section are rooms dedicated to the Louvre's impressive collection of Prints and Drawings, including prized sketches and preliminary drawings by Ingres and Rubens and some attributed to Leonardo. Because of their susceptibility to the light, however, they are exhibited in rotation.

Union Centrale des Arts Décoratifs

The other museums housed in the Louvre palace, under an umbrella organization with the snappy title of Union Centrale des Arts Décoratifs (entrance at 107 rue de Rivoli; Tues, Wed & Fri 11am–6pm, Thurs 11am–8pm; Sat & Sun 10am–6pm; €8 combined ticket for all three museums; @www.ucad.fr) are often unjustly overlooked, yet their exhibitions can be among the city's most innovative.

The eclectic collection of art objects and superbly crafted furnishing at the Musée des Arts Décoratifs fits the Union Centrale's "design" theme. The works in the "historical" rooms, running from the medieval period through to Art Deco and Art Nouveau, may seem humble in comparison with those in the Louvre's airy Objets d'Art section, but most of those here were made to be lived with or actually used, and feel more accessible as a result. There are curiously shaped and beautifully carved chairs, dressers and tables, religious paintings, Venetian glass and some wonderful tapestries. A number of "period rooms" have been reconstituted top-to-toe in the style of different eras, giving a powerful flavour of the ethos behind design trends, while separate galleries focus on jewellery and toys. Perhaps the most exciting part of the museum is the brand-new contemporary section, on the topmost floors, with rooms dedicated to each decade from the 1940s through to the present day. There are brilliant works by French, Italian and Japanese designers, including some great examples from the prince of French design, Philippe Starck.

The Musée de la Mode et du Textile holds high-quality exhibitions demonstrating the most brilliant and cutting-edge of Paris fashions from all eras. Recent exhibitions have included Jackie Kennedy's famous 1960s dresses and the work of the couturier Balenciaga. Immediately above, the Musée de la Publicité shows off its collection of advertising posters through cleverly themed, temporary exhibitions. Designed by the French über-architect Jean Nouvel, the space is appropriately trendy: half exposed brickwork and steel panelling, half crumbling Louvre finery. There's even a bar and a dozen computers from which you can freely access the archive.

The Opéra district

Between the Louvre and boulevards Haussmann, Montmartre, Poissonnière and Bonne-Nouvelle to the north lies the city's main commercial and financial district. Right at its heart stand the solid institutions of the Banque de France and the Bourse, while just to the north, beyond the glittering Opéra-Garnier, are the large department stores Galeries Lafayette and Printemps. More well-heeled shopping is concentrated on the rue St-Honoré in the west and the streets around aristocratic place Vendôme, lined with top couturiers, jewellers and art dealers. Scattered around the whole area are the delightful, secretive passages – nineteenth-century arcades that hark back to shopping from a different era.

The passages

Among the most attractive of the passages is the Galerie Vivienne, between rue Vivienne and rue des Petits-Champs, its decor of Grecian and marine motifs providing a suitably flamboyant backdrop for its smart shops, such as a branch of Jean-Paul Gaultier. But the most stylish examples are the three-storey passage du Grand-Cerf, between rue St-Denis and rue Dussoubs, and Galerie Véro-Dodat, between rue Croix-des-Petits-Champs and rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau, named after the two pork butchers who set it up in 1824. This last is the most homogeneous and aristocratic passage, with painted ceilings and faux marble columns. North of rue St-Marc, the several arcades making up the passage des Panoramas are more workaday, although they do retain a great deal of character: there's an old brasserie with carved wood panelling (now a tea shop, L'Arbre à Cannelle, see p.165) and a printshop with its original 1867 fittings, as well as bric-a-brac shops, and stamp and secondhand postcard dealers. In passage Jouffroy, across boulevard Montmartre, a shop, Monsieur Segas, sells unusual walking canes and theatrical antiques opposite a shop with exquisite dolls' house furniture, while Paul Vulin spreads his secondhand books further down along the passageway, and Ciné-Doc appeals to cinephiles with its collection of old film posters.

The Madeleine and the Opéra-Garnier

Set back from the boulevard des Capucines and crowning the avenue de l'Opéra is the dazzling Opéra-Garnier, which was constructed from 1860 to 1875 as part of Napoléon III's new vision of Paris. The building's architect, Charles Garnier, whose golden bust by Carpeaux can be seen on the rue Auber side of his edifice, pulled out all the stops to provide a suitably grand space in which Second Empire high society could parade and be seen. The facade is a fabulous extravaganza of white, pink and green marble, colonnades, rearing horses, winged angels and niches holding gleaming gold busts of composers. You can look round the equally sumptuous interior (daily 10am–5pm; €7), including the plush auditorium – rehearsals permitting – the colourful ceiling of which is the work of Chagall, depicting scenes from well-known operas and ballets. The visit includes the Bibliothèque-Musée de l'Opéra, dedicated to the artists connected with the Opéra throughout its history, and containing model sets, dreadful nineteenth-century paintings and rather better temporary exhibitions on operatic themes.

West of the Opéra, occupying nearly the whole of the place de la Madeleine, the imperious-looking Église de la Madeleine is the parish church of the cream of Parisian high society. Modelled on a Greek classical temple, it's surrounded by 52 Corinthian columns and fronted by a huge pediment depicting the Last Judgement. Originally intended as a monument to Napoleon's army, it narrowly escaped being turned into a railway station before finally being consecrated to Mary Magdalene in 1845. Inside, a wonderfully theatrical sculpture of Mary Magdalene Ascending to Heaven draws your eye to the high altar. In the half-dome above, a fresco entitled The History of Christianity commemorates the concordat signed between the church and the state after the Revolution and depicts all the major figures in Christendom, with Napoleon centre-stage, naturally.

If the Madeleine caters to spiritual needs, the rest of the square is given over to nourishment of quite a different kind, for this is where Paris's top gourmet food stores Fauchon and Hédiard are located. Their remarkable displays are a feast for the eyes, and both have salons de thé where you can sample some of their epicurean treats. On the east side of the Madeleine church is one of the city's oldest flower markets dating back to 1832, open every day except Monday while, nearby, some rather fine Art Nouveau public toilets are definitely worth inspecting.

Place Vendôme

A short walk east of the Madeleine along ancient rue St-Honoré, a preserve of top fashion designers and art galleries, lies place Vendôme, one of the city's most impressive set pieces. Built by Versailles' architect Hardouin-Mansart, it's a pleasingly symmetrical, eight-sided place, enclosed by a harmonious ensemble of elegant mansions, graced with Corinthian pilasters, mascarons and steeply pitched roofs. Once the grand residences of tax collectors and financiers, they now house such luxury establishments as the Ritz hotel, Cartier, Bulgari and other top-flight jewellers, lending the square a decidedly exclusive air. No. 12, now occupied by Chaumet jewellers, is where Chopin died in 1849.

Somewhat out of proportion with the rest of the square, the centrepiece is a towering triumphal column, surmounted by a statue of Napoleon dressed as Caesar, raised in 1806 to celebrate the Battle of Austerlitz – bronze reliefs of scenes of the battle, cast from 1200 recycled Austro-Russian cannons, spiral their way up the column.

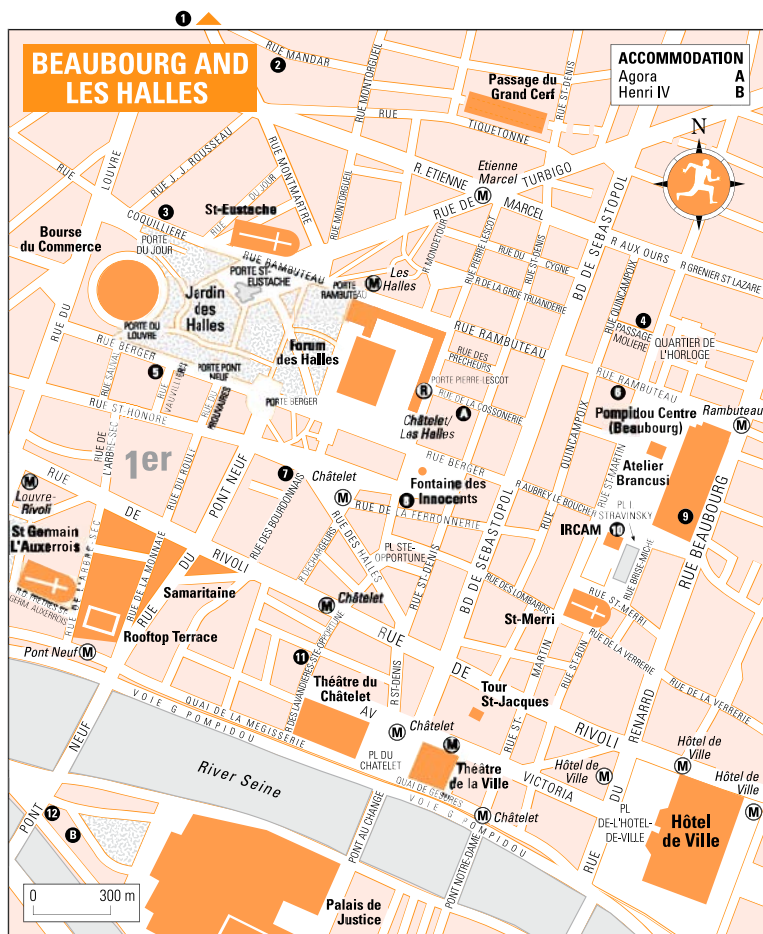

The Palais Royal and Bibliothèque Nationale

At the eastern end of rue St-Honoré stands the handsome, colonnaded Palais Royal, built for Cardinal Richelieu in 1624, though much modified and renovated since. The current building houses various governmental bodies and the Comédie Française, a long-standing venue for the classics of French theatre. To its rear lie gardens lined with stately three-storey houses built over arcades housing quirky antique and designer shops. It's an attractive and peaceful oasis, with avenues of limes, fountains and flowerbeds. You'd hardly guess that this was a site of gambling dens, brothels and funfair attractions until the Grands Boulevards took up the baton in the 1830s. Folly, some might say, has returned in the form of Daniel Buren's art installation, which consists of black and white striped pillars, rather like sticks of Brighton rock, all of varying heights, dotted about the palace's main courtyard.

The gardens are a handy short cut from the rue de Rivoli to the Bibliothèque Nationale (Tues–Sat 10am–7pm, Sun noon–7pm; ☎ www.bnf.fr) on the north side; you can enter free of charge and peer into the atmospheric reading rooms, though some look rather bereft, as many books have now been transferred to the new François Mitterrand site on the Left Bank. Visiting the library's temporary exhibitions (closed Mon) will give you access to the beautiful Galerie Mazarine, with its panelled ceilings painted by Romanelli (1617–1662). It's also worth calling into the Cabinet des Monnaies, Médailles et Antiques (daily 1–5/6pm; free), a permanent display of coins and ancient treasures built up by successive kings from Philippe-Auguste onwards; Charlemagne's ivory chess set is a particular highlight.

Les Halles and around

Les Halles was the city's main food market for over eight hundred years. It was moved out to the suburbs in 1969, despite widespread opposition, and replaced by a large underground shopping and leisure complex, known as the Forum des Halles, and an RER/métro interchange. Unightly, run down, even unsavoury in parts, the complex is now widely acknowledged as an architectural disaster – so much so that steps are under way to give it a major facelift. The French architect David Mangin, who won the competition to redevelop the site, plans to suspend a vast glass roof over the forum, allowing light to flood in, while also redesigning the gardens and creating a wide promenade

EATING

1	Chez Dilan	2	À la Tour de Montlhéry (Chez Denise)
2	Georges	9	La Victoire Suprême du Coeur
3	Au Pied de Cochon	3	Au Vieux Molière
11	La Robe et le Palais

DRINKING

8	Banana Café	8	Le Triptyque
10	Café Beaubourg
6	Le Petit Marcel
12	Taverne Henri IV

on the model of Barcelona's Ramblas. Work is due to start in 2007 and should be complete by 2012.

The Forum des Halles centre stretches underground from the Bourse du Commerce rotunda to rue Pierre-Lescot and is spread over four levels. The overground section comprises aquarium-like arcades of shops, arranged around a sunken patio, and landscaped gardens. The shops are mostly devoted to high-street fashion and there's also a large FNAC bookshop and the Forum des Créateurs, an outlet for young fashion designers. It's not all commerce, however: there's scope for various diversions including swimming, billiards and movie-going.

Although little now remains of the former working-class quarter, you can still catch a flavour of the old Les Halles atmosphere in some of the surrounding bars and bistros and on the lively market street of rue Montorgueil to the north, where traditional grocers, horse butchers and fishmongers still ply their trade.

At the foot of rue Montorgueil stands another survivor from the past, the beautiful, gracefully buttressed church of St-Eustache. Built between 1532 and 1637, it's a glorious fusion of Gothic and Renaissance styles, with soaring vaults, Corinthian pilasters and arcades. It was the scene of Molière's baptism, and Rameau and Marivaux are buried here.

Centre Georges Pompidou

The Centre Georges Pompidou (aka Beaubourg; www.centrepompidou.fr; M° Rambuteau/Hôtel-de-Ville), housing the Musée National d'Art Moderne, is one of the twentieth century's most radical buildings and its opening in 1977 gave rise to some violent reactions. Since then, however, it has won over critics and public alike, and has become one of the city's most recognizable landmarks. Architects Renzo Piano and Richard Rogers freed up maximum gallery space inside by placing all infrastructure outside: utility pipes and escalator tubes, all brightly colour-coded according to their function, climb around the exterior in crazy snakes-and-ladders fashion. The transparent escalator on the front of the building, giving access to the modern art museum, affords superb views over the city. Aside from the museum there are two cinemas, performance spaces and a library.

Tickets for the museum cost €10 and include entry to the Atelier Brancusi and temporary exhibitions. Under-18s get in free – pick up a pass at the ticket office. Admission to the museum and exhibitions is free for everyone on the first Sunday of the month.

Musée National d'Art Moderne

The superb Musée National d'Art Moderne (daily except Tues 11am–9pm; see above for admission) presides over the fourth and fifth floors of the Centre Pompidou, with the fifth floor usually covering 1905 to 1960 and the fourth 1960 to the present day. Thanks to an astute acquisitions policy and some generous gifts, the collection is a near-complete visual essay on the history of twentieth-century art and is so large that only a fraction of the 50,000 works are on display at any one time. The paintings are frequently rotated and rearranged.

The section covering the years 1905 to 1960 is a near-complete visual essay on the history of modern art: Fauvism, Cubism, Dada, abstract art, Surrealism and abstract expressionism are all well represented. There's a particularly rich collection of Matisse's, ranging from early Fauvist works to his late masterpieces – a stand-out is his Tristesse du Roi, a moving meditation on old age and memory. Other highlights include a number of Picasso's and Braque's early Cubist paintings and a substantial collection of Kandinskys, including his pioneering abstract works Avec l'arc noir and Composition à la tache rouge. A whole room is usually devoted to the characteristically colourful paintings of Robert and Sonia Delaunay, contrasting with the darker mood of more unsettling works likely to be on display by Surrealists Magritte, Dalí and Ernst.

In the post-1960s section the works of Yves Klein are perhaps the most arresting, especially his luminous blue “body prints”, made by covering female models in paint and using them as human paintbrushes. Established contemporary artists you're likely to come across include Claes Oldenburg, Christian Boltanski and Daniel Buren. Christian Boltanski is known for his large mise-en-scène installations, often containing veiled allusions to the Holocaust. Daniel Buren's works are easy to spot: they all bear his trademark stripes, exactly 8.7cm in width.

Atelier Brancusi

On the northern edge of the Pompidou Centre, down some steps off the sloping piazza, in a small separate one-level building, is the Atelier Brancusi (daily except Tues 2–6pm), the reconstructed home and studio of Constantin Brancusi. The sculptor bequeathed the contents of his workshop to the state on condition that the rooms be arranged exactly as he left them, and they provide a fascinating insight into how he lived and worked. Studios one and two are crowded with Brancusi's trademark abstract bird and column shapes in highly polished brass and marble, while studios three and four comprise the artist's private quarters.

Quartier Beaubourg and the Hôtel de Ville

The quartier around the Centre Pompidou, known as Beaubourg, is home to more contemporary art. Jean Tinguely and Niki de St-Phalle created the colourful moving sculptures and fountains in the pool in front of Église St-Merri on place Igor Stravinsky. This squirting waterworks pays homage to Stravinsky – each fountain corresponds to one of his compositions (The Firebird, The Rite of Spring and so on) – and shows scant respect for passers-by. On the west side of the square is the entrance to IRCAM, a research centre for contemporary music founded by the composer Pierre Boulez and an occasional venue for concerts; much of it is underground, with an overground extension by Renzo Piano. To the north are numerous commercial art galleries, occupying the attractive old hôtels particuliers on pedestrianized rue Quincampoix.

Heading back towards the river along rue Renard will bring you to the Hôtel de Ville, the seat of the city's government. It's a mansion of gargantuan proportions in florid neo-Renaissance style, modelled pretty much on the previous building burned down in the Commune. Those opposed to the establishments of kings and emperors created their alternative municipal governments on this spot in 1789, 1848 and 1870. But with the defeat of the Commune in 1871, the conservatives concluded that the Parisian municipal authority had to go if order was to be maintained and the working class kept in their place. Thereafter Paris was ruled directly by the ministry of the interior. Eventually, in 1977 the city was allowed to run its own affairs again and Jacques Chirac was elected mayor. In front of the Hôtel de Ville, the huge square – a notorious guillotine site in the French Revolution – becomes the location of a popular ice-skating rink from December to March (see p.192).

The Marais, the Île St-Louis and the Bastille

Jack Kerouac translated rue des Francs-Bourgeois, the Marais' main east–west axis along with rue Rivoli/rue St-Antoine, as “street of the outspoken middle classes”, though the original owners of the mansions lining its length would not have taken kindly to such a slight on their blue-bloodedness. The name’s origin is medieval and actually means “people exempt from tax” in reference to the penurious inmates of an almshouse that stood on the site of no. 34. It was not until the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that the Marais, as the area between the Pompidou Centre and the Bastille is known, became a fashionable aristocratic district. After the Revolution it was abandoned to the masses, who, up until some fifty years ago, were living ten to a room on unserviced, squalid streets. Since then, gentrification has proceeded apace and the middle classes are finally ensconced – mostly media, arty or gay, and definitely outspoken.

The renovated mansions, their grandeur concealed by the narrow streets, have become museums, libraries, offices and chic apartments, flanked by trendy fashion outlets, interior design shops and art galleries. Though cornered by Haussmann’s boulevards, the Marais itself was spared the baron’s heavy touch and has been left pretty much unspoilt. This is Paris at its most seductive – old, secluded, as lively by night as it is by day, and with as many alluring shops, bars and places to eat as you could wish for.

Rue des Francs-Bourgeois

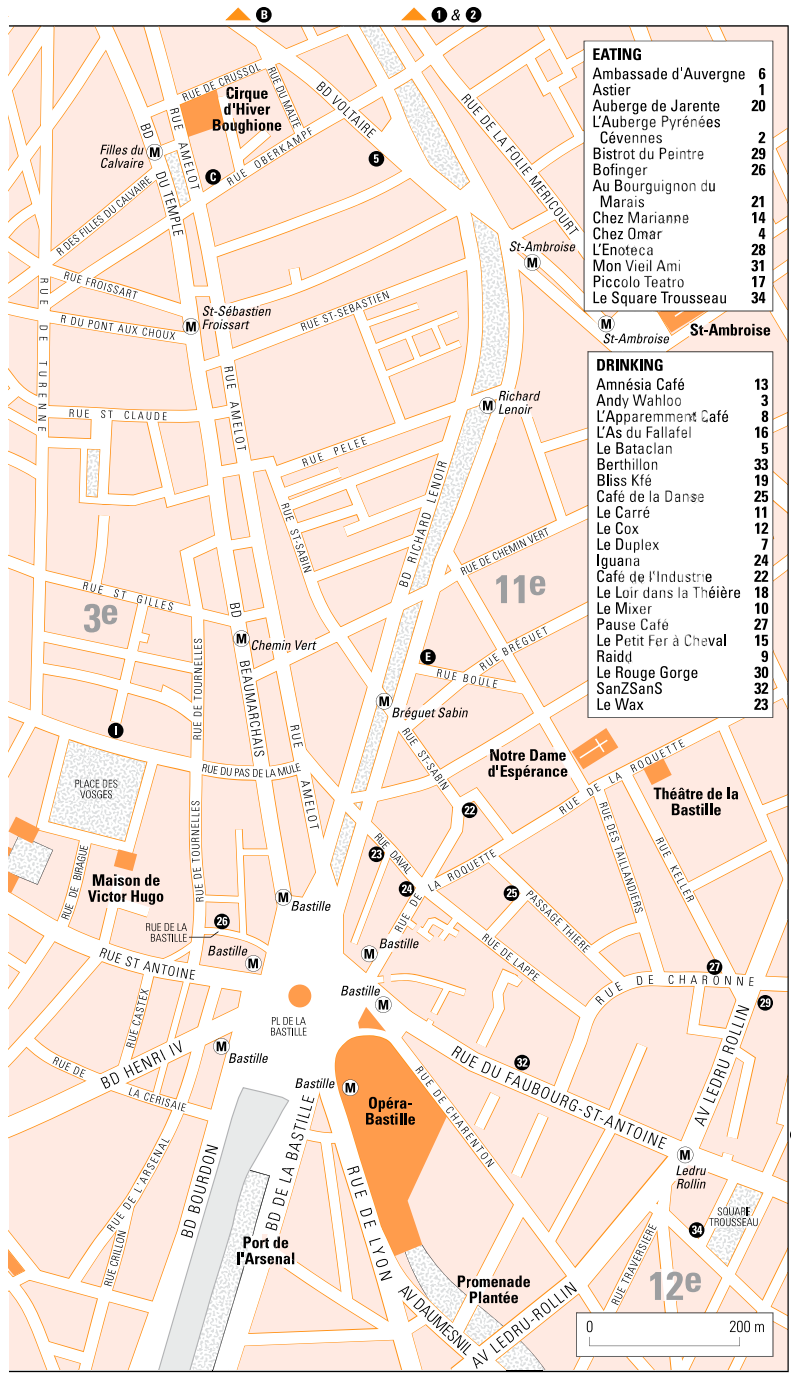

Rue des Francs-Bourgeois begins with the eighteenth-century magnificence of the Palais Soubise, which houses the Archives Nationales de France and the Musée de l’Histoire de France. The palace’s fabulous rococo interiors are the setting for changing exhibitions (Mon & Wed–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 2–5.30pm; around €3) drawn from the archives. The adjacent Hôtel de Rohan is also occasionally used for exhibitions from the archives and has more sumptuous interiors, notably the charming Chinese-inspired Cabinet des Singes, whose walls are painted with monkeys acting out various aristocratic scenes.

Opposite, at the back of a driveway for the Crédit Municipal bank, stands a pepperpot tower which formed part of Philippe-Auguste’s twelfth-century city walls. Further down the street are two of the grandest Marais hôtels, Carnavalet and Lamoignon, housing respectively the Musée Carnavalet and the Bibliothèque Historique de la Ville de Paris.

Musée Carnavalet

The Musée Carnavalet, whose entrance is off rue des Francs-Bourgeois at 23 rue de Sévigné (Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; free; M° St-Paul), presents the history of Paris from its origins up to the Belle Époque through an extraordinary collection of paintings, sculptures, decorative arts and archeological finds. The museum’s setting in two beautiful Renaissance mansions, Hôtel Carnavalet and Hôtel Le Peletier, surrounded by attractive gardens, makes a visit worthwhile in itself. There are 140 rooms in all, impossible to visit in one go, so it’s best to pick up a floor plan and decide which areas you’d like to concentrate on. The collection begins with nineteenth- and early twentieth-century shop and inn signs (beautiful objects in themselves) and fascinating models of Paris through the ages, along with maps and plans. Other highlights on the ground floor include the renovated orangery, which houses a significant collection of Neolithic finds such as wooden pirogues which were unearthed during the 1990s redevelopment of the Bercy riverside area.

On the first floor there are numerous Louis XV and Louis XVI salons and boudoirs rescued from buildings destroyed to make way for Haussmann’s boulevards, and remounted here more or less intact. Rooms 128 to 148 are largely devoted to the Belle Époque, evoked through vivid paintings of the period

EATING

Ambassade d'Auvergne	6
Astier	1
Auberge de Jarente	20
L'Auberge Pyrénées
Cévennes	2
Bistrot du Peintre	29
Bofinger	26
Au Bourguignon du Marais	21
Chez Marianne	14
Chez Omar	4
L'Enoteca	28
Mon Vieil Ami	31
Piccolo Teatro	17
Le Square Trouseau	34

DRINKING

Amnésia Café	13
Andy Wahloo	3
L'Apparement Café	8
L'As du Fallafel	16
Le Bataclan	5
Berthillon	33
Bliss Kfé	19
Café de la Danse	25
Le Carré	11
Le Cox	12
Le Duplex	7
Iguana	24
Café de l'Industrie	22
Le Loir dans la Théière	18
Le Mixer	10
Pause Café	17
Le Petit Fer à Cheval	27
Raidid	9
Le Rouge Gorge	30
SanZSanS	32
Le Wax	23

and some wonderful Art Nouveau interiors, among which is the sumptuous peacock-green interior designed by Alphonse Mucha for Fouquet's jewellery shop in the rue Royal. José-Maria Sert's Art Deco ballroom, with its extravagant gold-leaf decor and grand-scale paintings, including one of the Queen of Sheba with a train of elephants, is also well preserved. Nearby is a section on literary life at the beginning of the twentieth century, including a reconstruction of Proust's cork-lined bedroom. The second floor has rooms full of mementos of the French Revolution: models of the Bastille, original Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, tricolours and liberty caps, sculpted allegories of Reason, crockery with Revolutionary slogans, models of the guillotine and execution orders to make you shed a tear for royalists as well as revolutionaries.

Musée Picasso

To the north of the rue des Francs-Bourgeois, at 5 rue de Thorigny, is the Musée Picasso (daily except Tues: April–Sept 9.30am–6pm; Oct–March 9.30am–5.30pm; €6.50; free first Sun of the month; @ www.musee-picasso.fr; M° Filles du Calvaire/St-Paul), housed in the magnificent seventeenth-century Hôtel Salé. It's the largest collection of Picassos anywhere, representing almost all the major periods of the artist's life from 1905 onwards. Many of the works were owned by Picasso and on his death in 1973 were seized by the state in lieu of taxes owed. The result is an unedited body of work, which, although not including the most recognizable of Picasso's masterpieces, does provide a sense of the artist's development and an insight into the person behind the myth. In addition, the collection includes paintings Picasso bought or was given by contemporaries such as Matisse and Cézanne, his African masks and sculptures and photographs of him in his studio taken by Brassai.

The exhibition unfolds chronologically, starting with the artist's blue period, his experiments with Cubism and Surrealism, and moves on to his larger-scale works on themes of war and peace and his later preoccupations with love and death, reflected in his Minotaur and bullfighting paintings. Perhaps some of the most striking works on display are Picasso's more personal ones – those of his children, wives and lovers – such as Olga Pensive (1923), in which his first wife is shown lost in thought, the deep blue of her dress reflecting her mood. The breakdown of their marriage was probably behind the Surrealist-influenced Femme dans le Fauteuil Rouge: the violent clash of colours and the woman's grotesquely deformed body tell of acute distress. Two portraits of later lovers Dora Maar and Marie-Thérèse (both painted in 1937), exhibited side by side, show how the two women inspired Picasso in very different ways: they strike the same pose, but Dora Maar is painted with strong lines and vibrant colours, suggesting a passionate, vivacious personality, while Marie-Thérèse's muted colours and soft contours convey serenity and peace.

The museum also holds a substantial number of Picasso's engravings, ceramics and sculpture, reflecting the remarkable ease with which the artist moved from one medium to another. Some of the most arresting sculptures are those he created from recycled household objects, such as the endearing La Chèvre (Goat), whose stomach is made from a basket, and Tête de Taureau, an ingenious pairing of a bicycle seat and handlebars.

The Jewish quarter

One block south of the rue des Francs-Bourgeois, the area around narrow rue des Rosiers has traditionally been the Jewish quarter of the city, and remains so, despite incursions by trendy clothes shops. It has a distinctly Mediterranean flavour, testimony to the influence of the North African Sephardim, who replenished Paris's Jewish population, depleted when its Ashkenazim were rounded up by the Nazis and the French police and transported to the concentration camps.

That fate befell some of the inhabitants who once lived in the Hôtel de St-Aignan, at 71 rue de Temple, just northeast of the Centre Pompidou, now fittingly home to the Musée d'Art et d'Histoire du Judaïsme (Mon–Fri 11am–6pm, Sun 10am–6pm; €6.80, www.mahj.org; M° Rambuteau). The museum is a combination of the collections of the now closed Musée d'Art Juif in Montmartre, Isaac Strauss, conductor of the Paris Opera orchestra, and the Dreyfus archives, a gift to the museum from his grandchildren. Free audioguides in English are well worth picking up if you want to get the most out of your visit. The museum traces the culture, history and artistic endeavours of the Jewish people from the Middle Ages to the present day. The focus is on the history of Jews in France, but there are also many artefacts from the rest of Europe and North Africa. Some of the most notable exhibits are a Gothic-style Hanukkah lamp, one of the very few French Jewish artefacts to survive from the period before the expulsion of the Jews from France in 1394; an Italian gilded circumcision chair from the seventeenth century; and a completely intact late nineteenth-century Austrian sukkah, a brightly painted wooden hut built as a temporary dwelling for the celebration of the harvest. Other artefacts include Moroccan wedding garments, highly decorated marriage contracts from eighteenth-century Modena and gorgeous, almost whimsical, spice containers. One room, appropriately enough, is devoted to the Dreyfus affair, documented with letters, postcards and press clippings; you can read Émile Zola's famous letter "J'accuse" and the letters that Dreyfus sent to his wife from Devil's Island in which he talks of épouvantable ("terrible") suffering and loneliness. There's also a significant collection of paintings and sculpture by Jewish artists, such as Soutine and Chagall, who came to live in Paris at the beginning of the twentieth century. Events beyond the early twentieth century are taken up at the Mémorial de la Shoah's museum (see p.130).

Place des Vosges

A vast square of symmetrical pink brick and stone mansions built over arcades, the place des Vosges, at the eastern end of rue des Francs-Bourgeois, is a masterpiece of aristocratic elegance and the first example of planned development in the history of Paris. It was built by Henri IV and inaugurated in 1612 for the wedding of Louis XIII and Anne of Austria; Louis's statue – or, rather, a replica of it – stands hidden by chestnut trees in the middle of the grass and gravel gardens at the square's centre. The gardens are popular with families on weekends – children can run around on the grass (unusually for Paris the "pelouse" is not "interdite") and mess about in sandpits. Buskers often play under the arcades, serenading diners at the outside tables of restaurants and cafés, while well-heeled shoppers browse in the upmarket art, antique and fashion boutiques.

Through all the vicissitudes of history, the square has never lost its cachet as a smart address. Among the many celebrities who made their homes here was Victor Hugo: his house, at no. 6, where he wrote much of Les Misérables, is now a museum, the Maison de Victor Hugo (Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; closed hols; free; M° Chemin-Vert/Bastille); a whole room is devoted to posters of the various stage adaptations of his most famous novel. Hugo was multi-talented: as well as writing, he drew – many of his ink drawings are exhibited – and designed his own furniture; he even put together the extraordinary Chinese-style dining room on display here. That apart, the usual portraits, manuscripts and memorabilia shed sparse light on the man and his work, particularly if you don't read French.

△ Place des Vosges

From the southwest corner of the square, a door leads through to the formal château garden, orangery and exquisite Renaissance facade of the Hôtel de Sully, the sister site to the Jeu de Paume (see p.114). Changing photographic exhibitions, usually with social, historical or anthropological themes, are mounted here (Tues–Fri noon–7pm, Sat & Sun 10am–7pm; €5), and there's a bookshop with an extensive collection of books on Paris, some in English.

South of rue de Rivoli

The southern section of the Marais, below rues de Rivoli and St-Antoine, is quieter than the northern part and has some atmospheric streets, such as cobbled rue des Barres, perfumed with the scent of roses from nearby gardens and the occasional waft of incense from the church of St-Gervais-St-Protais, a late Gothic construction that looks somewhat battered on the outside owing to a direct hit from a Big Bertha howitzer in 1918. Its interior contains some lovely stained glass, carved misericords and a seventeenth-century organ – Paris's oldest.

One block further east, at 17 rue Geoffroy-l'Asnier, is the Mémorial de la Shoah (Mon–Fri & Sun 10am–6pm, Thurs until 10pm; free). Since 1956 this has been the site of the Mémorial du Martyr Juif Inconnu (Memorial to an Unknown Jewish Martyr), a sombre crypt containing a large black marble star of David, with a candle at its centre. In 2005 President Chirac opened a new museum here and unveiled a Wall of Names: four giant slabs of marble engraved with the names of the 76,000 French Jews sent to death camps from 1942 to 1944. Their weight is overwhelming.

The museum gives an absorbing account of the history of Jews in France, especially Paris, during the German occupation. There are last letters from deportees to their families, videotaped testimony from survivors, numerous ID cards and photos.

A little further east, between rues Fourcy and François-Miron, the handsome Hôtel Hénault de Cantoube, with its two-storey crypt, has become the Maison Européenne de la Photographie (Wed–Sun 11am–8pm; €6, free Wed after 5pm; @ www.mep-fr.org; M° St-Paul/Pont-Marie) and hosts excellent exhibitions of contemporary photography; the entrance is at 5/7 rue du Fourcy.

The Île St-Louis

Often considered the most romantic part of Paris, the peaceful Île St-Louis is prime strolling territory. Unlike its larger neighbour, the Île de la Cité, the Île St-Louis has no heavyweight sights, just austere handsome seventeenth-century houses on single-lane streets, tree-lined quais, a school, church, restaurants, cafés, interesting little shops, and the best sorbets in the world at Berthillon, 31 rue St-Louis-en-l'Île (see p.168). Unsurprisingly, the island is one of the most coveted of the city's addresses (Baron Guy de Rothschild has a house here). The island is particularly atmospheric in the evening, and an arm-in-arm wander along the quais is a must in any lover's itinerary.

The Bastille

The landmark column topped with the gilded “Spirit of Liberty” on place de la Bastille was erected not to commemorate the surrender in 1789 of the prison – whose only visible remains have been transported to square Henri-Galli at the end of boulevard Henri-IV – but the July Revolution of 1830 that replaced the autocratic Charles X with the “Citizen King” Louis-Philippe. When Louis-Philippe fled in the more significant 1848 Revolution, his throne was burnt beside the column and a new inscription added. Four months later, the workers again took to the streets. All of eastern Paris was barricaded, with the fiercest fighting on rue du Faubourg-St-Antoine, until the rebellion was quelled with the usual massacres and deportation of survivors. However, it is the events of July 14, 1789, symbol of the end of feudalism in Europe, that France celebrates every year on Bastille Day.

The Bicentennial in 1989 was marked by the inauguration of the Opéra-Bastille (see p.185), President Mitterrand's pet project. Filling almost the entire block between rues de Lyon, Charenton and Moreau, it has shifted the focus of place de la Bastille, so that the column is no longer the pivotal point; in fact, it's easy to miss it altogether when dazzled by the night-time glare of lights emanating from this “hippopotamus in a bathtub”, as one critic dubbed the Opéra.

The building's construction destroyed no small amount of low-rent housing, but, as with most speculative developments, the pace of change is uneven, and cobblers and ironmongers still survive alongside cocktail haunts and sushi bars, making the quartier de la Bastille a simultaneously gritty and trendy quarter. Place and rue d'Aligre, east of square Trousseau, still have their raucous daily market and, on rue de Lappe, Balajo is one remnant of a very Parisian tradition: the bals musettes, or music halls of 1930s gai Paris, frequented between the wars by Piaf, Jean Gabin and Rita Hayworth. It was founded by one Jo de France, who introduced glitter and spectacle into what were then seedy gangster dives, and brought Parisians from the other side of the city to the rue de Lappe lowlife. Now the street is full of fun, cool bars, full to bursting at the weekends. Hip bars and cafés have also sprung up in the surrounding streets, especially on rue de Charonne, also home to fashion boutiques and whacky interior designers, while alternative, hippy outfits cluster on rues Keller and de la Roquette.

Just south of here you can find quiet havens in the courtyards of rue du Faubourg-St-Antoine. Since the fifteenth century, this has been the principal artisan and working-class quartier of Paris, the cradle of revolutions and mother of street-fighters. From its beginnings the principal trade associated with it has been furniture-making, and the maze of interconnecting yards and passages are still full of the workshops of the related trades: marquetry, stainers, polishers and inlayers.

Quartier Latin

South of the river, the Rive Gauche (Left Bank) has long maintained an “alternative” identity, opposed to the formal, businesslike ambience of the Right Bank – as much left wing as left bank. These days, this image is mostly kept up by the student population of the Quartier Latin, which first settled on the high ground of the Montagne Ste-Geneviève in the twelfth century. No one knows if it was the learned Latin of the medieval scholars or the ruins of the Roman city of Lutetia that gave the area its name. The pivotal point of this “Latin quarter” is place St-Michel, where the tree-lined boulevard St-Michel begins. The famous boul’ Mich has long since changed from radical student heartland to busy commercial thoroughfare, but the universities on all sides maintain the area’s traditions, and the cafés and shops are still jammed with people, mainly young and – in summer – largely foreign.

Around St-Séverin

The touristy scrum is at its ugliest around rue de la Huchette, just east of the place St-Michel. The Théâtre de la Huchette still shows Ionesco’s La Cantatrice Chauve (The Bald Prima Donna) almost fifty years on, but it’s a last bastion of the area’s postwar heyday, and is now hemmed in by cheap bars and indifferent Greek restaurants. Connecting rue de la Huchette to the riverside is rue du Chat-qui-Pêche, a narrow slice of medieval Paris as it was before Haussmann got to work.

At the end of rue de la Huchette, rue St-Jacques is aligned on the main street of Roman Paris, and was the road up which millions of medieval pilgrims trudged at the start of their long march to Santiago de Compostela in Spain. One block south of rue de la Huchette, just west of rue St-Jacques, is the mainly fifteenth-century church of St-Séverin, whose entrance is on rue des Prêtres St-Séverin (Mon–Sat 11am–7.15pm, Sun 9am–8.30pm; M° St-Michel/Cluny–La Sorbonne). It’s one of the city’s more intense churches, its flamboyant choir resting on a virtuoso spiralling central pillar and its windows filled with edgy stained glass by the modern French painter Jean Bazaine. East of rue St-Jacques, and back towards the river, square Viviani provides a perfect view of Notre-Dame and a pleasant patch of green. The mutilated church behind is St-Julien-le-Pauvre (daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 3–6.30pm; M° St-Michel/Maubert Mutualité). The same age as Notre-Dame, it used to be the venue for university assemblies until rumbustious students tore it apart in 1524. Across rue Lagrange from the square, rue de la Bûcherie is the home of the celebrated English-language bookshop Shakespeare and Co (see p.195), which acts as an informal hostel for wannabe Hemingways. The still-more-famous original site – under Sylvia Beach, the first publisher of Joyce’s Ulysses – was on rue de l’Odéon.

The riverbank and Institut du Monde Arabe

A short walk from square Viviani on the riverbank, you’ll find old books, postcards and prints on sale from the bouquinistes, whose green boxes line the parapets of the riverside quais. It's a pleasant walk upstream to the Pont de Sully – which leads across to the Île St-Louis and offers a dramatic view of the apse and steeple of Notre-Dame – and the beginning of a sunny riverside garden dotted with interesting though worn pieces of modern sculpture.

Opposite the Pont de Sully, you can't miss the bold glass and aluminium mass of the Institut du Monde Arabe (Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; 🌐 www.imarabe.org; M° Jussieu/Cardinal-Lemoine), a cultural centre built to further understanding of the Arab world. Designed by Paris's architect of the moment, Jean Nouvel, its broad southern facade comprises thousands of tiny shutters which modulate the light levels inside while simultaneously mimicking a moucharabiyah, or traditional Arab latticework balcony. Originally designed to be light-sensitive, they now simply open and shut on the hour every hour to show off the effect. Inside, a sleek museum (€5) winds down from the seventh floor as it traces the evolution of art in the Islamic world, with precious glass, rugs, ceramics, illuminated manuscripts, woodcarving, metalwork and scientific instruments. On other levels there's a library and multimedia centre for scholars, an auditorium for films and concerts, and a specialist bookshop with a very good selection of CDs from the Arab world. The café-restaurant on the ninth floor is a great place to enjoy a mint tea and the view towards the apse of Notre-Dame.

The Musée National du Moyen-Âge and the Sorbonne

The nearby area around the slopes of the Montagne Ste-Geneviève, the hill on which the Panthéon stands, is good for a stroll. The best approach is from place Maubert (which has a good market on Tues, Thurs & Sat mornings) or from the St-Michel/St-Germain crossroads, where the walls of the third-century Roman baths are visible in the garden of the Hôtel de Cluny, a sixteenth-century mansion built by the abbots of the powerful Cluny monastery as their Paris pied-à-terre. It now houses the Musée National du Moyen-Âge, 6 place Paul-Painlevé, off rue des Écoles (daily except Tues 9.15am–5.45pm; €6.50, €4.50 on Sun; 🌐 www.musee-moyenage.fr; M° Cluny-La Sorbonne/St-Michel), a treasure house of medieval art. The vaults of the former frigidarium are intact – though temporarily protected by corrugated sheets, pending funds for restoration – and shelter two beautiful Roman capitals, as well as some fragments from the original west front of Notre-Dame, lopped off during the French Revolution. There's more medieval sculpture throughout, including the flamboyant Gothic chapel, with its vault splaying out from a central pillar, though the real beauties are the tapestries. Conjuring up scenes from the medieval world, there are depictions of a grape harvest, a woman embroidering while her servant patiently holds the threads for her, a lover making advances and a woman in a bath which overflows into a duck pond. But the greatest wonder of all is the truly stunning La Dame à la Licorne (“The Lady with the Unicorn”). Made in the late fifteenth century, probably in Brussels, the set depicts the five senses – along with the virtue in controlling them – in six richly coloured and detailed allegoric scenes, each featuring a beautiful woman flanked by a lion and a unicorn. Excellent hour-long sessions of medieval music are held on Friday lunchtimes (12.30pm) and Saturday afternoons (4pm), and there is a great programme of evening concerts.

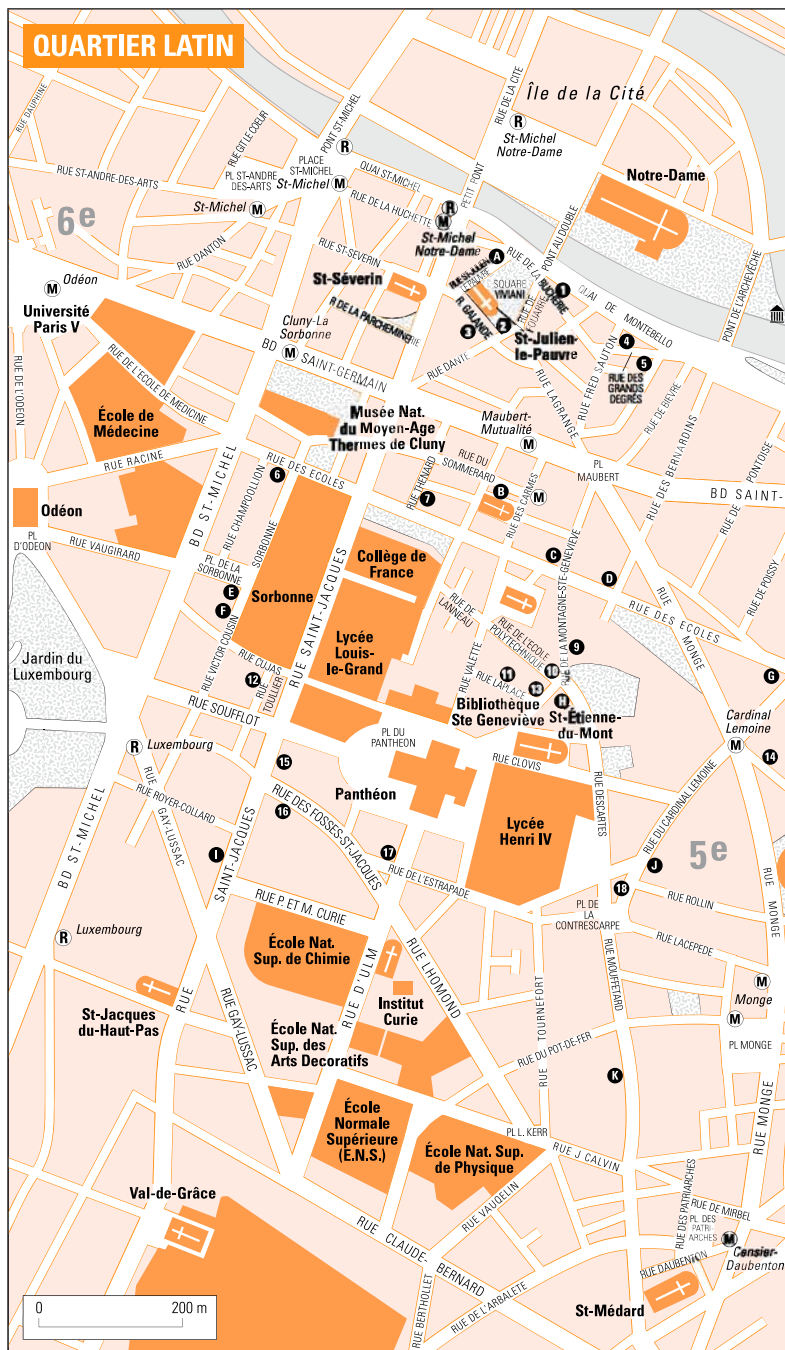

The forbidding-looking buildings on the other side of rue des Écoles are the Sorbonne, Collège de France and Lycée Louis-le-Grand, which numbers Molière, Robespierre, Sartre and Victor Hugo among its pupils. A better aspect can be found if you head up rue de la Sorbonne to the traffic-free place de la Sorbonne, overlooked by the dramatic Counter-Reformation facade of the Sorbonne's chapel, built in the 1640s by the great Cardinal Richelieu, whose

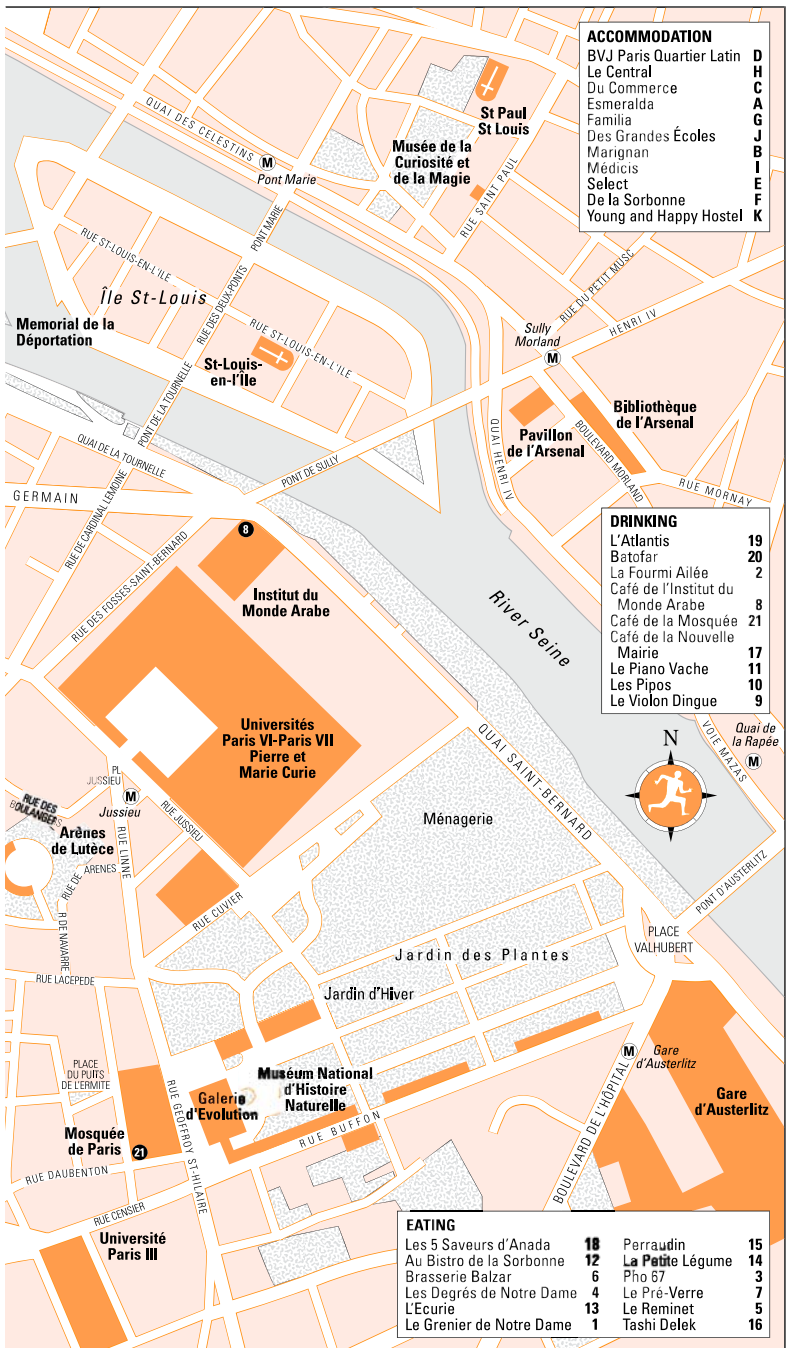

QUARTIER LATIN

1

PARIS AND AROUND

Quartier Latin

ACCOMMODATION

BVJ Paris Quartier Latin	D
Le Central	H
Du Commerce	C
Esmeralda	A
Familia	G
Des Grandes Écoles	J
Marignan	B
Médecis	I
Select	E
De la Sorbonne	F
Young and Happy Hostel	K

DRINKING

L'Atlantis	19
Batofar	20
La Fourmi Ailée	2
Café de l'Institut du Monde Arabe	8
Café de la Mosquée	21
Café de la Nouvelle Mairie	17
Le Piano Vache	11
Les Pipos	10
Le Violon Dingue	9

EATING

Les 5 Saveurs d'Anada	18	Perraudin	15
Au Bistro de la Sorbonne	12	La Petite Légume	14
Brasserie Balzar	6	Pho 67	3
Les Degrés de Notre Dame	4	Le Pré-Verre	7
L'Ecurie	13	Le Reinet	5
Le Grenier de Notre Dame	1	Tashi Delek	16

tomb it houses. With its lime trees, fountains and cafés, the square is a lovely place to sit, and you can watch the students going in and out of the Sorbonne's main gate.

1

PARIS AND AROUND

Quartier Latin

The Panthéon, St-Étienne-du-Mont and around

Further up the Montagne Ste-Geneviève, the broad rue Soufflot provides an appropriately grand perspective on the domed and porticoed Panthéon (daily: April–Sept 10am–6.30pm; Oct–March 10am–6pm; €7.50; RER Luxembourg/M° Cardinal-Lemoine), Louis XV's grateful response to Ste-Geneviève, patron saint of Paris, for curing him of illness. The Revolution transformed it into a mausoleum for the great, and the remains of giants of French culture such as Voltaire, Rousseau, Hugo and Zola are entombed in the vast, barrel-vaulted crypt below, along with Marie Curie (the only woman), writer, political adventurer and Gaullist culture minister André Malraux, and Alexandre Dumas, of musketeers fame, who was the last to be “panthéonized”, in November 2002. The interior is worth a visit for its monumental, bombastically Classical design – and to see a working model of Foucault's Pendulum swinging from the dome. The French physicist Léon Foucault devised the experiment, conducted at the Panthéon in 1851, to demonstrate vividly the rotation of the earth: while the pendulum appeared to rotate over a 24-hour period, it was in fact the earth beneath it turning. The demonstration wowed the scientific establishment and the public alike, with huge crowds turning up to watch the ground move beneath their feet.

The remains of two seventeenth-century literary giants, Pascal and Racine, alongside a few relics of Ste-Geneviève, lie in the church of St-Étienne-du-Mont, immediately behind the Panthéon on the corner of rue Clovis. The church's garbled facade conceals a stunning and highly unexpected interior. The sudden transition from flamboyant Gothic choir to sixteenth-century nave is smoothed over by a bizarre narrow catwalk which runs right round the interior, twisting down the pillars of the crossing in two spiral staircases before arching across the width of the church in the broad span of the rood screen. This last feature is highly unusual in itself, as most others in France have fallen victim to Protestant iconoclasts, reformers or revolutionaries. Exceptionally tall windows at the triforium level fill the church with light, and there is also some beautiful seventeenth-century glass in the cloister. Further down rue Clovis, a huge piece of Philippe-Auguste's twelfth-century city walls emerges from among the houses.

Place Maubert to the rue Mouffetard

North of St-Étienne-du-Mont, the villagey rue de la Montagne-Ste-Geneviève descends towards place Maubert, passing the pleasant cafés and restaurants around rue de l'École-Polytechnique. Heading uphill, rue Descartes runs into the tiny place de la Contrescarpe, once an arty hangout where Hemingway wrote – in the café La Chope – and Georges Brassens sang, but now a dog-eared student meeting-place. The ancient rue Mouffetard – rue Mouff' to locals – begins here. Most of the upper half of the street is given over to rather touristy eating places but the lower half, a cobbled lane winding downhill to the church of St-Médard, still offers a taste of the quintessentially Parisian market street that once thrived here, with a few grocers' stalls, butchers and speciality cheese shops, and a fruit-and-veg market on Tuesday and Saturday mornings.

The Paris mosque and Jardin des Plantes

A little further east, across rue Monge, are some of the city's most agreeable surprises. Just past place du Puits de l'Ermitte stand the crenellated walls of the Mosquée de Paris (daily except Fri & Muslim hols 9am–noon & 2–6pm; @ www.mosquee-de-paris.org; €3). You can walk in the sunken garden and patios with their polychrome tiles and carved ceilings, but not the prayer room. There's also a lovely, gardened tearoom (see p.170), which is open to all, and an atmospheric hamam (Turkish bath, see p.192): one of the most enjoyable things to do in this part of the city.

Behind the mosque is the Jardin des Plantes (daily: summer 8am–7.30pm; winter 8am–dusk; free; M° Austerlitz/Jussieu/Monge), which was founded as a medicinal herb garden in 1626 and gradually evolved into Paris's botanical gardens, with shady avenues of trees, lawns to sprawl on, hothouses, museums and a zoo. By the rue Cuvier exit is a fine Lebanon Cedar, planted in 1734, raised from a seed from the Oxford Botanical Gardens, and a slice of an American sequoia more than 2000 years old. In the nearby physics labs, Henri Becquerel discovered radioactivity in 1896, and two years later the Curies discovered radium.

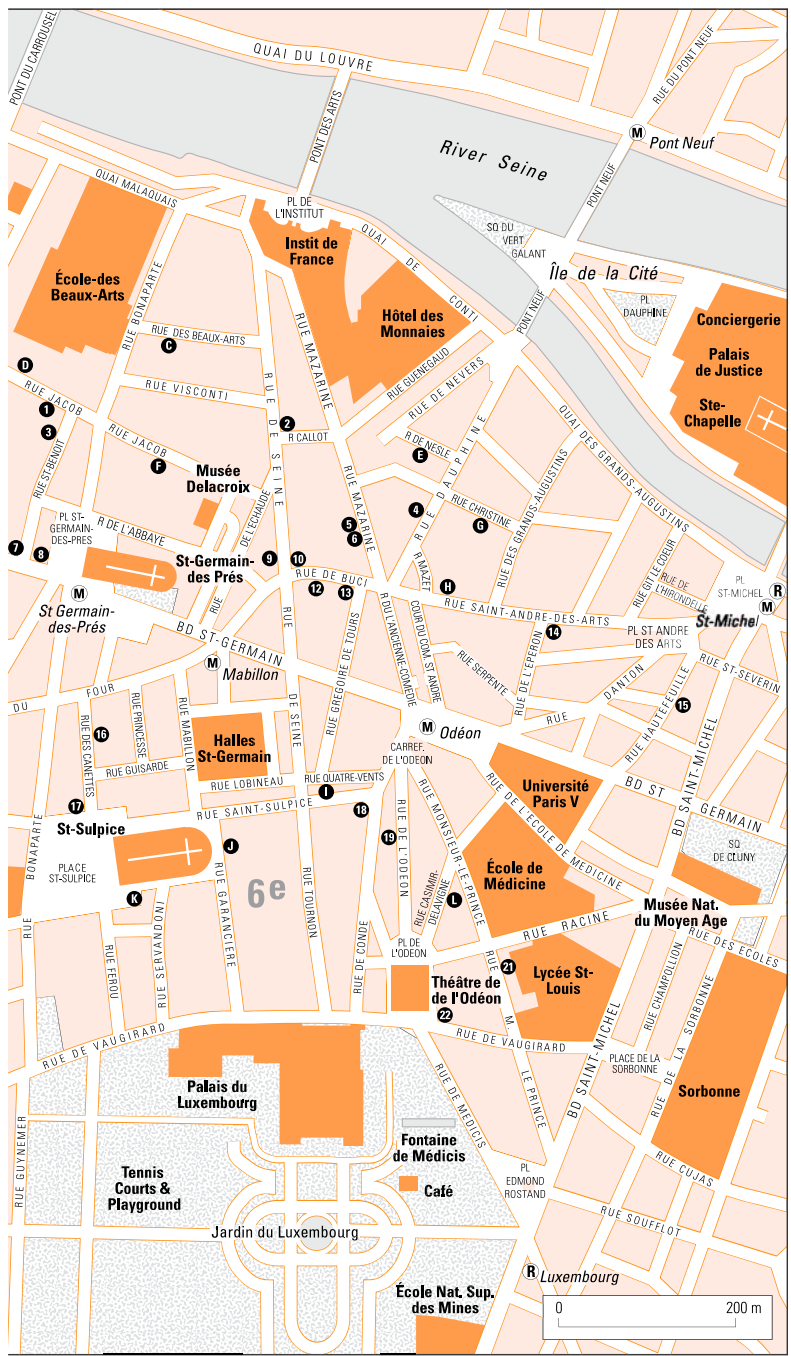

Magnificent, varied floral beds make a fine approach to the collection of buildings which form the Muséum National d'Histoire Naturelle (@ www.mnhn.fr). These musty museums of palaeontology, anatomy, mineralogy, entomology and palaeobotany should, however, be sidestepped in favour of the Grand Galerie de l'Évolution (daily except Tues 10am–6pm; €8), housed in a dramatically restored nineteenth-century glass-domed building; the entrance is off rue Buffon. The museum tells the story of evolution and the relations between human beings and nature with the aid of a huge cast of life-size animals that parade across the central space. The wow-factor may initially grab children's attention, but you'll have to look out for the translation placards to make the most of the visit.

Real animals can be seen in the small menagerie across the park to the northeast near rue Cuvier (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–6.30pm, Sun 9am–5pm; Oct–March daily 9am–5pm; €7). Founded here just after the Revolution, it is France's oldest zoo – and looks it. The old-fashioned iron cages of the big cats' fauverie, the stinky vivarium and the unkempt, glazed-in primate house are frankly depressing, though these animals are at least spared the fate of their predecessors during the starvation months of the 1870 Prussian siege. Most of the zoo is pleasantly park-like, however, and given over to deer, antelope, goats, buffaloes and other marvellous beasts that seem happy enough in their outdoor enclosures. The Microzoo allows you to inspect headlice and other minuscule wonders.

A short distance away to the northwest, with entrances in rue de Navarre, rue des Arènes and through a passage on rue Monge, is the Arènes de Lutèce, an unexpected backwater hidden from the street, and, along with the Roman baths (see p.133), Paris's only Roman remains. Once an amphitheatre for ten thousand, a few ghostly rows of stone seats now look down on old men playing boules in the sand, and benches, gardens and a kids' playground stand behind.

St-Germain

The northern half of the 6^e arrondissement, centred on place St-Germain-des-Prés, is one of the most attractive, lively and wealthy square kilometres in the city – and one of the best places to shop for clothes. The most dramatic approach is to cross the river from the Louvre by the footbridge, the Pont des Arts, from where there's a classic upstream view of the Île de la Cité, with barges moored at the quai de Conti, the Tour St-Jacques and Hôtel de Ville breaking the skyline of the Right Bank. The dome and pediment at the end of the bridge belong to the Institut de France, seat of the Académie Française, an august body of writers and scholars whose mission is to safeguard the purity of the French language. This is the most grandiose part of the Left Bank riverfront: to the left is the Hôtel des Monnaies, redesigned as the Mint in the late eighteenth century; to the right is the Beaux-Arts, the School of Fine Art, whose students throng the quais on sunny days, sketchpads on knees. More students can be found relaxing in the Jardin du Luxembourg, bordering the Quartier Latin towards the southern end of the sixième, which is one of the largest and loveliest green spaces in the city.

The riverside

The riverside chunk of the 6^e arrondissement is cut lengthwise by rue St-André-des-Arts and rue Jacob. It's an area full of bookshops, commercial art galleries, antique shops, cafés and restaurants, and if you poke your nose into the courtyards and side streets, you'll find foliage, fountains and peaceful enclaves removed from the bustle of the city. The houses are four to six storeys high, seventeenth- and eighteenth-century, some noble, some bulging and skew, all painted in infinite gradations of grey, pearl and off-white. Broadly speaking, the further west you go the posher the houses get.

Historical associations are legion: Picasso painted Guernica in rue des Grands-Augustins; Molière started his career in rue Mazarine; Robespierre et al split ideological hairs at the Café Procope in rue de l'Ancienne-Comédie. In rue Visconti, Racine died, Delacroix painted and Balzac's printing business went bust. In the parallel rue des Beaux-Arts, Oscar Wilde died, Corot and Ampère (father of amps) lived and the poet Gérard de Nerval went walking with a lobster on a lead.

If you're looking to eat, you'll find numerous places on place and rue St-André-des-Arts and along rue de Buci, up towards boulevard St-Germain. Rue de Buci preserves a strong flavour of its origins as a market street, with food shops, delis and some excellent cafés and brasseries. Before you get to rue de Buci, there is an intriguing little passage on the left, Cour du Commerce St-André, where Marat had a printing press and Dr Guillotin perfected his notorious machine by lopping off sheep's heads. A couple of smaller courtyards open off it, revealing another stretch of Philippe-Auguste's twelfth-century city wall.

A delightful corner for a quiet picnic is around rue de l'Abbaye and rue du Furstemberg. Halfway down rue du Furstemberg at no. 6, opposite a tiny square, is Delacroix's old studio. The studio backs onto a secret garden and is now the Musée Delacroix (daily except Tues 9.30am–5pm; €5), with a small collection of the artist's personal belongings as well as minor exhibitions of his work. This is also the beginning of some very upmarket shopping territory, in rue Jacob, rue de Seine and rue Bonaparte in particular.

St-Germain-des-Prés to St-Sulpice

Place St-Germain-des-Prés, the hub of the quartier, is only a stone's throw away from the Musée Delacroix, with the Deux Magots café (see p.171) on the corner of the square, Flore (see p.171) adjacent and Lipp (see p.172) across the boulevard St-Germain. All three are renowned for the number of philosophico-political-literary backsides that have shined – and continue to shine – their seats, along with plenty of celebrity-hunters. The tower opposite the Deux Magots belongs to the church of St-Germain, all that remains of an enormous Benedictine monastery. Inside, the transformation from Romanesque to early Gothic is just about visible under the heavy green and gold nineteenth-century paintwork. The last chapel on the south side contains the tomb of the philosopher René Descartes.

South of boulevard St-Germain, the streets round St-Sulpice are calm and classy. Rue Mabillon is pretty, with a row of old houses set back below the level of the modern street. On the left are the shops of the Halles St-Germain, on the site of a fifteenth-century market. Rue St-Sulpice leads through to the front of the enormous, early eighteenth-century church of St-Sulpice (daily 7.30am–7.30pm), an austere Classical building with a Doric colonnade surmounted by an Ionic, and Corinthian pilasters in the towers; uncut masonry blocks still protrude from the south tower, awaiting the sculptor's chisel. Three Delacroix murals, including one of St Michael slaying a dragon, can be seen in the first chapel on the right, but most visitors these days come to see the gnomon, a kind of solar clock whose origins and purpose were so compellingly garbled by The Da Vinci Code.

The main attractions of place St-Sulpice are the headquarters boutiques of Yves Saint Laurent Rive Gauche and agnès b, and the fashionable Café de la Mairie, with its outside tables on the sunny side of the square. All is expensive elegance in these parts, but if you're heading east towards boulevard St-Michel, the glitzy shops quickly fade into the worthy bookshops and inexpensive restaurants around the Ecole de Médecine.

Jardin du Luxembourg

The Palais du Luxembourg fronts onto rue de Vaugirard, Paris's longest street. It was constructed for Marie de Médicis, Henri IV's widow, to remind her of the Palazzo Pitti and Giardino di Boboli of her native Florence. Today, it's the seat of the French Senate and its gardens are the chief lung of the Left Bank, with formal lawns among the floral parterres dotted with trees in giant pots that are taken inside in winter. Children rent toy yachts to sail on the central round pond, but the western side is the more active area, with tennis courts (open to all-comers, though you may have to wait), donkey rides, a children's playground, chess tables that are invariably packed out, and the inevitable sandy area for boules. The puppet theatre (€4.20; call ☎01.43.26.46.47 for timings – in French) has been in the same family for the best part of a century, and still puts on enthralling shows. The quieter, wooded southeast corner ends in a miniature orchard of elaborately espaliered pear trees. The gardens get crazily crowded on summer days, when the most contested spots are the shady Fontaine de Médicis in the northeast corner, and the lawns of the southernmost strip – the only area where you're allowed to lie out on the grass. Elsewhere, you're restricted to slumping on the heavy, sage-green metal chairs, which are liberally distributed around the gravel paths.

Musée d'Orsay

On the riverfront just west of the Beaux-Arts, in a former railway station whose stone facade disguises a stunning vault of steel and glass, is the Musée-d'Orsay, at 1 rue de la Légion d'Honneur (Tues–Sun 9.30am–6pm, Thurs till 9.45pm; €7.50, Sun after 4.15pm and Thurs after 8pm €5.50, free on first Sun of the month, free to under-18s; 🌐www.musee-orsay.fr; M° Solférino/RER Musée-d'Orsay). Housing painting and sculpture from 1848 to 1914, and thus bridging the gap between the Louvre and Centre Pompidou, its highlights are the electrifying works of the Impressionists and so-called Post-Impressionists. You could spend half a day meandering through the numbered rooms in chronological order, but the layout makes it easy to confine your visit to a specific section, each of which has a very distinctive atmosphere.

The two cafés are fine – if pricey – places to take stock: the one on the upper level has a summer terrace and wonderful view of Montmartre through the giant railway clock, while the tearoom on the middle level is resplendently gilded in authentic period style.

The ground level

The ground floor, under the great glass arch, is devoted to pre-1870 work, with a double row of sculptures running down the central aisle like railway tracks, and paintings in the odd little bunkers on either side. The first set of rooms (1–3) is dedicated to Ingres, Delacroix – the bulk of whose work is in the Louvre – and the serious-minded works of the painters acceptable to the mid-nineteenth century salons; just beyond (rooms 11–13) are the relatively wacky works of Puvis de Chavannes, Gustave Moreau and the younger Degas. The influential Barbizon school and the Realists are showcased on the Seine side (rooms 4–7), with canvases by Daumier, Corot, Millet and Courbet. Just a few steps away, room 14 explodes with the early controversies of Monet's violently light-filled Femmes au Jardin (1867) and Manet's provocative Olympia (1863), which heralded the arrival of Impressionism.

The upper level

To continue chronologically you have to go straight to the upper level, done up like a suite of attic studios, where you pass first through the private collection donated by Étienne Moreau-Nélaton (room 29). An assiduous collector and art historian, his collection contains some of the most famous Impressionist images: Monet's Poppies, as well as Manet's Déjeuner sur l'Herbe, which sent the critics into apoplexies of rage and disgust when it appeared in 1863, and was refused for that year's Salon. From this point on, you'll have to fight off a persistent sense of familiarity or recognition – Degas' L'Absinthe, Renoir's Bal du Moulin de la Galette, Monet's Femme à l'Ombrelle – in order to appreciate Impressionism's vibrant, experimental vigour. There's a host of small-scale landscapes and outdoor scenes by Renoir, Sisley, Pissarro and Monet, paintings which owed much of their brilliance to the novel practice of setting up easels in the open to capture the light. Less typical works include Degas' ballet-dancers, which demonstrate his principal interest in movement and line as opposed to the more common Impressionist concern with light, and Le Berceau (1872), by Berthe Morisot, the first woman to join the early Impressionists. More heavyweight masterpieces can be found in rooms 34 and 39, devoted to Monet and Renoir in their middle and late periods – the development of Monet's obsession with light is shown with five of his Rouen Cathedral series, each painted in different light conditions. Room 35 is full of the fervid colours and disturbing rhythms of Van Gogh, while Cézanne, another step removed from the preoccupations of the mainstream Impressionists, is wonderfully represented in room 36: one of the canvases most revealing of his art is Pommes et Oranges (1895–1900), in which the background abandons perspective while the fruit has an extraordinary solidity.

Passing the café – with a summer terrace and a wonderful view of Montmartre through the giant railway clock – you arrive at a dimly lit, melancholy chamber (40) devoted to pastels by Redon, Manet, Mondrian and others. The next and final suite of rooms on this level is given over to the various offspring of Impressionism, and has an edgier, more modern feel, with a much greater emphasis on psychology. It begins with Rousseau's dreamlike La Charmeuse de Serpent (1907) and continues past Gauguin's ambivalent Tahitian paintings to Pointillist works by Seurat (the famous Cirque), Signac and others, ending with Toulouse-Lautrec at his caricatural nightclubbing best.

The middle level

Don't miss the covetable little Kaganovitch collection (rooms 49 & 50) on your way down to the middle level, where the flow of the painting section continues with Vuillard and Bonnard (rooms 71 & 72), tucked away behind Pompon's irresistible sculpture of a polar bear on the rue de Lille side of the railway chamber. On the far side, in rooms 55 and 58 overlooking the Seine, you can see a less familiar side of late nineteenth-century painting, with epic, naturalist works such as Detaille's stirring Le Rêve (1888) and Cormon's Caïn (1880), as well as a troubling handful of Symbolist paintings from artists as diverse as Munch, Klimt and Odilon Redon (rooms 59 & 60). On the parallel sculpture terraces, nineteenth-century marbles on the Seine side face early twentieth-century pieces across the divide, while the Rodin terrace bridging the two puts almost everything else to shame. Those visitors with energy to spare should head straight for the last half-dozen rooms, which contain superb Art Nouveau furniture and objets.

The Trocadéro, Eiffel Tower and the Septième

As examples of landmark architecture, the Palais de Tokyo and Palais de Chaillot are hard to love. These twin white elephants have long given the heights of the Trocadéro, on the north bank of the river, a forlorn air, but in recent years some exciting new museums and galleries have brought both palaces back to life. You can also enjoy the splendid view of the Eiffel Tower, across the river. The area at the tower's feet, to the east, is the septième (7^e) arrondissement, worth exploring for the classy, villagey shops and restaurants around the rue Cler. Much of the rest of the quarter is dominated by monumental military and government buildings, most domineeringly the École Militaire and Hôtel des Invalides. The latter houses an impressive war museum and, appropriately enough, the tomb of Napoleon. Tucked away in the streets to the east, towards St-Germain, the Musée Rodin and Musée Maillol show off the two sculptors' works in the intimate surroundings of handsome private houses.

The Palais de Chaillot and Palais de Tokyo

The stupendously ugly Palais de Chaillot was built in 1937, although on the strength of its bastardized Modernist-Classical architecture you'd think it dated from the height of Fascist occupation. An anthropologically themed Musée de l'Homme clings on in the west wing, along with the Musée de la Marine (daily except Tues 10am–6pm; €8, or €6.50 when there's no exhibition), which traces French naval history using models of ships and their accoutrements. The east wing of the palace is occupied by the Théâtre National de Chaillot, with a programme of popular theatre and contemporary dance. At the time of writing, it was about to be joined by the new Cité de l'Architecture et du Patrimoine (see @ www.citechaillot.org for opening hours), a combined institute, library and museum of architecture. The top floor of the museum focuses on the modern and contemporary, with models, designs and a reconstruction of an entire apartment from Le Corbusier's Cité Radieuse, in Marseille. On the vaulted level below, the Galerie des Moulages displays giant-sized plastercasts taken from great French buildings at the end of the nineteenth century, telling the story of national architecture from the Middle Ages through to the nineteenth century. The Galerie des Peintures Murales, on the top floor of the central Pavillon de Tête, features full-scale copies of great French frescoes and wall-paintings. Two rooftop terraces give superb views across the river to the Eiffel Tower.

TROCADÉRO, EIFFEL TOWER AND THE SEPTIÈME

The Palais de Tokyo, contemporary with Chaillot, and nearby on avenue du Président-Wilson, has long housed the Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris (Tues–Fri except public hols 10am–5.45pm, Sat & Sun 10am–6.45pm; free; M° Iéna/Alma-Marceau). The building is somewhat chilly but offers a perfect Modernist setting for the museum's strong early twentieth-century collection. Artists such as Braque, Chagall, Delaunay, Derain, Léger and Picasso are particularly well represented, thanks largely to the fact that so many of them lived and worked in Paris. Many of the works were expressly chosen for their Parisian themes, so while the collection can't rival the Beaubourg's for prestige, it makes for a particularly fascinating visit. The enormous, marvellous centrepieces are Matisse's La Danse de Paris; and Dufy's mural, La Fée Électricité, which was commissioned by the electricity board and illustrates the story of electricity from Aristotle to the then-modern power station in 250 lyrical, colourful panels filling three entire walls.

The artfully semi-derelict western wing of the palace has been taken over by the Site de Création Contemporaine (Tues–Sun noon–midnight; €6; @www.palaisdetokyo.com), a cutting-edge gallery that focuses exclusively on present-day contemporary art. A constant flow of exhibitions and events – anything from a show by Paris-born Louise Bourgeois to a temporary “occupation” by squatter-artists – keeps the atmosphere lively, and on Saturday nights after dusk there's even a show of “fire arts” (fire-eating, fire-juggling and more) by the aptly named Burn Crew Concept. Curiously, the design of the trendy café's floor, the giant photo-portrait windows and the neighbourhood garden down the palace's western side, on rue de la Manutention, are the only permanent works of art in the collection.

Just beyond the Palais de Tokyo, on place de l'Alma, a replica of the flame from the Statue of Liberty – given to France in 1987 as a symbol of Franco-American relations – has been adopted by mourners from all over the world as a memorial to Princess Diana, following her fatal car crash in the adjacent underpass. You can still see the odd bunch of flowers, or graffiti messages along the lines of “Mexico love you Diana”.

The Eiffel Tower

It's hard to believe that the Eiffel Tower, the quintessential symbol both of Paris and of the brilliance of industrial engineering, was designed to be a temporary structure. Late nineteenth-century Europe had a decadent taste for such giant-scale, colonialist-capitalist extravaganzas, but the 1889 Exposition – for which it was built – was particularly ambitious, and when completed the tower was the tallest building in the world, at 300m. Reactions were violent. Outraged critics protested “in the name of menaced French art and history” against this “useless and monstrous” tower. “Is Paris”, they asked, “going to be associated with the grotesque, mercantile imaginings of a constructor of machines?”

Curiously, Paris's most famous landmark was only saved from demolition by the sudden need for “wireless telegraphy” aerials in the first decade of the twentieth century. The tower's role in telecommunications – its only function apart from tourism – has become increasingly important, and the original crown is now masked by an efflorescence of antennae. Over the last century, the tower has needed few structural adjustments, but it has seen some surprising cosmetic changes: the original deep-red paint-scheme has been covered up with a sombre, dusty-chocolate brown since the late 1960s – at least Paris is spared the canary yellow that covered the tower for some of the 1890s. In the 1980s the tower was given a new system of illumination from within its superstructure, and for the millennium celebrations a fireworks spectacular transformed it into a gargantuan space rocket. A giant searchlight, added at the same time, still sweeps the skies from the top of the tower, making it look like some monstrous urban lighthouse, and after dusk thousands of effervescent lights fizz maniacally all over the structure for the first ten minutes of every hour – an effect well worth seeing from a distant vantage point.

△ The Eiffel Tower

Going up (daily: mid-June to Aug 9am–12.45am; Sept to mid-June 9.30am–11.45pm) costs €11 for the top, €7.70 for the second level (or €3.80 by the stairs) and €4.20 for the first level. Note that access to the upward-bound lifts stops 45 minutes before closing time, and you'll need to arrive up to an hour and 45 minutes before closing time if you plan to make it all the way to the top level; note, too, that the stairs close at 6.30pm from September to mid-June. Paris looks surreally microscopic from the top, and the views are almost better from the second level, especially on hazier days, but there's something irresistible about taking the lift all the way.

Stretching back from the legs of the Eiffel Tower, the long rectangular gardens of the Champs de Mars lead to the eighteenth-century buildings of the École Militaire, originally founded in 1751 by Louis XV for the training of aristocratic army officers, and attended by Napoleon, among other fledgling leaders. The surrounding quartier may be expensive and sought after as an address, but it's mostly uninspiring to visit.

The riverside

A short distance upstream of the Eiffel Tower, on quai Branly, stands the gleamingly new Musée du Quai Branly (Tues, Wed & Fri–Sun 10am–6.30pm, Thurs 10am–9.30pm; €8.50, free on first Sun of month; www.quaibrandy.fr). It brings together hundreds of thousands of non-European cultural or art objects bought or purloined by France at various times. The whole project is the child of President Chirac's passion for what he would no doubt call arts primitifs or arts premiers – though these terms were deemed too controversial to use in the museum's name. Presidential backing helped secure funding for the frankly princely museum building, a futuristic glass edifice on stilts by the French state's favourite architect, Jean Nouvel. Don't miss the huge terrace with its view of the Eiffel Tower, the garden or the unmistakable "wall of vegetation". Setting aside the rather dubious politics of excluding Western art, the 3500 objects on display at any one time are as fascinating as they are beautiful, and the museum has gone to some length to explain their cultural, and often ritual, contexts. Four separate areas are devoted to Asia, Africa, the Americas and the Pacific ("Oceania").

Just beyond, opposite the Pont d'Alma on the northeast side of the busy junction of place de la Résistance, is the entrance to the sewers, or les égouts (Mon–Wed, Sat & Sun: May–Sept 11am–5pm; Oct–April 11am–4pm; €4). Once you're underground it's dark, damp and noisy from the gushing water, though the main exhibition, which runs along a gantry walk poised above a main sewer, turns the history of the city's water supply and waste management into a surprisingly fascinating topic. Children, however, may be disappointed to find that it's not all that smelly.

A little further upstream still, the American Church on quai d'Orsay, together with the American College nearby at 31 av Bosquet, is a focal point in the well-organized life of Paris's large American community. The noticeboard is usually plastered with job and accommodation offers and queries. Immediately to the south lies a chi chi, a village wedge of early nineteenth-century streets. This tiny neighbourhood, between rue St-Dominique and rue de Grenelle, is full of appealingly bijou shops, hotels and restaurants, with the lively market street of rue Cler at the centre of it all.

Les Invalides

The Esplanade des Invalides, striking due south from Pont Alexandre III, is a more attractive vista than the one from the Palais de Chaillot to the École Militaire. The proud dome and heavy facade of the Hôtel des Invalides, built as a home for soldiers on the orders of Louis XIV, looms at the further end of the Esplanade. Under the dome are two churches, one for the soldiers, the other intended as a mausoleum for the king but now containing the mortal remains of Napoleon.

Les Invalides today houses the vast Musée de l'Armée (daily except the first Mon of every month: April–Sept 10am–6pm, Oct–March 10am–5pm; €7.50 ticket also valid for the Église du Dôme and Musée des Plans-Reliefs), an enormous national war museum whose most interesting wing, reached via the south entrance beside the Église du Dôme, is devoted to Général de Gaulle and World War II. The battles, the resistance and the slow liberation are documented through imaginatively displayed war memorabilia combined with stirring reels of contemporary footage, most of which have an English-language option. One leaves with the distinct impression that de Gaulle was personally responsible for the liberation of France. The beautiful collection of medieval and Renaissance armour in the west wing of the royal courtyard is well worth admiring, but the core of the museum, dedicated to the history of the French army from Louis XIV up to the 1870s, is closed for restoration until at least 2008.

Up under the roof of the east wing, the super-scale models of French ports and fortified cities in the Musée des Plans-Reliefs (same hours and ticket as Musée de l'Armée, above), are crying out for a few miniature armies. Essentially giant three-dimensional maps, they were created to plan defences or plot potential artillery positions. The eerie green glow of their landscapes only just illuminates the long, tunnel-like attic; the effect is rather chilling.

The two Invalides churches have separate entrances. The lofty Église des Soldats (free; entrance from main courtyard of Les Invalides) is the spiritual home of the French army. The walls are hung with almost one hundred enemy standards captured on the battlefield, the rump of a collection of some three thousand that once adorned Notre-Dame. The proud simplicity of this "Soldiers' Church" stands in stark contrast to the lavish Église du Dôme (same hours and ticket as Musée de l'Armée above; entrance from south side of Les Invalides), which lies on the other side of a dividing glass wall – a design innovation that allowed worshippers to share the same high altar without the risk of coming into social contact. The domed "Royal church" is a supreme example of the architectural pomposity of Louis XIV's day, with grandiose frescoes and an abundance of Corinthian columns and pilasters. Napoleon, or rather his ashes, lies in a hole in the floor in a cold, smooth sarcophagus of red porphyry, installed there on December 14, 1840. Freshly returned from St Helena, his remains were carried through the streets from the newly completed Arc de Triomphe to the Invalides. As many as half a million people came out to watch the emperor's last journey, and Victor Hugo commented that "it felt as if the whole of Paris had been poured to one side of the city, like liquid in a vase which has been tilted".

Musée Rodin and Musée Maillol

Immediately east of Les Invalides is the Musée Rodin, on the corner of rue de Varenne (Tues–Sun: April–Sept 9.30am–5.45pm, garden closes 6.45pm; Oct–March 9.30am–4.45pm, garden closes 5pm; house and gardens €7, garden only €1; @www.musee-rodin.fr; M° Varenne), elegantly presented in a beautiful eighteenth-century mansion which the sculptor leased from the state in return for the gift of all his work at his death. Major projects like The Burglers of Calais, The Thinker, The Gate of Hell and Ugolini and Son are exhibited in the garden – the latter forming the centrepiece of the ornamental pond. Indoors, which is usually very crowded, are well-loved works like The Kiss and The Hand of God. There's something particularly fascinating about works such as Romeo and Juliet and The Centaur, which seem only half-created, not wholly liberated from their raw blocks of stone.

The rest of rue de Varenne and the parallel rue de Grenelle is full of aristocratic mansions, including the Hôtel Matignon, the prime minister's residence. At 61 rue de Grenelle, a handsome eighteenth-century house has been turned into the Musée Maillol (daily except Tues 11am–6pm; €8; @www.museemaillo.com; M° Rue-du-Bac), overstuffed with Aristide Maillol's endlessly buxom sculpted female nudes, copies of which can be seen to better effect in the Louvre's Jardin du Carrousel. His paintings follow a similar theme, and there are also minor works by contemporaries like Matisse, Dufy, Bonnard, Picasso, Degas, Gauguin and Kandinsky.

From here, rue du Bac leads south to rue de Sèvres, cutting across rue de Babylone, another of the quartier's livelier streets, with the rich man's folly of La Pagode at no. 57bis. The building was brought over from Japan at the turn of the century and long used as an arts cinema; it has been recently renovated, with a café in the Japanese garden inside.

Montparnasse and southern Paris

The entertainment nexus of Montparnasse divides the well-heeled opinion-formers and powerbrokers of St-Germain and the 7^e from the relatively anonymous populations to the south. The three arrondissements to the south have suffered from large-scale housing developments, most notably along the riverfronts to both east and west, but villagey areas such as rue du Commerce in the 15^e, Pernety in the 14^e and the Buttes-aux-Cailles in the 13^e are well worth a foray. On the fringes of the city proper, hard up against the périphérique ring-road, are three fantastic parks: André Citroën, Georges-Brassens and Montsouris.

Like other Left Bank quartiers, Montparnasse trades on its association with the wild characters of the inter-war artistic and literary boom. Many were habitués of the cafés Select, Coupole, Dôme, Rotonde and Closerie des Lilas. The cafés are all still going strong on boulevard du Montparnasse, while the glitterati have mostly ended up in the nearby Montparnasse cemetery. The quarter's artistic traditions are maintained in a couple of second-tier, but fascinating, art museums, while elsewhere in Montparnasse you can ascend the Tour Montparnasse, Paris's first and ugliest skyscraper, and descend into the bone-lined catacombs.

Around Montparnasse station

Most of the life of the quarter is concentrated between the junction with boulevard Raspail, where Rodin's Balzac broods over the traffic, and at the station end of boulevard du Montparnasse, where the colossal Tour du Montparnasse has become one of the city's principal and most despised landmarks. Although central Paris is more distant, the view from the top is better than the one from the Eiffel Tower in that it includes the Eiffel Tower – and excludes the Tour du Montparnasse. It also costs less to ascend (April–Sept daily 9.30am–11pm; Oct–March Mon–Thurs & Sun 9.30am–10pm, Fri & Sat 9.30am–10.30pm; €9). Alternatively, you could sit down for an expensive drink in the 56th-storey bar, from where you get a tremendous view westwards.

One block northwest of the tower, on rue Antoine-Bourdelle, a garden of sculptures invites you into the Musée Bourdelle (Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; €4.50), which has been built around the sculptor's atmospheric old studio. As Rodin's pupil and Giacometti's teacher, Bourdelle's bronze and stone works move from a naturalistic style – as in the wonderful series of Beethoven busts – towards a more geometric, Modernist style, seen in his better-known, monumental sculptures.

Montparnasse station was once the great arrival and departure point for travellers heading across the Atlantic, a connection commemorated in the extraordinary Jardin Atlantique, a sizeable park that the city planners have actually suspended on top of the train tracks. Hemmed in by cliff-like high-rise apartment blocks, the park is a wonderful example of French design. There's a field of Atlantic-coast grasses, wave-like undulations in the lawns, a giant sundial and thermometer – which broke in the heatwave of 2003 when it exceeded its maximum – and a grid through which you can look down on the platforms below.

Montparnasse cemetery, the catacombs and the Observatoire

Just south of boulevard Edgar-Quinet (which has a good street market and cafés full of traders) is the main entrance to the Montparnasse cemetery

(mid-March to Oct Mon–Fri 8am–6pm, Sat 8.30am–6pm, Sun 9am–6pm; Nov to mid-March closes at 5.30pm), a gloomy city of the dead, with ranks of miniature temples, dreary and bizarre, and plenty of illustrious names, from Baudelaire to Beckett and Gainsbourg to Saint-Saëns. The joint grave of Jean-Paul Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir lies immediately right of the main entrance. In the southwest corner is an old windmill, one of the seventeenth-century taverns frequented by the carousing, versifying students who caused the district to be named after Mount Parnassus, the legendary home of the muses of poetry and song, and of Bacchus's drunken revels. Hidden away in the northern corner of the cemetery, on the east side of rue Emile-Richard, a tomb is poignantly crowned with a version of Brancusi's sculpture, The Kiss.

If you're determined to spend time among the dead, you can also get down into the catacombs (Tues–Sun 10am–4pm; €5) in nearby place Denfert-Rochereau, formerly place d'Enfer (Hell Square). The catacombs are abandoned quarries stacked with millions of bones, which were cleared from overstocked charnel houses and cemeteries between 1785 and 1871. Lining the passageway, the long thigh bones are stacked end-on, forming a wall to keep in the smaller bones, which can just be seen heaped higgledy-piggledy behind. These high femoral walls are further inset with skulls and plaques carrying macabre quotations such as “happy is he who always has the hour of his death in front of his eyes, and readies himself every day to die”. Older children often love the whole experience, but there are a good couple of kilometres to walk, and it can quickly become claustrophobic in the extreme, and cold.

Rue Schoelcher and boulevard Raspail, on the east side of the cemetery, have some interesting examples of twentieth-century architecture, from Art Nouveau to contemporary facades of glass in the Cartier Foundation at 259 bd Raspail (Tues–Sun noon–8pm; €6.50). Built in 1994 by Jean Nouvel, Parisian architect of the moment, this presents all kinds of contemporary art – installations, videos, multimedia – in high-quality temporary exhibitions. About 500m to the northeast, on avenue de l'Observatoire, the classical Observatoire de Paris sat on France's zero meridian line from the 1660s, when it was constructed, until 1884. After that date, they reluctantly agreed that 0° longitude should pass through a small village in Normandy that happens to be due south of Greenwich. You can see one of the bronze markers of the “Arago line” – which has nothing to do with any mystical “rose line”, notwithstanding the claims of a certain best-selling conspiracy thriller – set into the cobbles of the observatory's courtyard.

The 15^e arrondissement

The western edge of the 15^e arrondissement fronts the Seine from the Porte de Javel to the Eiffel Tower. From Pont Mirabeau northwards, the riverbank is marred by a sort of mini-Défense development of half-cocked futuristic towers with pretentious galactic names, rising out of a litter-blown pedestrian platform some 10m above street level. Far pleasanter riverside strolling is to be had on the narrow midstream island, the Allée des Cygnes, which you can reach from the Pont de Grenelle. A scaled-down version of the Statue of Liberty stands at the downstream end. South of Pont Mirabeau, between rue Balard and the river, is the city's newest park, the hyper-designed Parc André-Citroën (M° Balard), so named because the site used to be the Citroën motor works. Its best features are the glasshouses full of exotic-smelling shrubs, the dancing fountains – which bolder park-goers run through on hot days – and the tethered balloon (fine days only: 9am to roughly one hour before dusk; Mon–Fri €10, Sat & Sun €12), which offers eye-wateringly spectacular views.

It was in the rue du Commerce, running down the middle of the arrondissement from M° La Motte Piquet-Grenelle, that George Orwell worked as a dishwasher, an experience described in Down and Out in Paris and London. These days it's a lively, old-fashioned high street full of small shops and peeling, shuttered houses, with one fine old brasserie, the Café du Commerce (see p.179). Towards the end of the street is place du Commerce, with a bandstand in the middle, a model of old-fashioned petit-bourgeois respectability.

The other park in the 15^e, the Parc Georges-Brassens, lies in the south-east corner (M° Convention/Porte-de-Vanves). It's a delight, with a garden of scented herbs and shrubs (best in late spring) designed principally for blind and visually impaired visitors, puppets and rocks and merry-go-rounds for kids, a mountain stream with pine and birch trees, beehives and a tiny terraced vineyard. The corrugated pyramid with a helter-skelter-like spiral is the Silvia-Montfort theatre.

On the west side of the park, in a secluded garden in passage Dantzig, off rue Dantzig, stands an unusual polygonal building known as La Ruche. Home to Fernand Léger, Modigliani, Chagall, Soutine and many other artists at the start of the century, it's still used by creative types. In the sheds of the old horse market between the park and rue Brançon, a book market is held every Saturday and Sunday morning.

The 14^e below Montparnasse

The jokey quasi-Classical Ricardo Bofill apartment complex around place de Catalogne gives way to a walkway along the old rue Vercingétorix and to the cosy district of Pernety, which was long an artists' haunt. Wandering around Cité Bauer, rue des Thermopyles and rue Didot reveals adorable houses, secluded courtyards and quiet mews, and on the corner of rue du Moulin Vert and rue Hippolyte-Maindron you'll find Giacometti's old ramshackle studio and home. There are more artistic associations south of rue d'Alésia near the junction with avenue René-Coty: Dalí, Lurcat, Miller and Durrell lived in the tiny cobbled street of Villa Seurat off rue de la Tombe-Isoire; Lenin and his wife lodged across the street at 4 rue Marie-Rose; Le Corbusier built the studio at 53 av Reille, close to the secretive and verdant square du Montsouris which links with rue Nansouty; and Georges Braque's home was in the cul-de-sac now named after him off this street.

All these characters would have taken strolls in Parc Montsouris (RER Cité-Universitaire). Along with a lake and waterfall, its more surprising features include a meteorological office, a marker of the old meridian line, near boulevard Jourdan, and, by the southwest entrance, a kiosk run by the French Astronomy Association. The strange array of buildings across the boulevard from the park form the Cité Universitaire, home to several thousand students from over one hundred different countries.

The 13^e arrondissement

The 13^e is one of the most disparate areas of the city. Place d'Italie, with the ornate mairie and vast new Gaumont cinema, is the hub, with each of the major roads radiating out into very different quartiers. Avenue des Gobelins, leading north, has the Gobelins tapestry workshops at no. 42 (guided visits in French only: Tues–Thurs at 2pm & 2.45pm; €8; 🌐 www.gobelins.fr; M° Les Gobelins), which have operated here for some four hundred years. Tapestries are still being made by the same painfully slow methods, but are now based on drawings by contemporary painters. Almost all of the dozen or so works completed each year are destined for French government offices.

Between boulevard Auguste-Blanqui and rue Bobillot is the lively hilltop quarter of the Butte-aux-Cailles. If you're looking for unpretentious, youthful and vaguely lefty restaurants and nightlife, it's well worth the short métro ride out from the centre. The easiest route is to walk up rue Bobillot from place d'Italie.

Over to the east, in the middle of a swathe of high-rise social housing, is the Chinese quarter of Paris. Avenues de Choisy and d'Ivry are full of Vietnamese, Chinese, Thai, Cambodian and Laotian restaurants and food shops, as is Les Olympiades, a weird semi-derelict pedestrian area seemingly suspended between giant tower blocks.

Following rue Tolbiac or boulevard Vincent-Auriol to the river, you reach the entirely new district of Paris Rive Gauche, whose star attraction is the Bibliothèque Nationale de France. Accessible from its northern and southern corners (M° Quai-de-la-Gare or Bibliothèque-François-Mitterrand), it has four enormous towers – intended to look like open books – framing a huge platform surrounding a sunken pine copse with glass walls that allow light to filter through to the underground library spaces. Architect Dominique Perrault's design attracted widespread derision after shutters had to be added to the towers to protect the books and manuscripts from sunlight. There are occasional small-scale exhibitions, and the reading rooms on the “haut-jardin” level are open to everyone over 16 (Tues–Sat 10am–8pm, Sun 1–7pm; €3.30 for a day pass; @www.bnf.fr); the garden level is reserved for accredited researchers only.

From the Bibliothèque Nationale down to the boulevard périphérique, almost every stick of street furniture and square metre of tarmac is shiny and new. The still-underpopulated cafés and apartment blocks give the area a futuristic frontier-town feel that's perfectly represented in the form of the Passerelle Bercy-Tolbiac, a €21-million footbridge that crosses the Seine in a hyper-modern double-ribbon structure. Between the bridge and the Pont de Tolbiac, several barges have made the area a nightlife attraction in its own right (see p.181). Just west of the library, near métro Chevaleret, a few small but cutting-edge art galleries have sprung up on and around rue Louise Weiss. Immediately south of rue Tolbiac, the giant, decaying warehouse of Les Frigos was once used for cold-storage of meat and fish destined for Les Halles, but was taken over immediately after the market's closure by artists and musicians. It has been run as an anarchic studio space ever since, with open-door exhibitions once or twice a year, a bar-restaurant for the artists and an on-site gallery.

The Beaux Quartiers and Bois de Boulogne

Commonly referred to as the Beaux Quartiers, Paris's well-manicured western arrondissements, the 16^e and 17^e, are mainly residential with few specific sights, the chief exception being the Musée Marmottan, with its dazzling collection of late Monets. The most rewarding areas for exploration are the old villages of Passy, whose tranquillity attracted writers and artists such as Balzac and Berthe Morisot, and Auteuil. Both were incorporated into the city in the late nineteenth century and soon became very desirable districts. Well-to-do Parisians commissioned houses here, and as a result, the area is rich in fine examples of architecture, notably by Hector Guimard and Le Corbusier. Bordering the area to the west is the Bois de Boulogne, with its trees, lakes, cycling trails and the beautiful floral displays of the Parc de Bagatelle. Further west, modern architecture comes bang up to date with the gleaming skyscrapers of the purpose-built commercial district of La Défense, dominated by the enormous Grande Arche.

Auteuil

The Auteuil district is now an integral part of the city, but there's still a village-like feel about its streets, and it has some attractive villas (leafy lanes of old houses, fronted with English-style gardens), not to mention fine Art Nouveau buildings by Hector Guimard – there's a concentration on rue de la Fontaine (M° Église-d'Auteuil), including the exuberantly decorated Castel Béranger at no. 14. If the bulgy curves of Art Nouveau aren't for you, head up rue du Dr-Blanche for the cool, rectilinear lines of Le Corbusier's first private houses (they date from 1923), in a cul-de-sac to the right, looked after by the Fondation Le Corbusier. You can visit one of the houses, the Villa Roche (Mon 1.30–6pm, Tues–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, till 5pm on Fri, Sat 10am–5pm; closed Aug; €2.50). Built in a very plain, strictly Cubist style with windows in bands, the only extravagance is the raising of one wing on piers and a curved frontage. The houses look commonplace enough from the outside, but were a big contrast to anything that had gone before and, once you're inside, the spatial play still seems ground-breaking.

After taking a left at the northern end of rue du Dr-Blanche, then right on boulevard Beauséjour, use the short cut immediately opposite rue du Ranelagh across the disused Petite Ceinture train line to reach avenue Raphaël, from where it's a pleasant walk along the shady trees of the pretty, green-lawned Jardin du Ranelagh to the Musée Marmottan, 2 rue Louis-Boilly (Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; €7; M° Muette), which showcases Impressionist works. There's a dazzling collection of canvases from Monet's last years at Giverny, including several Nymphéas (Water Lilies), as well as his canvas entitled Impression, Soleil Levant (Impression, Sunrise), an 1872 rendering of a misty sunrise over Le Havre, whose title the critics usurped to give the Impressionist movement its name. The collection also features some of his contemporaries – Manet, Renoir and Berthe Morisot.

Bois de Boulogne

The Bois de Boulogne (M° Porte-Maillot) is an area of extensive parkland running down the west side of the 16^e. The “bois” of the name is somewhat deceptive, though it does contain some remnants of the once great Forêt de Rouvray. Once the playground of the wealthy, it also established a reputation as the site of the sex trade and its associated crime. The same is true today and you should avoid it at night. By day, however, the park is an extremely pleasant spot for a stroll.

The best, and wildest, part for walking is towards the southwest corner. Bikes are available for rent at the entrance to the Jardin d'Acclimatation adventure park (see p.193) and you can go boating on the Lac Inférieur. One of the main attractions is the Parc de Bagatelle (bus #244 from M° Porte-Maillot, or bus #43 from M° Pont-de-Neuilly), which features beautiful displays of tulips, hyacinths and daffodils in the first half of April, irises in May, water lilies and roses at the end of June.

La Défense

An impressive complex of gleaming skyscrapers, La Défense (M°/RER Grande-Arche-de-la-Défense) is Paris's prestige business district and a monument to late twentieth-century capitalism. Its most popular attraction is the huge Grande Arche, an astounding 112-metre hollow cube clad in white marble, standing 6km out from the Arc de Triomphe at the far end of the Voie Triomphale. Suspended within its hollow – which could enclose Notre-Dame with ease – are open lift shafts and a “cloud” canopy. You can take a lift up to the roof (daily 10am–7pm; €7.50) and, on a clear day, scan to the Louvre and beyond, though the view from the bottom of the arch is nearly as good.

Montmartre and northern Paris

Perched on Paris's highest hill, towards the northern edge of the city, Montmartre was famously the home and playground of artists such as Renoir, Degas, Picasso and Toulouse-Lautrec. The crown of the Butte Montmartre, around place du Tertre, is overrun with tourists these days, but the steep streets around Abbesses métro preserve an attractively festive, village-like atmosphere – and seem to become more gentrified and more fashionable every year. Pigalle, by contrast, at the southern foot of the Butte, remains brassy and seedy, while the Goutte d'Or, to the east, is vibrantly multi-ethnic. Out at the northern city limits, the mammoth St-Ouen market hawks everything from extravagant antiques to the cheapest flea-market hand-me-downs.

Place des Abbesses and up to the Butte

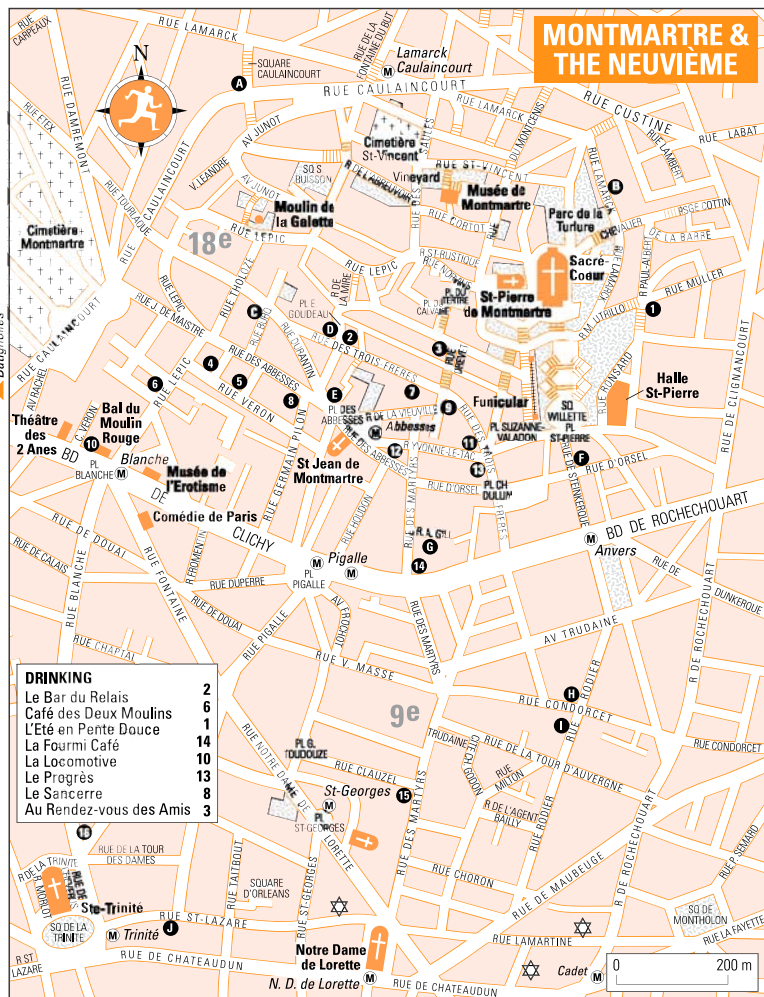

In spite of being one of the city's chief tourist attractions, the Butte Montmartre manages to retain the quiet, almost secretive, air of its rural origins. The most popular access route is via the rue de Steinkerque and the steps below the Sacré-Coeur (the funicular railway from place Suzanne-Valadon is covered by normal métro tickets). For a quieter approach, go up via place des Abbesses or rue Lepic.

Place des Abbesses is postcard-pretty, with one of the few complete surviving Guimard métro entrances. To the east, at the Chapelle des Auxiliatrices in rue Yvonne-Le-Tac, Ignatius Loyola founded the Jesuit movement in 1534. It's also supposed to be the place where St-Denis, the first bishop of Paris, had his head chopped off by the Romans around 250 AD. He is said to have carried it until he dropped, where the cathedral of St-Denis now stands north of the city. Today, the streets are full of trendy boutique clothes shops and laid-back restaurants.

Continuing from place des Abbesses to the top of the Butte, two quiet and attractive routes are up rue de la Vieuville and the stairs in rue Drevet to the minuscule place du Calvaire, with a lovely view back over the city, or up rue Tholozé, then right below the Moulin de la Galette – the last survivor of Montmartre's forty-odd windmills, immortalized by Renoir – into rue des Norvins.

Artistic associations abound hereabouts. Zola, Berlioz, Turgenev, Seurat, Degas and Van Gogh lived in the area. Picasso, Braque and Juan Gris invented Cubism in an old piano factory in place Émile-Goudeau, known as the Bateau-Lavoir, still serving as artists' studios, though the original building burnt down years ago. Toulouse-Lautrec's inspiration, the Moulin Rouge, survives too, albeit as a shadow of its former self, on the corner of boulevard de Clichy and place Blanche (see p.182).

The Musée de Montmartre, at 12 rue Cortot (Wed–Sun 10am–6pm; €5.50), just over the brow of the hill, tries to recapture something of the feel of those pioneering days, but it's a bit of a disappointment, except for the occasional temporary exhibition. The house itself, rented at various times by Renoir, Dufy, Suzanne Valadon and her alcoholic son Utrillo, is worth visiting for the view over the neat terraces of the tiny Montmartre vineyard – which produces some 1500 bottles a year – on the north side of the Butte. You can walk round to the vineyard, where the steep rue de Saules falls away past the cabaret club Au Lapin Agile. Famously painted and patronized by Picasso,

- DRINKING
- Le Bar du Relais 2
 - Café des Deux Moulins 6
 - L'Été en Pente Douce 1
 - La Fourmi Café 14
 - La Locomotive 10
 - Le Progrès 13
 - Le Sancerre 8
 - Au Rendez-vous des Amis 3

ACCOMMODATION		EATING
André Gill	G	Perfect	I
Bonséjour Montmartre	C	Regyns Montmartre	E
Caulaincourt	A	Timhotel Montmartre	D
Ermitage	B	Le Village Hostel	F
Langlois	J	Woodstock Hostel	H
		Le Bistrot
		Le Bistrot des Deux-Théâtres	16
		Chez les Fondus	11
		La Famille	7
		Au Grain de Folie	9
		Haynes	15
		Le Mono	4
		Le Relais
		Gascon	12
		Le Restaurant	5

Utrillo and other leading lights of the early twentieth-century Montmartre scene, it still puts on arty cabaret shows featuring French chanson and poetry (Tues–Sun 9pm–2am; €24).

Place du Tertre and Sacré-Coeur

The place du Tertre is the heart of Montmartre. It's photogenic but basically fraudulent, jammed with tourists, overpriced restaurants and “artists” knocking up garish paintings with their eyes shut. Between place du Tertre and the Sacré-Coeur, the old church of St-Pierre is all that remains of the Benedictine abbey that occupied the Butte Montmartre from the twelfth century on. Though much altered, it still retains its Romanesque and early Gothic feel. In it are four ancient columns, two by the door, two in the choir, leftovers from a Roman shrine that stood on the hill – mons mercurii (Mercury's Hill), the Romans called it.

Crowning the Butte is the Sacré-Coeur (daily 6am–10.30pm), whose white tower and frothy, ice-cream-scoop dome are an essential part of the Paris skyline. Construction was started in the 1870s on the initiative of the Catholic Church to atone for the “crimes” of the Commune. Square Willette, the space at the foot of the monumental staircase, is named after the local artist who turned out on inauguration day to shout “Long live the devil!”. The best thing about the church is the view from the top of the dome (daily: April–Sept 8.30am–7pm; Oct–March 9am–6pm; €5), which takes you almost as high as the Eiffel Tower; on bright days the best views are not to be had in the middle of the day, as Paris lies directly to the south

△ Sacré-Coeur, Montmartre

Montmartre cemetery

West of the Butte, near the beginning of rue Caulaincourt in place Clichy, lies the Montmartre cemetery (mid-March to Oct Mon–Fri 8am–6pm, Sat 8.30am–6pm, Sun 9am–6pm; Nov to mid-March closes 5.30pm; free). Ramshackle and peeling, on a tiny courtyard full of plants, it epitomizes the kind-hearted, instinctively arty, sepia-tinged Paris that every romantic visitor secretly cherishes. The cemetery is tucked down below street level in the hollow of an old quarry with its entrance on avenue Rachel under rue Caulaincourt. A tangle of trees and funereal pomposity, it holds the graves of Zola, Stendhal, Berlioz, Degas, Feydeau, Offenbach and Truffaut, among others.

St-Ouen flea market

Officially open Saturday to Monday 9am to 7pm – unofficially, from 5am – the puces de St-Ouen (M^o Porte-de-Clignancourt) claims to be the largest flea market in the world, the name “flea” deriving from the state of the secondhand mattresses, clothes and other junk sold here when the market first operated outside the city walls. Nowadays it’s predominantly a proper – and expensive – antiques market (mainly furniture, but including old café-bar counters, telephones, traffic lights, posters, jukeboxes and petrol pumps). There are twelve individual markets, of which Marché Jules-Vallès and Marché Lécuyer-Vallès are the cheapest and most likely to throw up an unexpected treasure. What is left of the rag-and-bone element is strung out along rue J.H. Fabre and rue du Dr-Babinski, under the flyover of the périphérique. This area is packed with vendors selling counterfeit clothing and pirated DVDs, and alive with cup-and-ball scam merchants and the like.

Pigalle

From place Clichy in the west to Barbès-Rochechouart in the east, the hill of Montmartre is underlined by the sleazy boulevards of Clichy and Rochechouart, the centre of the roadway often occupied by bumper-cars and other funfair sideshows. At the Barbès end of boulevard Rochechouart, where the métro clatters by on iron trestles, the crowds teem round the Tati department stores, the city's cheapest, while the pavements are lined with West and North African street vendors offering fabrics, watches and trinkets. At the place Clichy end, tour buses from all over Europe feed their contents into massive hotels. In the middle, between place Blanche and place Pigalle, sex shows, sex shops, tiny bars where hostesses lurk in complicated tackle, and street prostitutes (both male and female) coexist with one of Paris's most elegant private villas on avenue Frochot. The city's best specialist music shops can be found in the adjacent streets.

Perfectly placed amongst all the sex shops and shows is the Musée de l'Erotisme (daily 10am–2am; €8), which explores different cultures' approaches to sex. The ground floor and first floor are dedicated to sacred and ethnographic art, displaying proud phalluses and well-practised positions from Asia, Africa and pre-Colombian Latin America, plus a few more satirical European pieces. The rest of the floors upstairs are devoted to often fascinating temporary exhibitions.

The Goutte d'Or

Along the north side of boulevard de la Chapelle, between boulevard Barbès and the Gare du Nord rail lines, stretches the poetically named quarter of the Goutte d'Or ("Drop of Gold"), a name that derives from the medieval vineyard that occupied this site. It has gradually become an immigrant ghetto since World War I, when large numbers of North Africans were first imported to replenish the ranks of Frenchmen dying in the trenches. While the quartier remains poor, it is home to a host of mini-communities, now predominantly West African and Congolese, rather than North African, but with pockets of South Asian, Haitian, Turkish and other ethnicities as well. Countless shops can be found selling African music and fabrics, but the main sight for visitors is on rue Dejean, a few steps east of métro Château-Rouge, where the Marché Dejean (closed Sun afternoon and all day Mon) heaves with African groceries and thrums with shoppers. Another, more general market takes place in the mornings twice weekly (Wed & Sat) underneath the métro viaduct on the boulevard de la Chapelle.

Canal St-Martin and La Villette

The Bassin de la Villette and the canals at the northeastern gate of the city were for generations the centre of a densely populated working-class district. Most of the jobs were in the La Villette abattoirs and meat market or the related industries that spread around the waterways. The amusements were skating or swimming, betting on cockfights or eating at the many restaurants famed for their fresh meat. The abattoirs and meat market are gone, replaced by the huge complex of La Villette, a postmodern park of science and technology.

The whole Villette complex stands at the junction of the Ourcq and St-Denis canals. The first was built by Napoleon to bring fresh water into the city; the second is an extension of the Canal St-Martin built as a short cut to the great western loop of the Seine around Paris. The canals have undergone extensive renovation, and derelict sections of the quais are being made more appealing to cyclists, rollerbladers and pedestrians.

Canal St-Martin and place de Stalingrad

The Canal St-Martin runs underground at the Bastille to surface again in boulevard Jules-Ferry by rue du Faubourg-du-Temple. The canal still has a slightly industrial feel, especially along its upper stretch. The lower part is more attractive, with plane trees, cobbled quais and elegant, high-arched footbridges. In the last decade or so the area has been colonized by the new arty and media intelligentsia, bringing trendy bars, cafés and boutiques in their wake. The area is particularly lively on Sunday afternoons, when the quais are closed to traffic, pedestrians, cyclists and rollerbladers take over the streets and a young crowd hangs out along the canal's edge, nursing beers or softly strumming guitars. Inevitably, having acquired a certain cachet, the district has attracted property developers, and bland apartment blocks have elbowed in among traditional, solid, mid-nineteenth-century residences such as the Hôtel du Nord of Marcel Carné's film, at 102 quai de Jemappes – now a restaurant.

The canal disappears underground again further north at place de Stalingrad. To one side of the square stands the beautifully restored Rotonde de la Villette, one of Ledoux's tollhouses in Louis XVI's tax wall, where taxes were levied on all goods coming into the city – a major bone of contention in the lead-up to the 1789 Revolution.

Beyond the square is the renovated Bassin de la Villette dock, popular for Sunday strolls, fishing and canoeing. Recobbled, and with its dockside buildings converted into offices for canal boat trips, and a cinema (the MK2) with an attached waterfront brasserie, the Bassin has lost all vestiges of its former status as France's premier port. At rue de Crimée a unique hydraulic bridge marks the end of the dock and the beginning of the Canal de l'Ourcq. If you keep to the south bank on quai de la Marne, you can cross directly into the Parc de la Villette.

The Parc de la Villette

The Parc de la Villette (daily 6am–1am; free; 📍 www.villette.com) music, art and science complex, between avenues Corentin-Cariou and Jean-Jaurès, has so many disparate and disconnected elements that it's hard to know where to start. To help you get your bearings, there's an information centre at the entrance by M° Porte-de-Pantin, to the south.

The main attraction is the enormous Cité des Sciences et de l'Industrie (Tues–Sat 10am–6pm, Sun 10am–7pm; €7.50 or €10.50 with the planetarium; 📍 www.cite-sciences.fr; M° Porte-de-la-Villette). This high-tech museum devoted to science and all its applications is built into the concrete hulk of the abandoned abattoirs on the north side of the Canal de l'Ourcq. Four times the size of the Pompidou Centre, it's a colossal glass-walled building, surrounded by a moat. Inside are crow's-nests, cantilevered platforms, bridges and suspended walkways, the different levels linked by lifts and escalators around a huge central space open to the full forty-metre height of the roof. The permanent exhibition, called Explora, covers subjects such as sound, robotics, energy, light, ecology, maths, medicine, space and language. As the name suggests, the emphasis is on exploring, encouraged through interactive computers, videos, holograms, animated models and games.

When all the interrogation and stimulation becomes too much, you can relax in cafés within Explora, before joining the queue for the planetarium. Back on the ground floor there's the Louis-Lumière Cinema, which shows 3-D films (included in Cité des Sciences et de l'Industrie ticket), and the Cité des Enfants for children (see p.193), as well as a whole programme of excellent temporary exhibitions.

In front of the complex floats the Géode (hourly shows Tues–Sat 10.30am–9.30pm, Sun 10.30am–7.30pm; €9), a bubble of reflecting steel that looks as though it's been dropped from an intergalactic boules game into a pool of water. Inside is a screen for Omnimax 180° films, not noted for their plots, but a great visual experience. There's also the Cinaxe, between the Cité and the Canal St-Denis (screenings every 15min Tues–Sun 11am–5pm; €5.40, or €4.80 with Explora ticket), combining 70mm film shot at thirty frames a second with seats that move. Beside the Géode is a real 1957 French submarine, the Argonaute (Tues–Sat 10am–6pm, Sun 10am–7pm; €3). South of the canal are bizarrely landscaped themed gardens of “mirrors”, “mists”, “winds and dunes” and “islands”, and over to the east is the Zénith inflatable rock music venue. To the south, the largest of the old market halls is now a vast and brilliant exhibition space, the Grande Salle.

South of the Grande Salle stands the Cité de la Musique (@www.cite-musique.fr), in two complexes to either side of the Porte-de-Pantin entrance. To the west is the national music academy, while to the east are a concert hall, the very chic Café de la Musique, a music and dance information centre and the excellent Musée de la Musique (Tues–Sat noon–6pm, Sun 10am–6pm; €7), presenting the history of music from the end of the Renaissance to the present day, both visually – a collection of 4500 instruments – and aurally, with headsets and interactive displays. The buildings' abstract designs are meant to evoke their function; the academy's windows are arranged in sequence like musical notation and the wavy roof, according to its architect Christian de Portzamparc, is like Gregorian chant, but could equally suggest the movement of a dancer or a conductor's baton.

Belleville, Ménilmontant and Père-Lachaise

Traditionally working class, with a history of radical and revolutionary activity, the gritty eastern districts of Paris, particularly the old villages of Belleville and Ménilmontant, are nowadays some of the most diverse and vibrant parts of the city, home to sizeable ethnic populations, as well as students and artists, attracted by the low rents. The main visitor attraction in the area is the Père-Lachaise cemetery, final resting place of many well-known artists and writers. Visiting the modern Parc de Belleville will reveal the area's other main asset – wonderful views of the city below. Excellent views of Sacré-Coeur are also to be had from the fairytale-like Parc des Buttes-Chaumont.

Parc des Buttes-Chaumont

At the northern end of the Belleville heights, a short walk from La Villette, is the parc des Buttes-Chaumont (M° Buttes-Chaumont/Botzaris), constructed by Haussmann in the 1860s to camouflage what until then had been a desolate warren of disused quarries and miserable shacks. Out of this rather unlikely setting a wonderfully romantic park was created – there's a grotto with a cascade and artificial stalactites, and a picturesque lake from which a huge rock rises up topped with a delicate Corinthian temple. From the temple you get fine views of Sacré-Coeur and beyond. The park stays open all night and, equally rarely for Paris, you're not cautioned off the grass.

Belleville and Ménilmontant

The route from Buttes-Chaumont to Père-Lachaise will take you through the one-time villages of Belleville and Ménilmontant. Many of the old village lanes disappeared in the tower-block mania of the 1960s and 1970s, but others have now been opened up, and many of the newest buildings are imaginative infill, following the height and curves of their older neighbours. Dozens of cobbled and gardened villas (lanes) lined with houses remain intact: east of Buttes-Chaumont towards place Rhin-et-Danube, between rue Boyer (with a 1920s Soviet-style building at no. 25) and rue des Pyrénées just north of Père-Lachaise, and out to the east by Porte de Bagnolet, up the very picturesque steps from place Octave-Chanut.

The first main street you cross coming down from Buttes-Chaumont, rue de Belleville, is the Chinatown of Paris. Vietnamese and Chinese shops and restaurants have proliferated over the years, adding considerable visual and gastronomic cheer to the area. African and oriental fruits, spices, music and fabrics can be bought at the boulevard de Belleville market on Tuesdays and Fridays. Edith Piaf was abandoned on the steps of no. 72 rue de Belleville when just a few hours old, and there's a small museum dedicated to her at 5 rue Créspin-du-Gast (Mon–Thurs 1–6pm; closed Sept; by appointment on ☎01.43.55.52.72; donation; M° Ménilmontant/St-Maur).

You get fantastic views down onto the city centre from the higher reaches of Belleville and Ménilmontant: the best place to watch the sun set is the Parc de Belleville (M° Couronnes/Pyrénées), which descends in a series of terraces and waterfalls from rue Piat. And from rue de Ménilmontant, by rues de l'Ermitage and Boyer, you can look straight down to the Pompidou Centre. Large numbers of students and artists have moved into rue de Ménilmontant and its extension rue Oberkampf – the latter in particular has undergone quite a transformation as a result, with an explosion of trendsetting bars and cafés jostling for space alongside the ethnic bakeries, cheap goods stores and grocers.

Père-Lachaise cemetery

Père-Lachaise cemetery (Mon–Fri 8am–5.30pm, Sat 8.30am–5.30pm, Sun 9am–5.30pm; M° Gambetta/Père-Lachaise/Alexandre-Dumas/Phillipe-Auguste), final resting place of numerous notables, is an atmospheric, eerily beautiful haven, with little cobbled footpaths, terraced slopes and magnificent old trees which spread their branches over the tombs as though shading them from the outside world. The cemetery was opened in 1804, after an urgent stop had been put to further burials in the overflowing city cemeteries and churchyards. The civil authorities had Molière, La Fontaine, Abelard and Héloïse reburied here, and to be interred in Père-Lachaise quickly acquired cachet. A free map of the cemetery is available at all the entrances or you can buy a more detailed one for €2 at nearby newsagents and florists.

Among the most visited graves is that of Chopin (Division 11), often attended by Poles bearing red-and-white wreaths and flowers. Fans also flock to the ex-Doors lead singer Jim Morrison (Division 6), who died in Paris at the age of 27. You can tell when you're getting near his grave: messages in praise of love and drugs are scribbled on nearby trees and tombs.

Jeanne Herbuterne, who killed herself in crazed grief a few days after the artist died in agony from meningitis.

In Division 97 are the memorials to the victims of the Nazi concentration camps and executed Resistance fighters. The sculptures are relentless in their images of inhumanity, of people forced to collaborate in their own degradation and death. Marking one of the bloodiest episodes in French history is the Mur des Fédérés (Division 76), the wall where the last troops of the Paris Commune were lined up and shot in the final days of the battle in 1871. The man who ordered their execution, Adolphe Thiers, lies in the centre of the cemetery in division 55.

Bercy, the Promenade Plantée and Bois de Vincennes

The 12^e arrondissement has seen a number of exciting urban regeneration projects in the last few years. Much of the development has taken place in the riverside Bercy quartier, which extends from the Gare de Lyon down to the périphérique. For centuries this was the site of warehouses where the capital's wine supplies were unloaded from river barges. Much of the area has now been turned into a welcome green space, the extensive Parc de Bercy (M° Bercy), cleverly incorporating elements of the old warehouse district such as disused railway tracks and cobbled lanes. The park has arbours, rose gardens, lily ponds, a huge stepped fountain set into one of the grassy banks and a Maison du Jardinage which holds exhibitions and provides information on all aspects of gardening.

The impressive building resembling a pack of falling cards that overlooks the east side of the park, at 51 rue de Bercy, was designed by Bilbao's Guggenheim architect Frank O. Gehry and houses the Cinémathèque (www.cinema.theque.fr; M° Bercy), the repository for a huge archive of films dating back to the earliest days of cinema. Regular retrospectives of French and foreign films are screened in the four cinemas and it also has an engaging museum (Mon & Wed–Fri noon–7pm, Thurs till 10pm, Sat & Sun 10am–8pm; €4), with lots of early cinematic equipment and silent-film clips, as well as the dress that Vivien Leigh wore in Gone with the Wind.

Continuing eastwards through the Parc de Bercy, you come to Bercy Village (M° Cour Saint-Émilien), another new development, the main thoroughfare of which is the Cour Saint-Émilien, a pedestrianized street lined with former wine warehouses converted into cafés, restaurants and shops. The ochre-coloured stone and the homogeneity of the buildings make for an attractive ensemble and it's an agreeable spot for a wander.

Even better for a stroll, especially if you feel like escaping from the bustle of the city for a bit, is the Promenade Plantée (M° Bastille/Ledru-Rollin), a stretch of disused railway line, much of it along a viaduct, that has been converted into an elevated walkway and planted with a profusion of trees and flowers – cherry trees, maples, limes, roses and lavender. The walkway starts near the beginning of avenue Daumesnil, just south of the Bastille opera house, and is reached via a flight of stone steps – or lifts – with a number of similar access points all the way along. It takes you to the Parc de Reuilly, then descends to ground level and continues nearly as far as the périphérique, from where you can follow signs to the Bois de Vincennes. The whole walk is around 4.5km long, but if you don't feel like doing the entire thing you could just walk the first part – along the viaduct – which also happens to be the most attractive stretch, running past venerable old mansion blocks and giving a bird's-eye view of the area below and of small architectural details not seen from street level. What's more, the arches of the viaduct itself have been ingeniously converted into spaces for artisans' ateliers and craftshops, collectively known as the Viaduc des Arts. There are 51 of them, including furniture restorers, interior designers, cabinet makers and fashion and jewellery boutiques; a full list and map is available from no. 23 av Daumesnil.

The Bois de Vincennes

The Bois de Vincennes is the city's only extensive green space besides the Bois de Boulogne. Unfortunately it's so crisscrossed with roads that countryside sensations don't stand much of a chance. There are some very pleasant corners though, including Paris's best gardens, the Parc Floral (daily Nov–Jan 9.30am–5pm; Feb & Oct 9.30am–6pm; March & April 9.30am–7pm; April–Sept 9.30am–8pm; €1; @www.parcfloraldeparis.com; bus #112 or short walk from M° Château-de-Vincennes). Flowers are always in bloom in the Jardin des Quatres Saisons; you can picnic beneath pines, then wander through concentrations of camellias, cacti, ferns, irises and bonsai trees.

Elsewhere in the Bois de Vincennes, you can spend an afternoon boating on Lac Daumesnil, or you could visit the zoo, just north of the lake, at 53 av de St-Maurice (see p.194). On the northern edge of the bois, the Château de Vincennes (daily 10am–5/6pm; M° Château-de-Vincennes), royal medieval residence, then state prison, porcelain factory, weapons dump and military training school, can be visited on one of two guided tours (45min €5, or 1hr 15min €6.50). The highlight is the flamboyant Gothic Chapelle Royale, completed in the mid-sixteenth century and decorated with superb Renaissance stained-glass windows around the choir.

Eating and drinking

Eating and drinking are among the chief delights of Paris, as they are in France as a whole. An incredible number of restaurants remain defiantly traditional, offering the classic cuisine bourgeoise based on well-sauced meat dishes, but you can find a tremendous variety of foods, from Senegalese to Vietnamese, and from eastern European to North African. Regional French cuisines, notably from the southwest, are always popular, as is contemporary French gastronomy – spices and ingredients from the Asia-Pacific region are current fads. There is a huge diversity of places to eat: luxuriously hushed restaurants decked with crystal and white linen; noisy, elbow-to-elbow bench-and-trestle-table joints; intimate neighbourhood bistros with specials on the blackboard; grand seafood brasseries with splendid, historic interiors; and artfully distressed cafés serving dishes of the day. Relatively inexpensive offshoots of top restaurants are something of a fashion at the moment, as are the more commercial equivalents – the spin-off bistros of celebrity chefs like Alain Ducasse and Guy Savoy, often focusing on a speciality such as rôtisserie or Basque food.

Excluding top-flight restaurants, costs vary less than you might expect – though in terms of what the French call rapport qualité-prix it goes without saying that restaurants in tourist hotspots are usually best avoided. Fixed-price menus of two or three courses – called a menu in French, or sometimes a formule at lunchtime – often represent the least expensive way to eat. You'll pay as little as €10–15 at lunchtime; in the evening, €20–30 is fairly typical, though you can often easily pay less – and a lot more. Above that you should be getting some gourmet satisfaction, while for true, starred gastronomy you'll pay something in the region of €100–150 or more. The big boulevard cafés and brasseries are always more expensive than those a little further removed, and addresses in the smarter or more touristy arrondissements set prices soaring. A snack or drink on the Champs-Élysées or place St-Germain-des-Prés, for instance, will be double or triple the price of one in Belleville or Batignolles.

In general, prices fall as you move away from the centre – as does the proportion of foreign to Parisian diners. Paris has always been an international city, but if you're looking for a pungently Parisian experience, the best advice is to eat in one of the more outlying quartiers, and eat late. Given how closely packed tables tend to be, your neighbours can really make a difference to the atmosphere.

Drinking venues range from the many cafés that move seamlessly from coffees to cocktails as evening approaches, to the tiny, dedicated wine bars offering little-known vintages from every region of France. There are cavernous beer cellars, designer bars with DJ soirées at weekends and the ubiquitous Irish/British/Canadian pubs. You can take coffee and cakes in a chintzy salon de thé, in a bookshop or gallery, or even in the courtyard of a mosque. Many bars have happy hours, but prices can double after 10pm, and any clearly trendy, glitzy or stylish place is bound to be expensive.

The different eating and drinking establishments are listed here by arrondissement. They are divided into restaurants, including brasseries and bistros, and bars and cafés, a term used to incorporate anywhere you might go for a drink or a lighter meal – cafés, ice-cream parlours and salons de thé. You'll also find boxes listing vegetarian (see p.175), ethnic (see p.178) and late-night (see p.177) possibilities. Restaurant opening times are typically noon–2/2.30pm and 7.30–10.30/11pm; exceptions to this are noted in the text. Where possible, we have marked restaurants listed on the maps. It's best to book ahead for evening meals, especially from Thursday to Saturday; for most places it's usually enough to book on the day, though for the top gourmet restaurants you'll need to book at least two or three weeks in advance.

The Champs-Élysées and around

See map, pp.110–111.

Bars and cafés

 Angelina 226 rue de Rivoli, 1^{er}; M^o Tuileries. This elegant old salon de thé, with its murals, gilded stucco work and comfy leather armchairs, does the best hot chocolate in town – a generous jugful with whipped cream on the side costs around €6. Mon–Fri 8am–7pm, Sat & Sun 9am–7pm.

L'Arbre à Cannelle 57 passage des Panoramas, 2^e; M^o Rue-Montmartre. Tucked away in an attractive passage, this salon de thé with exquisite wood panelling, frescoes and painted ceilings makes an excellent spot to treat yourself to salads and tarts both savoury and sweet. Mon–Sat 11.30am–6pm.

Aux Bons Crus 7 rue des Petits-Champs, 1^{er}; M^o Palais-Royal. This relaxed, workaday place has been serving good wines and cheese, sausage and ham for over a century. A carafe costs from €6, a plate of cold meats from €13. Mon 9am–3pm, Tues–Sat 7.30am–11pm.

Bar Costes Hotel Costes, 239 rue St-Honoré, 8^e; M^o Concorde/Tuileries. A favourite haunt of fashionistas and celebs, this is a romantic place for an aperitif or late-night drinks amid decadent nineteenth-century decor of red velvet, swags and columns, set around an Italianate courtyard. Cocktails around €15. Daily until 2am.

Juveniles 47 rue de Richelieu, 2^e; M^o Palais-Royal. A very popular tiny wine bar run by a Scot. There are usually around ten different wines available by the glass (from €3); plats du jour cost €11, cheese plates and other light dishes €7. Tues–Sat 11am–11pm, Sun noon–2pm, Mon 7.30–11pm.

Ladurée 75 av des Champs-Élysées, 8^e; M° George-V. This Champs-Élysées branch of the Ladurée tearooms, with its luxurious gold and green decor, is perfect for a shopping break. Try the delicious macaroons or the thick hot chocolate (€6.10). Daily 7.30am–11.30pm.

Musée Jacquemart-André 158 bd Haussmann, 8^e ☎01.45.62.11.59; M° St-Philippe-du-Eoule/Miro-mesnil. Part of the Musée Jacquemart-André but with independent access, this is the most sumptuously appointed salon de thé in the city. Admire the ceiling frescoes by Tiepolo while savouring fine pastries or salads. Daily 11.30am–5.30pm.

Le Café Noir 65 rue Montmartre, 2^e; M° Sentier. Despite the name, it's the colour red that predominates in this buzzy little corner bar, great for an aperitif or late-night drinks, when the music and ambience hot up and it's standing room only at the bar. Mon–Fri 8.30am–2am, Sat 4pm–2am.

Le Rubis 10 rue du Marché-St-Honoré, 1^{er}; M° Pyramides. This very small and very crowded wine bar is one of the oldest in Paris, known for its excellent wines – mostly from the Beaujolais and Loire regions – and home-made rillettes (a kind of pork pâté). Plats du jour for around €10 are served at midday. Mon–Fri 7.30am–9pm, Sat 9am–3pm; closed mid-Aug.

 Verlet 56 rue St-Honoré, 1^{er}; M° Palais-Royal/Musée du Louvre. A heady aroma of coffee greets you as you enter this charming old-world coffee merchant's-cum-café. Wood furnishings, green-leather benches and caddies line one wall, the menu features 25 varieties of coffee and there's a selection of teas and light snacks, too. Mon–Sat 9am–7pm.

Restaurants

Alain Ducasse at the Plaza-Athénée Hotel Plaza-Athénée, 25 av Montaigne, 8^e ☎01.53.67.65.00, @www.alain-ducasse.com; M° Alma-Marceau. One of Paris's top haute cuisine temples, run by star chef Alain Ducasse, whose sublime dishes, such as Brittany langoustines with Oscietra caviar, are likely to revive even the most jaded palate. The stylish decor features Louis XV-style chairs and Swarovski crystal chandeliers. Around €200 a head. Thurs & Fri 12.45–2.15pm & 7.45–10.15pm.

Chartier 7 rue du Faubourg-Montmartre, 9^e ☎01.47.70.86.29; M° Montmartre. Dark-stained woodwork, brass hat-racks, mirrors, waiters in long aprons – this has the original decor of an early twentieth-century soup kitchen. Though crowded and rushed, it's worth a visit, and the food's not bad at all. Three courses for €16, and a bottle of wine from €6. Daily 11.30am–3pm & 6–10pm.

Le Dauphin 167 rue St-Honoré, 1^{er} ☎01.42.60.40.11; M° Palais-Royal/Musée-du-Louvre. This old bistro, with original Art Deco stained glass, serves inventive southwestern dishes. Specialities are the parilladas, such as the parillada du boucher (€23) made up of steak, duck, chicken breast and sausage; veggies are catered for too with the parillada de la terre (tomatoes, courgette, aubergine, fennel, peppers and endives; €19). Daily.

Dragons Élysées 11 rue de Berri, 8^e ☎01.42.89.85.10; M° George-V. The Chinese-Thai cuisine encompasses dim sum, curried seafood and baked mussels, but the overriding attraction is the extraordinary decor: beneath a floor of glass tiles water runs from pool to pool inhabited by exotic fish. Midweek lunchtime menu €14, otherwise count on around €35 a head. Daily.

Higuma 32bis rue St-Anne, 1^{er} ☎01.47.03.38.59; M° Pyramides. Authentic Japanese canteen with cheap, filling ramen dishes and a good-value set menu at €10. Daily 11.30am–10pm.

 Aux Lyonnais 32 rue St-Marc, 2^e ☎01.42.96.65.04; M° Bourse/Richelieu-Drouot. This revamped old bistro, with lovely Belle Époque tiles and mirrored walls, serves up delicious Lyonnais fare – try the quenelles (light and delicate fish dumplings) followed by the heavenly Cointreau soufflé for dessert. Three-course set menu €28. Closed Sat lunch, Sun & Mon.

Pierre Gagnaire Hôtel Balzac, 6 rue Balzac, 8^e ☎01.58.36.12.50, @www.pierre-gagnaire.com; M° George-V. Judged third-best restaurant in the world by Restaurant magazine in 2006, Pierre Gagnaire is a gastronomic adventure. The lunch menu costs €90, dinner at least €200. Mon–Fri noon–1.30pm & 7.30–9.30pm, Sun 7.30–9.30pm.

Le Relais de l'Entrecôte 15 rue Marbeuf, 8^e; M° Franklin-D.-Roosevelt. No reservations are taken at this bustling diner, so you may have to queue for the single dish on the menu: steak and frites. This is no ordinary steak though – the secret is in the delicious, buttery sauce. Around €22 including a salad starter. Desserts at around €6 are excellent too. Daily; closed Aug.

Rue Balzac 3–5 rue Balzac, 8^e ☎01.53.89.90.91; M° Charles-de-Gaulle. This ultra-stylish restaurant is the enterprise of rock singer Johnny Hallyday and chef Michel Rostang. The low lighting and subdued reds and yellows of the decor provide an atmospheric backdrop to classy cuisine, available in small or large servings (“petit modèle” and “grand modèle”). Around €60 a head. M° George-V. Closed lunch Sat & Sun, & Aug.

Les Saveurs de Flora 36 av George-V, 8^e ☎01.40.70.10.49; M° George-V. A stylish, cosy restaurant, with an open fireplace and chandeliers, run by chef-owner Flora Mikula, who creates tasty, inventive dishes, drawing mainly on Mediterranean influences. The set menu at €36 is very good value, considering the high quality and upmarket location. Closed Sat lunch & Sun.

Spoon, Food and Wine 14 rue de Marignan, 8^e ☎01.40.76.34.44; M° Franklin-D.-Roosevelt. Innovative world-food bistro headed up by top chef Alain Ducasse. The chic, minimalist decor and inventive cuisine, marrying unusual flavours and ingredients, attract a fashionable crowd. Count on around €65 a head. Closed Sat, Sun & mid-July to mid-Aug.

Taillevent 15 rue Lamennais, 8^e ☎01.44.95.15.01; M° Charles-de-Gaulle. One of Paris's finest gourmet restaurants. The Provençal-influenced cuisine and wine list are exceptional, the decor classy and refined. There's a set menu for €70 at lunch only, otherwise reckon on an average of €150 a head, excluding wine, and book well in advance. Closed Sat, Sun & Aug.

Vaudeville 29 rue Vivienne, 2^e ☎01.40.20.04.62; M° Bourse. There's often a queue to get a table at this lively late-night brasserie, attractively decorated with marble and mosaics. Dishes include grilled cod with truffle sauce and belle tête de veau. Lunchtime menu €22.90, dinner €29.90. Daily noon–3pm & 7pm–1am.

Beaubourg and Les Halles

See map, p.122.

Bars & cafés

Café Beaubourg 43 rue St-Merri, 4^e; M° Rambuteau/Hôtel-de-Ville. Seats under the expansive awnings of this stylish café, bearing the trademark sweeping lines of designer Christian Portamparc, command frontline views of the Pompidou piazza and are great for people-watching. Drinks €5. It's also good for a relaxing Sunday brunch (from €15). Daily 8am–1am.

Le Petit Marcel 63 rue Rambuteau, 4^e; M° Rambuteau. Speckled tabletops, mirrors and Art Nouveau tiles, a cracked and faded ceiling and about eight square metres of drinking space. There's a small dining area, too, where you can get cheap and filling dishes such as frites and omelette. Mon–Sat till 2am.

Taverne Henri IV 13 place du Pont-Neuf, Île de la Cité, 1^{er}; M° Pont-Neuf. An old-style wine bar that's probably changed little since Yves Montand used to come here with Simone Signoret. It's especially lively at lunchtime when lawyers from the nearby Palais de Justice drop in for generous plates of meats and cheeses (for around €12) and tartines (with a choice of cheeses, hams, pâté and saucisson). Mon–Fri 11.30am–9.30pm, Sat noon–5pm; closed Sun & Aug.

Restaurants

Chez Dilan 13 rue Mandar, 2^e ☎01.42.21.14.88; M° Les Halles/Sentier. An excellent-value Kurdish restaurant, strewn with kilims and playing taped Kurdish music. Starters include melt-in-your-mouth babaqunuc (stuffed aubergines) and mains beyti (spiced minced beef wrapped in pastry, with yoghurt, tomato sauce and bulgar wheat). Around €18 for two courses; €9 for half a litre of Kurdish wine. Closed Sun.

Georges Centre Georges Pompidou, 4^e ☎01.44.78.47.99; M° Rambuteau/Hôtel-de-Ville. On the top floor of the Pompidou Centre, this trendy minimalist restaurant with outdoor terrace commands stunning views over Paris and makes a stylish place for lunch or dinner. The French-Asian fusion cuisine is pretty good, if overpriced. Count on around €50 to €60 per head. Daily except Tues noon–midnight.

Au Pied de Cochon 6 rue Coquillière, 1^{er} ☎01.40.13.77.00; M° Châtelet-Les Halles. A Les Halles institution, this is the place to go for extravagant middle-of-the-night pork chops, steak and, of course, pigs' trotters. Mains cost around €20. Daily 24hr.

La Robe et le Palais 13 rue des Lavandières St-Opportune, 1^{er} ☎01.45.08.07.41; M° Châtelet. Small, busy restaurant à vins serving traditional cuisine and an excellent selection of wines, running to around 250 vintages. Typical main courses include sea bream, boudin noir (black pudding), andouillette (tripe sausage) and steak. The two-course lunch menu is good value at around €15. Closed Sun.

 À la Tour de Montlhéry (Chez Denise) 5 rue des Prouvaires, 1^{er} ☎01.42.36.21.82; M° Louvre-Rivoli/Châtelet. A quintessential old-style Parisian bistro, going back to the Les Halles market days. Diners sit elbow to elbow at long tables in a narrow, smoky dining room and tuck into filling meaty dishes, such as andouillette (tripe sausage), offal and steak, accompanied by perfectly cooked frites. Mains cost around €22. Mon–Fri noon–3pm & 7.30pm–5am. Closed mid-July to mid-Aug.

La Victoire Suprême du Coeur 41 rue des Bourdonnais, 1^{er} ☎01.40.41.93.95; M° Louvre-Rivoli/Châtelet. While the interior – plastered with photos and drawings of Indian guru Sri Chinmoy – takes some getting used to, this restaurant does some of the best vegetarian food in Paris, including tasty salads, quiches and wholesome mains, such as mushroom roast with blackberry sauce. Two courses at lunch cost as little as €12.50, €15.30 for dinner. Mon–Sat 11.45am–10pm.

Au Vieux Molière passage Molière, 157 rue Saint-Martin, 3° ☎01.42.78.37.87, 🌐www.vieux-molier.com; M° Étienne-Marcel/Rambuteau/RER Châtelet. Tucked away down a small passage, this is an atmospheric restaurant, with French chansons playing softly in the background and prints of literary figures on the walls. The menu changes daily, but typical dishes are garlic-roasted chicken and mullet in saffron sauce. Reckon on around €35 for dinner. Closed Sat & Sun lunch.

Marais, Île St-Louis & Bastille

See map, pp.126–127.

Bars and cafés

Andy Wahloo 69 rue des Gravilliers, 3° ☎01.42.71.20.38; M° Arts-et-Métiers. A very popular bar decked out in original Pop Art-inspired Arabic decor. Yummy meze appetizers are served until midnight and the bar serves a few original cocktails, including the Wahloo Special (rum, lime, ginger, banana and cinnamon; €9). DJs play a wide range of dance music. Mon–Sat 11am–2am.

L'Apparement Café 18 rue des Coutures-St-Gervais, 3°; M° St-Sébastien-Froissart. A chic and cosy café resembling a series of comfortable sitting rooms, with quiet corners and deep sofas. The salads (from around €8), which you compose yourself by ticking off your chosen ingredients and handing your order to the waiter, are recommended. Mon–Fri noon–2am, Sat 4pm–2am, Sun 12.30pm–midnight.

L'As du Falafel 34 rue des Rosiers, 4° ☎01.48.87.63.60; M° St-Paul. The best falafel shop in the Jewish quarter. Falafels to take away cost only €4; you can pay a bit more and sit in the little dining room. Daily noon–midnight; closed Fri eve & Sat.

Berthillon 31 rue St-Louis-en-l'Île, 4°; M° Pont-Marie. You may well have to queue for one of Berthillon's exquisite ice creams or sorbets – arguably the best in Paris. Wed–Sun 10am–8pm.

Iguana 15 rue de la Roquette, cnr rue Daval, 11°; M° Bastille. A place to be seen in with a decor of trellises, colonial fans and a brushed bronze bar. By day, the clientele studies recherché art reviews over excellent coffee, while things hot up at night with a youngish, high-spirited crowd. DJ on Thurs. Cocktails around €9. Daily 9am–5am.

Café de l'Industrie 16 rue St-Sabin, 11°; M° Bastille. Rugs on the floor around solid old wooden tables, miscellaneous objects – from stuffed crocodiles to atmospheric black-and-white photos – on the walls, and a young, unpretentious crowd enjoying the comfortable absence of minimalism. One of the best Bastille cafés, packed out every evening. Daily 10–2am.

△ Dining at Bofinger

CAFÉS, BISTROS AND BRASSERIES

Les Deux Magots

France is famous for its cuisine, of course, but how do you decide exactly where to eat it? What's the difference between a bistro and a brasserie? What does gastronomique mean and where can you get a simple sandwich? Read on. Just like anywhere in the world, France has its share of fast-food outlets and takeaways. But if you want to sit down to eat in reasonable comfort you'll be faced with an overwhelming variety of alluring establishments to choose from.

Les Deux Magots

▲ Polidor, St-Germain, Paris

Cafés and wine bars

If you're looking for breakfast or a simple snack, your best bet is a café-bar, where you can lounge for hours, watching the world go by. In addition to an extensive drinks list, most cafés offer morning croissants and can rustle up filled baguettes, toasted sandwiches and the like at lunchtime, possibly all day. Some might run to more substantial fare, along the lines of a couple of plats du jour, maybe even a basic menu (see box overleaf), but nothing too elaborate.

For a more sophisticated, night-time feel, drop into a wine bar, which you'll generally find in larger towns and cities. At the top end, these can be very refined establishments catering to serious wine connoisseurs. Others are small and convivial. While the wine takes priority, you'll typically be offered cheese or cold meat platters to nibble on.

Brasseries vs Bistros

These are the quintessential urban French eateries. Brasseries are typically large and bustling, with lots of mirrors and brasswork, whereas bistros tend to be small, casual and inexpensive neighbourhood restaurants. Most bistros open for lunch and dinner; brasseries generally serve meals all day – a few city-centre places may keep going until midnight – and double as café-bars outside regular meal times. Standard brasserie fare consists of salads, omelettes, grills and a smattering of fish dishes, plus seafood platters at more upmarket places. Don't expect any fireworks, but the food should be quick and wholesome.

▼ La Cigale, Nantes

If it's something more homely you're after, you'll probably be better off in a bistro, where the daily dishes could be a selection of fuss-free classics, such as boeuf bourguignon or quiche and salad. Though most bistros still offer traditional fare, you'll find some now offering more contemporary, eye-catching cuisine, often with minimalist furnishings and upbeat colour schemes to match.

If it's something more homely you're after, you'll probably be better off in a bistro, where the daily dishes could be a selection of fuss-free classics, such as boeuf bourguignon or quiche and salad. Though most bistros still offer traditional fare, you'll find some now offering more contemporary, eye-catching cuisine, often with minimalist furnishings and upbeat colour schemes to match.

Farm feast

In country areas keep an eye out for fermes auberges. These farm restaurants provide a means for small farmers to supplement their income, the main criteria being that they produce the majority of ingredients themselves. They are often the best place to sample really traditional local cuisine. In southwest France, for example, you'll be treated to all manner of dishes prepared from goose or duck: rich slabs of foie gras followed by magret (breast) or confit (preserved duck or goose) served with potatoes – fried in the birds' fat, of course. Elsewhere it might be pork or lamb, but always at very reasonable prices; a four-course meal for between €15 and €35 is the norm, including an aperitif and wine. Reservations are a must.

All the restos

If it offers meals and doesn't fall into any of the above categories, it must be a restaurant. From the lowly truckers' routiers up through family-run country inns (usually called auberges or sometimes relais) and hotel dining rooms to Michelin-starred establishments serving the very highest haute cuisine, restaurants cover a broad range. In general, however, they're more formal than café-bars or brasseries and stick to the traditional meal times of noon–2pm, and 7–9pm, sometimes later in larger towns and during the summer months. The food could be traditional or modern, hearty home-cooking or classic and refined, international or resolutely French.

Top qualité?

Unfortunately, while eating at top-class establishments usually guarantees a certain excellence, elsewhere it can be a matter of luck. There's nothing to say you'll eat better in a smart-looking restaurant than in a simple café. In either the food could be inspired and inventive or come from the freezer via the microwave. The best rule of thumb is to avoid places that are half empty at peak times, use your nose and regard long menus with suspicion. Be cautious, too, of restaurants or menus professing to offer gastronomique cuisine. In theory, this means they use the best ingredients and blend texture and taste, colour and aroma to create an unbeatable eating experience. Sadly, the term is much overused and the food often doesn't live up to the hype – or the price tag.

▼ Dessert at Astier, Paris

▲ Parisian waiter

Restaurant etiquette

Bread and tap water are provided free of charge in France. If there's no side-plate, just put your bread on the table. It's fine to tear it into pieces and also to mop your plate with it. Elbows on the table is fine, too. In fact, you should keep your hands visible at all times.

In touristy areas in high season, and for all the more upmarket places, it's wise to reserve. Prices, and what you get for them, must be posted outside. The vast majority include a service charge of 15 percent – in which case it should say service compris (s.c.) or prix net. Very occasionally you'll see service non compris (s.n.c.) or servis en sus, which means it's up to you whether you leave a tip or not.

Menu primer

Plat du jour Reasonably priced "daily specials" commonly served at lunchtime.

Menu fixe or menu du jour

Fixed-price menus – often referred to simply as menus – comprising a set number of courses and a limited choice. Lunchtime menus are cheaper than those at dinner and often represent excellent value.

Formule Usually available only at lunchtime, a formule is a trimmed-down menu, typically offering just two courses for a set price.

Carte Choosing from the carte (the full menu) naturally offers a greater choice – though you'll pay more for the privilege.

Menu carte Choose freely from the carte but pay a fixed price according to whether you opt for one, two or three courses.

 Le Loir dans la Théière 3 rue des Rosiers, 4^e; M^o Saint-Paul. A laid-back salon de thé where you can sink into a battered sofa and feast on enormous portions of home-made cakes and vegetarian quiches. Come early for the popular Sunday brunch (€15). Mon–Fri 11am–7pm, Sat & Sun 10am–7pm.

Pause Café 41 rue de Charonne, cnr rue Keller, 11^e; M^o Ledru-Rollin. A traditional high-ceilinged, glass-fronted café with tiled floors. Its terrace is particularly prized in warmer weather. Tues–Sat 8am–2am, Sun to 9pm.

Le Petit Fer à Cheval 30 rue Vieille-du-Temple, 4^e; M^o St-Paul. A very attractive small drinking spot with original fin-de-siècle decor, including a marble-topped bar in the shape of a horseshoe (fer à cheval). You can snack on sandwiches or something more substantial in the little back room furnished with old wooden méto seats. Mon–Fri 9am–2am, Sat & Sun 11am–2am; food noon–midnight.

Le Rouge Gorge 8 rue St-Paul, 4^e; M^o St-Paul. Friendly wine bar and restaurant with bare stone walls and jazz or classical music playing in the background. Devoted to exploring a wide range of wines: one week it might be Corsica, the next Spain or the Loire, and the theme is taken up in the frequently changing menu. Mains cost around €16. Mon–Sat noon–11pm. Closed last fortnight in Aug.

SanZSans 49 rue du Faubourg-St-Antoine, 11^e; M^o Bastille. Gothic getup of red velvet, oil paintings and chandeliers, popular with a young crowd, especially on Friday and Saturday evenings, when DJs play funk, Brazilian beats and house. Drinks are reasonably priced. Daily 9am–5am.

Le Wax 15 rue Daval, 11^e; M^o Bastille. A popular bar with great early 70s interior, full of happy locals and foreigners dancing to soul, house and electronica. Tues–Thurs till 2am, Fri & Sat till 5am.

Restaurants

 Ambassade d'Auvergne 22 rue de Grenier St-Lazare, 3^e ☎01.42.72.31.22; M^o Rambuteau. Suited, mustachioed waiters serve scrumptious Auvergnat cuisine that would have made Vercingétorix proud. There's a set menu for €28, but you may well be tempted by some of the house specialities, like the roast guinea fowl with garlic (€17). Daily noon–2pm & 7.30–10pm; closed last two weeks in Aug.

Astier 44 rue Jean-Pierre-Timbaud, 11^e ☎01.43.57.16.35; M^o Parmentier. Very popular restaurant with an unstuffy atmosphere and food renowned for its freshness and refinement. Outstanding selection of perfectly ripe cheeses and excellent wine list. It's essential to book; lunch is often less crowded (€21.50 menu) and just as enjoyable. Evening menu €26. Closed Sat & Sun, Aug & fortnight in May & at Christmas.

 Auberge de Jarente 7 rue Jarente, 4^e ☎01.42.77.49.35; M^o St-Paul. This friendly Basque restaurant serves up hearty dishes of cassoulet, hare stew, magret de canard, pipérade and the like. Set menus at €21 and €30. Tues–Sat noon–2.30pm & 7.30–10.30pm; closed Aug.

L'Auberge Pyrénées Cévennes 106 rue de la Folie Méricourt, 11^e ☎01.43.57.33.78; M^o République. Make sure you come hungry to this homely little place serving hearty portions of country cuisine. The garlicky moules marinières and the wonderful cassoulet, served in its own copper pot, are highly recommended. Around €30 a head à la carte. Noon–2pm & 7–11pm, closed Sat lunch and all day Sun.

Bistrot du Peintre 116 av Ledru Rollin, 11^e ☎01.47.00.34.39; M^o Faidherbe-Chaligny. A traditional neighbourhood bistro, where small tables are jammed together beneath faded Art Nouveau frescoes and wood panelling. The emphasis is on hearty cuisine, with dishes such as beef tartare and confit de canard for around €14. Mon–Sat 7am–2am, Sun 10am–8pm.

Bofinger 7 rue de la Bastille, 4^e ☎01.42.72.87.82; M^o Bastille. Popular fin-de-siècle brasserie with its splendid original decor perfectly preserved. Specialities are sauerkraut and seafood and there's a set dinner menu for €29.90. Daily noon–3pm & 7pm–1am.

Au Bourguignon du Marais 52 rue François Miron, 4^e ☎01.48.87.15.40; M^o St-Paul. A warm, relaxed restaurant, with attractive contemporary decor and tables outside in summer, serving excellent Burgundian cuisine with carefully selected wines to match. Mains cost €15–25, wine starts at €20. Mon–Fri noon–3pm & 8–11pm; closed two weeks in Aug.

Chez Marianne 2 rue des Hospitalières-St-Gervais, 4^e ☎01.42.72.18.86; M^o St-Paul. You can eat very well and cheaply at this homely restaurant specializing in Middle Eastern and Jewish delicacies. A platter of mezzes that might include tabbouleh, aubergine purée, chopped liver and hummus starts from €12, and the wines are reasonably priced too. Daily noon–midnight.

 Chez Omar 47 rue de Bretagne, 3^e; M^o Arts-et-Métiers. No reservations are taken at this popular North African couscous restaurant, but it's no hardship to wait at the bar for a table, taking in the handsome old brasserie decor and the buzzy atmosphere. Portions are copious and the couscous light and fluffy. The merguez (spicy sausage) costs €12, or go all out for the royal (€22). No credit cards. Daily except Sun lunch noon–2.30pm & 7–11.30pm.

L'Enoteca 25 rue Charles-V, 4^e ☎01.42.78.91.44; M° St-Paul. A fashionable Italian bistro à vins in an old wood-beamed Marais building, with an impressive wine list running to 22 pages. Food doesn't take a back seat either: choose from an array of antipasti laid out enticingly in the middle of the room, fresh pasta or more substantial dishes such as courgettes farcis à la viande de veau. There's a two-course midweek lunchtime menu for €13, otherwise reckon on around €40 a head. Daily noon–11.30pm; closed one week in mid-Aug.

Mon Vieil Ami 69 rue St-Louis-en-l'Île, 4^e ☎01.40.46.01.35; M° Pont-Marie. Charming little bistro, with appealing contemporary decor of chocolate browns and frosted-glass panels. The excellent cuisine is bold and zesty, using seasonal ingredients, and the wine list includes some choice vintages. Three courses cost around €40. Daily 12.30–2.30pm & 7.30–10.30pm. Closed Jan & Aug.

Piccolo Teatro 6 rue des Ecoffes, 4^e ☎01.42.72.17.79; M° St-Paul. A cosy vegetarian restaurant with low lighting, stone walls and wooden beams. The speciality is gratins, with poetic names such as douceur et tendresse (spinach, mint, mozzarella and Gruyère). Reckon on €15–20 without drinks. Closed Mon & Aug.

Le Square Troussseau 1 rue Antoine Vollon, 12^e ☎01.43.43.06.00; M° Ledru-Rollin. Handsome belle-époque brasserie patronized by a chic but relaxed crowd. The regularly changing menu features excellent traditional cuisine. Lunch menu for €20; à la carte reckon on at least €40. Closed Sun & Aug.

Quartier Latin

See map, pp.134–135.

Bars and cafés

La Fourmi Ailée 8 rue du Fouarre, 5^e; M° Maubert-Mutualité. This former feminist bookshop has been transformed into a salon de thé offering simple, light fare. A high ceiling painted with a lovely mural and a book-filled wall contribute to the unusual atmosphere. From noon to 3pm it's restaurant service only – count on around €10–15 for a plat. Daily noon–7pm.

Café de l'Institut du Monde Arabe 1, rue des Fossés St-Bernard, 5^e; M° Jussieu/Cardinal-Lemoine. Rooftop café-restaurant where you can drink mint tea and nibble on cakes looking out on the Seine. Inside the building, the self-service cafeteria Moucharabiyah offers a decent plate of lunchtime couscous. Tues–Sun 10am–6pm.

Café de la Mosquée 39 rue Geoffroy-St-Hilaire, 5^e; M° Monge. You can drink mint tea and eat sweet cakes beside a fountain and assorted fig trees in the courtyard of this Paris mosque – a delightful haven of calm. Meals are served in the adjoining restaurant for around €15 and up. Daily 9am–11pm.

Café de la Nouvelle Mairie 19 rue des Fossés-St-Jacques, 5^e; M° Cluny-La Sorbonne/RER Luxembourg. Sleek café-wine bar with a relaxed feel generated by its older, university-based clientele. Serves inventive and reasonably priced mains, and you can drink at the outside tables on sunny days. Mon, Wed & Fri 9am–10pm, Tues & Thurs 9am–11pm.

Le Piano Vache 8 rue Laplace, 5^e; M° Cardinal-Lemoine. Venerable bar crammed with students drinking at little tables, with cool music and a laid-back atmosphere. Mon–Fri noon–2am, Sat & Sun 9pm–2am.

Les Pipos 2 rue de l'École-Polytechnique, 5^e; M° Maubert-Mutualité/Cardinal-Lemoine. Old, rustically wooden bar, serving inexpensive wines along with simple plates of charcuterie, cheese and the like. Mon–Sat 8am–1am; closed two weeks in Aug.

Le Violon Dingue 46 rue de la Montagne-Ste-Genève, 5^e; M° Maubert-Mutualité. A long, dark student pub that's noisy, friendly and popular with young travellers. English-speaking bar staff and cheap drinks. The cellar bar stays open until 4.30am on busy nights. Daily 6pm–2.30am; happy hour 8–10pm.

Restaurants

Les 5 Saveurs d'Anada 72 rue Cardinal-Lemoine, 5^e ☎01.43.29.58.54; M° Cardinal-Lemoine. Airy and informal restaurant serving delicious, reasonably priced organic vegetarian food. The salads are good, or you could try one of the creative meat-substitute dishes (around €12), such as tofu soufflé or seitan with celeriac and basil. Daily noon–2.30pm & 7.30–10.30pm.

Au Bistro de la Sorbonne 4 rue Toullier, 5^e ☎01.43.54.41.49; RER Luxembourg. Traditional French and delicious North African food – tagines, couscous – served at reasonable prices to a crowd of locals and students. The interior is bright and attractively muralled. Closed Sun.

Brasserie Balzar 49 rue des Écoles, 5^e ☎01.43.54.13.67; M° Maubert-Mutualité. Truly classic high-ceilinged, pot-plant-festooned brasserie, long frequented by the literary intelligentsia of the Quartier Latin, though it draws a more international crowd earlier on. À la carte around €30. Daily 8am–11.30pm.

Les Degrés de Notre Dame 10 rue des Grands Degrés, 5^e ☎01.55.42.88.88; M° Maubert-Mutualité. Reliable, inexpensive and substantial French food served in a friendly, faintly rustic dining room. Good-value lunch menu. Closed Sun.

L'Ecurie 58 rue de la Montagne Ste-Geneviève, 5^e ☎01.46.33.68.49; M° Maubert-Mutualité/Cardinal-Lemoine. Shoe-horned into a former stables, this family-run restaurant is bustling and very lovable. Expect well-cooked meat dishes served without flourishes – grilled with chips, mostly – for less than €15, and book ahead. Mon–Sat noon–3pm & 7pm–midnight, Sun 7pm–midnight.

Le Grenier de Notre Dame 18 rue de la Bûcherie, 5^e ☎01.43.29.98.29; M° Maubert-Mutualité/St-Michel. Some people love the menu of unreconstructed veggie classics and the quiet, dimly lit, neighbourhood atmosphere; others find it dull. At around €20 for a meal, the prices aren't low. Mon–Fri noon–2.30pm & 7–11pm, Sat & Sun noon–11pm.

 Perraudin 157 rue St-Jacques, 5^e ☎01.46.33.15.75; RER Luxembourg. One of the classic bistros of the Left Bank. The atmosphere is thick with Parisian chatter and the tables brightly lit and tightly packed. Solid cooking, with moderately priced menus. No reservations. Closed Sat & Sun; closed two weeks in Aug.

La Petite Légume 36 rue Boulangers, 5^e ☎01.40.46.06.85; M° Jussieu. A health-food grocery that doubles as a vegetarian restaurant and tearoom, serving homely, organic plats for €8–12, along with organic Loire wines. Closed Sun.

Pho 67 59 rue Galande, 5^e ☎01.45.25.56.69; M° Maubert-Mutualité. Authentic Vietnamese, with dishes for around €6. Try the famous pho soup, in this case made with tender French steak.

 Le Pré-Verre 8 rue Thénard, 5^e ☎01.43.54.59.47; M° Maubert-Mutualité.

This sleek, modern bistro à vins has a great wine list, while blackboard lists are dotted with unusual ingredients and spices – think swordfish on a bed of quinoa grain or wild boar ragout with quince. Evening menu at €25. Tues–Sat noon–2pm & 7.30–10.30pm; closed three weeks in Aug.

Le Reminet 3 rue des Grands Degrés, 5^e ☎01.44.07.04.24; M° Maubert-Mutualité. This artful little bistro-restaurant shows its class through small touches: snowy-white tablecloths, fancy chandeliers and carefully considered and imaginative sauces. Gastronomic menu at €50, but you can get away with two courses à la carte for about half that. Closed Tues & Wed.

Tashi Delek 4 rue des Fossés-St-Jacques, 5^e ☎01.43.26.55.55; RER Luxembourg. Elegantly styled Tibetan restaurant serving Himalayan dishes ranging from delicious broths to the addictive, ravioli-like momok. You can eat handsomely for under €20. Closed Sun & two weeks in Aug.

St-Germain

See map, pp.138–139.

Bars & cafés

Le 10 10 rue de l'Odéon, 6^e; M° Odéon. Small, dark bar with Art Deco posters above and an atmospheric, studenty cellar bar below. Daily 6pm–2am.

 Chez Georges 11 rue des Canettes, 6^e; M° Mabillon. This tobacco-stained wine bar has its old shopfront still in place and oozes Left Bank character. The downstairs bar attracts a younger crowd that stays lively well into the small hours. Relatively inexpensive for the area, too. Tues–Sat noon–2am; closed Aug.

Cosi 54 rue de Seine, 6^e; M° St-Germain-des-Prés. Great Italian deli sandwiches on home-made focaccia. You can eat in, with a glass of wine, enjoying the musical tastes of the opera-loving owner. Daily noon–midnight.

Les Deux Magots 170 bd St-Germain, 6^e; M° St-Germain-des-Prés. Right on the corner of place St-Germain-des-Prés, this expensive café is the victim of its own reputation as the historic hangout of Left Bank intellectuals, but it's great for people-watching. It's worth arriving early for the breakfasts. Daily 7.30am–1am.

Les Étages St-Germain 5 rue de Buci, 6^e; M° Mabillon. Outpost of boho trendiness at the edge of the rue de Buci market, with a certain trashy glamour. The downstairs café-bar is open to the street, and in the evenings you can lounge around upstairs with a cocktail. Daily 11am–2am.

Flore 172 bd St-Germain, 6^e; M° St-Germain-des-Prés. The great rival and immediate neighbour of Les Deux Magots, with a very similar clientele. Sartre, De Beauvoir, Camus and Marcel Carné used to hang out here. Best for a late-afternoon coffee or after-dinner drink, preferably in the insiders' haunt upstairs. Daily 7am–1.30am.

Fubar 5 rue St-Sulpice, 6^e; M° Odéon. Relaxed lounge bar with a young, international crowd drinking well past the last métro. The upstairs room is very cosy, with soft armchairs and deep red walls. Daily 5pm–2am.

Café de la Mairie Place St-Sulpice, 6^e; M° St-Sulpice. Famous for the beautiful people sun-seeking on the outdoor terrasse, which looks onto the beautiful square. Mon–Sat 7am–2am.

 Bar du Marché 75 rue de Seine, 6^e; M° Mabillon. Humming café where the waiters are funky kitted out in flat caps and bright aprons. It's great fun – in a self-consciously bohemian way – and perennially fashionable. You pay a little extra for the location near the rue de Buci market. Daily 7am–2am.

La Mezzanine de l'Alcazar 62 rue Mazarine, 6^e; M^o Odéon. The decor is très design at this cool cocktail bar, set on a mezzanine level overlooking Conran's Alcazar restaurant. Expensive but exquisite – much like the clientele. DJs Wed–Sat. Daily 7pm–2am.

La Palette 43 rue de Seine, 6^e; M^o Odéon. Once-famous Beaux-Arts student hangout, now frequented by art dealers and their customers. The decor is superb, including, of course, a large selection of colourful, used palettes. Mon–Sat 9am–2am.

Au Petit Suisse 16 rue de Vaugirard, 6^e; RER Luxembourg/M^o Cluny-La Sorbonne. Everything you'd need from a café: outdoor terrace, in-house tabac, two-hundred-year history, Art Deco interior, menu of sandwiches, salads and decent plats du jour, and a mezzanine level that's made for people-watching. Daily 6.30am–midnight.

La Taverne de Nesle 32 rue Dauphine, 6^e; M^o Odéon. Full of young, local night-birds fuelled up by happy hour cocktails and one or more of the vast selection of beers. DJs at weekends. Daily 6pm till around 4am.

Restaurants

 Au 35 35 rue Jacob, 6^e ☎01.42.60.23.24; M^o St-Germain-des-Prés. Adorably intimate bistro, but the food's the thing – from a perfect duck breast to an exotic, rich pastilla of lamb with honey and spices. Around €30 without wine. Mon–Fri noon–2.30pm & 7.30–11pm, Sat 7.30–11pm.

Allard 41 rue St-André-des-Arts, 6^e ☎01.43.26.48.23; M^o Odéon. Proudly unreconstructed Parisian restaurant with a meaty, homely cuisine. If it wasn't for the international clientele, you could be dining in another century. From around €30. Closed Sun.

L'Atlas 11 rue de Buci, 6^e ☎01.40.51.26.30; M^o Mabillon. Unpretentious market brasserie serving good seafood, and simple, meaty main dishes at around €17. Daily 6.30am–1am.

Brasserie Lipp 151 bd St-Germain, 6^e; M^o St-Germain-des-Prés. One of the most celebrated of all the classic Paris brasseries, the haunt of the very successful and very famous, with a wonderful 1900s wood-and-glass interior. Decent plats du jour, including the famous sauerkraut, for under €20, but the full menu is expensive. No reservations, so be prepared to wait. Daily 9am–1am.

Le Petit St-Benoît 4 rue St-Benoît, 6^e ☎01.42.60.27.92; M^o St-Germain-des-Prés. Another tobacco-stained St-Germain institution, all rickety wooden tables and brass train-carriage-style coat racks. Serves the sort of meaty, comfort food your grand-mère would cook, at reasonable prices. Closed Sun.

Polidor 41 rue Monsieur-le-Prince, 6^e ☎01.43.26.95.34; M^o Odéon. A bright, noisy traditional bistro, open since 1845. Packed until late with regulars and tourists alike enjoying meaty Parisian classics on the good-value menus (€20 and €30, or just €12 for a weekday lunch). No bookings; just turn up and wait. Mon–Sat noon–2.30pm & 7pm–12.30am, Sun noon–2.30pm & 7–11.30pm.

 Le Salon d'Héliène 4 rue d'Assas, 6^e ☎01.42.22.00.11; M^o St-Sulpice/Sèvres-Babylone. Underneath celebrity chef Héliène Darroze's gastronomic restaurant, the trendier and more relaxed ground-floor bistro bar offers superbly imaginative tapas-style dishes drawing on her native Basque cuisine. Book well in advance and bring upwards of €100 a head. Closed Tues lunch, Mon & Sun; closed Aug.

 La Tourelle 5 rue Hautefeuille, 6^e ☎01.46.33.12.47; M^o St-Michel. This splendidly convivial, almost medieval-styled bistro offers fresh, simple and largely meaty cuisine. No bookings, so just turn up and wait. Closed Sat lunch & Sun; closed Aug.

Trocadéro, Eiffel Tower and the Septième

See map, pp.144–145.

Bars and cafés

Café du Marché 38 rue Cler, 7^e ☎01.47.05.51.27; M^o La Tour-Maubourg. This big, busy café-brasserie in the bustling heart of the rue Cler market serves inexpensive, market-fresh plats du jour. Mon–Sat noon–11pm.

Café du Musée d'Orsay 1 rue Bellechasse, 7^e; RER Musée-d'Orsay/M^o Solférino. Superb views through the giant clockface dominating the museum's rooftop café, which serves snacks and drinks. Tues–Sun 11am–5pm.

Restaurants

 L'Arpège 84 rue de Varenne, 7^e ☎01.45.05.09.06; M^o Varenne. Elite chef Alain Passard shocked the gastronomic establishment at his Michelin-starred restaurant by making vegetables the centrepiece of his cuisine. Exhilarating cooking in a (relatively) relaxed, plain setting. Budget on €100 as a bare minimum, and book well in advance. Closed Sat & Sun.

Chez Germaine 30 rue Pierre-Leroux, 7^e ☎01.42.73.28.34; M^o Duroc/Vaneau. This tiny family-run restaurant packs them in for the inexpensive lunchtime menu of simple but perfectly cooked French food. Mon–Fri noon–2.30pm & 7–10pm, Sat noon–2.30pm; closed Aug.

La Fontaine de Mars 19 rue St-Dominique, 7^e ☎01.47.05.46.44; M^o École-Militaire/La Tour-Maubourg. Almost entirely decked out in genteel pinks – tablecloths, napkins, gingham café-curtains – this local restaurant is formal but friendly, and there’s a wonderful summer terrasse under a stone arcade that’s perfect for lunch (€16 menu). Daily noon–3pm & 7.30–11pm.

Jules Verne South Pillar, Eiffel Tower, 7^e ☎01.45.55.61.44; M^o École Militaire. Genuinely haute cuisine – served on the second-floor of the Eiffel Tower. The decor feels a bit moodily 1980s, but there are lots of romantic corners and the food is truly gastronomic. Book three months in advance. Lunch menu at €49 (weekdays only), evening menus from €114. Daily 12.15–1.45pm & 7.15–9.45pm.

Le P’tit Troquet 28 rue de l’Exposition, 7^e ☎01.47.05.80.39; M^o École Militaire. Tiny, discreet restaurant done out like an elegant antiques shop, serving delicate and classy traditional cuisine to the diplomats and politicians of the quartier. Expect to pay upwards of €30. Mon 7.30–10pm, Tues–Sat 12.30–2.30pm & 7.30–10pm.

Thoumieux 79 rue St-Dominique, 7^e ☎01.47.05.49.75; M^o La Tour-Maubourg. Cavernous, bemirrored traditional brasserie, popular with a smart local clientele for reliable classics. The basic lunch menu is inexpensive, but you’ll pay over €30 in the evening. Daily noon–3.30pm & 6.30pm–midnight.

Montmartre & le Neuvième

See map, p.156.

Bars and cafés

Le Bar du Relais 12 rue Ravignan, 18^e; M^o Abbesses. Quaint building in a beautiful spot just under the Butte, with tables out on the little square where Picasso’s Beateau-Lavoir studio used to be. Quiet and atmospheric by day, youthful and bohemian by night, with an electronique playlist. Mon–Thurs 3pm–2am, Fri–Sun noon–2am.

Café des Deux Moulins 15 rue Lepic, 18^e; M^o Blanche. Having seen its heyday of fans on the trawl of Amélie lore (she waited tables here in the film), this diner-style café is back to its old self: a down-to-earth neighborhood hangout, preserved in a bright, charming 1950s interior. The Sunday brunch is popular. Daily 7am–2am.

L’Été en Pente Douce 23 rue Muller, cnr rue Paul-Albert, 18^e; M^o Anvers/Château Rouge. Pure

Montmartre atmosphere, with chairs and tables set out beside the long flight of steps that leads up to Sacré-Coeur from the eastern side. Serves good, fairly inexpensive traditional French plats. Daily noon–midnight.

La Fourmi Café 74 rue des Martyrs, 18^e; M^o Pigalle/Abbesses. Trendy, high-ceilinged café-bar, full of conscientiously beautiful young Parisians drinking coffee by day and cocktails at night to a retro-lounge soundtrack. Mon–Thurs 8am–2am, Fri & Sat 8am–4am, Sun 10am–2am.

 Le Progrès 1 rue Yvonne Le Tac, 18^e; M^o Abbesses/Anvers. This café is something of a lighthouse for the young bobos (bohemian-bourgeois) of Montmartre. By day a simple, relaxed café serving reasonably priced meals and salads (€12–15), at night it turns into a lively bar. Daily 9am–2am.

Le Sancerre 35 rue des Abbesses, 18^e; M^o Abbesses. A fashionable, sunny hangout under the southern slope of Montmartre, with a row of outside tables that’s perfect for watching the world go by. The food can be disappointing. Daily 7am–2am.

Au Rendez-vous des Amis 23 rue Gabrielle, 18^e; M^o Abbesses. Halfway up the Butte, this small, ramshackle, smoky and community-spirited hangout is a magnet for Montmartre locals, especially the young, artsy and alternative. Daily 8.30am–2am.

Restaurants

Le Bistro des Deux-Théâtres 18 rue Blanche, cnr rue Pigalle, 9^e ☎01.45.26.41.43; M^o Trinité. Classic luvvie hangout serving particularly good cuisine bourgeoise in a long, plush dining room decorated with actors’ photos. The €32 all-in menu includes an aperitif, half a bottle of wine and coffee. Daily noon–2.30pm & 7pm–12.30am.

Chez les Fondus 17 rue des Trois Frères, 18^e ☎01.42.55.22.65; M^o Abbesses. The €15 menu here gets you a hearty fondue – Bourguignonne (meat) or Savoyarde (cheese) – and your personal baby bottle of wine. It’s unflatteringly popular with a raucous young Parisian crowd, who squeeze onto the banquettes between the zanily graffitied walls. Daily 5pm–2am.

La Famille 41 rue des Trois-Frères, 18^e ☎01.42.52.11.12; M^o Abbesses. Customers at the laid-back Famille are trendy, local, thirty-somethings for the most part, and the decor is appropriately distressed, urban-designer in feel. The food is jocularly retro but worryingly hit-and-miss – some think the “KFC-style” chicken very witty, for instance; others find it inedible. Menus for around €30. Meals served Tues–Sat 9–11.15pm, bar till around 2am; closed three weeks in Aug.

Au Grain de Folie 24 rue La Vieuville, 18°
 ☎01.42.58.15.57; M° Abbesses. Tiny, simple and colourfully dilapidated vegetarian place. All the food is inexpensive and organic and there's always a vegan option. Mon–Sat 12.30–2.30pm & 7–10.30pm, Sun 12.30–10.30pm.

Haynes 3 rue Clauzel, 9° ☎01.48.78.40.63; M° St-Georges. Classic black American soul-food restaurant with a jazz-cellar feel – and blues or jazz most nights from around 8pm. Around €40, with wine. Tues–Sat 7.30pm–12.30am.

Le Mono 40 rue Véron, 18° ☎01.46.06.99.20; M° Abbesses. Welcoming, family-run Togolese restaurant. The delicious mains (around €10) are mostly grilled fish or meats served with sour-sweet, hot sauces and rice or cassava on the side. There's a great atmosphere, with soukous (African rumba) on the stereo and Togolese carvings on the walls. Closed Wed.

 Le Relais Gascon 6 rue des Abbesses, 18°
 ☎01.42.58.58.22; M° Abbesses. Serving filling and inexpensive meals all day, this noisy two-storey restaurant provides a welcome blast of Gascon heartiness. Offers enormous hot salads for €10.50. Daily 10am–2am.

Le Restaurant 32 rue Véron, 18°
 ☎01.42.23.06.22; M° Abbesses. The decor and clientele follow the fashion for distressed, arty chic but, while there are a few adventurous flavours, most of the food is surprisingly homely and robust. Two-course menu at around €20. Mon–Fri 12.30–2.30pm & 7.30pm–midnight, Sat 7.30–11.30pm.

Northern Paris

Bars and cafés

Le Dépanneur 27 rue Fontaine, 9°; M° Pigalle. Relaxed all-night bar just off place Pigalle. One to know about for winding down after clubbing. Open 24 hours.

Restaurants

Bistral 80 rue Lemercier, 17° ☎01.42.63.59.61; M° Place de Clichy. Imaginatively cooked food with superb ingredients in a relaxed, modern setting. The blackboard menu changes daily but you might find a delicious lamb loin with a shrimp crust or andouille in a pepper butter. Mon–Fri noon–2.30pm & 7.30–10.30pm, Sat 7.30–11pm.

Le Morosophe 83 rue Legendre, 17°
 ☎01.53.06.82.82; M° Brochant. Relaxed contemporary bistro serving unpretentious but well-cooked seasonal dishes. Lunchtime menu at €12, evenings at €27. Closed Sun.

Le Relais Savoyard 13 rue Rodier, cnr rue Agent-Bailly, 9° ☎01.45.26.17.48; M° Notre-Dame-de-Lorette/Anvers/Cadet. Generous helpings of inexpensive and hearty Savoyard cuisine in a little dining room at the back of a local bar. Closed Sun, Mon lunch & two weeks in Aug.

Wepler 14 place de Clichy, 17° ☎01.45.22.53.24; M° Place de Clichy. As palatial, historic brasseries go, Wepler has remained unashamedly unfussy. Serves honest brasserie fare (€18 for two courses, €25 for three). Daily noon–1am, café from 7am.

Eastern Paris

Bars and cafés

L'Atmosphère 49 rue Lucien-Sampaix, 10°; M° Gare-de-l'Est. Lively café-bar by the canal St-Martin, with an alternative flavour and occasional live music on Sundays. Tues–Fri 11am–2am, Sat 5.30pm–2am.

Le Baron Rouge 1 rue Théophile-Roussel, cnr place d'Aligre market, 12°; M° Ledru-Rollin. This traditional bar à vins is perfect for a light lunch or aperitif after shopping at the place d'Aligre market. If it's crowded inside, join the locals standing around the wine barrels on the pavement lunching on saucisson or mussels washed down with a glass of Muscadet. Tues–Sat 10am–2pm & 5–9.30pm, Sun 10am–2pm.

Café Charbon 109 rue Oberkampf, 11°; M° St-Maur/Parmentier. A very successful and attractive resuscitation of a fin-de-siècle café, packed in the evenings with a young and trendy clientele, quieter during the day and ideal for a leisurely breakfast or an aperitif in the early evening. Beer €2.30; full-blown meals (€20–25) also available noon–2.30pm & 8–11pm. Wed–Sat 9am–4am, Sun–Tues 9am–2am.

Chez Prune 36 rue Beaufort, 10°
 ☎01.42.41.30.47; M° Jacques-Bonsergent. A very friendly and laid-back café-bar with pleasant outdoor seating overlooking the canal. Creative assiettes (around €9) are guaranteed to tempt both meat-eaters and vegetarians, and it's a romantic place to sip a glass of wine or indulge in a dessert. Mon–Sat 7.30am–1.45am, Sun 10am–1.45am.

Lou Pascalou 14 rue des Panoyaux, 20°; M° Ménilmontant. This local boho hangout with a zinc bar is a great place for a relaxing evening drink. Be sure to try some of their delicious mint tea – over a game of chess if you fancy it. There's a wide range of beers, bottled and on tap, from €2 and cocktails from €5. Daily 9am–2am.

La Mère Lachaise 78 bd Ménilmontant, 20°
 ☎01.47.97.61.60; M° Père-Lachaise. The sunny terrace of this stylish bar-restaurant makes a good place for a drink after a visit to Père-Lachaise, while the cosy interior bar has a retro-chic decor of painted wood and wrought-iron lamps. Mon–Sat 8am–2am, Sun 9am–1am.

Café de la Musique 213 av Jean-Jaurès, M° Porte-de Pantin. Part of the Cité de la Musique, this café, with a popular terrace just inside the La Villette complex, was designed by the Cité architect Portzamparc and exudes sophistication, discretion and comfort, but be prepared to pay over the odds for a coffee. Daily till 2am.

Café Tribal cour des Petites-Écuries, 10°; M° Château-d'Eau. Tucked down an atmospheric side street, this North African-tinged café-bar pulls in the new bohemians of the quarter with loud music, cheap beer and mojitos, outside tables and free couscous on Friday and Saturday nights (or free moules frites on Wed and Thurs). Daily noon–2am.

Le Viaduc Café 43 av Daumesnil, 12°; M° Gare-de-Lyon. A stylish restaurant-bar in one of the Viaduc des Arts' converted railway arches, with seating outside in nice weather. Ideal for lunch (€17) or drinks after perusing the galleries or walking the Promenade Plantée. The three-course Sunday jazz brunch from noon to 4pm is especially popular. Daily 8am–2am.

De La Ville Café 34 bd de la Bonne Nouvelle, 10°; M° Bonne-Nouvelle. This ex-bordello, with grand staircase, gilded mosaics and marble columns, draws a fashionable crowd. On weekends, well-known DJs spin the disks till the early hours. Cocktails cost €8, a demi €3.50. Daily 11am–2am, Fri & Sat till 4am.

Restaurants

Les Allobroges 71 rue des Grands-Champs, 20° ☎01.43.73.40.00; M° Maraichers. Charming neighbourhood restaurant, serving traditional French cuisine to consistently high standards.

Count on around €35 a head. Closed Sun & Mon & Aug.

Flo 7 cour des Petites-Écuries, 10° ☎01.47.70.13.59; M° Château-d'Eau. Tucked away down a secret side alley, this is a dark, handsome and extremely atmospheric old-time brasserie. Fish and seafood are the specialties, but the food is generally excellent – if not cheap, at around €25 minimum. Daily 11am–1am.

Jacques-Mélaç 42 rue Léon-Frot, 11°; M° Charonne. Some way off the beaten track (between Père-Lachaise and place Léon-Blum) but a highly respected and very popular bistro à vins, whose patron even makes his own wine – the solitary vine winds round the front of the shop. The food (plats around €12), wines and atmosphere are great; no bookings. Tues–Sat 9am–10.30pm; closed Aug.

Julien 16 rue du Faubourg-St-Denis, 10° ☎01.47.70.12.06; M° Strasbourg-St-Denis. Part of the same enterprise as Flo (see above), with an even more splendid decor of globe lamps, brass, murals, white linen and polished wood – if not such a romantic situation. Similar high-quality brasserie cuisine at the same prices. Daily until 1am.

Lao Siam 49 rue de Belleville, 19° ☎01.40.40.09.68; M° Belleville. The surroundings are nothing special, but the excellent Thai and Laotian food, popular with locals, makes up for it. From €20 a head. Mon–Fri noon–3pm & 6–11.30pm, Sat & Sun noon–12.30am.

La Mansouria 11 rue Faidherbe-Chaligny, 11° ☎01.43.71.00.16; M° Faidherbe-Chaligny. An

Paris for vegetarians

The chances of finding vegetarian main dishes on the menus of traditional French restaurants are not good, though these days some of the newer, more innovative restaurants will often have one or two on offer. It's also possible to put together a meal from vegetarian starters, omelettes and salads. Your other option is to go for a Middle Eastern or Indian restaurant or head for one of the city's handful of proper vegetarian restaurants – they do tend to be based on a healthy diet principle rather than haute cuisine, but at least you get a choice. All the establishments listed below are reviewed in the pages that follow, listed under the relevant map area.

Les 5 Saveurs d'Anada 72 rue du Cardinal-Lemoine, see p.170.

Aquarius 40 rue de Gergovie, see p.172.

L'Arpège 84 rue de Varenne, see p.171.

Au Grain de Folie 24 rue de la Vieuville, see opposite.

Le Grenier de Notre Dame 18 rue de la Bûcherie, see p.171.

La Petite Légume 36 rue Boulangers, see p.171.

Piccolo Teatro 6 rue des Ecoiffes, see p.170.

La Victoire Suprême du Coeur 41 rue des Bourdonnais, see p.167.

excellent, elegant Moroccan restaurant, serving superb couscous and tagines. Set menu €29. Closed Sun eve & two weeks in Aug.

Pooja 91 passage Brady, 10^e ☎01.48.24.00.83; M^o Strasbourg-St-Denis/Château-d'Eau. Not quite London, let alone Bombay, but friendly and located in a glazed passage that is lined with Indian restaurants, all offering good if rather similar fare. Costs around €20 in the evening. Daily noon–3pm & 6–11pm; closed Mon lunchtime.

Terminus Nord 23 rue de Dunkerque, 10^e ☎01.42.85.05.15; M^o Gare-du-Nord. Another magnificent 1920s brasserie in the Flo family (same hours and prices; see p.175). The location right opposite the Gare du Nord draws a less local clientele, but it's a fine introduction – or farewell – to old-style Paris dining if you're travelling by Eurostar.

 Le Train Bleu Gare de Lyon, 12^e ☎01.43.43.09.06; M^o Gare de Lyon. The sumptuous decor of what must be the world's most luxurious station buffet is straight out of a bygone golden era – everything drips with gilt, and chandeliers hang from high ceilings frescoed with scenes from the Paris–Lyon–Marseilles train route. The traditional French cuisine has a hard time living up to all this, but is still pretty good, if a tad overpriced. The set menu costs €45, including half a bottle of wine; for à la carte reckon on €70. Daily 11.30am–3pm & 7–11pm.

Waly Fay 6 rue Godefroy-Cavaignac, 11^e ☎01.40.24.17.79; M^o Charonne. A moderately priced West African restaurant with a cosy, stylish atmosphere, the dim lighting, rattan and old, faded photographs creating an intimate, faintly colonial ambience. Smart young black and white Parisians come here to dine on perfumed, richly spiced stews and other West African delicacies. Mon–Sat noon–2pm & 7.30–11pm, Sun 11am–5pm; closed last two weeks of Aug.

Le Zéphyr 1 rue Jourdain, 20^e ☎01.46.36.65.81; M^o Jourdain. Trendy but relaxed 1930s Art Deco-style bistro where you'll pay around €13 for lunch – double that in the evenings – for fine traditional cooking. Daily noon–3pm & 7–11pm, closed Aug.

Southern Paris

Bars and cafés

 L'Entrepôt 7–9 rue Francis-de-Pressensé, 14^e; M^o Pernety. Arty cinema with a spacious, relaxed café, outside seating in the courtyard and frequent evening gigs. Offers a great Sunday brunch and plats for around €10–16. Mon–Sat noon–2am.

 La Folie en Tête 33 rue Butte-aux-Cailles, 13^e; M^o Place-d'Italie/Corvisart. Alternative-spirited, laid-back and distinctly lefty bar. Cheap drinks and snacks in the daytime and a wide-ranging soundtrack at night. Mon–Sat 5pm–2am.

Le Merle Moqueur 11 rue Butte-aux-Cailles, 13^e; M^o Place-d'Italie/Corvisart. Tiny, noisy and ramshackle bar serving up home-made flavoured rums to young Parisians. Daily 5pm–2am.

Le Select 99 bd du Montparnasse, 14^e; M^o Vavin. Perhaps not quite as famous as its immediate neighbours – the Dôme, the Rotonde and the other Montparnasse cafés frequented by Picasso, Modigliani, Cocteau and the rest – but much less spoilt, distinctly less expensive and infinitely more satisfying. Perfect for a coffee or a cognac. Mon–Thurs & Sun till 3am, Fri & Sat till 4.30am.

Restaurants

Aquarius 40 rue de Gergovie, 14^e ☎01.45.41.36.88; M^o Pernety/Plaisance. Homely vegetarian restaurant serving wholesome if not spectacular meals from a tiny kitchen. Mexican chilli and lasagne cost around €12. Closed Sun and three weeks in Aug/Sept.

Student restaurants

Students of any age – with an ISIC card – are eligible to apply for meal tickets for university cafeterias and restaurants. The tickets, which cost €4.80, have to be obtained from the particular restaurant of your choice (opening hours generally 11.30am–2pm & 6–8pm). Though the food isn't wonderful, you can't complain about the price. The most central venues are all on the Left Bank, and some of the most usefully located include: Châtelet, 10 rue Jean-Calvin, 5^e (M^o Censier-Daubenton; closed Sat & Sun); Mabillon, 3 rue Mabillon, 6^e (M^o Mabillon); Mazet, rue André Mazet, 6^e (M^o Odéon; lunch only). Not all serve both midday and evening meals, and most are closed on the weekend and only operate during term-time; the exception is Bullier, 39 av Georges-Bernanos, 5^e (M^o Port-Royal), which is open every day, including during vacations. A full list of venues is available from ☎www.crous-paris.fr.

Late-night Paris

It's not at all unusual for bars and brasseries in Paris to stay open after midnight; the list below is of cafés and bars that remain open after 2am, and restaurants that are open beyond midnight – though not all of the latter will still serve food beyond that time. Note that the three Drugstores, at 133 av des Champs-Élysées and 1 av Matignon in the 8^e, and 149 bd St-Germain in the 6^e, stay open till 2am, with bars, restaurants, shops and tabacs. Each restaurant is listed under the relevant map area in the main listings.

Bars and cafés

Le Dépanneur 27 rue Fontaine, 9^e. All-nighter, see p.174.

Fourmi Café 74 rue des Martyrs, 18^e. Mon–Thurs & Sun till 2am, Fri & Sat till 4am, see p.173.

Iguana 15 rue de la Roquette, 11^e. Daily till 5am, see p.168.

SanZSanS 49 rue du Faubourg-St-Antoine, 11^e. Daily till 5am, see p.169.

La Taverne de Nesle 32 rue Dauphine, 6^e. Mon–Thurs & Sun till 4am, Fri & Sat till 5am, see p.172.

De La Ville Café 34 bd de la Bonne Nouvelle, 10^e. Daily 11am–2am, Fri & Sat till 4am, see p.175.

Le Wax 15 rue Daual, 11^e. Tues–Thurs till 2am, Fri & Sat till 5am, see p.169.

Restaurants

L'Atlas 11 rue de Buci, 6^e. Daily till 1am, see p.172.

Bofinger 7 rue de la Bastille, 4^e. Daily till 1am, see p.169.

Brasserie Lipp 151 bd St-Germain, 6^e. Daily till 1am, see p.172.

Chez Gladines 30 rue des Cinq-Diamants, 13^e. Daily till 1am, see p.178.

Chez les Fondus 17 rue des Trois-Frères, 18^e. Daily till 2am, see p.173.

La Coupole 102 bd du Montparnasse, 14^e. Daily till 1am, see p.179.

L'Entrepôt 7–9 rue Francis-de-Pressensé, 14^e. Mon–Sat till 2am, see opposite.

La Famille 41 rue des Trois-Frères, 18^e. Daily till 2am, see p.173.

Flo 7 cours des Petites-Écuries, 10^e. Daily till 1.30am, see p.175.

Haynes 3 rue Clauzel, 9^e. Tues–Sat till 12.30am, see p.174.

Julien 16 rue du Faubourg-St-Denis, 10^e. Daily till 1am, see p.175.

N'Zadette M'Foua 152 rue du Château, 14^e. Daily till 2am, see p.179.

Au Pied de Cochon 6 rue Coquillière, 1^{er}. All-nighter, see p.167.

Polidor 41 rue Monsieur-le-Prince, 6^e. Mon–Sat till 12.30am, see p.172.

Le Relais Gascon 6 rue des Abbesses, 18^e. Daily till 2am, see p.174.

Terminus Nord 23 rue de Dunkerque, 10^e. Daily till 1am, see opposite.

À la Tour de Monthéry (Chez Denise) 5 rue des Prouvaires, 1^e. Mon–Fri till 5am, see p.167.

Vaudeville 29 rue Vivienne, 2^e. Daily till 1am, see p.167.

Wepler 14 place de Clichy, 17^e. Daily till 1am, see p.174.

Auberge Etchegorry 41 rue Croulebarbe, 13^e ☎01.44.08.83.51; M^o Gobelins. A former guinguette (dance hall) on the banks of the Bièvre, this Basque restaurant has an old-fashioned atmosphere of relaxed conviviality, and the food's good too. From around €35 a head. Closed Sun & Mon.

L'Avant Goût 37 rue Bobillot, 13^e

☎01.45.81.14.06; M^o Place d'Italie. Small neighbourhood restaurant with a big reputation for excitingly good modern French cuisine, and wines to match. Cool contemporary decor and presentation. The €15 lunch menu is one of the city's best deals; you'll pay upwards of €30 in the evening.

Ethnic restaurants of Paris

Our selection of Paris's ethnic restaurants only scratches the surface of what's available. North African places can be found just about everywhere, as can Indo-Chinese restaurants, with notable concentrations around avenue de la Porte-de-Choisy in the 13^e and in the Belleville Chinatown. Indian restaurants are common in and around the passage Brady in the 10^e. The Greeks, bunched together in rue de la Huchette, rue Xavier-Privas and along rue Mouffetard, all in the 5^e, are for the most part disappointing and overpriced. Each restaurant is listed under the relevant map area in the main listings.

West African and North African

Chez Omar 47 rue de Bretagne, 11^e, See p.169.

Café de l'Institut du Monde Arabe 1, rue des Fossés St-Bernard, 5^e, See p.170.

La Mansouria 11 rue Faidherbe-Chaligny, 11^e, See p.175.

Le Mono 40 rue Véron, 18^e, See p.174.

N'Zadette M'Foua 152 rue du Château, 14^e, See opposite.

Waly Fay 6 rue Godefroy-Cavaignac, 11^e, See p.176.

Indian

Pooja 91 passage Brady, 10^e, See p.176.

Indo-Chinese

Le Bambou 70 rue Baudricourt, 13^e, see below.

Dragons Élysées 11 rue de Berri, 8^e, see p.166.

Lao Siam 49 rue de Belleville, 20^e, see p.175.

Lao-Thai 128 rue de Tolbiac; 13^e, see opposite.

Pho 67 59 rue Galande, 5^e, see p.171.

Tricotin 15 av de Choisy, 13^e, see p.180.

Italian

L'Enoteca 25 rue Charles-V, 4^e, see p.170.

Japanese

Higuma 32bis rue Sainte-Anne 2^e, see p.166.

Jewish

L'As du Fallafel 34 rue des Rosiers, 4^e, see p.168.

Chez Marianne 2 rue des Hospitalières-Saint-Gervais, 4^e, see p.169.

Kurdish

Chez Dilan 13 rue Mandar, 2^e, see p.167.

Tibetan

Tashi Delek 4 rue des Fossés-St-Jacques, 5^e, see p.171.

Tues–Sat noon–2.30pm & 7.30–11pm; closed three weeks in Aug.

 Le Bambou 70 rue Baudricourt, 13^e ☎01.45.70.91.75; M^o Tolbiac. Tiny bistro crammed with punters, French and Vietnamese alike, tucking into sublimely fresh-tasting Vietnamese food, including giant, strongly flavoured pho soups. Tues–Sun noon–3pm & 7–10.30pm.

 Chez Gladines 30 rue des Cinq-Diamants, 13^e ☎01.45.80.70.10; M^o Corvisart. This excellent-value tiny corner bistro is always

Gourmet restaurants of Paris

It's worth budgeting for at least one meal in one of Paris's truly spectacular gourmet restaurants. One of the top rated is Alain Ducasse at the Plaza-Athénée hotel (see p.166). The first-ever chef to have been awarded six Michelin stars (shared between two restaurants), Ducasse swept like a tidal wave through the world of French cuisine in the early 1990s and hasn't looked back. Other greats include Pierre Gagnaire (see p.166), famed for its highly inventive cuisine, and Taillevent (see p.167), which concentrates on the great classics of French cooking, with a touch of the Mediterranean, and boasts a wine list out of this world. Relatively few gastronomic restaurants situate themselves on the Left Bank, but those that do tend to offer a surprise of some kind: Hélène Darroz, 4 rue d'Assas, 6^e (☎01.42.22.00.11) breaks the mould by being run by a woman and offering bold combinations; Alain Passard at L'Arpège (see p.172) works principally with vegetables; the theatrical, rooftop Le Tour d'Argent, 15–17 quai de la Tournelle, 5^e (🌐www.letourdargent.com), is four hundred years old and obsessed with duck; while at Jules Verne, up on the top floor of the Eiffel Tower (see p.173), the surprise is that the cooking matches the view.

At almost all of these restaurants you'll need to dress smartly; most prefer men to wear a jacket and tie. Prices are often cheaper if you go at midday during the week, and some offer a set lunch menu for around €70–90. Otherwise count on €100 as a bare minimum – the top menus soar above €200, and there's no limit on the amount you can pay for wine. Recently, some of the star chefs have made their fine cuisine more accessible to a wider range of customers by opening up less expensive and more casual high-quality establishments. In addition to presiding over the Plaza Athénée, for example, Alain Ducasse also runs the cutting-edge bistro Spoon, Food and Wine (see p.167), while Hélène Darroze has her relatively relaxed Salon d'Hélène on the ground floor (see p.172).

welcoming, with a young clientele packed in on rickety tables. Serves hearty Basque and southwest dishes such as magret de canard, and giant warm salads. Mon & Tues noon–3pm & 7pm–midnight, Wed–Sun noon–3pm & 7pm–1am.

Le Café du Commerce 51 rue du Commerce, 15^e ☎01.45.75.03.27; M° Émile-Zola. This former workers' brasserie has a dramatic setting on three levels around a buzzing central atrium. The emphasis is on high-quality meat, with inexpensive lunch menus and evening meals for around €30–40, all-in. Daily noon–midnight.

La Coupole 102 bd du Montparnasse, 14^e ☎01.43.20.14.20; M° Vavin. The most enduringly famous arty-chic Parisian hangout, with noisy conversation filling the huge and splendid dining room. The menu runs from oysters to Welsh rarebit; the evening menu is €33.50, or two courses for €23.50 before 6pm and after 10pm. The downstairs club gets going from around 9.30pm. Daily 8am–1am.

Lao-Thai 128 rue de Tolbiac, 13^e ☎01.44.24.28.10; M° Tolbiac. Big glass-fronted place on a busy interchange, serving fine Thai and Laotian food. Inexpensive lunch menus, otherwise around €25 for two. Daily except Wed.

N'Zadette M'Foua 152 rue du Château, 14^e ☎01.43.22.00.16; M° Pernety. Small, cheerily tacky Congolese restaurant serving tasty dishes such as maboké (meat or fish baked in banana leaves). It's mostly meat in sauces, but there's a vegetarian menu. Count on €20–30 a head. Tues–Sun 7pm–2am.

L'Os à Moëlle 3 rue Vasco de Gama, 15^e ☎01.45.57.27.27; M° Lourmel. On the southwestern edge of the city, chef Thierry Faucher's relaxed neighbourhood bistro offers superb French cuisine at reasonable prices (the evening menu is €38). His Cave de l'Os à Moëlle (☎01.45.57.28.88), across the road, is a friendly wine bar with communal tables groaning with excellent, homely food; for a mere €20 you just help yourself. Tues–Sat noon–2pm & 7pm–midnight; closed Aug.

La Régalade 49 av Jean-Moulin, 14^e ☎01.45.45.68.58; M° Alésia. Deceptively simple bistro whose utterly classic décor – tiled floor, plain old café furniture – matches the menu. But there's a surprise: the standard €30 prix fixe delivers a memorable meal in the best French tradition. Closed Mon lunch, Sat & Sun; closed Aug.

Le Temps des Cerises 18–20 rue Butte-aux-Cailles, 13° ☎01.45.89.69.48; M° Place-d'Italie/Corvisart. Welcoming restaurant – it's run as a workers' co-op – with elbow-to-elbow seating and a different daily choice of imaginative dishes. The lunch and evening menus are inexpensive, though there are opportunities to splash out a little too. Mon–Fri noon–2pm & 7.30–11.45pm, Sat 7.30pm–midnight.

Tricotin 15 av de Choisy, 13° ☎01.45.85.51.52 & ☎01.45.84.74.44; M° Porte-de-Choisy. Glazed in like a pair of overgrown fish tanks, the twin Tricotin restaurants are just set back from the broad av de Choisy, at the south end of Chinatown (next to the Chinese-signed McDonald's). Restaurant no. 1 (closed Tues) also specializes in Thai and grilled dishes, while no. 2 has a longer list of Vietnamese, Cambodian and steamed foods. Daily 9am–11.30pm.

Au Vin des Rues 21 rue Boulard, 14° ☎01.43.22.19.78. Charming old-fashioned bistro, with tiny tables and rickety wooden chairs serving solid French classics. Convivial atmosphere, especially on the rowdy accordion and pot-au-feu evenings (Thurs). Around €30 a head. Closed Sun lunch.

Music and nightlife

The strength of the Paris music scene is its diversity – a reputation gained mainly from its absorption of immigrant and exile populations. The city has no rival in Europe for the variety of world music to be discovered: Algerian, West and Central African, Caribbean and Latin American sounds are represented in force. You'll have to look out for individual gigs in one of the listings magazines (see map p.93), as most venues don't specialize but instead pursue eclectic programmes that might feature Congolese hip-hop cheek-by-jowl with home-grown pop-rock. For the quintessentially Parisian experience try to find a chanson night – the song style long associated with the city through wartime cabaret artists such as Edith Piaf, Maurice Chevalier and Charles Trenet and 1960s poet-musicians ranging from Georges Brassens to Serge Gainsbourg. Jazz fans are in for a treat, with all styles from New Orleans to current experimental to be heard, although in most clubs admission and drinks prices are a real drawback.

Nightlife recommendations for clubs are listed separately from live venues, though many clubs also showcase live acts on certain nights, and many concert venues hold DJ-led sessions after hours. Most clubs play électro, which covers anything from lounge to techno, though you'll also find some interesting Latin and African flavours, and rock music is once more on the up. Places that cater for a primarily gay or lesbian clientele are listed in the "Gay and lesbian Paris" section.

Classical music, as you might expect in this Neoclassical city, is in vibrant form. The Paris Opéra, with its two homes – the Opéra-Garnier and Opéra-Bastille – puts on a fine selection of opera and ballet. The need for advance reservations (except sometimes for the concerts held in churches) rather than the price is the major inhibiting factor here. On June 21 the Fête de la Musique sees live bands and free concerts of every kind of music throughout the city.

Information and tickets

See p.93 for listings magazines. The best places to get tickets for concerts, whether rock, jazz, chansons or classical, are branches of the FNAC chain, selling books and music: the main store is at Forum des Halles, 1–5 rue Pierre-Lescot, 1^{er} (☎01.40.41.40.00, @www.fnac.com; M° Chatelet-Les Halles), and there's one on the place de la Bastille (see p.198). Virgin Megastore (see p.198) also has a concerts booking agency.

Music venues

Most of the music venues listed below are also clubs, and some fall into many categories – the boundaries between world music and jazz, in particular, can be blurred. A few places have live music all week, but the majority host bands on just a couple of nights, usually Thursday to Saturday. Admission prices depend on who's playing, but you can expect to pay around €7–15 entry.

Rock and world music venues

Le Bataclan 50 bd Voltaire, 11° ☎ 01.43.14.00.30, www.le-bataclan.com; M° Oberkampf; see map pp.124–125. Classic ex-music-hall venue with one of the best and most eclectic line-ups of any venue, covering anything from international and local dance and rock musicians – Francis Cabrel, Chemical Brothers, Khaled, Moby – to opera, comedy and techno nights.

La Cigale 120 bd de Rochechouart, 18° ☎ 01.49.25.81.75, www.lacigale.fr; M° Pigalle. Formerly playing host to the likes of Mistinguett and Maurice Chevalier, since 1987 and a Philippe Starck renovation this historic, 1400-seater Pigalle theatre has become a leading venue for cutting-edge rock and indie acts, especially French and other continental European bands.

Café de la Danse 5 passage Louis-Philippe, 11° ☎ 01.47.00.57.59, www.chez.com/cafedeladanse; M° Bastille; see map pp.124–125. Rock, pop, world and folk music played in an intimate and attractive space. Open nights of concerts only.

Le Divan du Monde 75 rue des Martyrs, 18° ☎ 01.40.05.06.99, www.divandumonde.com; M° Pigalle. A youthful venue in a café whose regulars once included Toulouse-Lautrec. One of the city's most eclectic, exciting programmes, ranging from techno to Congolese rumba, with dancing till dawn on weekend nights.

Élysée Montmartre 72 bd de Rochechouart, 18° ☎ 01.55.07.06.00, www.elyseemontmartre.com; M° Anvers. A historic Montmartre nightspot with a wonderful, vast arched-roof dance floor. Hosts frequent gigs midweek from up-and-coming and touring bands, plus regular club events (including fortnightly party night Le Bal, with live acts and DJs playing all those 1980s French pop tunes you never sang along to, but everyone around you clearly did).

La Flèche d'Or 102bis rue de Bagnolet 20° ☎ 01.44.64.01.02, www.flechedor.com; M° Porte-de-Bagnolet. Friendly alternative venue set in a converted train station. Most nights from around 9pm there's a varied and inexpensive (often free) programme of indie, rock and club acts.

La Guinguette Pirate quai François Mauriac, 13° ☎ 01.44.06.96.45, www.guinguettepirate.com; M° Quai-de-la-Gare. Beautiful Chinese barge, moored alongside the quay in front of the Bibliothèque Nationale, hosting relaxed but upbeat world music nights from Tuesday to Sunday, with occasional excursions into chanson and slam poetry. Moored adjacent, the radical Péniche Alternat (www.alternat.org) and Batofar (see p.183) are excellent alternatives, with similarly adventurous programmes of gigs.

Maison des Cultures du Monde 101 bd Raspail, 6° ☎ 01.45.44.72.30, www.mcm.asso.fr; M° Rennes. All the arts from all over the world, including music, art, dance and theatre. Runs its own world music label, Inedit, and holds a festival of world theatre and music in March.

Le Nouveau Casino 109 rue Oberkampf, 11° ☎ 01.43.57.57.40, www.nouveaucasino.net. A sample month might include Swedish indie, Anglo-French electro-reggae, folk-hop and Belgian chanson. Turns into a club later on.

Olympia 28 bd des Capucines, 9° ☎ 08.92.68.33.68, www.olympiahall.com; M° Madeleine/Opéra. The classic Paris venue, a renovated old-style music hall hosting top international rock and pop acts, with a good programme of domestic stars as well.

Trabendo Parc de la Villette, 19° ☎ 01.49.25.81.75, www.trabendo.fr; M° Porte-de-Pantin. Despite its moderate size, this place attracts some big French and international names in the world, jazz and rock fields. Open on the nights of concerts only.

Zenith Parc de la Villette, 211 av Jean-Jaurès, 20° ☎ 01.42.08.60.00, www.le-zenith.com/paris; M° Porte-de-Pantin. Seating for 6000 in a giant tent designed exclusively for rock and pop concerts, with a good programme including acts like Coldplay, Morcheeba and Paco de Lucia. Head for the concrete column with a descending red aeroplane.

Jazz venues

Le Baiser Salé 58 rue des Lombards, 1er ☎ 01.42.33.37.71, www.lebaisersale.com; M° Châtelet. Small, crowded upstairs room with live music every night from 10pm – usually jazz, rhythm & blues, fusion, reggae or Brazilian. This is one of the less expensive jazz clubs, with free jam sessions on Mondays. The downstairs bar is great for just chilling out. Admission €5–18. Mon–Sat 5.30pm–6am.

Cabaret

Paris's cabaret clubs are still high-kicking along, but if you're looking for an atmosphere of sexy, bohemian exuberance you're better off in the gay bars of the Marais (see p.186) and if it's titillation you're after try the sex clubs of Pigalle. That said, the cabaret shows listed below provide a certain glitzy good time, and the dancers are superbly professional. Audiences are mostly groups of international tourists, paying top dollar. You can also choose to have dinner before the show, but you'll pay heavily for the privilege. To get away from the crowds, as long as you don't mind roughing it, you could visit the tiny transvestite cabaret on rue des Martyrs, just up from Pigalle métro.

Chez Michou 80 rue des Martyrs, 18^e ☎01.46.06.16.04, 🌐www.michou.com. At its best this is like a scene from an Almodóvar film, with transvestites masquerading as various female celebrities, lip-syncing to classic songs and teasing the audience – but you'll need to know your French pop culture to get the most out of it, and it can be rather desperate on a quiet night. Show €36, not including the various dinner menus.

Crazy Horse 12 av George-V, 8^e ☎01.47.23.32.32, 🌐www.lecrazyhorseparis.com; M^o George-V. At the sexier end of the scene, with lots of provocative “dancing”. Two shows daily at 8.30pm and 11pm (or three shows squeezed in on Saturdays at 8pm, 10.15pm and 12.15am). €90 including two drinks, or €49 standing at the bar.

Le Lido 116bis av des Champs-Élysées, 8^e ☎01.40.76.56.10, 🌐www.lido.fr; M^o George-V. The most spectacular show, with expensive lighting and sound effects, lots of professional, Vegas-style glitz. Two shows daily at 9.30pm (€100) and 11.30pm (€80).

Le Moulin Rouge 82 bd de Clichy, 18^e ☎01.53.09.82.82, 🌐www.moulinrouge.fr; M^o Blanche. The traditional Paris show, with the serried ranks of the sixty Doriss Girls' frilly knickers as the highlight. Shows at 9pm (€97) and 11pm (Thurs–Sun only; €87). Book up to two months in advance at weekends.

Le Bilboquet 13 rue St-Benoît, 6^e ☎01.45.48.81.84, 🌐jazzclub.bilboquet.free.fr; M^o St-Germain. Traditional jazz can be heard nightly at this smart, comfortable club founded in 1947 and once host to legendary greats such as Charlie Parker and Stéphane Grappelli. The music starts at 9.30pm, and food is served until 1am. Admission €18. Mon–Sat 9pm–dawn.

Caveau de la Huchette 5 rue de la Huchette, 5^e ☎01.43.26.65.05, 🌐www.caveaudelahuchette.fr; M^o St-Michel. One of the city's oldest jazz clubs dating back to the mid-1940s. Both Lionel Hampton and Sidney Bechet played here. Live jazz, usually trad and big band, to dance to on a floor surrounded by tiers of benches. Popular with students. Admission Sun–Thurs €11; Fri & Sat €13; drinks around €6. Daily 9.30pm–2am or later.

New Morning 7–9 rue des Petites-Écuries, 10^e ☎01.45.23.51.41, 🌐www.newmorning.com; M^o Château-d'Eau. This cavernous, somewhat spartan venue, an ex-printing press, is the place to hear the big international names on the circuit. It's often standing room only unless you get here early. Admission €16.50–20. Usually Mon–Sat 8pm–1.30am (concerts start around 9pm).

Le Petit Journal 71 bd St-Michel, 5^e ☎01.43.26.28.59; RER Luxembourg. Small, smoky bar, with good, mainly French, traditional and mainstream sounds. These days rather middle-aged and tourist-prone. Admission, including first drink, €16, subsequent drinks €6; €43–48 including meal. Closed Aug.

Le Petit Journal Montparnasse 13 rue du Commandant-Mouchotte, 14^e ☎01.43.21.56.70, 🌐www.petitjournal-montparnasse.com; M^o Montparnasse. Under the Hôtel Montparnasse, and sister establishment to the above, with bigger visiting names, both French and international. Admission free, but first drink around €18. Mon–Sat 8.30pm–2am (concerts from 10pm). Closed mid-July to mid-Aug.

Le Petit Opportun 15 rue des Lavandières-Ste-Opportune, 1^{re} ☎01.42.36.01.36; M^o Châtelet-Les Halles. Arrive early to get a seat for the live music in the dungeon-like cellar where the acoustics play strange tricks and you can't always see the musicians. Fairly eclectic policy and a crowd of genuine connoisseurs. Admission, including first drink, from €11, subsequent drinks €4. Tues–Sat 9pm–dawn, with first set starting at 10.30pm; closed Aug.

Le Sunside/Le Sunset 60 rue des Lombards, 1^{er}
 ☎ 01.40.26.46.60, 🌐 www.sunset-sunside.com; M^o
 Châtelet-Les Halles. Two clubs in one: Le Sunside on the ground floor features mostly traditional jazz, whereas the downstairs Sunset is a venue for electric and fusion jazz. The Sunside concert usually starts at 9 or 9.30pm and the Sunset at 10pm, so you can sample a bit of both. Admission €20–25.
 Daily 9pm–2.30am.

Utopia 79 rue de l'Ouest, 14^e ☎ 01.43.22.79.66;
 M^o Pernety. No genius here, but good French blues singers interspersed with jazz and blues records, with a mainly young, studenty audience and a pleasant atmosphere. Admission free; drinks from €8. Mon–Sat 10pm–dawn; closed Aug.

Chanson venues

Casino de Paris 16 rue de Clichy, 9^e
 ☎ 01.49.95.99.99, 🌐 www.casinodeparis.fr; M^o Trinité. This decaying, once-plus former casino in one of the seediest streets in Paris is a venue for all sorts of performances – including chansons, poetry combined with flamenco guitar and cabaret.

Clubs

The clubs listed below are recommended as dance venues, although a few also put on live music gigs. It's worth remembering that most of the places listed under "Music venues" also function as clubs, and many gay and lesbian venues attract mixed crowds, often from the trendy end of the nightlife spectrum. Things rarely kick off before 1am, and at the most fashionable places you'll need to look good to avoid hanging around at the velvet rope. You'll have to keep your ear to the ground to find the very latest must-go soirée – check out the listings in Zurban magazine (see p.93), or try simply asking around in likely-looking bars or music shops. Most entry prices include one free drink, and vary according to when you turn up – usually anything from €10–12 on weekdays to €15–20 on Friday and Saturday after midnight; exceptions are noted below. Given the difficulty of finding a taxi after hours (see p.96), many Parisian clubbers just keep going until the métro starts running at around 5.30am.

L'Atlantis 32 quai d'Austerlitz, 13^e ☎ 01.44.23.24.00; M^o Gare d'Austerlitz. The number one black music club in Paris, and one of the biggest, most up-tempo and most hustly clubs of all. Soirées include African and Caribbean nights, but there's a backbone of hip-hop and R&B.

Batofar quai François Mauriac, 13^e
 ☎ 01.56.29.10.00, 🌐 www.batofar.org. This old lighthouse boat moored at the foot of the Bibliothèque Nationale is a small but classic address.
 The programme is very eclectic: from dancehall to electroclash via contemporary Brazilian

Check the listings magazines under "Variétés" and "Chansons". Most performances start at 8.30pm.
 Tickets start at €20.

Au Limonaire 18 Cité Bergère, 9^e
 ☎ 01.45.23.33.33, 🌐 limonaire.free.fr; M^o Grands Boulevards. Tiny backstreet venue, perfect for Parisian chanson nights showcasing young singers and zany music/poetry/performance acts. Dinner beforehand – traditional, inexpensive, and fairly good – guarantees a seat for the show at 10pm (Tues–Sat) – otherwise you'll be crammed up against the bar, if you can get in at all.

La Locandiera 145 rue Oberkampf, 11^e
 ☎ 01.56.98.12.18; M^o Mémilmontant. Friendly Italian bar-restaurant with a vaulted basement that frequently features chanson acts (from 9pm) – both in the classic French manner and with pop, world and jazz inflections. Free.

Au Magique 42 rue de Gergovie, 14^e
 ☎ 01.45.42.26.10, 🌐 www.aumagique.com; M^o
 Pernety. A bar and "chanson cellar" with traditional French chanson performances by lesser-known stars during the week. At weekends the owner takes to the piano. Admission is free, payment for the show is at your own discretion, and drinks are very reasonably priced. Wed–Sat 8pm–2am.

sounds. Entry is usually around €10. Tues–Thurs 8pm–2am, Fri 11pm–dawn, Sat 11pm–noon.

Le Cab 2 place du Palais-Royal, 1^{er}
 ☎ 01.58.62.56.25; M^o Palais-Royal; see map, pp.110–111. This miniature maze of a cellar club drags the beautiful people away from the Champs-Élysées – on weekend nights you'll need to look good to get in, though dining beforehand at the glitzy supper club certainly helps. Designer retro-meets-futuristic lounge decor, with a similar music policy. Mon–Sat 11.30pm–5am.

La Locomotive 90 bd de Clichy, 18°
 ☎ 08.36.69.69.28, 🌐 www.laloco.com; M° Blanche; see map, p.156. High-tech monster club with three dance floors, all playing variations on house.
 Tues–Sun 11pm–dawn.

Man Ray 34 rue Marbeuf, 8° ☎ 01.56.88.36.36, 🌐 www.manray.fr; see map, pp.110–111. Celebrity-designed, celebrity-patronized, and celebrity-owned (Johnny Depp is among the owners), this is Paris's A-list "gastro-club", set in a vast and very theatrical underground space. Dining tables are cleared away at midnight to reveal the dancefloor. Entry free, but drinks very expensive at around €15. Sun–Thurs 7pm–2am, Fri & Sat
 7pm–5am.

Le Pulp 25 bd Poissonnière, 2°, 🌐 www.pulp-paris.
 com; M° Bonne-Nouvelle; see map, pp.110–111.
 Ultra-fashionable lesbian club with superb (and free) mixed nights Wed and Thurs. Wed–Sat midnight–6am.

Rex Club 5 bd Poissonnière, 2° ☎ 01.42.36.28.83;
 M° Grands-Boulevards; see map, pp.110–111.
 The clubbers' club: spacious and serious about its music, which is strictly electronic, notably techno.

 Attracts big-name DJs such as Laurent Garnier.
 Entry around €13. Thurs–Sat 11.30pm–6am; closed Aug.

Le Triptyque 142 rue Montmartre, 2°
 ☎ 01.40.28.05.55, 🌐 www.letriptyque.com; M°
 Palais de la Bourse; see map, p.122. Unpretentious club packed with anyone from local students to lounge lizards. For once, it's all about the music, with concerts earlier on, then themed DJ soirées which change nightly – everything from electro to jazz to hip-hop to ska. Entry is sometimes free on some nights; others rise to around €15. Open daily till 6am.

WAGG 62 rue Mazarine, 6° ☎ 01.55.42.22.00; M°
 Odéon; see map, pp.138–139 International St-Germain yuppie-types lounge around on designer furnishings in this intimate, Conran-designed cellar club. The music is UK-influenced house and disco-funk. Fri & Sat 11.30pm–dawn, Sun 5pm–midnight.
 Entry €15, free on Sun.

Classical music

Paris is a stimulating environment for classical music, both established and contemporary. The former is well represented in performances within churches – sometimes free or very cheap – and in an enormous choice of commercially promoted concerts held every day of the week. Contemporary and experimental computer-based work also flourishes.

Concert venues

Some of the city's most dynamic and eclectic programming is to be found at the Cité de la Musique at La Villette (🌐 www.cite-musique.fr; M° Porte-de-Pantin). Ancient music, contemporary works, jazz, chanson and music from all over the world can be heard at the complex's two major concert venues: the Conservatoire (the national music academy) at 209 av Jean-Jaurès, 19° (☎ 01.40.40.46.46); and the Salle des Concerts at 221 av Jean-Jaurès, 19° (☎ 01.44.84.44.84).

These apart, the top auditoriums are: Salle Gaveau, 45 rue de la Boétie, 8° (☎ 01.49.53.05.07, 🌐 www.sallegaveau.com; M° Miromesnil); Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, 15 av Montaigne, 8° (☎ 01.49.52.50.50, 🌐 www.theatrechampselysees.fr; M° Alma-Marceau); the Théâtre Musical de Paris (🌐 www.chatelet-theatre.com; M° Châtelet) and the Salle Pleyel, 252 rue du Faubourg-St-Honoré, 8° (☎ 08.25.00.02.52, 🌐 www.pleyel.com; M° Concorde). Tickets are best bought at the box offices, though for big names you may find overnight queues, and a large number of seats are always booked by subscribers. The price range is very reasonable.

Churches and museums are also good places to hear classical music. Regular concerts can be caught at the Église St-Séverin, 1 rue des Prêtres St-Séverin, 5° (☎ 01.48.24.16.97; M° St-Michel); the Église St-Julien le Pauvre, 23 quai de Montebello, 5° (☎ 01.42.26.00.00; M° St-Michel); and the Sainte-Chapelle, 4 bd du Palais, 1^{er} (☎ 01.42.77.65.65; M° Cité).

The Musée du Louvre (@www.louvre.com) and the Musée d'Orsay (@www.musee-orsay.fr) both host chamber music recitals in their auditoriums, while from time to time the Musée National du Moyen-Âge holds recitals of medieval music. Sometimes free classical concerts take place at Radio France, 166 av du Président-Kennedy, 16^e (☎01.56.40.15.16, @radio-france.fr; M^o Passy).

Opera

Despite the inevitable discussion about the acoustics of the new opera house, opened in 1989, the Opéra-Bastille orchestra is first-rate and nearly every performance is a sell-out. The current musical director, Belgian Gérard Mortier, has been pulling audiences in with some daring and unusual offerings. 2005 saw a sell-out performance of Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, directed by Peter Sellars and designed by the video artist Bill Viola. Tickets (€5–150) can be bought online (@www.opera-de-paris.fr): the date that tickets go on sale varies with each production and is given on the site. You can also book by phone (Mon–Fri 9am–6pm, Saturday 9am–1pm; ☎01.72.29.35.35, or at the ticket office (Mon–Sat 11am–6.30pm) within two weeks of the performance – the number of tickets available by this stage however is limited and for popular performances people start queuing at 9am, if not earlier. Unfilled seats are sold at a discount to students fifteen minutes before the curtain goes up, and 62 standing tickets at €5 are available for Opéra-Bastille performances one and a half hours before the curtain goes up.

The Opéra-Bastille enjoys a friendly rivalry with the Théâtre du Châtelet, 1 place du Châtelet, 1^{er} (☎01.40.28.28.40; M^o Châtelet), which also puts on large-scale productions. Operas are still staged at the old Opéra-Garnier, place de l'Opéra, 9^e (☎08.92.89.90.90, @www.opera-de-paris.fr; M^o Opéra), though these days it hosts mostly ballets; the procedure for getting tickets for the latter is the same as for the Opéra-Bastille above. Operetta, as well as more daring modern operas, are performed at the Opéra-Comique, Salle Favart, 5 rue Favart, 2^e (☎01.42.44.45.46, @www.opera-comique.com; M^o Richelieu-Drouot).

Festivals

Festivals are plentiful in all the diverse fields that come under the far too general term of “classical”. The Festival d'Art Sacré consists mainly of concerts and recitals of early sacred music (end of Nov to mid-Dec; @www.festivaldartsacre.new.fr); concerts feature in the general arts Festival d'Automne (mid-Sept to end Dec; @www.festival-automne.com); and a Festival Chopin is held in the lovely setting of the Bois de Boulogne's Orangerie (mid-June to mid-July; @www.frederic-chopin.com).

For details of these and more, the current year's festival schedule is available from tourist offices or their website (@www.paris-info.com).

Gay and lesbian Paris

Paris is one of Europe's major centres for gay men, with numerous bars, clubs, restaurants, saunas and shops catering for a gay clientele. Its focal point is the Marais, whose central street, rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie, has visibly gay commerces at almost every other address. Lesbians have many fewer dedicated addresses, but there are a handful of women-only places. The high spot of the calendar is the annual Marche des Fiertés LGBT, or gay pride march, which normally takes place on the last Saturday in June.

Information and contacts

The gay and lesbian community is well catered for by the media, the best source of information being Têtu (www.tetu.com), France's main gay monthly magazine – the name means “headstrong”. Alternatively, have a look at www.paris-gay.com, a major portal for gay tourists visiting Paris.

Centre Gai et Lesbien de Paris 3 rue Keller, 11^e ☎ 01.43.57.21.47 www.cglparis.org; M° Ledru-Rollin/Bastille/Voltaire. The first port-of-call for information and advice – legal, social, psychological and medical, this also has a good library and puts on small exhibitions. Mon–Sat 4–8pm.

Maison des Femmes 163 rue de Charenton, 12^e ☎ 01.43.43.41.13, www.maisondesfemmes.free.fr; M° Reuilly-Diderot. Feminist campaigning centre that organizes occasional gay/straight lunches and social nights. Mon–Wed 9am–7pm, Thurs & Fri 9am–5pm.

Les Mots à la Bouche 6 rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie, 4^e ☎ 01.42.78.88.30, www.motsbouche.com; M° Hôtel-de-Ville. The main gay and lesbian bookshop, with exhibition space, meeting rooms and lots of free maps, listings and club flyers to pick up. There is a selection of literature in English, and one of the helpful assistants usually speaks English too. Mon–Sat 11am–11pm, Sun 2–8pm.

Pharmacie du Village 26 rue du Temple, 4^e ☎ 01.42.72.60.71; M° Hôtel-de-Ville. Gay-run pharmacy. Open Mon–Sat 8.30am–9.30pm, Sun 9am–8pm.

SOS Homophobie ☎ 01.48.06.42.41, www.sos-homophobie.org. First-stop helpline for victims of homophobia. Lines open Mon–Fri & Sun 8–10pm, Sat 2–4pm.

Bars and clubs

In terms of nightlife, Paris is one of the world's great cities to be gay. The Marais area, especially, has a wide range of gay venues – the selection given below only scratches the surface – and although lesbians do not enjoy a wide selection of women-only places, they are welcome in some of the predominantly male clubs. The reputation of wild hedonism in gay clubs has spread outside the gay community and attracted heterosexuals in search of a good time. Consequently, heterosexuals are welcome in some gay establishments if in gay company – some gay clubs have all but abandoned a gay policy – while many of the more mainstream clubs have started doing gay nights. For a complete rundown, consult Têtu magazine's Agenda section.

Amnésia Café 42 rue Vieille-du-Temple, 4^e; M^o Hotel-de-Ville/St-Paul; see map, pp.126–127. Daily 10am–2am. One of the more relaxed and friendlier gay bars in the Marais, with a predominantly Parisian, fairly well-heeled clientele lounging around on the sofas. Low-lit, cosy and straight-friendly.

Banana Café 13 rue de la Ferronnerie, 1^{er} ①01.42.33.35.31; M^o Châtelet; see map, p.122. Seriously hedonistic club-bar, packing in the punters with up-tempo clubby tunes. Daily 6pm–5am.

Bliss Kfé 30 rue du Roi de Sicile, 3^e ①01.42.78.49.36; M^o St-Paul; see map, pp.126–127. Small, laid-back and faintly grungy bar with a good programme of DJ soirées, massage sessions and so on. Draws a friendly, fairly cool crowd of lesbians, straights and gay guys. At weekends, people spill down the stairs into the cellar bar later on. Daily 5pm–2am.

Le Carré 18 rue du Temple, 4^e; M^o Hotel-de-Ville; see map, pp.126–127. Big, stylish, designer café with good food, comfortable chairs, ultra-cool lighting and an excellent terrasse on the street. Mostly full of sophisticated, good-looking Parisians, with a loyal local gay clientele. Daily 10am–4am.

Le Cox 15 rue des Archives, 3^e ①01.42.72.08.00; M^o Hôtel-de-Ville; see map, pp.126–127. Muscly, body-beautiful clientele up for a seriously good time. A good pre-club place, with DJs on weekend nights. Daily 1pm–2am.

Le Duplex 25 rue Michel-le-Comte, 3^e ①01.42.72.80.86; M^o Rambuteau; see map, pp.126–127. Popular with trendy media types for its relatively sophisticated atmosphere, but still relaxed and friendly. Sun–Thurs 8pm–2am, Fri & Sat 8pm–4am.

Le Mixer 23 rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie, 4^e ①01.48.87.55.44; M^o Hôtel-de-Ville; see map, pp.126–127. Popular gay, lesbian and straight-friendly bar with a futuristic, Beaubourg-meets-Blade Runner decor. The small dancefloor is overlooked by a DJ on a giddy plinth, and there's a cosy mezzanine level. Daily 5pm–2am.

Le Pulp 25 bd Poissonnière, 2^e ①01.40.26.01.93, ②www.pulp-paris.com; M^o Bonne-Nouvelle; see map, pp.110–111. Paris's lesbian club par excellence, especially on Fri and Sat nights, playing anything from techno to Madonna. Wed–Sat midnight–6am.

Raidd 23 rue du Temple, 4^e; M^o Hotel-de-Ville; see map, pp.126–127. The city's premier gay bar, famous for its sculpted topless waiters, go-go boys' shower shows and unabashed hedonism. Straights and non-beautiful people need not apply. Daily 5pm–2am.

Redlight 34 rue du Départ, 15^e ①01.42.79.94.53; M^o Montparnasse-Bienvenue. Gay flavour of the moment for its huge weekend club nights, which begin well after midnight and end around 10am, or noon on Sundays. Expect to hear a lot of house.

Le Tango 13 rue au-Maire, 3^e ①01.42.72.17.78; M^o Arts-et-Métiers. Gay and lesbian club with a traditional Sunday afternoon bal from 5pm, featuring proper slow dances as well as tangos and camp 70s and 80s disco classics. Turns into a full-on club on Friday, Saturday and Sunday nights. Fri & Sat 10.30pm–dawn, Sun 5pm–5am.

Film, theatre and dance

Cinema—goers have a choice of around three hundred films showing in Paris in any one week. The city's plethora of little arts cinemas screen unrivalled programmes of classic and contemporary films, and you can find mainstream movies at almost any time of the day or night. The city also has a vibrant theatre scene. Several superstar directors are based here, including Peter Brook and Ariane Mnouchkine. Dance enjoys a high profile, enhanced by the recent opening of the Centre National de la Danse, Europe's largest dance academy.

The main festivals include the Festival de Films des Femmes (March; ①01.49.80.38.98, ②www.filmsdefemmes.com) at the Maison des Arts in Créteil, just south east of Paris (M^o Créteil-Préfecture); the Festival Exit (March; www.macreteil.com), which features international contemporary dance, performance and theatre, at the same venue; Paris Quartier d'Été (mid-July to mid-Aug; www.quartierdete.com), with music, theatre and cinema events around the city; the Festival d'Automne (Sept–Dec; www.festival-automne.com), with traditional and experimental theatrical, musical, dance and multimedia productions from all over the world; and the Festival du Cinéma en Plein Air (July to mid-Aug; www.cinema.arbo.com) at Parc de la Villette, showing free films in the park.

Information and tickets

The most comprehensive film listings are given in the inexpensive weeklies Zurban (www.zurban.com) and Pariscope. In Pariscope, watch out for the smaller Reprises section, where you'll usually find a number of British or American classics listed, though often enough these turn out to be one-off screenings at an unlikely hour of the afternoon. You rarely need to book in advance; programmes (séances) often start around midday and continue through to the early hours. The average price is around €8, but many smaller cinemas have lower rates on Monday or Wednesday and for earlier séances, and student reductions are available from Monday to Thursday. Almost all of the huge selection of foreign films will be shown at some cinemas in the original language – version originale or v.o. in the listings. Dubbed films will be listed as v.f. and English versions of co-productions as version anglaise or v.a.

Stage productions are detailed in Pariscope and L'Officiel des Spectacles with brief résumés or reviews. Ticket prices are often around €15–30, though you may pay less in smaller venues, and more for many commercial and major state productions (most closed Sun & Mon). Half-price previews are advertised in Pariscope and L'Officiel des Spectacles, and there are weekday student discounts. Tickets can be bought directly from the theatres, from FNAC shops and the Virgin Megastore (see p.198), or at the ticket kiosks on place de la Madeleine, 8°, opposite no. 15, and on the parvis of the Gare du Montparnasse, 15° (Tues–Sat 12.30–7.45pm, Sun 12.30–3.45pm). They sell half-price same-day tickets and charge a small commission, but be prepared to queue.

Film

Even though many of the smaller movie houses in obscure corners of the city have closed in recent years and the big chains, UGC and Gaumont, keep opening new multi-screen cinemas, you still have an unbeatable choice of non-mainstream films in Paris, covering every place and period. You can go and see Senegalese, Taiwanese, Brazilian or Finnish films, for example, that would never be shown in Britain or the US or watch your way through the entire careers of individual directors in the mini-festivals held at many of the independents.

The Quartier Latin, around the Sorbonne, has a particularly high concentration of arts cinemas showing an almost incredible repertoire of classic films, while the area around the Gare Montparnasse is chock-full with big-screen movie-houses offering the latest glossy releases. For the biggest screen of all, check out the Gaumont cinema on place de l'Italie.

Classic venues

L'Arlequin 76 rue des Rennes, 6°; M° St-Suplice.
The Quartier Latin's best cinephile's palace, offering special screenings of classics every Sunday at 11pm followed by debates in the café opposite.

Cinémathèque Française 51 rue de Bercy, 12°, www.cinemathèque.fr; M° Bercy. The chief institution of French cinema has, as you'd expect, a superb archive of art films – and, since 2005, a stunning Frank Gehry building in which to show them off. Films are shown throughout the afternoon and evening, with regular festivals.

L'Entrepôt 7–9 rue Francis-de-Pressensé, 14^e

📍 www.lentrepot.fr; M^o Pernety. One of the best alternative Paris cinemas, this has been keeping film addicts happy for years with three screens dedicated to the obscure, the subversive and the brilliant, as well as its bookshop and bar-restaurant.

Forum des Images 2 Grande Galerie, Porte St-Eustache, Forum des Halles, 1^{er} 📍 www.forumdesimages.net; RER Châtelet-Les Halles. The entirely renovated venue screens several films or projected videos daily, but also has a large library of newsreel footage, film clips, adverts, documentaries, etc – all connected with Paris – that you can access yourself from a computer terminal.

Grand Action and Action Écoles 5 & 23 rue des Écoles, 5^e; M^o Cardinal-Lemoine/Maubert-Mutualité; Action Christine, 4 rue Christine, 6^e; M^o Odéon/St-Michel. The Action chain specializes in new prints of ancient classics and screens contemporary films from different countries.

Le Grand Rex 1 bd Poissonnière, 2^e; M^o Bonne-Nouvelle. Just as outrageous as La Pagode (see below), but in the kitsch line, with a Metropolis-style tower blazing its neon name, 2750 seats, a ceiling of stars and Moorish city skyline. Foreign films are always dubbed.

Max Linder Panorama 24 bd Poissonnière, 9^e; M^o Bonne-Nouvelle. Opposite Le Grand Rex, and with almost as big a screen, this cinema always shows films in the original and has state-of-the-art sound and Art Deco decor.

MK2 Bibliothèque 128–162 av de France, 13^e; M^o Bibliothèque/Quai de la Gare. Brand new, and right behind the Bibliothèque Nationale, this is an architecturally cutting-edge cinema with a very cool café, mini-sofas for couples, and fourteen screens showing a varied range of French films – mostly new, some classic – and v.o. foreign movies.

La Pagode 57bis rue de Babylone, 7^e; M^o François-Xavier. The most beautiful of the city's cinemas, transplanted from Japan at the turn of the last century to be a rich Parisienne's party place. The wall panels of the Grande Salle auditorium are embroidered in silk, golden dragons and elephants hold up the candelabra and a battle between Japanese and Chinese warriors rages on the ceiling.

Reflet Medicis II and III, Quartier Latin and Le Champo 3 rue Champollion, 9 rue Champollion and 51 rue des Écoles, 5^e; M^o Cluny-La-Sorbonne/Odéon. A cluster of inventive little cinemas, tirelessly offering up rare screenings and classics, including frequent retrospective cycles covering great directors, both French and international (always in v.o.). The small, all-black cinema café Le Reflet, on the other side of the street, is a little-known cult classic in itself.

Le Studio 28 10 rue de Tholozé, 18^e; M^o Blanche/Abbesses. In its early days, after one of the first showings of Buñuel's L'Âge d'Or, this was done over by extreme right-wing Catholics who destroyed the screen and the paintings by Dalí and Ernst in the foyer. The cinema still hosts avant-garde premieres, followed occasionally by discussions with the director, as well as regular festivals.

UGC Ciné-Cité Les Halles 7 place de la Rotonde, Forum des Halles, 1^{er}; M^o Châtelet-Les Halles.

A nightmare to find – on the bottom level of the Forum des Halles complex, on the Porte Rambuteau side – but worth persevering for the frequent screenings of arthouse and v.o. films, for once on large screens backed by up-to-date sound. Expect to queue for tickets.

Theatre

Bourgeois farces, postwar classics, Shakespeare, Racine and Molière are all staged with the same range of talent or lack of it that you'd find in London or New York. What is rare are home-grown, socially concerned and realist dramas, though touring foreign companies make up for that. Exciting contemporary work is provided by the superstar breed of directors such as Peter Brook, Ariane Mnouchkine and Patrice Chéreau; spectacular and dazzling sensation tends to take precedence over speech in their productions, which often feature huge casts, extraordinary sets and overwhelming sound and light effects – an experience, even if you haven't understood a word.

Bouffes du Nord 37bis bd de la Chapelle, 10^e 📍 01.46.07.34.50, 📍 www.bouffesdunord.com; M^o La Chapelle. Peter Brook resurrected the derelict Bouffes du Nord in 1974 and has been based there ever since. The theatre also hosts top-notch chamber music recitals.

Cartoucherie rte du Champ-de-Manoeuvre, 12^e; M^o Château-de-Vincennes. Home to several interesting theatre companies including workers' co-op Théâtre du Soleil, set up by Ariane Mnouchkine (☎ 01.43.74.24.08, 🌐 www.theatre-du-soleil.fr).

Comédie Française 2 rue de Richelieu, 1^{er} ☎ 01.44.58.15.15, 🌐 www.comedie-francaise.fr; M° Palais-Royal. The national theatre, staging mainly Racine, Molière and other classics, but also twentieth-century greats such as Anouilh and Genet.

Odéon Théâtre de l'Europe 1 place Paul-Claudel, 6^e ☎ 01.44.41.36.36, 🌐 www.theatre-odeon.fr; M° Odéon. Contemporary plays and foreign-language productions in the theatre that became an open parliament during May 1968.

Théâtre de la Huchette 23 rue de la Huchette, 5^e ☎ 01.43.26.38.99; M° Saint-Michel. Fifty years on, this small theatre is still showing Ionesco's Cantatrice Chauve (The Bald Prima Donna; 7pm) and La Leçon (8pm), two classics of the Theatre of the Absurd. Reserve by phone or at the door from 5pm; tickets €18 for one play or €28 for two.

Théâtre National de Chaillot Palais de Chaillot, place du Trocadéro, 16^e ☎ 01.53.65.30.00, 🌐 www.theatre-chaillot.fr; M° Trocadéro. Puts on an exciting programme and regularly hosts foreign productions; Deborah Warner and Robert Lepage are regular visitors.

Théâtre National de la Colline 15 rue Malte-Brun, 20^e ☎ 01.44.62.52.52, 🌐 www.colline.fr; M° Gambetta. Known for its modern and cutting-edge productions under director Alain Françon.

Dance

The status of dance in the capital received a major boost with the inauguration in 2004 of the Centre National de la Danse, a long overdue recognition of the importance of dance in a nation that boasts six hundred dance companies. A huge complex on the scale of the Pompidou, the CND is committed to promoting every possible dance form from classical to contemporary, and including ethnic traditions. Its creation also reflects an increased interest in the capital in dance, especially in contemporary dance, and while Paris itself has few hometown companies (government subsidies go to regional companies expressly to decentralize the arts) it makes up for this by regularly hosting all the best contemporary practitioners. Names to look out for are Régine Chopinot's troupe from La Rochelle, Maguy Marin's from Rilleux-le-Pape and Angelin Preljocaj's from Aix-en-Provence. Plenty of space and critical attention are also given to tango, folk and to visiting traditional dance troupes from all over the world. As for ballet, the principal stage is at the Palais Garnier, home to the Ballet de l'Opéra National de Paris, directed by Brigitte Lefèvre. It still bears the influence of Rudolf Nureyev, its charismatic, if controversial, director from 1983 to 1989, and frequently revives his productions, such as Swan Lake and La Bayadère. Many of the venues listed above under "Theatre" also host dance productions.

Centre National de la Danse 1 rue Victor Hugo, Pantin ☎ 01.41.83.27.27, 🌐 www.cnd.fr; M° Hoche/RER Pantin. The capital's major new dance centre occupies an impressively large building, ingeniously converted from a disused 1970s monolith into an airy high-tech space. Though several of its eleven studios are used for performances, the main emphasis of the centre is to promote dance through training, workshops and exhibitions.

Centre Pompidou rue Beaubourg, 4^e ☎ 01.44.78.13.15, 🌐 www.centrepompidou.fr; M° Rambuteau/RER Châtelet-Les Halles. The Grande Salle in the basement is used for dance performances by visiting companies.

Maison des Arts de Créteil place Salvador-Allende, Créteil ☎ 01.45.13.19.19, 🌐 www.maccreteil.com; M° Créteil-Préfecture. A lively suburban dance and theatre venue, hosting the acclaimed Festival Exit (see p.187) and home of the innovative dance troupe Compagnie Montalvo-Hervieu.

Opéra-Garnier place de l'Opéra, 9^e ☎ 08.36.69.78.68, 🌐 www.opera-de-paris.fr; M° Opéra. Main home of the Ballet de l'Opéra National de Paris.

Théâtre des Abbesses 31 rue des Abbesses, 18^e; M° Abbesses. The Théâtre de la Ville's sister company, where you'll find slightly more offbeat performances by the likes of provocative choreographers Robyn Orlin and Jan Fabre.

Théâtre Musical de Paris place du Châtelet, 4^e ☎ 01.40.28.28.40, 🌐 www.chatelet-theatre.com;

M° Châtelet. A major ballet venue where, in 1910, Diaghilev put on the first season of Russian ballet. Though mainly used for classical concerts and opera, it also hosts top-notch visiting ballet companies such as the Mariinsky.

Théâtre de la Ville 2 place du Châtelet, 4°

☎ 01.42.74.22.77, 🌐 www.theatredelaville-paris.com; M° Châtelet. The height of success for contemporary dance productions is to end up here. Works by Karine Saporta, Maguy Marin and Pina Bausch are regularly featured, along with modern theatre classics, comedy and concerts.

Sports and activities

When it's cold and wet and you've had your fill of café vistas and peering at museums, monuments and the dripping panes of shopfronts, don't despair or retreat back to your hotel. As well as movies, Paris offers a whole host of pleasant ways to pass the time indoors – skating, swimming, Turkish baths – or outdoors, with a range of popular sports to watch or participate in.

Information

L'Officiel des Spectacles has the best listings of sports facilities (under “Activités sportives”). Information on municipal facilities is available from the town hall, the Mairie de Paris, place de l'Hôtel de Ville, 4° (☎ 01.42.76.40.40, 🌐 www.paris.fr). For details of current sporting events, try daily sports paper L'Équipe. The Palais Omnisport Paris-Bercy (POPB), 8 bd Bercy, 12° (☎ 01.46.91.57.57, 🌐 www.bercy.fr; M° Bercy) is a major venue for a wide range of sports, including athletics, cycling, show jumping, ice hockey, ball-room dancing, judo and motorcross.

Spectator sports

Cycling The biggest event of the French sporting year is the grand finale of the Tour de France on the Champs-Élysées in late July. Huge crowds turn out to cheer on the cyclists at the finishing line of the ultimate stage in the gruelling three-week 3500-odd-kilometre event, and the French president presents the yellow jersey (maillot jaune) to the overall winner. Races commencing in Paris include the Paris–Roubaix, instigated in 1896, which is reputed to be the most exacting one-day race in the world, and the rugged six-day Paris–Nice event, covering over 1100km. The Palais Omnisport (see above) holds other bike races and cycling events. For more information on the Tour de France and other cycling events, see Basics.

Football and rugby The Stade de France, on rue Francis de Pressensé in St-Denis (☎ 01.55.93.00.00, 🌐 www.stadefrance.fr; RER Stade-de-France-St-Denis), is the venue for international football matches and rugby's Six Nations' Cup and other international matches. The Parc des Princes, 24 rue du Commandant-Guilbaud, 16° (☎ 01.42.30.03.60, 🌐 www.bercy.fr; M° Porte-de-St-Cloud), is the home ground for the first-division football team Paris-St-Germain (PSG) plus the rugby team Le Racing.

Horse-racing The biggest races are the Prix de la République and the Grand Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe on the first and last Sunday in October at Auteuil and Longchamp, both in the Bois de Boulogne. Trotting races, with the jockeys in chariots, run from Aug to Sept in the Hippodrome de Vincennes, 2 rte de la Ferme (🌐 www.cheval-francais.com), in the Bois de Vincennes. L'Humanité and Paris-Turf carry details of all races; admission charges are under €5. If you want to place a bet, any bar or café with the letters “PMU” will take your money on a three-horse bet, known as le tiercé.

Running The Paris Marathon is held in April over a route from place de la Concorde to Vincennes. Up-to-date information is available online at 🌐 www.parismarathon.com.

Tennis The French Open takes place in the last week of May and first week of June at Roland-Garros, 2 av Gordon-Bennett, 16° (☎ 01.47.43.48.00, 🌐 www.frenchopen.org; M° Porte-d'Auteuil). Evening tickets are available at heavily reduced prices on the same day, from 5pm. Otherwise there's a fair chance of booking non-numbered tickets for the lower-profile matches on outside courts. Smaller tournaments, including November's Paris Open, take place throughout the year.

Activities

Boules The classic French game involving balls, boules (or pétanque), is best performed (if you have your own set or are prepared to make some new French friends) or watched at the Arènes de Lutèce (p.137) and the Bois de Vincennes (p.164). On balmy summer evenings it's a common sight in the city's parks and gardens.

Cycling Since 1996 the Mairie de Paris has made great efforts to introduce dedicated cycle lanes in Paris, which now add up to some 300km. You can pick up a free bike map, the carte des voies cyclables, from town halls, tourist offices and bike hire outlets (see p.199). If you prefer cycling in a more natural environment, the Bois de Boulogne and the Bois de Vincennes have extensive bike tracks. On Sundays cycling and rollerblading (see below) by the Seine is popular, when its central quais are closed to cars between 9am and 5pm; the quais along the Canal St-Martin are closed to cars from 10am to 6pm on Sundays. Excellent day and night bicycle tours are offered by Paris à Vélo C'est Sympa/Vélo Bastille, 22 rue Alphonse Baudin, 11^e (☎01.48.87.60.01, @www.parisvelosympa.com; M° Bastille) for around €35; Fat Tire Bike Tours, 24 rue Edgar Faure, 15^e (☎01.56.58.10.54, @www.FatTireBikeToursParis.com; M° Duplex) offers tours on the Left Bank for around €25, as well as tours on Segway "human transporter" machines. For bike rental, see Listings, p.199.

Ice skating From Dec to March a small rink is set up in place Hôtel de Ville (daily 9am–10pm; M° Hôtel-de-Ville); skating is free and skates are available for hire for €5. The ice-rink on the first floor of the Eiffel Tower looks set to become a regular fixture; it's free, but you'll need a ticket for the tower to use it.

In-line skating Rollerblading has become so popular in Paris that it takes over the streets most Friday nights from 9.45pm, when expert skaters – over 10,000 on fine evenings – meet on the esplanade of the Gare Montparnasse in the 14^e (M° Montparnasse) for a three-hour circuit of the city; check out @www.pari-roller.com for details. Three good places to find more information and rent rollerblades (around €7 for a half-day) are: Vertical Line, 4 rue de la Bastille, 4^e (☎01.42.74.70.00, @www.vertical-line.com; M° Bastille); Nomades, 37 bd Bourdon, 4^e (☎01.44.54.07.44, @www.nomadeshop.com; M° Bastille); and Ootini, 73 av de la République, 11^e (☎01.43.38.89.63, @www.ootini.com); Vertical Line and Nomades also hold their own roller events. The main outdoor in-line skating and skateboarding arena is the concourse of the Palais de Chaillot (M° Trocadéro). Les Halles (around the Fontaine des Innocents), the Pompidou Centre piazza and place du Palais-Royal are also very popular, as well as the central quais of the Seine on Sundays (see Cycling, above).

Swimming L'Officiel des Spectacles lists all the municipal pools (€2.60), of which the best are the brand-new and luxurious Josephine Baker, 13^e which actually floats on the Seine beside the Bibliothèque Nationale (M° Bibliothèque François-Mitterrand/Quai de la Gare), and has a sliding roof; unchlorinated student hangout Jean Taris, 16 rue de Thouin, 5^e (M° Cardinal-Lemoine); the 1930s-style, also studenty Piscine de Pointoise, 18 rue de Pointoise, 5^e (M° Maubert-Mutualité); the Art Deco Butte aux Cailles, 5 place Verlaine, 13^e (M° Place-d'Italie); and the 50-metre-long Piscine Susanne Berlioux/Les Halles, 10 place de la Rotonde, niveau 3, Porte du Jour, Forum des Halles, 1^{er} (RER Châtelet-Les Halles). For something more spectacular, Aquaboulevard, 4 rue Louis-Armand (☎01.40.60.10.00; M° Balard/Porte de Versailles), provides an array of pools, wave machines, jacuzzis and waterlides; for the €20 all-day ticket (€10 for children aged 3–11) you can use all the other fitness and sports facilities as well.

Tennis One of the nicest places to play tennis is on one of the six asphalt courts at the Jardins du Luxembourg (daily 8am–9pm; €6.50 per hour; RER Luxembourg/M° Notre-Dame-des-Champs). Addresses and opening hours of the other 41 courts in Paris can be found at @www.tennis.paris.fr, which also allows you to book in advance – though you have to set up a log-in in French. It may be simpler to call ☎01.71.71.70.70 or just turn up, book yourself in and wait – there'll usually be a place within an hour or so.

Turkish baths The most atmospheric hamam or Turkish baths is the Hamam de la Mosquée, 39 rue Geoffroy-St-Hilaire, 5^e (☎01.43.31.38.20; entry €15, towels and massage extra; M° Censier-Daubenton), with its vaulted cooling-off room and marble-lined steam chamber; times may change, so check first, but generally women on Mon, Wed, Thurs & Sat 10am–9pm, Fri 2–9pm, men Tues 2–9pm & Sun 10am–9pm. For a more upmarket, Parisian version of a hamam, head for Les Bains du Marais, 31–33 rue des Blancs Manteaux, 4^e (☎01.44.61.02.02, @www.lesbainsdumarais.com; sauna and steam room €35, massage €35 extra; M° Rambuteau); there are mixed sessions on Wednesday evenings (7–11pm), Saturdays (10am–8pm) and Sundays (11am–11pm) for which you have to bring a partner and a swimsuit.

Kids' Paris

For most kids the biggest attraction for miles around is Disneyland Paris (see p.207), though within the city there are plenty of less expensive and more educational possibilities for keeping them entertained. Wednesday afternoons, when primary school children have free time, and Saturdays are the big times for children's activities and entertainments; Wednesdays continue to be child-centred even during the school holidays. The tours around the sewers and the catacombs will delight some older children, while smaller ones can enjoy performances of Guignol (the equivalent of Punch and Judy) in the city's parks. Many of the museums and amusements already detailed will appeal, especially the Cité des Sciences et de l'Industrie (see p.159) and its special section for children, the Cité des Enfants (see below), in the Parc de la Villette. A number of museums have children's activities on Wednesdays and Saturdays, details of which are carried in the free booklet Objectif Musée, available from the museums. The Musée du Moyen-Âge, Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris, Carnavalet, the Louvre, the Institut du Monde Arabe and the Musée d'Orsay have regular or special programmes but they will of course be conducted in French. Otherwise, the most useful sources of information for current shows, exhibitions and events are the special sections in the listings magazines ("Enfants" in Pariscope, and "Jeunes" in L'Officiel des Spectacles) and the Kiosque Paris-Jeunes at the Direction Jeunesse et Sports, 25 bd Bourdon, 4^e (Mon–Fri noon–7pm; ☎01.42.76.22.60; M^o Bastille), and at the CIDJ (Centre Information et Documentation Jeunesse), 101 quai Branley, 15^e (Mon–Fri 9.30am–6pm, Sat 9.30am–1pm; ☎01.44.49.12.00; M^o Bir-Hakeim). The tourist office also publishes a free booklet in French, Paris-Île-de-France Avec Des Yeux Enfants, with lots of ideas and contacts.

Cité des Enfants

The Cité des Enfants, with areas for 3 to 5 year olds and 6 to 12 year-olds, is a hugely engaging special section of the Cité des Sciences et de l'Industrie – detailed on p.159 – in the Parc de la Villette (Tues–Sat 10am–6pm, Sun 10am–7pm). The kids can touch, smell and feel things, play about with water, construct buildings on a miniature construction site, experiment with sound and light, manipulate robots, put together their own television news and race their own shadows. It's beautifully organized and managed, and if you haven't got a child it's worth borrowing one to get in here. Sessions run for an hour and a half (Tues, Thurs & Fri 11.30am, 1.30pm & 3.30pm; Wed, Sat, Sun & public hols 10.30am, 12.30pm, 2.30pm & 4.30pm; adults and children €5; children must be accompanied by at least one adult). It's worth booking in advance during busy holiday periods at the Cité des Sciences ticket office on ☎08.92.69.70.72.

The rest of the museum is also pretty good for kids, particularly the planetarium, the various film shows, the Argonaute submarine and the frequent temporary exhibitions designed for the young. And in the park, there's lots of green space, a dragon slide and seven themed gardens featuring mirrors, trampolines, water jets and spooky music.

Jardin d'Acclimatation

The Jardin d'Acclimatation, in the Bois de Boulogne by Porte des Sablons (daily: June–Sept 10am–7pm; Oct–May 10am–6pm; adults and children €2.70; ☎www.jardindacclimatation.fr; M^o Les Sablons/Porte-Maillot) is a children's paradise: a cross between a funfair, zoo and amusement park. Temptations range from bumper cars, go-karts and pony and camel rides to sea lions, birds, bears and monkeys; plus there's a magical mini-canal ride (la rivière enchantée), distorting mirrors, scaled-down farm buildings and a puppet theatre. Rides do cost extra – around €2.50 a time, or you can buy a carnet of fifteen tickets for €30. The best way to get to the park is via the petit train (€5.20 return, including entrance fee) which leaves every fifteen minutes from behind the L'Orée du Bois restaurant near Porte Maillot métro station.

Parc Floral

Fun and games are always to be had at the Parc Floral, in the Bois de Vincennes, route de la Pyramide (M° Château-de-Vincennes, then a seven-minute walk past the Château de Vincennes, or bus #112; daily: March–Sept 9.30am–7pm, Oct–Feb 9.30am–5pm; €1, children €0.50 plus supplements for some activities, under-7s free; @www.parcfloraldeparis.com). The excellent playground has slides, swings, ping-pong, pedal carts, miniature golf modelled on Paris monuments (from 2pm), an electric car circuit and a petit train touring all the gardens (April–Oct daily 1–5pm; €1). Tickets for the activities are sold at the playground between 2 and 5.30pm weekdays and until 7pm on weekends; activities stop fifteen minutes afterwards. Note that many of these activities are available from March/April to August only and on Wednesdays and weekends only in September and October. On Wednesdays at 2.30pm (May–Sept) there are free performances by clowns, puppets and magicians. Also in the park is a children's theatre, the Théâtre Astral, which puts on mime, clowns and other not-too-verbal shows for small children aged 3 to 8 (Wed, Sun & during school hols Mon–Fri 3pm; ☎01.43.71.31.10; €6). There's also a series of pavilions with child-friendly educational exhibitions (free entry) which look at nature in Paris; the best is the butterfly garden (1.30–5.15pm).

Parc Zoologique

The top Paris zoo is in the Bois de Vincennes at 53 av de St-Maurice, 12° (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 9am–6.30pm; Oct–March closes one hour earlier; €5; M° Porte-Dorée). It was one of the first zoos in the world to get rid of cages and use landscaping to simulate a more natural environment.

Funfairs and the circus

The Tuileries gardens normally have a funfair in July, and there's usually a merry-go-round at the Forum des Halles and beneath Tour St-Jacques at Châtelet, with carousels for smaller children on place de la République and at the Rond-Point des Champs-Élysées, by avenue Matignon. Circus shows are put on from October to January at the Cirque d'Hiver Bouglione, 110 rue Amelot, 11° (M° Filles-du-Calvaire; details in Pariscopes and L'Officiel des Spectacles).

Shopping

Even if you don't plan – or can't afford – to buy, browsing Paris's shops and markets is one of the chief delights of the city. Flair for style and design is as evident here as it is in other aspects of the city's life. Parisians' epicurean tendencies and fierce attachment to their small local traders has kept alive a wonderful variety of speciality shops, despite the pressures to concentrate consumption in gargantuan underground and multistorey complexes. Among specific areas, the square kilometre around place St-Germain-des-Prés is hard to beat, packed with books, antiques, gorgeous garments, artworks and playthings. But in every quartier you'll find enticing displays of all manner of consumables.

Bookshops

Books are not cheap in France – foreign books least of all – but don't let that stop you from browsing. The best areas are in the studenty Quartier Latin and along the Seine, where rows of bouquinistes' stalls are perched on the parapets of the quais. Here we've listed a few specialists and favourites.

Artcurial 9 av Matignon, 8^e; M^o Franklin-D.-Roosevelt. The best art bookshop in Paris, set in an elegant town house. Sells French and foreign editions, and there's also a gallery and café. Mon–Sat 10.30am–7pm; closed two weeks in Aug.

FNAC 74 av des Champs-Élysées, 8^e; M^o George-V; Forum des Halles, niveau 2, Porte Pierre-Lescot, 1^{er}; M^o/RER Châtelet-Les Halles; 136 rue de Rennes, 6^e; M^o Montparnasse; @ www.fnac.com.

Not the most congenial of bookshops, but it's the biggest and covers everything. Mon–Sat 10am–7.30pm; the Champs-Élysées branch is open till midnight daily.

Gibert Jeune 10 place St-Michel, 5^e; M^o St-Michel. The biggest of the Quartier Latin student/academic bookshops. No. 10 has the main English selection, and you can find almost any subject covered at the other branches on the place. An institution.

Parallèles 47 rue St-Honoré 1^{er}; M^o Châtelet-Les Halles. An alternative bookshop, with everything from anarchism to New Age. Good for info on current events and gigs. Mon–Sat 10am–7pm.

Shakespeare & Co 37 rue de la Bûcherie, 5^e; M^o Maubert-Mutualité. A cosy, famous literary haunt, staffed by American wannabe Hemingways, with the biggest selection of secondhand English books in town. Daily noon–midnight.

Village Voice 6 rue Princesse, 6^e; M^o Mabilon. Welcoming recreation of a neighbourhood bookstore, with a good selection of contemporary titles and a decent list of British and American classics. Mon 2–8pm, Tues–Sat 10am–8pm, Sun 2–7pm.

W.H. Smith 248 rue de Rivoli, 1^{er}; M^o Concorde. The Paris outlet of the British chain has a wide range of new books and newspapers. Daily 9.30am–7pm.

Clothes

The best places to start shopping for clothes are the department stores. Otherwise, all the main international labels can easily be found in and around the streets named below – as long as you can brave the intimidatingly chic assistants. We've listed only the most quintessentially Parisian names (for a more complete list, including all branches, see @ www.modeaparis.com), plus a few particularly interesting one-off boutiques.

The different quarters of Paris cater for very different clientele. The streets around St-Sulpice métro – rues du Vieux Colombar, de Rennes, Madame, de Grenelle and du Cherche-Midi – are lined with clothing shops of all kinds, and the relatively compact size and relaxed, Left-Bank atmosphere makes this one of the most appealing of Paris's shopping quarters. For couture and seriously expensive designer wear, make for the wealthy, manicured streets around the Champs-Élysées, especially avenue François-1er, avenue Montaigne and rue du Faubourg-St-Honoré. In recent years, younger designers have begun colonizing the lower reaches of the latter street, between rue Cambon and rue des Pyramides. On the eastern side of the city, around the Marais and Bastille, the clothes, like the residents, are younger, cooler and less formal. Chic boutiques line the Marais' main shopping street, rue des Francs-Bourgeois, and young, trendy designers and hippie outfits congregate on Bastille streets rue de Charonne and rue Keller. At the more alternative end of the spectrum, there's a good concentration of one-off designer boutiques around Abbesses métro stop, at the foot of Montmartre – try rues des Martyrs, des Trois-Frères, de la Vieuville, Houdon and Durantin. For streetwise clothing, the Forum des Halles and surrounding streets is a good place to browse – though there’s a lot of inexpensive rubbish; in this area, rue Étienne-Marcel and pedestrianized rue Tiquetonne are best for young, trendy boutiques.

As long as there’s a strong euro, visitors from outside the eurozone will find shopping relatively expensive. That said, the sales are officially held twice a year, beginning in mid-January and mid-July and lasting a month. Ends of lines and old stock of the couturiers are sold year round in “stock” discount shops, listed below, or out at the vast, American-style La Vallée Village mall, which lies inside the frontiers of Disneyland (Mon–Thurs 10am–7pm, Fri & Sat 10am–8pm, Sun 11am–7pm; 📍 www.lavallee-village.com; RER Val d’Europe–Serris–Montévrain).

agnès b 6 rue du Jour, 1^{er} (M° Châtelet-Les Halles), 6 & 10 rue du Vieux Colombier, 6e (M° St-Sulpice). The queen of classic understatement, for men and women of all persuasions. Relatively affordable for designer gear.

Anne Willi 13 rue Keller, 11^e; M° Ledru-Rollin/Voltaire. Original pieces of clothing in gorgeous fabrics that respect classic French sartorial design. Prices from €60 upwards. Mon 2–8pm, Tues–Sat 11.30am–8pm.

APC 3 & 4 rue de Fleurus, 6^e; M° St-Placide. Young and urban, but still effortlessly classic in that Parisian way. The men’s and women’s shops face each other across the road. Mon, Fri & Sat 11am–7pm, Tues–Thurs 9am–7.30pm.

Bonnie Cox 38 rue des Abbesses, 18^e; M° Abbesses. Young fashion names such as Michiko, Custo and Xily Bet at relatively uninflated prices – think €150 for a dress. Daily 11am–8pm.

Collections Privé 40 bd de la Tour Maubourg, 7^e; M° La Tour-Maubourg. A kind of gallery for young, independent and very individualistic designers; most clothes fall in the €100–250 range. Tues, Wed, Fri & Sat 11am–7pm, Thurs 11am–9pm.

Comptoir des Cotonniers 30 rue de Buci & 58 rue Bonaparte, 6^e; M° Mabillon/St-Germain-des-Prés. Utterly reliable little chain stocking well-cut women’s basics that nod to contemporary fashions. Trousers, shirts and dresses for around €100. Has around twenty branches in Paris – two handy ones are at 29 rue du Jour (M° Les Halles) and 33 rue des Francs Bourgeois (M° St-Paul). Mon 11am–7pm, Tues–Sat 10am–7.30pm.

Dépôt-vente du 17e 109 rue de Courcelles, 17^e; M° Courcelles. Big, chic shop whose speciality is heavily discounted ready-to-wear brands like Armani, Dior and Rykiel. Mon 2–7pm, Tues–Sat 10.30am–7pm.

Heaven 83 rue des Martyrs, 18^e; M° Abbesses. Luxurious clothing for men and women; its sometimes brash, sometimes classically elegant. Tues–Sat 11am–7.30pm, Sun 2–7.30pm.

Isabel Marant 16 rue de Charonne, 11^e; M° Bastille. Marant excels in feminine and flattering clothes in quality fabrics such as silk and cashmere. Prices are €90 upwards. Mon–Sat 10.30am–7.30pm.

Jacques Le Corre 193 rue Saint-Honoré, 1^{er}; M° Tuileries. Creative, original hats, footwear and

Department stores

Le Bon Marché 38 rue de Sèvres, 7^e, 📍 www.lebonmarche.fr; M° Sèvres-Babylone. Paris’s oldest department store, founded in 1852, and currently one of the most highly regarded – and correspondingly expensive. Mon–Wed & Fri 9.30am–7pm, Thurs 10am–9pm, Sat 9.30am–8pm.

Galeries Lafayette 40 bd Haussmann, 9^e, 📍 www.galerieslafayette.com; M° Havre-Caumartin. The store’s forte is high fashion. Three floors are given over to the latest creations by leading designers for women, while an adjoining three-storey store is devoted to men’s fashion. Then there’s a huge parfumerie and a host of big names in men and women’s accessories – all under a superb 1900 dome. It’s also worth checking out Lafayette Maison, the huge and impressive home store just up the road at 35 bd Haussmann. Mon–Sat 9.30am–7.30pm, Thurs till 9pm.

Au Printemps 64 bd Haussmann 9^e, 📍 www.printemps.com; M° Havre-Caumartin. Books, records, a parfumerie even bigger than that of rival Galeries Lafayette and excellent fashion for men and women. Mon–Sat 9.35am–7pm, Thurs till 10pm.

handbags. The stylish, unisex hats here come in interesting colours and shapes; Jacques is famed for his classic cotton cloche, perfecting the vagrant-chic look. Mon–Sat 11am–7pm.

Le Mouton à Cinq Pattes 19 rue Gregoire de Tours, 6^e; M^o Odéon. A classic bargain clothing address, with racks upon racks of end-of-line and reject clothing from designer names both great and small. You might find a shop-soiled Gaultier classic; you might find nothing. At these prices, it's worth the gamble. Another shop is at 138 bd St-Germain. Mon–Sat 10am–7pm.

Sabbia Rosa 71–73 rue des Saints-Pères, 6^e; M^o St-Germain-des-Prés. Supermodels' knickers – literally, they all shop here – at supermodel prices. Mon–Sat 10am–7pm.

Sonia/Sonia Rykiel 61 rue des Saints-Pères, 6^e; M^o Sèvres-Babylone. Sonia Rykiel has been a St-Germain institution since 1968; this is the younger, more exciting and less expensive offshoot. Mon–Sat 10.30am–7pm.

Spree 16 rue de la Vieuville, 18^e; M^o Abbesses. So fashionable it actually looks like an art gallery, with a collection led by individual designers such as Vanessa Bruno, Isabel Marant and Christian Wijnants. Mostly in the €100–250 range, though vintage pieces can run way higher. Mon 2–7pm, Tues–Sat 11am–7.30pm.

Vanessa Bruno 25 rue St-Sulpice, 6^e; M^o Odéon. Bright, breezy and effortlessly top-drawer women's fashions. Mon–Sat 10.30am–9.30pm.

YSL Rive Gauche men 6 place St-Sulpice, 6^e (M^o St-Sulpice/Mabillon), women 32–38 rue du Faubourg-Saint-Honoré, 8^e (M^o Concorde). Ready-to-wear spin-off from the designer label. Skinny monochrome chic remains the staple for men; the lines for women are more colourful but no less distinctively YSL.

Zadig & Voltaire 1 & 3 rue du Vieux Colombier, 6^e; M^o St-Sulpice. The women's clothes at this small, moderately expensive Parisian chain are pretty and feminine. In style it's not a million miles from agnès b. Mon–Sat 10am–7pm. Branches at 15 rue du Jour, 1^{er} (M^o Les Halles); 9 rue du 29 Juillet, 1^{er} (M^o Tuileries); 11 rue Montmartre, 1^{er} (M^o Les Halles); 36 rue de Sévigné, 4^{er} (M^o St-Paul).

Food and drink

You can, of course, find sumptuous food stores all over Paris: the listings below are for the specialist places, palaces of gluttony many of them, with prices to match. Economical food shopping is invariably best done at the street markets or supermarkets, though save your bread buying for the local boulangerie. The least expensive supermarket chain is Ed (“l'épicier”). Food markets are detailed at the end of this section.

Barthélémy 51 rue de Grenelle, 7^e; M^o Bac. Purveyors of cheeses to the rich and powerful. Tues–Sat 8am–1pm & 4–7.15pm; closed Aug.

Les Caves Augé 116 bd Haussmann, 8^e; M^o St-Augustin. This old-fashioned, wood-panelled shop is the oldest cave in Paris and not only sells fine wines, but also a wide selection of port, armagnac, cognac and champagne. Mon 1–7.30pm, Tues–Sat 9am–7.30pm.

Caves Michel Renaud 12 place de la Nation, 12^e; M^o Nation. Established in 1870, this wine shop sells superb-value French and Spanish wines, champagnes and Armagnac. Mon–Fri 9.30am–1pm & 2–8.30pm.

Comptoir du Saumon 60 rue François-Miron, 4^e; M^o St-Paul. This place specializes in salmon, but also sells eels, trout and all things fishy, as well as having a delightful little restaurant in which to taste the fare. Mon–Sat 10am–10pm.

Debaube and Gallais 30 rue des Sts-Pères, 7^e; M^o St-Germain-des-Prés/Sèvres-Babylone. A beautiful, ancient shop specializing in exquisite chocolates. Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm; closed Aug.

Fauchon 26 place de la Madeleine, 8^e; M^o Madeleine. An amazing range of groceries and wine, all at exorbitant prices; there's a self-service counter for patisseries and plats du jour, and a traiteur which stays open until 9pm. Mon–Sat 9am–7pm.

Hédiard 21 place de la Madeleine, 8^e; M^o Madeleine. The aristocrat's grocer since 1850; there are several other branches throughout the city. Mon–Sat 9am–10pm.

La Maison de l'Escargot 79 rue Fondary, 15^e; M^o Duplex. As the name suggests, this place specializes in snails: they even sauce and re-shell them while you wait. Tues–Sat 9.30am–7pm; closed Aug.

Mariage Frères 30 rue du Bourg-Tibourg, 4^e; M^o Hôtel-de-Ville. Hundreds of teas, neatly packed in tins, line the floor-to-ceiling shelves of this 100-year-old emporium. There's a salon de thé in the back with exquisite pastries (daily noon–7pm). Daily 10.30am–7.30pm.

Poilâne 8 rue du Cherche-Midi, 6^e; M^o Sèvres-Babylone. The source of the famous “Pain Poilâne” – a kind of sourdough bread. Mon–Sat 6.15am–8.15pm.

Rendez-Vous de la Nature 96 rue Mouffetard, 5^e; M° Cardinal-Lemoine. One of the city's most comprehensive health-food stores, with everything from fresh organic produce to herbal teas. Tues–Sat 11am–7pm.

Music

New cassettes and CDs are not particularly cheap in Paris, but there are plenty of secondhand bargains, and you may come across selections that are novel enough to tempt you. There are plentiful world music and jazz albums that would be specialist rarities in the UK or US.

Crocodisc 40–42 rue des Écoles, 5^e, www.crocodisc.com; M° Maubert-Mutualité. Folk, Oriental, Afro-Antillais, rai, funk, reggae, salsa, hip-hop, soul, country; Crocojazz is nearby at 64 rue de la Montagne-Ste-Geneviève, 5^e. Offers new and secondhand music at some of the best prices in town. Tues–Sat 11am–7pm.

FNAC Musique 4 place de la Bastille, 12^e; M° Bastille. Extremely stylish shop in black, grey and chrome, with computerized catalogues, books, every variety of music and a concert booking agency. Mon–Sat 10am–8pm.

Paul Beuscher 15–29 bd Beaumarchais, 4^e; M° Bastille. A music department store that's been going strong for over 100 years, selling instruments, scores, books and recording equipment. Mon–Fri 9.45am–12.30pm & 2–7pm, Sat 9.45am–7pm.

Virgin Megastore 52–60 av des Champs-Élysées, 8^e; M° Franklin-D.-Roosevelt (Mon–Sat 10am–midnight, Sun noon–midnight) and 99 rue de Rivoli, 1^{er}; M° Palais-Royal (Wed–Sat 10am–10pm, Sun & Mon 10am–8pm). The biggest and trendiest of Paris's music shops, with a concert booking agency.

Sport and outdoor activities

Nomades 37 bd Bourdon, 4^e; M° Bastille. The place to buy and rent rollerblades and equipment, with its own bar out back. See also "In-line skating", p.192. Tues–Sat 11am–7pm, Sun noon–6pm.

Au Vieux Campeur 48 rue des Écoles, 5^e www.au-vieux-campeur.fr; M° Maubert-

Mutualité. Giant outdoor activities shop with over a dozen well-stocked branches on the same block – you'll be directed to the right section for maps, boots, tents and so on. Times vary; generally 11am–7.30pm.

Markets

Paris's markets, like its shops, are grand spectacles. Mouthwatering arrays of food from half the countries of the globe, captivating in colour, shape and smell, assail the senses in even the drabest parts of town. We've listed some of the most distinctive or specialized below; a full list is available online at www.paris.fr/fr/marches. Though all have semi-official opening and closing hours, many begin business in advance and drag on till dusk. Food markets usually start between 7am and 8am and tail off around 1pm, though a few stalls may carry on into the afternoon and evening. The covered markets have specific opening hours, detailed below.

Paris's well-organized flea markets, or marchés aux puces, are increasingly oriented towards genuine antiques, but you can still find some bargains among the more junk-like offerings typically sold around the fringes of the markets proper. Arrive early.

Flea markets

Place d'Aligre 12^e; M° Ledru-Rollin. A small flea market and the only one located in the city proper, peddling secondhand clothes and bric-a-brac – anything from old gramophone players to odd bits of crockery. Tues–Sun 7.30am–12.30pm.

Porte de Montreuil 20^e; M° Porte-de-Montreuil. The most junkyard-like of them all, and the best for secondhand clothes – it's cheapest on Mon when leftovers from the weekend are sold off. Also good for old furniture and household goods. Sat, Sun & Mon 7am–7.30pm.

Porte de Vanves 14^e; M^o Porte-de-Vanves. One of the best for bric-a-brac and little Parisian knickknacks. Professionals deal alongside weekend amateurs. Sat & Sun 7am–7.30pm.

St-Ouen/Porte de Clignancourt 18^e; M^o Porte-de-Clignancourt. Huge collection of over a dozen antiques markets, with some collectable design items to be found, especially in Marchés Vernaison and Jules-Vallès. Marché Malik is good for second-hand/vintage clothes and bags. Stalls selling records, books and junk of all sorts can be found along rue Jean-Henri Fabre, between the market proper and the métro station. Mon, Sat & Sun 9am–6.30pm.

Food markets

Belleville bd de Belleville, 20^e; M^o Belleville/Ménilmontant. Tues & Fri 7am–2pm.

Dejean place du Château-Rouge, 18^e; M^o Château-Rouge. Africa central. Tues–Sun.

Enfants-Rouges 39 rue de Bretagne, 3^e; M^o Filles-du-Calvaire. Tues–Sat 8am–1pm & 4–7pm, Sun 8am–2pm.

Maubert place Maubert, 5^e; M^o Maubert-Mutualité. Tues, Thurs & Sat.

Montorgueil rue Montorgueil & rue Montmartre, 1^{er}; M^o Châtelet-Les Halles/Sentier. Tues–Sat 8am–1pm & 4–7pm, Sun 9am–1pm.

Place d'Aligre 12^e; M^o Ledru-Rollin. Tues–Sun until 12.30pm.

Porte-St-Martin rue du Château-d'Eau, 10^e; M^o Château-d'Eau. Tues–Sat 8am–1pm & 4–7.30pm, Sun 8am–1pm.

Raspail bd Raspail, between rue du Cherche-Midi & rue de Rennes, 6^e; M^o Rennes. Tues & Fri. Celebrated organic market on Sun.

Richard Lenoir bd Richard Lenoir, 11^e; M^o Bastille/Richard Lenoir. Thurs & Sun.

Rue de Lévis 17^e; M^o Villiers. Tues–Sun.

Tang Frères 48 av d'Ivry, 13^e; M^o Porte-d'Ivry. More a supermarket yard than a market; a vast emporium of all things oriental. Tues–Sun 9am–7.30pm.

Ternes rue Lemer cier, 17^e; M^o Ternes. Specializes in flowers. Tues–Sun 8am–7.30pm.

Listings

Airlines Aer Lingus ☎01.70.20.00.72; Air Canada ☎08.25.88.08.81; Air France ☎08.20.82.08.20; British Airways ☎08.25.82.54.00; Bmibaby ☎08.90.71.00.81; Delta ☎08.00.30.13.01; easyJet ☎08.25.08.25.08; Qantas ☎08.11.98.00.02; Ryanair ☎08.92.23.23.75.

Banks and exchange Money-exchange bureaux and automatic exchange machines can be found at all airports and mainline train stations, along with ATM points. Beware of exchange bureaux, which may advertise the selling rather than buying rate and add on hefty commission fees. On the whole, you're better off in a bank, or by just using credit and debit cards in many cash machines.

Bike hire Charges start from about €15 a day; you'll need to show a picture ID, and you'll also be asked to pay a deposit of around €200–300, and/or leave a passport or credit card. If you want a bike for Sunday, when all of Paris takes to the quais, you'll need to book in advance. Try Paris-Vélo, 2 rue du Fer-à-Moulin, 5^e (☎01.43.37.59.22, 🌐www.paris-velo-rent-a-bike.fr; M^o Censier-Daubenton), for 21-speed and mountain bikes; Paris à Vélo C'est Sympa, 22 rue Alphonse Baudin, 11^e (☎01.48.87.60.01, 🌐www.parisvelosympa.com; M^o Bastille), who also offer enjoyable and well-run bicycle tours; or Fat Tire Bike Tours, 24 rue Edgar Faure, 15e

(☎01.56.58.10.54, 🌐www.fattirebiketoursparis.com; M^o Duplex), who offer a wide range of bikes, including tandems, childrens' bikes and bikes with child seats and run fun bike tours that are a good way to get to grips with the city. For more information about bike tours see p.192. In addition, RATP, the transport authority, has two bike rental offices (both daily 9am–7pm; 🌐www.rouelibre.fr): at 1 passage Mondétour, opposite 120 de la rue Rambuteau, 1^{er} (☎01.44.76.86.43; M^o Les Halles), and at 37 bd Bourdon, 4^e (☎01.44.54.19.29; M^o Bastille). It also has a few Cyclobus mobile bike-rental vans parked near Notre-Dame, Porte d'Auteuil and Château de Vincennes (Esplanade St-Louis).

Buses For national and international buses, including Eurolines (☎08.36.69.52.52), you can get information and tickets at the main terminus, 28 av du Général-de-Gaulle, Bagnole (M^o Gallieni).

Car hire The big international car hire companies have offices at the airports, at the Gare du Nord – down the stairs near the Eurostar platform and taxi gate – and at various points around the city. Two reliable local firms are Buchard, 99 bd Auguste-Blanqui ☎01.45.88.28.38; and Locabest ☎01.48.31.77.05, 🌐www.locabest.fr, with offices at 3 rue Abel (M^o Gare-de-Lyon) and at 104 bd Magenta, 10^e (M^o Gare-du-Nord).

Dental treatment A useful (private) emergency service is SOS Dentaire, 87 bd Port-Royal, 5^e ☎ 01.43.37.51.00; M^o Port-Royal.

Embassies/Consulates Australia, 4 rue Jean-Rey, 15^e ☎ 01.40.59.33.00, 🌐 www.france.embassy.gov.fr; M^o Bir-Hakeim; Canada, 35 av Montaigne, 8^e ☎ 01.44.43.29.00, 🌐 www.amb-canada.fr; M^o Franklin-D.-Roosevelt; Germany, 13–15 av Franklin D. Roosevelt, 8^e ☎ 01.53.83.45.00, 🌐 www.amb-allemande.fr; M^o Franklin-D.-Roosevelt; Ireland, 4 rue Rude, 16^e ☎ 01.44.17.67.00, M^o Charles-de-Gaulle-Étoile; New Zealand, 7ter, rue Léonardo-de-Vinci, 16^e ☎ 01.45.01.43.43; M^o Victor-Hugo; UK, 35 rue du Faubourg-St-Honoré, 8^e ☎ 01.44.51.32.81, 🌐 www.amb-grande-bretagne.fr; M^o Concorde; US, 2 av Gabriel, 8^e ☎ 01.43.12.22.22, 🌐 www.amb-usa.fr; M^o Concorde.

Emergencies Call the SAMU ambulance service on ☎ 15 (operators can put you through to an English-speaker) or the private association SOS-Médecins on ☎ 08.20.33.24.24 for 24hr medical help.

Festivals There are free concerts and street performers all over Paris for the Fête de la Musique, which coincides with the summer solstice (June 21; 🌐 www.fetedelamusique.culture.fr). Gay Pride follows swiftly afterwards, on the last Saturday of June. July 14 (Bastille Day) is celebrated with official pomp in parades of tanks down the Champs-Élysées, firework displays and concerts. For a month from this date, the quais are transformed into a beach along the Seine as part of the Paris Plages scheme. The Tour de France finishes along the Champs-Élysées on the third or fourth Sunday of July. In early October, the Nuit Blanche ("sleepless night") persuades Parisians to stay up all night for an energetic programme of arts events and parties all over the city. See Basics and the Festive France colour section for other music and religious festivals.

Hospitals In emergencies, call an ambulance on ☎ 15. If you require longer-term out-patient care, perhaps, or if you prefer not to avail yourself of France's superb healthcare system, then consider one of the English-speaking private, not-for-profit hospitals. These include the Hertford British Hospital, 3 rue Barbès, Levallois-Perret (☎ 01.46.39.22.22, 🌐 www.british-hospital.org; M^o Anatole-France) and the American Hospital, 63 bd Victor-Hugo, Neuilly-sur-Seine (☎ 01.46.41.25.25, 🌐 www.american-hospital.org; M^o Porte-Maillot then bus #82 to terminus).

Internet Internet access is everywhere in Paris – if it's not in your hotel it'll be in a café nearby, and there are lots of points internet around the city. Most post offices offer online access, too.

Language schools French lessons are available from the Alliance Française, 101 bd Raspail, 6^e ☎ 01.42.84.90.00, 🌐 www.alliancefr.org, and numerous other establishments. A full list is obtainable from embassy cultural sections.

Laundries There's bound to be a self-service laundromat (laverie self-service or libre-service) somewhere near where you're staying – just ask locally. They're generally open from 7am to around 8pm.

Left luggage Lockers are available at all train stations.

Libraries The American Library in Paris, 10 rue du Général-Camou, 7^e (Tues–Sat 10am–7pm; ☎ 01.53.59.12.60; 🌐 www.americanlibraryinparis.org; M^o École-Militaire), has American papers and a vast range of books; to use the library you'll need to get a day pass (€11). The Bibliothèque Publique d'Information, Pompidou Centre, 3^e (Mon & Wed–Fri noon–10pm, Sat & Sun 11am–10pm; closed May 1; free; 🌐 www.bpi.fr; M^o Rambuteau), and the Bibliothèque Nationale François Mitterrand, 13^e (see p.153) have vast collections, including all the foreign press.

Lost property Your first port of call should be the Commissariat de Police for the arrondissement where you think the loss took place; the next step is the central police Bureau des Objets Trouvés, 36 rue des Morillons, 15^e (☎ 08.21.00.25.25; M^o Convention; Mon–Thurs 8.30am–5pm, Fri 8.30am–4.30pm). For property lost on métro/RER and bus services, try the station where you might have lost it first, then call ☎ 08.92.68.77.14. If you lose your passport, report it to a police station and then your embassy.

Pharmacies 24hr service at Dhery, 84 av des Champs-Élysées, 8^e ☎ 01.45.62.02.41 (M^o George-V); 6 place Clichy, 9^e ☎ 01.48.74.65.18. There's a British pharmacy, SNC, at 62 av des Champs-Élysées, 8^e ☎ 01.43.59.22.52; it's open daily from 8am to midnight. All pharmacies, if closed, post the address of one nearby that stays open late (pharmacie de garde).

Police ☎ 17 (☎ 112 from a mobile) for emergencies. To report a theft, go to the commissariat de police of the arrondissement in which the theft took place.

Post office Main office at 52 rue du Louvre 1^{er}; M^o Châtelet-Les-Halles. Open daily 24hr for letters, poste restante, faxes, telegrams and phone calls. Other offices are usually open Mon–Fri 8am–7pm, Sat 8am–noon.

Telephones To call within Paris, even if you're already in the city, you need to dial the ☎ 01 code. ☎ 08.92 numbers cost €0.34 a minute from any (landline) phone in France; ☎ 08.21 numbers cost

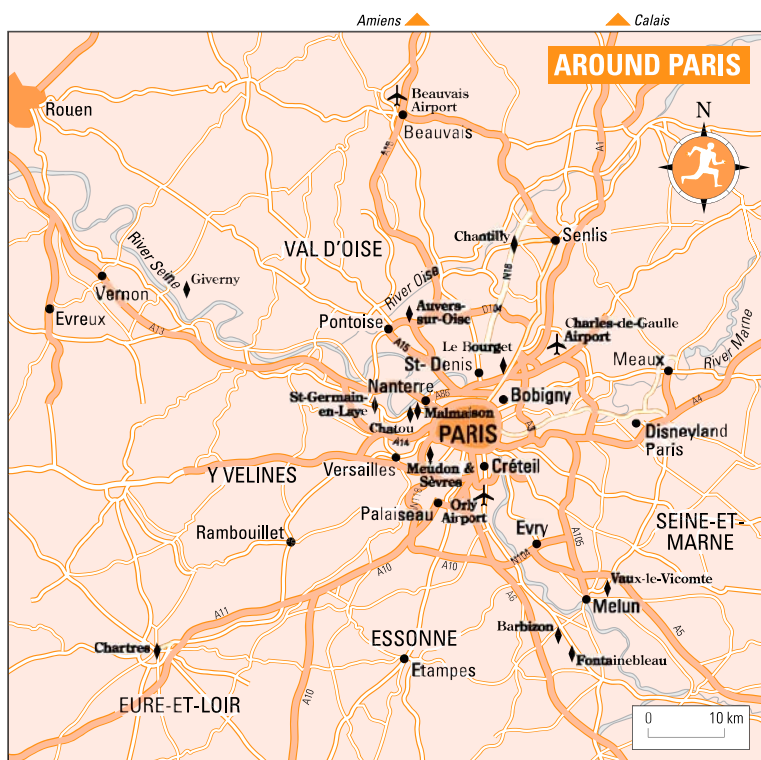

€0.12; neither work from abroad. Public phones accept phonecards (télécartes), sold at tabacs, and sometimes credit cards – rarely coins. If you plan to make a lot of calls, consider buying a French phone using pre-paid charge-up cards (mobicartes); deals are often available for around €30 – less than the cost of just a few international calls on a foreign mobile. Note that France operates on the European GSM standard, so US cellphones won't work in France unless you've got a tri-band phone. Numbers for mobile phones (portables) begin 06.

Travel agencies OTU Voyages, 119 rue St-Martin, 4^e, opposite the Pompidou Centre (☎01.55.82.32.32, 🌐www.otu.fr) is good for student and discount travel, as is Voyages Wasteels, 11 rue Dupuytren, 6^e (☎01.43.25.12.52, 🌐www.wasteels.fr).

Around Paris

The region around the capital – the Île de France – and the borders of the neighbouring provinces are studded with large-scale châteaux. Many were royal or noble retreats for hunting and other leisured pursuits, while some – like Versailles – were for more serious state show. All are impressive, especially Vaux-le-Vicomte for its harmonious architecture and Chantilly for its masterpiece-studded art collection. If you have even the slightest curiosity about church buildings, make sure you visit the cathedral of Chartres, which more than fulfils expectations. Closer in, on the edge of Paris itself, St-Denis boasts a cathedral second only to Notre-Dame – a visit which can be combined with a wander back into the centre of the city along the banks of the St-Denis canal. Other waterside walks include Chatou and the Marne-side towns, which were famously frequented by the carousing, carefree painters and musicians of the early 1900s, when these places were open countryside or small villages. Auvers-Sur-Oise is Van Gogh's final resting place, and has a museum that transports you back to Impressionist days and landscapes. Whether the various suburban museums deserve your attention will depend on your degree of interest in the subjects they represent – china at Sèvres, French prehistory at St-Germain-en-Laye, Napoleon at Malmaison or horses at Chantilly. The biggest pull for kids is without question Disneyland Paris, out beyond the bizarre satellite town of Marne-la-Vallée, but they might also like the air and space museum at Le Bourget.

All of the attractions listed in this section are easily accessible by the region's public transport links of train, RER, métro and bus. We have arranged the accounts geographically, moving in a clockwise direction around Paris from St-Denis in the north to Malmaison in the west.

St-Denis

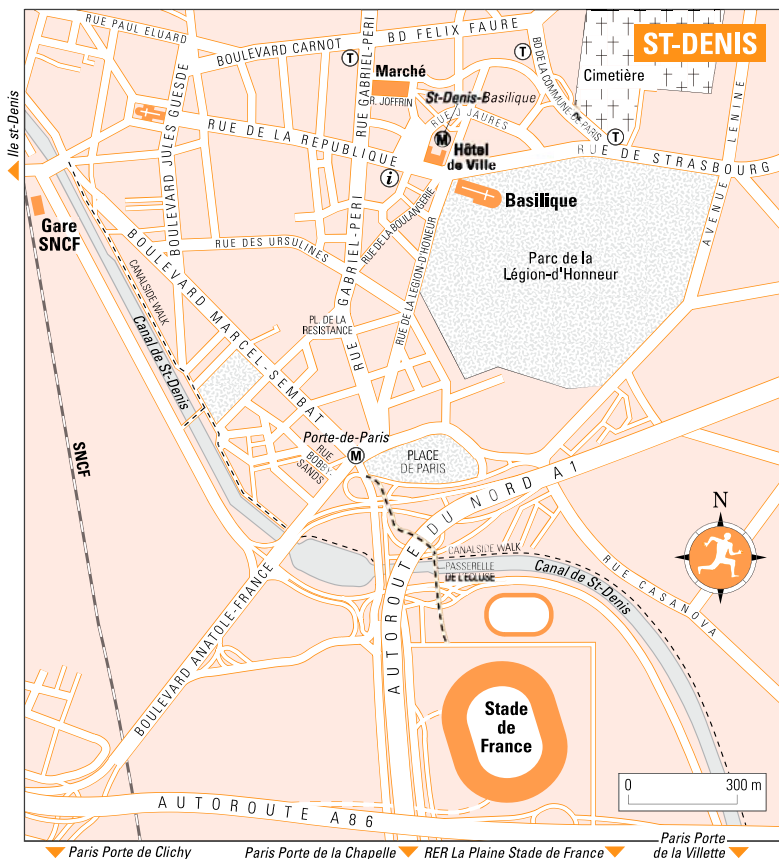

ST-DENIS, 10km north of the centre of Paris and accessible by métro (M° St-Denis-Basilique) is home to one of the most heavily industrialized communities in France and has long been the stronghold of the Communist Party. Recession has, however, taken a heavy toll in the form of closed factories and unemployment.

The centre of St-Denis retains traces of small-town origins, but the area immediately abutting its cathedral has been transformed into an astonishing, fortress-like housing and shopping complex. A thrice-weekly market (Tues, Fri & Sun mornings) takes place in the square by the Hôtel de Ville and the covered halles, at the end of rue Dupont, which leads off the square. It's an exuberant, multi-ethnic affair, where the swathes of cheap fabrics on the market stalls and the quantity of butcher's offal in the covered section – ears, feet and tails – shows this is not wealthy territory.

The town's chief claim to fame, though, is its magnificent cathedral, close by the St-Denis-Basilique métro station, the burial place of the kings of France. Begun by Abbot Suger, friend and adviser to royalty, in the first half of the twelfth century, the Basilique St-Denis (April–Sept Mon–Sat 10am–6.15pm, Sun noon–6.15pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–5.15pm, Sun noon–5pm; tombs €6.50, closed during services) is generally regarded as the birthplace of the Gothic style in European architecture. The west front was the first ever to have a rose window, but it is in the choir that you best see the emergence of the new style: the slimness and lightness that comes with the use of the pointed arch, the ribbed vault and the long shafts of half-column rising from pillar to roof. It's a remarkably well-lit church, thanks to the transept windows – so big that they occupy their entire end walls – and the clerestory, which is almost one hundred percent glass – another first for St-Denis.

△ Statue of Louis XVI, Basilique St-Denis

Legend holds that the first church here was founded by a mid-third-century Parisian bishop, later known as St-Denis. The story goes that after he was beheaded for his beliefs at Montmartre (Mount of the Martyr), he picked up his head and walked all the way to St-Denis, thereby establishing the abbey. It's not that far – just over five kilometres – though as a friend of Edward Gibbon's once remarked, “the distance is nothing, it's the first step that counts”. The abbey maintained royal connections by holding the coronation of Pepin the Short, in 754, and appointing the king as its abbot during much of the Carolingian era. It was with Hugues Capet, in 996, that it became the customary burial place of the French monarchs, and since then all but three French kings have been interred here. Their very fine tombs and effigies are distributed about the transepts and ambulatory.

Immediately on the left of the entrance, in the south transept, is one of the most bizarre sights: the bare feet of François 1er and his wife Claude de France peering out of their enormous Renaissance memorial. Beside the steps to the ambulatory lies Charles V, the first king to have his funeral effigy carved from life, on the day of his coronation in 1364. Alongside him is his wife Jeanne de Bourbon, who clutches the sack of her own entrails to her chest – a reminder that royalty was traditionally eviscerated at death, the flesh boiled away from the bones and buried separately. Up the steps and round to the right, a

Artistic haunts

The countryside around Paris began to take a primary role for painters in search of inspiration in the late nineteenth century, when it attracted many a city artist, either on a day jaunt or on a more permanent basis. The towns along the banks of the Seine read like a roll-call of Musée d'Orsay paintings, and pockets of unchanged towns and scenery remain. Local museums, set up to record these pioneering artistic days, are well worth a visit. A little further afield is Monet's studio and Japanese-style garden at Giverny, in Normandy (see p.364), where he lived and painted his almost abstract water-lily sequences.

Auvers-Sur-Oise

On the banks of the River Oise, about 35km northwest of Paris, AUVERS makes an attractive rural excursion. Van Gogh spent the last two months of his life here, in a frenzy of painting activity, averaging over a canvas a day. The church at Auvers, the portrait of Dr Gachet, black crows flapping across a wheat field – many of Van Gogh's best-known works belong to this period. He died in his brother's arms, after an incompetent attempt to shoot himself, in the tiny attic room he rented in the Auberge Ravoux. The auberge still stands, repaired and renovated, on the main street. A visit to Van Gogh's room (mid-March to mid-Nov Wed–Sun 10am–6pm; €5) is surprisingly moving, and there's a short video about his time in Auvers.

At the entrance to the village is the Château d'Auvers, which offers a fascinating, high-tech tour of the world the Impressionists inhabited (April–Sept Tues–Sun 10.30am–6pm; Oct–March Tues–Fri 10.30am–4.30pm, Sat & Sun 10.30am–5.30pm; @www.chateau-auvers.fr; €10.50). Most evocative of all is a walk through the old part of the village, past the church and the red lane into the famous wheat field and up the hill to the cemetery where, against the far left wall in a humble ivy-covered grave, the Van Gogh brothers lie side by side.

Auvers boasts a further artistic connection in Van Gogh's predecessor, Daubigny – contemporary of Corot and Daumier. A small museum (Wed–Sun: April–Oct 2–6pm, Nov–March 2–5pm; €3.50), dedicated to him and his art, can be visited above the tourist office. His studio-house (April–Nov Thurs–Sun 2–6.30pm; €4.50), built to his own requirements, can also be visited at 61 rue Daubigny. From here, Daubigny would go off for weeks at a time, in his boat, to paint. This is represented by a boat sitting in the garden which is, in fact, a replica of a smaller boat once owned by Monet.

To reach Auvers you can take trains from Gare du Nord or Gare St-Lazare, changing at Pontoise.

Chatou

A long narrow island in the Seine, the Île de Chatou was once a rustic spot to which Parisians came on the newly opened train line in the mid-nineteenth century to row florid Louis XVI and busty Marie-Antoinette – often graced by bouquets of flowers – kneel in prayer. The mawkish scene was sculpted in 1830, long after their execution.

Most visitors to St-Denis, however, come for a match or concert at the Stade de France. At least €430 million was spent on the construction of this high-tech stadium, whose cosmic elliptic structure is best appreciated at night when lit up. If there isn't an event on, you can visit its grounds, facilities and small museum (daily 10am–6pm; €6).

To walk back to Paris, follow rue de la République from the Hôtel de Ville to the church of St-Denis-de-l'Éstrée, then go down the left side of the church until you reach the canal bridge. If you turn left, you can walk practically all on the river and dine and flirt at the guinguettes (dance halls). A favourite haunt of many artists was the Maison Fournaise, just below the Pont de Chatou road bridge, now a restaurant (closed Sun evening in winter; ☎01.30.71.41.91; menu €25), with a small museum of memorabilia (Wed–Sun 10am–6pm; €4). One of Renoir's best-known canvases, Le Déjeuner des Canotiers, shows his friends lunching on the balcony, which is still shaded by a magnificent riverside plane tree. As well as many Impressionists, Vlaminck, Derain, Matisse and other members of the Fauve movement were habitués.

Access to the island is from the Rueil-Malmaison RER stop. Take the exit av Albert-1er, go left out of the station and right along the dual carriageway onto the bridge – a ten-minute walk. Bizarrely, the island hosts a twice-yearly ham and antiques fair (March & Sept), which is fun to check out.

Barbizon

The landscape and country life around Barbizon, 60km southeast of Paris and 10km from Fontainebleau, inspired painters such as Rousseau and Millet to set up camp here, initiating an artistic movement known as the Barbizon group. More painters followed, as well as writers and musicians, all attracted by the lifestyle and community. The Auberge du Père Ganne, on the main road, became the place to stay, not unrelated to the fact that the generous owner accepted the artists' decorations of his inn and furniture as payment. Now home to a museum (daily except Tues 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; €6), the Impressionist inn still contains the original painted furniture as well as many Barbizon paintings. To get to Barbizon, you'll need your own wheels; a summer bus service connects with Fontainebleau (see p.211), but it's fairly infrequent and limited to weekends.

Meudon

The tranquil suburb of Meudon, to the southwest of Paris, was where Rodin spent the last years of his life. In 1895, he acquired the Villa des Brillants at 19 av Rodin (April–Sept Fri–Sun 1–6pm; €2), installing his studio in the first room you encounter as you enter through the veranda. It was in this room that he used to dine with his companion, Rose Beuret, on summer evenings, and here that he married her, after fifty years together, just a fortnight before her death in February 1917. His own death followed in November, and they are buried together on the terrace below the house, beneath a version of The Thinker. The classical facade behind them masks an enormous pavilion containing plaster casts of many of his most famous works. To get there, you can take RER line C to Meudon-Val Fleury, from where it's a fifteen-minute walk along avenues Barbusse and Rodin. Alternatively, the tramway line T2 connects Meudon with La Défense and the ceramic museum at Sèvres (see p.210).

the way along the towpath (parts of the canal side are being rehabilitated and may necessitate a slight detour) – between an hour and a half and two hours – to Porte de la Villette. There are stretches where it looks as if you're probably not supposed to be there, but pay no attention and keep going. You pass peeling villas with unkempt gardens, patches of greenery, sand and gravel docks, and waste ground where larks rise above rusting bedsteads and doorless fridges. Decaying tenements and improvised shacks give way to lock-keepers' cottages with roses and vegetable gardens, then derelict factories and huge sheds where trundling gantries load bundles of steel rods onto Belgian barges.

Chantilly

CHANTILLY, a small town 40km north of Paris, is associated mainly with horses. Some 3000 thoroughbreds prance the forest rides of a morning, and two of the season's classiest flat races, the Jockey Club and the Prix de Diane, are held here. The old château stables are given over to a horse museum.

Trains take about thirty minutes from Paris's Gare du Nord to Chantilly. Occasional free buses pass from the station to the château, though it's only twenty or thirty minutes' walk away, on a pleasant, signposted path through the forest. Footpaths GR11 and 12 pass through the château park and its surrounding forest: following them makes a peaceful and leisurely way of exploring this bit of country.

The château and the Musée Vivant du Cheval

The Chantilly estate used to belong to two of the most powerful clans in France: first the Montmorencys, then, through marriage, to the Condés. The present Château (April–Oct daily except Tues 10am–6pm; Nov–March Mon & Wed–Fri 10.30am–12.45pm & 2–5pm, Sat & Sun 10.30am–5pm; €8; park open daily 10am–5/6pm, €4) was built in the late nineteenth century on the ruins of the Grand Château, built for the Grand Condé, who helped Louis XIV smash Spanish power in the mid-seventeenth century. It's a beautiful structure, graceful and romantic, surrounded by water and looking out over a formal arrangement of pools and pathways designed by Le Nôtre, Louis XIV's gardener.

The entrance is across a moat, past two realistic bronzes of hunting hounds. The visitable parts are mainly made up of an enormous collection of paintings and drawings owned by the Institut de France (see p.140). Stipulated to remain as organized by Henri d'Orléans (the donor of the château), the arrangement is haphazard by modern standards, but immensely satisfying. Some highlights can be found in the Rotunda of the picture gallery – Piero di Cosimo's Simonetta Vespucci and Raphael's Madone de Lorette – and in the so-called Sanctuary, with Raphael's Three Graces displayed alongside Filippo Lippi's Esther et Assuerius and forty miniatures from a fifteenth-century Book of Hours (an illuminated religious text) attributed to the great French Renaissance artist Jean Fouquet. Pass through the Galerie de Psyche, with its series of sepia stained glass illustrating Apuleius' Golden Ass, to the room known as the Tribune, where Italian art, including Botticelli's Autumn, takes up two walls, and Ingres and Delacroix have a wall each.

A guided tour (free) is the only way to access the apartments of the sixteenth-century wing known as the Petit Château. The first port of call is the well-stocked library, where a facsimile of the museum's single greatest treasure is on display, Les Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, the most celebrated of all the Books of Hours. The illuminated pages illustrate the months of the year with representative scenes from contemporary (early 1400s) rural life – harvesting, ploughing, sheep-shearing and pruning – and are richly coloured and drawn with a delicate naturalism. The remaining half-dozen rooms on the tour mostly show off superb furnishings, with exquisite boiseries panelling the walls of the Monkey Gallery, wittily painted with allegorical stories in a pseudo-Chinese style. A grand parade of canvases in the long gallery depicts the many battles won by the Grand Condé.

Five minutes' walk back towards town along the château drive, the colossal stable block has been transformed into a horse museum, the Musée Vivant du Cheval (April–Oct Mon & Wed–Fri 10.30am–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 10.30am–6pm; Nov–March Mon & Wed–Fri 2–5pm, Sat & Sun 10.30am–5.30pm; €8.50; @www.museevivantducheval.fr). The building was erected at the beginning of the eighteenth century by the incumbent Condé prince, who believed he would be reincarnated as a horse and wished to provide fitting accommodation for 240 of his future relatives. In the vast main hall, horses of different breeds from around the world are stalled, with a central ring for demonstrations (April–Oct daily 11.30am, 3.30pm & 5.15pm; Nov–March weekends only; entry included in ticket).

Disneyland Paris

There are no two ways about it: children will love Disneyland Paris, 32km east of the capital, and the high-speed rides will thrill even the most jaded adult. The park takes its inspiration from (Disney) films as much as funfair rides, and the results are sometimes clever and high-tech, sometimes enjoyably old-fashioned. Commercialism is shrilly insistent, however – it would be hard to find sponsors less magical than Esso, McDonalds and Nestlé – and prices for food and drink are inflated. Bad weather can take the Florida shine off the outing, too, but it does have one advantage: on a wet and windy off-season weekday you can get round every ride you want. Otherwise, lines for the big rides are common, though you can reduce the wait at the most popular attractions by using the Fastpass scheme, where you turn up and reserve a time in advance – you then come back and walk right through.

The complex is divided into three areas: Disneyland Park, the original Magic Kingdom, with most of the big rides; Walt Disney Studios Park, a more technology-based attempt to recreate the world of cartoon film-making, with fake sets and virtual reality rides; and Disney Village, where you can eat overpriced, mostly American-style food. A clutch of (expensive) Disney hotels allow you to sleep locally if you're planning on making more than a day of it.

Disneyland Park

Since the opening of Space Mountain, Disneyland Park has provided a variety of good thrill rides, though the majority of attractions remain relatively sedate. The Magic Kingdom is divided into four “lands” radiating out from Main Street USA. Fantasyland appeals to the tinies, with Sleeping Beauty's Castle, Peter Pan's Flight, the Mad Hatter's Teacups and Alice's Curious Labyrinth among its attractions. Adventureland has the most outlandish sets and two of the best rides – Pirates of the Caribbean and Indiana Jones and the Temple of Peril: Backwards. Frontierland has the Psycho-inspired but insipid Phantom Manor and the hair-raising roller coaster Big Thunder Mountain, modelled on a runaway mine train. In Discoveryland there's a high-tech 3-D experience called “Honey, I Shrunk The Audience”, a 360-degree Parisian exposé in Le Visionarium, the Nautilus submarine of 20,000

Leagues Under the Sea and the terrifyingly fast Space Mountain roller coaster. The grand parade of floats representing all the top box-office Disney movies sallies down Main Street USA at 4pm every day (a good time to try for the more popular rides). Night-time Princess Parades and firework displays take place several times a week.

Walt Disney Studios Park

Other than the “Rock ‘N’ Roller Coaster Starring Aerosmith”, a corkscrew-looping, metal-playing white-knuckler, the new Walt Disney Studios Park lacks the big, scary rides offered by its older neighbour. Yet in some ways it’s a more satisfying affair, focusing on what Disney was and is still renowned for – animation. Cartoonists can be visited “at work”, there are mock film and TV sets where you can be part of the audience, and the special effects and stunt shows are impressive, although probably not as impressive as your average film. The virtual-reality ride Armageddon is genuinely thrilling – your space-station is bombarded by meteors – and the tram tour’s passage through the collapsing Catastrophe Canyon is good fun. A few minutes’ walk away, you can book a two-hour football coaching session for 7- to 14-year-olds at the high-tech Manchester United Soccer School.

Arrival and information

To reach Disneyland from Paris, take RER line A from Châtelet-Les Halles to Marne-la-Vallée/Chessey station, which is opposite the main park gates. The journey takes around 45 minutes and costs €11.90 for a round-trip (children under 12 €5.94, under-3s free). If you’re coming from Charles de Gaulle airport, you can take the TGV straight to the park in ten minutes (14 trains daily from roughly 9am–9pm; €13.80). From both CDG or Orly airports, shuttle buses run to individual hotels (times and frequencies change seasonally, but roughly every 20–30min 8.30am–7.45pm; €16, children aged 3–11 €13; @www.vea.fr). Marne-la-Vallée/Chessey also has its own TGV train station, linked to Lille, Lyon – and London via special Eurostar trains. By car, the park is a 32-kilometre drive east of Paris along the A4: take the “Porte de Bercy” exit off the périphérique, then follow “direction Metz/Nancy”, leaving at exit 14. From Calais follow the A26, changing to the A1, the A104 and finally the A4.

Admission charges for the “1-day/1-Park” ticket are €43 for an adult or €35 for a child (aged 3–11); the ticket allows entry to either the Disneyland Park or Walt Disney Studios Park, not both (though if you opt for the Studios you can visit the Disneyland Park after the Studios closes). One-day “Hopper” tickets, allowing access to both parks, cost €53/45; two- and three-day Hopper tickets are also available. Opening hours vary depending on the season and whether it’s a weekend, and should be checked when you buy your ticket (which can be done online at @www.disneylandparis.com) but they are usually 9/10am–8pm, or until 9pm or 11pm on weekends in high summer; Walt Disney Studios Park always closes at 6pm. You can buy admission passes and train tickets in Paris at all RER line A and B stations and in major métro stations.

Accommodation

Disney’s six heavily themed hotels are a mixed bag, and only worth staying in as part of a multi-day package booked through an agent, or through Disneyland; otherwise they’re incredibly expensive. From the UK, for example, you can get a three-day pass, with a return ticket on Eurostar and two nights’ accommodation at the Hotel Santa Fe for around £300 per adult and £140 per child. For details look online or call ☎00 33.1.60.30.60.81 from the US, ☎0870 503

0303 in the UK ☎01.60.30.60.53 in France or from other countries. To really economize, you could camp at the nearby Camping du Parc de la Colline, route de Lagny, 77200 Torcy (☎01.30.58.56.20), which is open all year and offers minibus shuttles to the park

Vaux-le-Vicomte

Of all the great mansions within reach of a day's outing from Paris, the classical Château of Vaux-le-Vicomte (end March to mid-Nov daily 10am–6pm; 🌐 www.vaux-le-vicomte.com; €12.50), 46km southeast of Paris, is the most architecturally harmonious and aesthetically pleasing – and the most human in scale.

To get there, take a train from Gare de Lyon (or RER line D from Châtelet) to Melun (40min), and pick up the navette, or shuttle bus (€7 return), though it only runs on weekends and you'll have to check the timetable on the château website. Otherwise, a taxi costs roughly €15 for the seven-kilometre ride to the château.

The château

Louis XIV's finance superintendent, Nicholas Fouquet, had the château built at colossal expense, using the top designers of the day – architect LeVau, painter Le Brun and landscape gardener Le Nôtre. The result was magnificence and precision in perfect proportion, and a bill that could only be paid by someone who occasionally confused the state's accounts with his own. The house-warming party, to which the king was invited, was more extravagant than any royal event – a comparison which other finance ministers ensured that Louis took to heart. Within three weeks Fouquet was jailed for life on trumped-up charges, and the design team carted off to build the king's own gaudy piece of one-upmanship at Versailles.

Seen from the entrance, the château is a rather austere grey pile surrounded by an artificial moat, and it's only when you go through to the south side – where clipped box and yew, fountains and statuary stand in formal gardens – that you can look back and appreciate the very harmonious and very French combination of a steep, tall roof and a central dome with classical pediment and pilasters.

In terms of the interior, the main artistic interest lies in the work of Le Brun, who was responsible for the two fine tapestries in the entrance. These were made in the local workshops set up by Fouquet specifically to adorn his house (and subsequently removed by Louis XIV to become the famous Gobelins works in Paris). Le Brun's painted ceilings include Fouquet's Bedroom, the Salon des Muses, Sleep in the Cabinet des Jeux and the so-called King's Bedroom, whose decor is the first example of the style that became known as “Louis Quatorze”.

Other points of interest are the kitchens, which have not been altered since construction, and a room displaying letters in the hand of Fouquet, Louis XIV and other notables. One, dated November 1794 (mid-Revolution), addresses the incumbent Duc de Choiseul-Praslin as tu. “Citizen,” it says, “you've got a week to hand over one hundred thousand pounds ...”, and signs off with “Cheers and brotherhood”. You can imagine the shock to the aristocratic system.

Every fine Saturday evening from May to mid-October, and every Friday for most of July and August, the state rooms and gardens are illuminated with two thousand candles between 8pm and midnight (€15.50 entrance) – as they

Museums around Paris

The museums in the general vicinity of Paris – ceramics at Sèvres, prehistory at St-Germain-en-Laye and aviation at Le Bourget – are excellent and shouldn't be missed if their subjects arouse interest.

Musée de l'Air et d'Espace

The French were always pioneering aviators and LE BOURGET, a short hop up the A1 motorway from St-Denis, is intimately connected with their earliest exploits. Lindbergh landed here after his epic first flight across the Atlantic and, until the development of Orly in the 1950s, this was Paris's principal airport. The museum (Tues–Sun: April–Sept 10am–6pm; Oct–March 10am–5pm; 📍 www.mae.org; €7) occupies the old airport buildings, and consists of five hangars and the Grande Galerie, all littered with real planes. The latter takes you from the earliest attempts of the Montgolfier brothers, with their devil-may-care hot-air balloons, to the quixotic aircraft of World War I. The dedicated World War II hangar shows off the finest aircraft from the era while the Hall Concorde, adjacent, houses the first, beautiful Concorde prototype. Other hangars focus on France's high-tech achievements since the 1950s, including space exploration and the super-sophisticated, best-selling Mirage fighters. To get there, take RER line B from Gare du Nord to Gare du Bourget, or métro line 7 to La Courneuve; bus #152 connects both station to the museum. Alternatively, take bus #350 from the Gare du Nord.

Musée National de la Céramique

The Musée National de la Céramique (daily except Tues 10am–5pm; €4.50; 📍 www.musee-ceramique-sevres.fr) in SÈVRES possesses one of the world's greatest collections of pottery and china. If you're interested in ceramics there's a vast quantity to savour here, including Islamic, Chinese, Italian, German, Dutch and English pieces. There is also, inevitably, a comprehensive collection of French Sèvres ware: the stuff is still made right here. Close by, overlooking the river, the Parc de St-Cloud is good for fresh air and has a geometrical sequence of pools and fountains delineating a route down to the river and across to the city. Getting to Sèvres from Paris is easy: take the métro to the Pont-de-Sèvres terminus, cross the bridge and spaghetti junction and the museum is the massive building facing the riverbank on your right. Alternatively, the new riverbank tramway line T2 now connects the museum directly with La Défense, via the Rodin museum at Meudon (see p.205).

Musée des Antiquités Nationales

ST-GERMAIN is a pleasant town, but the Musée des Antiquités Nationales (daily except Tues 9am–5.15pm; 📍 www.musee-antiquitesnationales.fr; €4.50, free first Sun of the month) is the main attraction. It's housed opposite St-Germain-en-Laye RER station in a renovated château that was one of the main residences of the French court before Versailles was built. The extensive Stone Age section includes mock-ups of several cave drawings and carvings, and a beautiful collection of decorative objects, tools and so forth. All ages of early French history are covered, from Celts and Romans to Franks. A great section on Alésia – where Vercingétorix found himself besieged by Caesar's army – shows how the battle was won. Outside the château, a terrace – Le Nôtre, again, was responsible – stretches for more than 2km above the Seine, with a view over the whole of Paris.

probably were on the occasion of Fouquet's fateful party. The fountains and other waterworks can be seen in action on the second and last Saturdays of each month in summer (April–Sept only; 3–6pm). In the stables, the Musée des Équipages comprises a collection of horse-drawn vehicles, including those used by Charles X fleeing Paris and the Duc de Rohan retreating from Moscow.

Fontainebleau

From the Gare de Lyon it's a fifty-minute train ride to FONTAINEBLEAU, famous for its vast, rambling Château (daily except Tues: June–Sept 9.30am–6pm; Oct–May 9.30am–5pm; €6.50, 📍 www.musee-chateau-fontainebleau.fr). The connecting buses #A and #B from Fontainebleau-Avon station take you to the château gates in fifteen minutes.

The château owes its existence to its situation in the middle of a magnificent forest, which made it the perfect base for royal hunting expeditions. A lodge was built here as early as the twelfth century, but it only began its transformation into a luxurious palace during the sixteenth on the initiative of François I, who imported a colony of Italian artists – most notably Rosso il Fiorentino and Niccolò dell'Abate – to carry out the decoration. They were responsible for the celebrated Galerie François-1er – which had a seminal influence on the subsequent development of French aristocratic art and design – the Salle de Bal, the Salon Louis XIII and the Salle du Conseil with its eighteenth-century decoration. The palace continued to enjoy royal favour well into the nineteenth century; Napoleon spent huge amounts of money on it, as did Louis-Philippe.

You can take various guided tours (all €3), of which the most interesting takes you round the Petits Appartements, which were fitted out for Napoleon and his first wife Josephine, and preserve their original decor. Of more recherché interest are the tours of the Chinese museum created for Eugénie, the wife of Napoléon III, and the Musée Napoléon 1er, which mostly attracts those nostalgic for the First Empire. For details of tour times, ring ☎01.60.71.50.70.

The gardens are equally luscious, but if you want to escape to the relative wilds, the surrounding forest of Fontainebleau is full of walking and cycling trails, all marked on Michelin map #196 (Environs de Paris).

Versailles

The Palace of Versailles (Tues–Sun: April–Oct 9am–6pm; Nov–March 9am–5pm; closed public hols; €13.50, 📍 www.chateauversailles.fr) is rightly one of the most visited monuments in France. The standard ticket gives you free access to the key rooms of the palace, but if you plan to visit the Trianons in the park (see p.213) and the “Grandes Eaux Musicales”, or dancing fountains (see p.213), it's worth buying the “passport” (April–Oct Mon–Fri €20, Sat & Sun €25; Nov–March €16). All tickets allow you to come and go during the day. Don't set out to see all the palace in one visit – it's not possible.

To get there, take RER line C5 to Versailles-Rive Gauche (40min), turn right out of the station and immediately left to approach the palace.

The palace

The palace was inspired by the young Louis XIV's envy of his finance minister's château at Vaux-le-Vicomte (see p.209), which he was determined to outdo. He recruited the design team of Vaux-le-Vicomte architect Le Vau, painter Le Brun and gardener Le Nôtre and ordered something a hundred times the size. Versailles is the apotheosis of French regal indulgence and, even if its extravagant decor and the blatant propaganda of the Sun King are not to your liking, it will certainly leave an impression.

Construction began in 1664 and lasted virtually until Louis XIV's death in 1715. Second only to God, and the head of an immensely powerful state,

△ Hall of Mirrors, Versailles

Louis XIV was an institution rather than a private individual. His risings and sittings, comings and goings, were minutely regulated and rigidly encased in ceremony, attendance at which was an honour much sought after by courtiers. Versailles was the headquarters of every arm of the state. More than 20,000 people – nobles, administrative staff, merchants, soldiers and servants – lived in the palace in a state of unhygienic squalor, according to contemporary accounts.

Following Louis XIV's death, the château was abandoned for a few years before being reoccupied by Louis XV in 1722. It remained the residence of the royal family until the Revolution of 1789, when the furniture was sold and the pictures dispatched to the Louvre. Thereafter Versailles fell into ruin until Louis-Philippe established his giant museum of French Glory here – it still exists, though most is mothballed. In 1871, during the Paris Commune, the château became the seat of the nationalist government, and the French parliament continued to meet in Louis XV's opera building until 1879. Restoration only began in earnest between the two world wars, and since 2003, the palace has become the focus of one of Jacques Chirac's pet schemes, a grand restoration project to rival Mitterrand's Louvre, with a budget of €400 million. The château's management eagerly buys back its original furnishings every time they come up for auction. Intriguingly, it has chosen to restore the château as it appeared in the last days of the monarchy.

The most stunning room is the Galerie des Glaces – or Hall of Mirrors – where the Treaty of Versailles was signed to end World War I. Restoration works are expected to continue until 2008, but at least half the gallery will be visible at any one time; it's best viewed at the end of the day, when the crowds have departed and sunlight fills it from the west. Overdoses of gilding await you in the grands appartements, the state apartments of the king and queen, and the royal chapel, a grand structure that ranks among France's finest Baroque creations.

The park and Grand and Petit Trianons

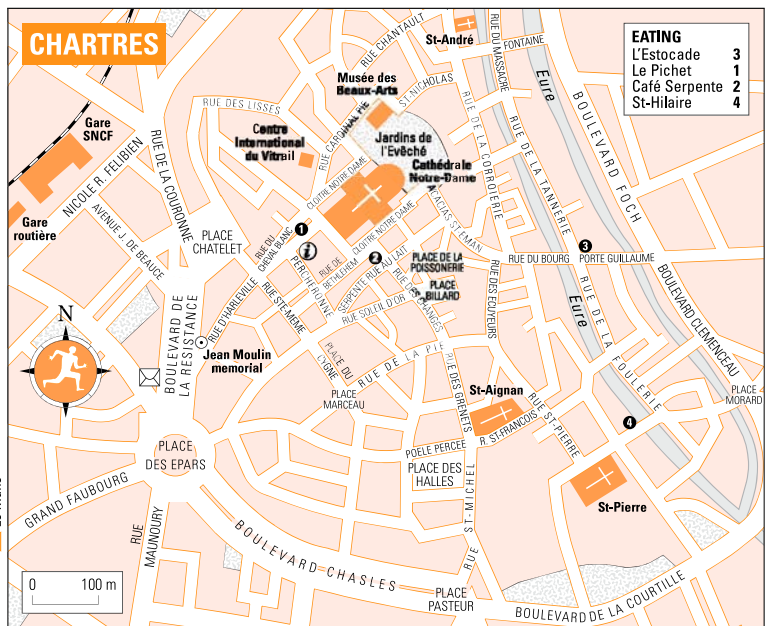

You could spend the whole day just exploring the park at Versailles (April–Oct 7am–8.30pm; Nov–March 8am–6pm; free, except on “Grandes Eaux” days, see p.211). Studded around the park are various outcroppings of the royal mania for building. The Italianate Grand Trianon was designed by Hardouin-Mansart in 1687 as a “country retreat” for Louis XIV, while the delicious Petit Trianon was built by Gabriel in the 1760s for Louis XV's mistress, Mme de Pompadour. The quintessentially picturesque Hameau de la Reine was built in 1783 as a play farm for Marie-Antoinette, so she could indulge the fashionable, Rousseau-inspired fantasy of the natural life. Unless you have the “passport”, a separate ticket is needed for all three buildings (daily noon–5/6pm; €9, or €5 after 4pm and from Nov to March). At weekends in summer, the various Louis XIV fountains are switched on, to the accompaniment of Baroque music; when this “Grandes Eaux Musicales” is in action, you have to pay extra to visit the park (€7), unless you have the “passport” ticket.

Distances in the park are considerable. If you can't manage them on foot, a petit train shuttles between the terrace in front of the château and the Trianons. There are bikes for hire at the Grille de la Reine, Porte St-Antoine and by the Grand Canal. Boats are for hire on the Grand Canal, within the Park.

Near the park entrance at the end of boulevard de la Reine is the Hôtel Palais Trianon, where the final negotiations for the Treaty of Versailles took place in 1919; the hotel has a wonderfully posh tearoom. The style of the Trianon is very much that of the town in general. The dominant population is aristocratic; those with pre-revolutionary titles are disdainful of those dating merely from the Napoleonic era. On Bastille Day, local conservatives like to show their colours, donning black ribbons and ties to mourn the passing of the ancien régime.

Chartres

About 80km southwest of Paris, CHARTRES is a modest but charming market town whose existence is almost entirely overshadowed by its extraordinary cathedral (daily: May–Oct 8am–8pm; Nov–April 8.30am–7.30pm; free). Built between 1194 and 1260, it was one of the quickest ever constructed and, as a result, preserves a uniquely harmonious design. The astounding size of the cathedral is entirely due to the presence of the Sancta Camisia – supposed to have been the robe Mary wore when she gave birth to Jesus. After an earlier Romanesque structure burnt down in 1194, the relic was discovered three days later, miraculously unharmed. It was a sign that the Virgin wanted her church lavishly rebuilt – at least, so said the canny medieval fundraisers. In the medieval heyday of the pilgrimage to Santiago de Compostela, hordes of pilgrims on their way south to Spain would stop here to venerate the relic – the sloping floor evident today allowed for it to be washed down more easily. The Sancta Camisia still exists, though after many years on open display it was recently rolled up and put into storage. It may yet be restored to the cathedral.

The geometry of Chartres is unique in being almost unaltered since its consecration, and virtually all of the magnificent stained glass is original thirteenth-century work. But if a group of medieval pilgrims suddenly found themselves here they would be deeply dismayed. The paint and gilt work that once brought the portal sculptures to life has vanished, while the walls have lost the white-wash that reflected the vivid colours of the stained-glass windows. Worse still, the high altar has been brought down into the body of the church, among the hoi polloi, and chairs usually cover up the thirteenth-century labyrinth on the floor of the nave. The cathedral's stonework, however, is still captivating, particularly the choir screen, which curves around the ambulatory. Outside, hosts of sculpted figures stand like guardians at each entrance portal. Like the south tower and spire which abuts it, the mid-twelfth-century Royal Portal actually survives from the earlier Romanesque church. You have to pay extra to visit the crypt and treasury, though these are relatively unimpressive. Crowds permitting, it's worth climbing the north tower for its bird's-eye view of the sculptures and structure of the cathedral (Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–4.30pm, Sun 2–4.30pm; May–Aug open until 5.30pm; €4). There are gardens at the back from where you can contemplate the innovative flying buttresses.

In the former episcopal palace immediately behind the cathedral, the Musée des Beaux-Arts (Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm (till 5pm Nov–April), Sun 2–6pm; €2.70, combined ticket with Maison Picassiette, opposite, €5.80), has some beautiful tapestries, a room full of works by Maurice de Vlaminck and an excellent Sainte Lucie by Zurbarán. Behind the museum, rue Chantault leads past old town houses to the River Eure and Pont du Massacre. You can follow the river upstream, passing ancient wash-houses. A left turn at the end of rue de la Tannerie, then third right, will bring you to the Maison Picassiette, at 22 rue du Repos (April–Oct Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; €4.30). This house was entirely decorated with mosaics by a local road-mender and later cemetery-caretaker, Raymond Isidore, creating a strange yet moving folly – “I took the things that other people threw away”, as he put it. Back at the end of rue de la Tannerie, the bridge over the river brings you back to the medieval town, where you can wander about spotting little details such as the sixteenth-century carved salmon that decorates a house at the eastern end of place de la Poissonnerie. A large food market takes place on place Billard and rue des Changes on Saturday morning, and there’s a flower market on place du Cygne (Tues, Thurs & Sat).

At the edge of the old town, at the junction of boulevard de la Résistance and rue Collin-d’Arleville, stands a memorial to Jean Moulin, Prefect of Chartres until 1942. In 1940, he refused to sign a document claiming that Senegalese soldiers in the French army were responsible for Nazi atrocities. He later became de Gaulle’s number-one man on the ground, coordinating the Resistance, but died at the hands of Klaus Barbie in 1943, on his way to a concentration camp in Germany.

Practicalities

Trains run from Paris’s Gare du Montparnasse at least every hour on weekdays (1hr). From the gare SNCF, it’s less than ten minutes’ walk to the cathedral and tourist office (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 9.30am–5.30pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2.30–4.30pm; ☎02.37.18.26.26). The latter can supply free maps and help with accommodation.

For a snack, there are lots of places with outside tables on rue Cloître-Notre-Dame, opposite the south side of the cathedral: try the Café Serpente. For a proper restaurant meal, Le Pichet, 19 rue de Cheval Blanc, almost under the northwest spire (☎02.37.21.08.35; closed Wed, Tues & Sun eve), has a cosy interior full ofingham and bric-a-brac, and serves simple dishes like steak or Greek salads for around €10–14. The slightly more upmarket L’Estocade, 1 rue de la Porte Guillaume (☎02.37.34.27.17; closed Mon, Sun evening & Nov–April), has a lovely situation down by the peaceful, canal-like River Eure. The St-Hilaire, 11 rue du Pont St-Hilaire (☎02.37.30.97.57; closed Mon & Sun), serves refined regional cuisine (menus €25–40) in a sweet little upstairs dining room.

Malmaison

The Château of Malmaison (daily except Tues: April–Oct 10am–4.30pm; Nov–March 10am–noon & 1.30–5.15pm; €5; 🌐www.chateau-malmaison.fr), set in the beautiful grounds of the Bois-Préau, about 15km west of central Paris, is a relatively small and enjoyable place to visit. It was the home of the Empress Josephine, and – during the 1800–1804 Consulate – of Napoleon, too. According to his secretary, “it was the only place next to the battlefield where he was truly himself”. After their divorce, Josephine stayed on here, building up her superb rose garden and occasionally receiving visits from the emperor until her death in 1814. Tours of the château include the private and official apartments, some with original furnishings, as well as Josephine’s clothes, china, glass and personal possessions. There are other Napoleonic bits in the adjacent Bois-Préau museum (same hours and ticket).

To get to Malmaison take the métro to Grande-Arche-de-la-Défense, then bus #258 to Malmaison-Château. Alternatively, if you'd like a walk, take the RER to Rueil-Malmaison and follow the GR11 footpath for about two kilometres from the Pont de Chatou along the left bank of the Seine and into the château park.

Travel details

Trains

Gare de Austerlitz to: Tours (hourly; 2hr 30min).

Gare de l'Est to: Metz (10 daily; 2hr 50min); Nancy (12 daily; 2hr 50min–3hr 20min); Reims (15 daily; 1hr 40min–2hr 20min); Strasbourg (11 daily; 4hr).

Gare de Lyon to: Avignon (13 daily; 2hr 40min–3hr 30min); Besançon (8 daily; 2hr 30min–3hr); Dijon (hourly; 1hr 40min); Grenoble (13 daily; 2hr 50min–3hr 50min); Lyon (hourly; 2hr–2hr 30min); Marseille (hourly; 3hr 10min); Nice (7 daily; 5hr 30min–6hr 30min).

Gare Montparnasse to: Bayonne (6 daily; 4hr 45min–6hr 30min); Bordeaux (at least hourly; 3hr– 3hr 30min); Brest (8 daily; 4hr 20min–5hr 20min); Nantes (11 daily; 2hr); Pau (7 daily; 5hr 15min–7hr 20min); Poitiers (14 daily; 1hr 40min); Rennes (at least hourly; 2hr 15min); Toulouse (10 daily; 5hr–6hr 30min); Tours (hourly; 1hr–1hr 30min).

Gare du Nord to: Amiens (at least hourly; 1hr 45min); Arras (roughly every 2hr; 50min); Boulogne (at least hourly; 2hr 10min); Lille (hourly; 1hr).

Gare St-Lazare to: Caen (hourly; 1hr 50min–2hr 30min); Cherbourg (roughly every 2hr; 3hr–3hr 30min); Dieppe (2 daily; 2hr 15min); Le Havre (every 2–3hr; 2hr–2hr 30min); Rouen (hourly; 1hr 15min).

The north

- * Marquenterre Bird Sanctuary From geese and godwits to storks and spoon-bills, a huge variety of birds make their home amid briny meres and tamarisk-fringed dunes. See p.238
- * Son et Lumière at Amiens Cathedral The biggest Gothic building in France, brought to life by sound and light on summer evenings, transporting you back to a truly medieval experience. See p.242
- * Lillois Cuisine Eat anything from the ubiquitous moules-frites, washed down with micro-brewed beer, to fried escargots with onions roasted in lavender oil in the historic centre of Lille, the cultural capital of northern France. See p.251
- * World War I monuments in the Somme Moving memorials by Lutyens and others to the victims of the trenches. See p.263
- * The towers of Laon Cathedral Weird stone carvings adorning one of the great wonders of French Gothic. See p.266
- * Champagne tasting at Épernay Taste vintage bubbly in the atmospheric cellars of world-famous sparkling wine emporia. See p.279

△ Lutyens' Memorial to the Missing, Thiepval

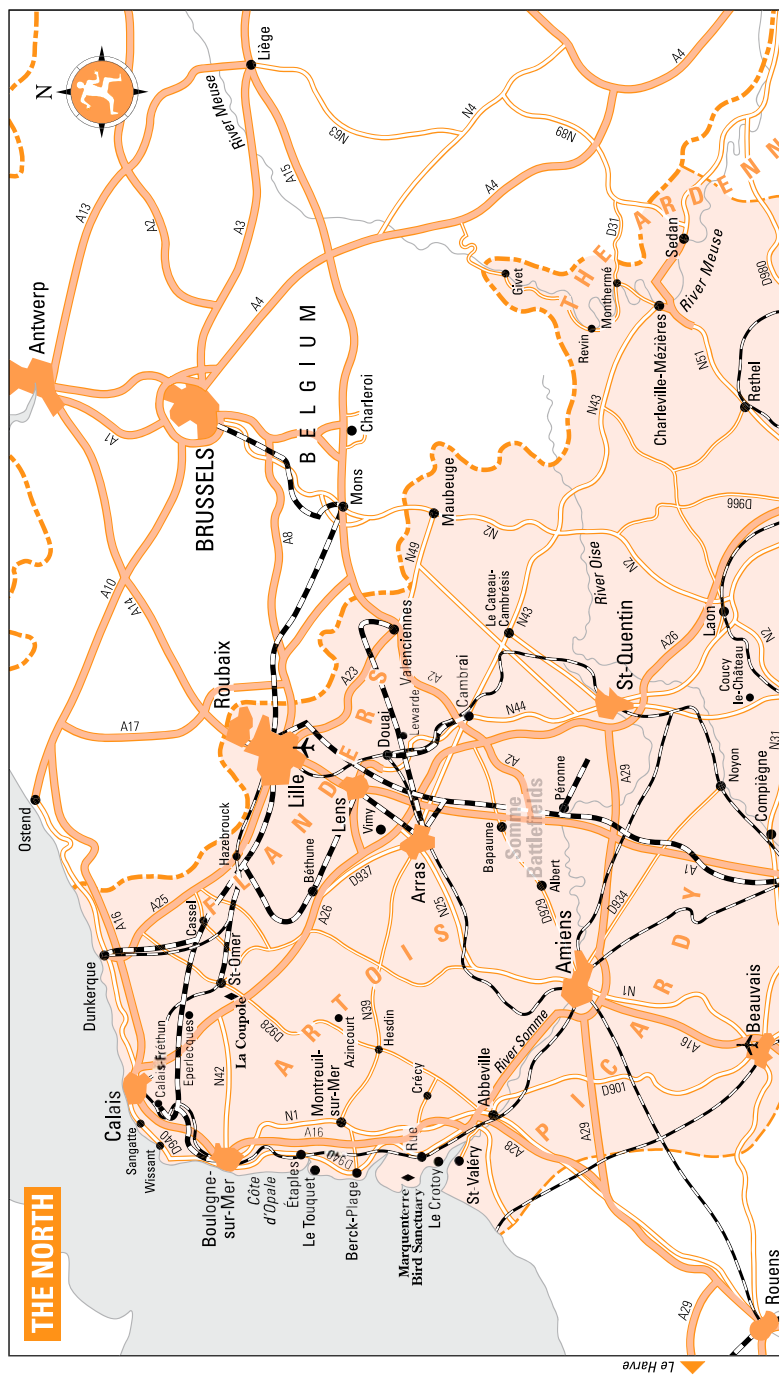

The north

When conjuring up exotic holiday locations, you're unlikely to light upon the north of France. Even among the French, the most enthusiastic tourists of their own country, it has few adherents. Largely flat Artois and Flanders include the most heavily industrialized parts of the country, these days hit by post-industrial depression, while across the wheat fields of the more sparsely populated regions of Picardy and Champagne a few drops of rain are all that is required for total gloom to descend. Coming from Britain it's likely, however, that you'll arrive and leave France via this region, and there are good reasons to stop within easy reach of Calais and the Channel Tunnel, even at Boulogne, whose attractive medieval quarter makes it by far the most appealing of the northern Channel ports. Just inland the delightful village of Cassel is a rare example of a Flemish hill settlement, while St-Omer and Montreuil-sur-Mer are also strong contenders in terms of charm and interest.

Northern France has been on the path of various invaders into the country, from northern Europe as well as from Britain, and the events that have taken place in Flanders, Artois and Picardy have shaped French and world history. The bloodiest battles were those of World War I, above all the Battle of the Somme, which took place north of Amiens, and Vimy Ridge, near Arras, where the trenches have been preserved in perpetuity; a visit to any of these is highly recommended to understand the sacrifice and futility of war.

On a more cheerful note, Picardy boasts some of France's finest cathedrals, including those at Amiens, Beauvais and Laon. Further south, the wineries, vineyards and world-famous produce of the Champagne region are the main draw, for which the best bases are Épernay and Reims, the latter with another fine cathedral. Other attractions include the bird sanctuary of Marquenterre; the wooded wilderness of the Ardennes; industrial archeology in the coalfields around Douai, where Zola's Germinal was set; the great medieval castle of Coucy-le-Château; and the battle sites of the Middle Ages – Agincourt and Crécy – familiar names in the long history of Anglo-French rivalry.

In city centres from Lille to Troyes, you'll find your fill of food, culture and entertainment in the company of locals similarly intent on having a good time. And in addition to the more obvious pleasures of the Champagne region, there's the possibility of finding relatively lucrative employment during the harvest season towards the end of September.

THE NORTH

Le Havre

The Channel ports and the road to Paris

2

THE NORTH

Dunkerque and around

The millions of British day-trippers who come to this far northern tip of France every year are mostly after a sniff of something foreign: a French meal, a shopping bag full of continental produce, or more commonly a few crates of cheap wine. Until the end of the twentieth century the chief function of the northern Channel ports – dreary Calais, more appealing Boulogne, and Dunkerque, the least attractive of the three – was to provide cheap, efficient points of access into France from Britain. Since then, however, serious competition has been provided by the Channel Tunnel, emerging at Sangatte, 5km southwest of Calais. The “Chunnel”, also used by the high-speed Eurostar passenger trains linking London to Lille, Paris and Brussels, has reduced the crossing time to just half an hour, with the efficient but pricey autoroute system waiting to whisk you away off to your ultimate destination. Details of the various train and ferry crossings are listed on pp.30 and 31.

For a much more immediate immersion into la France profonde – little towns, idiosyncratic farms, a comfortable verge to sleep off the first cheese, baguette and vin rouge picnic – the old route nationale N1, which shadows the coast all the way from Dunkerque to Abbeville before heading inland to Paris, is more sedate than the A16 autoroute. Interesting things to see on the way include: the cathedrals at Amiens and Beauvais; the hilltop fortress at Montreuil; the remains of Hitler’s Atlantic Wall along the Côte d’Opale; and the Marquenterre Bird Sanctuary at the mouth of the River Somme. Immediately south of Dunkerque is the Flemish hilltop settlement of Cassel, a minor gem, while St-Omer is definitely day-trip material for the visitor over from Britain and its remaining old buildings and treasures make it far preferable to dreadful Calais.

Dunkerque and around

The Channel Tunnel has had a gloomy effect on DUNKERQUE’s hotels, restaurants and shops. The town, however, remains France’s third largest port and a massive industrial centre in its own right, its oil refineries and steelworks producing a quarter of the total French output. Unstylishly resurrected from wartime devastation, Dunkerque is not an attractive town and the only reason you might want to visit is to pay homage to the events of 1940, in which case you should head straight for Malo-les-Bains is a pleasant enough, if modest, resort. The few buildings of any significance to have survived World War II (or at least to have been rebuilt afterwards) are: the tall medieval brick belfry, the town’s chief landmark, recently renovated (guided tours: April–Sept Mon–Sat 10am, 11am & hourly 2–5pm; July & Aug also Sun & hols 11am, 2pm & 3pm; €2.80); the nearby fifteenth-century church of St-Éloi; and, a few blocks north of the church on place Charles-Valentin, the early twentieth-century Hôtel de Ville, a Flemish fancy to rival that of Calais. Dunkerque does have a few museums too. The Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues 10am–12.15pm & 1.45–6pm; €4.50), on place du Général-de-Gaulle near the post office, three blocks along rue du Président-Poincaré from the belfry, has a minor collection of

The evacuation of 350,000 Allied troops from the beaches of Dunkerque from May 27 to June 4, 1940, has become a wartime legend. However, the story conveniently conceals the fact that the Allies, through their own incompetence, almost lost their entire armed forces in the first few weeks of the war.

The German army had taken just ten days to reach the English Channel and could very easily have cut off the Allied armies. Unable to believe the ease with which he had overcome a numerically superior enemy, however, Hitler ordered his generals to halt their lightning advance, giving Allied forces trapped in the Pas-de-Calais enough time to organize Operation Dynamo, the largest wartime evacuation ever undertaken. Initially it was hoped that around 10,000 men would be saved, but thanks to low-lying cloud and the assistance of more than 1750 vessels – among them pleasure cruisers, fishing boats and river ferries – 140,000 French and more than 200,000 British soldiers were successfully shipped back to England. The heroism of the boatmen and the relief at having saved so many British soldiers were the cause of much national celebration.

In France, however, the ratio of British to French evacuees caused bitter resentment, since Churchill had promised that the two sides would go bras dessus, bras dessous (“arm in arm”). Meanwhile, the British media played up the “remarkable discipline” of the troops as they waited to embark, the “victory” of the RAF over the Luftwaffe and the “disintegration” of the French army all around. In fact, there was widespread indiscipline in the early stages as men fought for places on board; the battle for the skies was evenly matched; and the French fought long and hard to cover the whole operation, some 150,000 of them remaining behind to become prisoners of war. In addition, the Allies lost seven destroyers and 177 fighter planes and were forced to abandon more than 60,000 vehicles. After 1940 Dunkerque remained occupied by Germans until the bitter end of the war. It was the last French town to be liberated in 1945.

seventeenth- and eighteenth-century French, Dutch and Flemish paintings, with bits of natural history and a display on the May 1940 evacuations. The LAAC (Lieu d'Art et Action Contemporaine), or Modern Art Museum (mid-May to mid-Oct: Tues, Wed & Fri 2–6.30pm; Thurs 2–8.30pm; Sat & Sun 10am–12.30pm; mid-Oct to mid-May: Tues, Wed & Fri 2–5.30pm; Thurs 2–8.30pm; Sat & Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm), in the middle of the sculpture park beside the canal on avenue des Bains, specializes in the period from 1950 to 1980 and features Andy Warhol, Pierre Soulages and César in its collection. More interesting, especially for children, is the Musée Portuaire (daily except Tues: July & Aug 10am–6pm; Sept–June 10am–12.45pm & 1.30–6pm; €4), at 9 quai de la Citadelle on the Bassin du Commerce, which illustrates the history of Dunkerque from its beginnings as a fishing hamlet, using models of boats and tools of the various trades associated with the port.

Practicalities

From Dunkerque's gare SNCF – where buses also stop – it's a short walk to the tourist office (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–4pm; ☎03.28.66.79.21, 🌐www.ot-dunkerque.fr) housed in the belfry itself. If you're looking to rent a car, there's a branch of Avis at the station (☎03.28.66.67.95).

A reasonable accommodation option by the station on 22/27 place de la Gare is the comfortable two-star Le Select (☎03.28.66.64.47, 🌐www.leselect-hotel.fr; Ⓜ). More salubrious hotels away from the station include the Borel, a

Regional food and drink

2

THE NORTH

Dunkerque and around

French Flanders has one of France's richest regional cuisines. Especially on the coast the seafood – oysters, shrimps and scallops – and fish – above all sole and turbot – are outstanding, while in Lille moules-frites are appreciated every bit as much as in neighbouring Belgium. Here, too, beer is the favourite drink, with pale and brown Pelforth the local brew. Traditional estaminets or brasseries also serve a range of dishes cooked in beer, most famously the carbonades à la flamande, a kind of beef stew; rabbit, chicken, game and fish may also be prepared à la bière. Other pot-cooked dishes include the hochepot (a meaty broth), waterzooi (chicken in a creamy sauce) and potjevlesch (various white meats in a rich sauce). In addition to the boulette d'Avesnes, the Flemish cheese par excellence is the strong-flavoured maroilles, used to make flamiche, a kind of open tart of cheese pastry, also made with leeks (aux poireaux). For the sweet toothed, crêpes à la cassolette (pancakes with muscovado sugar) are often on menus, but waffles (gaufres) are the local speciality and come in two basic varieties: the thick honeycomb type served with sugar or cream, or the wafer-like biscuit filled with jam or syrup. Charles de Gaulle, who was from Lille, was apparently particularly fond of the latter sort.

Champagne's cuisine is dominated by the famous sparkling wine, large quantities of which are sloshed in sauces or over sorbets. Otherwise the province's cooking is known for little apart from its cheeses – sharp-tasting, creamy white Chaource and orange skinned Langres – and Champagne's main contribution to French food, the andouillette, for which Troyes is famed. Translated euphemistically into English as "chitterling sausage", it is in actual fact an intestine crammed full of more intestines, all chopped up. An acquired taste (and texture), it's better than it sounds – look out for the notation AAAAA, a seal of approval awarded by the Association of Amateurs of the Authentic Andouillette. The Ardennes is another area that really lacks a distinctive repertoire (à l'ardennaise just means flavoured with juniper berries); game looms large on all menus, pâté d'Ardennes being the most famous dish.

modern three-star with well-set-up rooms overlooking the fishing boats of the Bassin du Commerce at 6 rue Hermitte (☎03.28.66.51.80, 🌐www.hotelborel.fr; 📍), and the equally well-appointed but more old-fashioned Europ'Hôtel, close by at 13 rue Leughenaer (☎03.28.66.29.07, 🌐www.europ-hotel.com; 📍). There's also a seafront HI hostel on place Paul Asseman, 2km east of the centre, practically at Malo-les-Bains (☎03.28.63.36.34; take blue bus #3 to Piscine, direction "Malo-les-Bains"; €12.20 including breakfast, plus €2.80 for sheets).

There are more enjoyable eating options in Malo-les-Bains, but if you're staying in Dunkerque, try La Sirène, 65 rue de l'Amiral-Ronarc'h, near the belfry, for good seafood (☎03.28.59.03.29; closed Sat & Sun; menus from €20); or The Famous Tormore Pub at 11 place Charles-Valentin near the town hall, which is better than its name suggests – it's a brasserie-cum-grill serving Flemish dishes and popular with locals (☎03.28.63.15.95; €15 or so à la carte, €12 lunch menu). At 6 quai de la Citadelle, Le Corsaire has menus from €25, as well as a view over the port and the Duchesse Anne, a 1901 German ship given to France as part of the war reparations in 1946. For a (non-alcoholic) drink, the Café MEO'7, at 6 Place du Beffroi, offers a wide range of organic coffees, teas and fruit juices.

Malo-les-Bains

MALO-LES-BAINS is a pleasant enough nineteenth-century seaside suburb on the east side of Dunkerque (buses #3 & #9), from whose vast sandy beach

the Allied troops embarked in 1940 (see box, p.223). Digue des Alliés is the dirtier end of an extensive beachfront promenade lined with cafés and restaurants; at the cleaner end, Digue de Mer, the beach can almost seem pleasant when the sun comes out – as long as you avert your eyes from the industrial inferno to the west. However, the suburb actually reveals its fin-de-siècle charm away from the seafront, a few parallel blocks inland along avenue Faidherbe and its continuation avenue Kléber, with place Turenne sandwiched in between; around here you'll find some excellent patisseries, boulangeries and charcuteries.

A beachfront campsite, La Licorne, is at 1005 bd de l'Europe (☎03.28.69.26.68, 📧campingdelalicorne@ville-dunkerque.fr). Other places to stay include the Hirondelle, 46/48 av Faidherbe (☎03.28.63.17.65, 🌐www.hotelhirondelle.com; 📍), a modern two-star in a great position; and the unassuming, less expensive Au Bon Coin, 49 av Kléber (☎03.28.69.12.63, ☎03.28.69.64.03; 📍), whose cosy bar is good for a drink; both have well-regarded restaurants specializing in seafood with menus from around €14. Also on avenue Kléber are a few more exotic eateries, including a Vietnamese and a North African. Two popular beachfront brasseries, again focusing on seafood, are L'iguane, 15 Digue des Alliés (towards Dunkerque), a down-to-earth establishment offering generous servings at €10 a plat, and the stylish but more expensive Le Pavois, at 175 Digue de Mer (menu €17).

Cassel

Barely 30km southeast of Dunkerque and just off the A25 autoroute towards Lille, is the tiny hilltop town of CASSEL. Hills are rare in Flanders, and consequently Cassel was much fought over from Roman times onwards. During World War I, Marshal Foch spent “some of the most distressing hours” of his life here, and it was supposedly up to the top of Cassel's hill that the “Grand Old Duke of York” marched his 10,000 men in 1793, though, as hinted at in the nursery rhyme, he failed to take the town.

Cassel boasts a very Flemish Grand'Place, lined with some magnificent mansions, from which narrow cobbled streets fan out to the ramparts. From the public gardens in the upper town, you have an unrivalled view over Flanders, with Belgium just 10km away. Here among the trees is eighteenth-century Kasteel Meulen, the last of Cassel's wooden windmills (April–Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–March Sat, Sun & school hols; €2.80), which once numbered 29 across the town, pounding out flour and linseed oil for educational purposes.

Practicalities

There's no public transport into town from Cassel's gare SNCF (a regular service on the Dunkerque–Lille line), a full 3km west, so your own transport would come in handy. The town's useful tourist office is on the square (July & Aug Mon–Fri 9am–noon & 1.30–5.45pm, Sat 9am–noon & 2–5.45pm, Sun 2–6.30pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 8.30am–noon & 1.30–5.30pm, Sat 9am–noon; ☎03.28.40.52.55, 🌐www.ot-cassel.fr); they have a list of bed-and-breakfast gîtes and other places to stay in or near Cassel. An upmarket option is the very smart Châtellerie de Schoebeque at 32 rue Foch (☎03.28.42.42.67, 🌐www.schoebeque.com; 📍), which has fifteen individually designed rooms, and offers a free driver service in the evening to restaurants in the surrounding countryside.

On the southern side of the Grand'Place many of the cafés and restaurants have a fabulous view over the surrounding countryside, which is especially attractive on a sunny day. Of the numerous options, La Taverne Flamande, at my heart.” The association has been maintained by various Brits across the centuries: Lady Emma Hamilton, Lord Nelson’s mistress; Oscar Wilde; Nottingham lacemakers who set up business in the early nineteenth century; and, nowadays, nine million British travellers per year, plus another million-odd day-trippers.

Arrival, information and accommodation

There’s a free if infrequent daytime bus service from the ferry terminal to place d’Armes and the central Calais-Ville gare SNCF, in front of which is a bus station, with departures for Dunkerque, Boulogne and the out-of-city supermarkets. To get to the outlying gare TGV (“Calais-Fréthun” is actually much further from Calais than the name suggests) for Eurostar trains to London and Paris, either take a bus (free on demonstration of a SNCF ticket) or one of the regular trains to Boulogne, checking first that it stops there (most do). If you’re driving and intent on skipping Calais in favour of Paris, which would be understandable, take a left out of the ferry terminal – the new autoroute bypass begins almost immediately, leading to both the A26 and the N1. If you plan to rent a car, you could try Avis (☎03.21.34.66.50) or Budget (☎03.21.96.42.20), both located in place d’Armes and at the ferry terminal; a cheaper option, also at the ferry terminal, is National/Citer (☎03.21.34.58.45). For details of ferry crossings, see Basics.

If you decide to stay in Calais, plenty of accommodation is available, though it’s wise to book ahead in the high season. The tourist office at 12 bd Clemenceau, the continuation of rue Royale (Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–6.30pm; June–Sept also open Sun 10am–1pm; ☎03.21.96.62.40, 🌐www.calais-cotedopale.com), has a free accommodation booking service as well as a list of gîtes in the region.

Hotels

Formule 1 av Charles-de-Gaulle, chemin de Bergnieulles, Coquelles ☎08.92.68.56.85, 🌐www.hotelformule1.com. Just a ten-minute drive from the car ferry, this is a characterless but perfectly modern and clean option. ②

George V 36 rue Royale ☎03.21.97.68.00, 🌐www.legeorgev.com. Smart en-suite rooms and a traditional brasserie-restaurant. ⑤

Métropol 43 quai du Rhin ☎03.21.97.54.00, 🌐www.metropolhotel.com. Situated beside the canal right next to the train station, this is a comfortable and modern but nondescript hotel with small rooms. ③

Meurice 5 rue Edmond-Roche ☎03.21.34.57.03, 🌐www.hotel-meurice.fr. Comfortable three-star with a grand entrance, luxurious high beds and antique furniture in a quiet street behind the Musée des Beaux-Arts. ⑤

Résidence du Golf 74 Digue G. Berthe ☎03.21.96.88.99, 🌐www.hoteldugolf-calais.com.

Neat, bright motel-style rooms which, although lacking in character, have the advantages of a kitchenette, a view of the water and proximity to both the beach and the centre of town. ④

Richelieu 17 rue Richelieu ☎03.21.34.61.60, 🌐www.hotelrichelieu-calais.com. Overlooking the park of the same name, this hotel has light and airy rooms, all equipped with shower, TV and toilet. ③

Hostel and campsite

Hostel av du Maréchal-de-Lattre-de-Tassigny ☎03.21.34.70.20, 📧adjcalais@orange.fr. Modern hostel located right at the seaward end of rue Royale, just one block from the beach. Double rooms, breakfast included. €14.50 with HI card, €16 without.

Camping municipal 26 av Raymond-Poincaré ☎03.21.97.89.79. A large exposed site close to the beach, open all year. Right next door is a special short-term overnight parking area for cars; enquire at the campsite.

The Town

Calais divides in two with Calais-Nord, the old town rebuilt after the war with the drab place d’Armes and rue Royale as its focus, separated by canals from the sprawling “new town” or Calais-Sud, centred around the Hôtel de Ville and the main shopping streets, boulevards Lafayette and Jacquard – the latter named after the inventor of looms, who mechanized Calais’ lacemaking industry.

Calais-Nord’s charms, such as they are, soon wear thin. The Tour du Guet, on place d’Armes, is the only medieval building in the quarter to have survived wartime bombardment. From the Tour, rue de la Paix leads to the church of Notre-Dame, where Charles de Gaulle married local girl Yvonne Vendroux in 1921. Rather spuriously dubbed the only English Perpendicular church on the continent, it’s not a particularly good example of the style, especially in its present state of dereliction. There is an unusual lacemaking exhibition, along with a small but interesting collection of sixteenth- to twentieth-century art, including paintings by Picasso and Dubuffet, and a Rodin sculpture, in the Musée des Beaux-Arts et de la Dentelle on rue Richelieu (Mon & Wed–Fri 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm, Sat 10am–noon & 2–6.30pm, Sun 2–6.30pm; €5, free Wed), which runs alongside the Parc Richelieu, at the other end of rue Royale from the place d’Armes. Continue in the other direction on rue Royale and you’ll come to the city’s beach, where the waters are chilly but swimmable, and from which on a fine day the English shore is visible; or take rue des Thermes to visit the 51-metre lighthouse at place Henri-Barbusse, with 271 steps to a panoramic view (June–Sept daily 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; Oct–May Wed 2–5.30pm; €2.50).

Calais-Sud is scarcely more exciting. Just over the canal bridge, the town’s landmark, the Hôtel de Ville, raises its belfry over 60m into the sky; this Flemish extravaganza was finished in 1926, and miraculously survived World War II. Somewhat dwarfed by the building, Rodin’s famous bronze, the Burghers of Calais, records for ever the self-sacrifice of local dignitaries, who offered their lives to assuage the blood lust of the victor at Crécy, Edward III – only to be spared at the last minute by the intervention of Queen Philippa, Edward’s wife. For a record of Calais’ wartime travaux you can consult the fascinating Musée de la Deuxième Guerre Mondiale (mid-Feb to April & Sept to mid-Nov daily except Tues 11am–5pm; May–Aug daily 10am–6pm; €6), installed in a

Shopping in Calais

For truly epic cross-the-border shopping it’s best to head to the hypermarkets, or grandes surfaces, a few kilometres out of town. The best of these is the Auchan complex on the Boulogne road, the N1 (Mon–Sat 9am–9pm; bus #5; change given in sterling if you wish); this is closely followed by Carrefour/Mi-Voix, on the east side of town, on avenue Georges-Guynemer (daily 9am–9pm; bus #4). Cité Europe, a vast shopping complex by the Channel Tunnel terminal and just off the A16 in the direction of Boulogne (bus #7), offers you another large Carrefour (Mon–Fri 9am–10pm, Sat 8.30am–10pm) as well as high-street clothes shops and food shops (Mon–Thurs & Sat 10am–8pm, Fri 10am–9pm), all under one roof.

In Calais-Nord, place d’Armes and rue Royale are the main shopping arteries with a string of boutiques selling mainly clothes and chocolate; try La Maison du Fromage et des Vins (closed Mon & Tues but open Sun morning) for a good selection of cheeses and wine. Generally, however, the streets of Calais-Sud – particularly boulevards Jacquard and Lafayette – are a better bet. A new shopping mall or centre commercial, Les 4 Boulevards (Mon–Sat 7am–9pm), has recently opened on boulevard Jacquard and houses some thirty boutiques, many of them selling designer clothing. More colourful still are the markets around place d’Armes (Wed & Sat) and boulevard Lafayette (Thurs & Sat).

former German Blockhaus in the Parc St-Pierre across the street, with exhibits of uniforms, weapons and models from World War II and a small section devoted to World War I.

Eating and drinking

Calais is full of mediocre eateries, catering for its day-tripper trade – place d'Armes is full of such examples – and there are plenty of self-service and fast-food outlets near the beach. Drinking establishments are mainly of the Gaelic theme-pub variety and are in abundance on rue Royale and its continuation, rue de la Mer. Le Troubadour on quai du Rhin is a popular hangout for local music-heads, with lots of long hair around the games tables by day and bands by night. Le Bekeur is a gay bar close to the town centre at 40 rue de Thermes, playing French disco music for the over thirties; it opens until late and serves three-course menus from €12.

Le Channel 3 bd de la Résistance ☎03.21.34.42.30. Generous menus – ranging from €18 to €60 – and stylish decor. Beautifully prepared but safely unadventurous food, with a wide range of delicious desserts, and views over the yacht basin. Closed Sun eve & Tues; booking recommended.

George V 36 rue Royale ☎03.21.97.68.00. Brasserie-restaurant with immaculate white tablecloths and a classic menu (€22–44) or half menu (€17). Closed Sat lunch & Sun.

Histoire Ancienne 20 rue Royale ☎03.21.34.11.20. Greek-run brasserie with a charming interior, particularly its old bar; the good, mainly French menu includes the occasional Greek dish plus salads that will delight vegetarians. Menus from €11 for early lunch and dinner; otherwise from €17.50.

Café de Paris 72 rue Royale ☎03.21.34.76.84. The closest France gets to an American diner, this brasserie is popular with locals and tourists alike for its cheap fare; plats du jour from €9.30, menu at €12.50.

Le St-Charles 47 place d'Armes ☎03.21.96.02.96. By far the best option on the place d'Armes, and consequently often crowded. Menus consist of traditional French and Italian dishes and start from €11. Closed Tues and Sun eve.

Around Calais

Understandably, most tourists travel straight through the Pas-de-Calais – Calais' hinterland – but if you're on a short break from across the Channel, it's worth making the effort to venture inland to the likes of St-Omer and its surrounding World War II museums.

St-Omer

Away from the ports, the landscape becomes more rural and the roads straighter and quieter. The first stop inland for many visitors to France is ST-OMER, a quiet, attractive little town, 43km southeast of Calais. The Hôtel de Ville, and some of the recently restored mansions on rue Gambetta, display genuine flights of Flemish magnificence. The Gothic Basilique Notre-Dame (daily March–Sept 8.30am–6pm, Oct–Feb 8.30am–5pm) contains some fine statues and the fascinating Musée de l'Hôtel Sandelin at 14 rue Carnot (Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4.50) is worth a stop. The decor and artwork of each room is representative of a certain period and country, with some fine furniture, sculpture, and remarkable French, Dutch and Flemish paintings, all meticulously laid out. In the Flemish room you'll find a Breugel, while in the next room are two works by his son. The museum also contains some of the finest decorative art in France, including a glorious piece of medieval goldsmithing known as the Pied de Croix de St-Bertin.

It's also worth visiting the pleasant public gardens to the west of town and you can explore the nearby marais, a network of Flemish waterways cut between plots of land on reclaimed marshes east of town along the river. Boat trips, or bateaux-promenade, run by Isnor Location (☎03.21.39.15.15, 🌐www.isnor.fr) leave from the church in nearby Clairmarais (July & Aug daily 11am & hourly 2–5pm; Sept–June Sat & Sun hourly 2–5pm; €6.20). Round trips take about an hour, and include a commentary in French on the flora and fauna of the marshes, while longer trips also include a ride down the unique vertical boat-lift at Arques. For further information, including times, plus details of kayak and canoe rental, contact the tourist office (see below).

Practicalities

To get to the centre of town from the exuberant 1903 gare SNCF, cross over the canal and walk for ten minutes down rue F-Ringot, past the post office and into rue Carnot. The tourist office is in the western end of town near the park at 4 rue Lion d'Or (Easter–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Oct–Easter Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎03.21.98.08.51, 🌐www.tourisme-saintomer.com).

For accommodation, try the pretty, old, Hôtel St-Louis at 25 rue d'Arras (☎03.21.38.35.21, 🌐www.hotel-saintlouis.com; 📍); Le Flaubert restaurant from €16; the Bretagne, 2 place du Vainquai, near the train station (☎03.21.38.25.78, 🌐www.hotellebretagne.com; 📍); Le Vainquai restaurant from €18), or the Au Vivier, 22 rue Louis-Martel, on a small pedestrian street near the town hall (☎03.21.95.76.00, ✉levivier@orange.fr; 📍; closed beginning of Jan), whose restaurant specializes in fish (closed Sun, menus from €16). The closest camp-site is Le Clair Marais on rue du Romelaër near the Forêt de Clairmarais, 4.5km east of St-Omer (☎03.21.38.34.80, ☎03.21.98.37.05; April–Oct), although there's no transport out there. For places to eat other than the hotels, try the establishments around place Maréchal-Foch: Les Trois Caves, at no. 18 has the best reputation and specializes in local dishes (menu €24; ☎03.21.39.72.52; closed Mon lunch).

The Blockhaus at Eperlecques

In the Forêt d'Eperlecques, 12km north of St-Omer off the D300, you can visit the largest ever Blockhaus, or concrete bunker, built in 1943–44 by the Germans – or rather by 6000 of their half-starved prisoners of war (daily: March 2.15–6pm; April & Oct 10am–noon & 2.15–6pm; May–Sept 10am–7pm; Nov 2.15–5pm; €7, or dual ticket with La Coupole €13). It was designed to launch V2 rockets against London, but fortunately the RAF and French Resistance prevented it ever being ready for use by bombing it during construction – unfortunately killing many of the Allied prisoners at the same time. As well as the Blockhaus, you will also see remnants of many weapons that were used to attack (or were built with the purpose of attacking) London, including a 45-metre ramp for launching V1 rockets.

The Blockhaus is hard to reach without your own transport: it's a four-kilometre walk from the station at Watten, on the eastern edge of the forest, to which there are several trains daily from Calais.

La Coupole

Of all the converted World War II bunker museums, La Coupole (daily: July & Aug 10am–7pm; Sept–June 9am–6pm; closed for two weeks over Christmas and New Year; 🌐www.lacoupole.com; €9), 5km southwest of St-Omer, is the most modern and stimulating. As you walk around the site of an intended V2 rocket launch pad, you can listen on multilingual infrared headphones to a discussion of the occupation of northern France by the Nazis, the use of prisoners as slave labour, and the technology and ethics of the first liquid-fuelled rocket – advanced by Hitler and taken at the end of the war by the Soviets, the French and the Americans and developed in the space race. Visits last two and a half hours: films, models and photographs, all with accompanying text in four different languages, help to develop each theme. Getting there by car is easy: it's just off the D928 (A26 junctions 3 & 4), but there are only a few buses running from St-Omer train station (ring La Coupole or St-Omer tourist office for times).

The Côte d'Opale

The Côte d'Opale is the stretch of Channel coast between Calais and the mouth of the River Somme, characterized by huge, wild and windswept sandy beaches more attractive than anything to be found in any of the port cities. In the northern part, as far as Boulogne, the beaches are fringed, as on the English side of the Channel, by white chalk cliffs. Here, between the prominent headlands of Cap Blanc-Nez and Cap Gris-Nez, the D940 coast road winds high above the sea, allowing you to appreciate the “opal” in the name – the sea and sky merging in an opalescent, oyster-grey continuum. The southern part of the coast is flatter, and the beach, uninterrupted for 40km, is backed by a landscape of pine-anchored dunes and brackish tarns, punctuated every few hundred metres by solid German pillboxes now toppled on their noses by the shifting sand foundations. An organization called Eden 62 publishes ten free leaflets detailing walks around the area (☎03.21.32.13.74, 🌐www.eden62.fr). It also offers six guided nature walks per month.

South from Calais: the Channel Tunnel and Wissant

Right on the southern outskirts of Calais, Blériot-Plage was thus named to commemorate Louis Blériot's epic first cross-Channel flight in 1909. Six kilometres further along the foreshore of well-conserved dunes, by the dreary village of Sangatte, the Channel Tunnel comes ashore; the actual terminal is 5km to the east outside the village of Fréthun. Thereafter, the D940 winds up onto the grassy windswept heights of Cap Blanc-Nez, topped by an obelisk commemorating the Dover Patrol, who kept the Channel free from U-boats during World War I. Just off the D940, opposite the turn-off to the Cap Blanc-Nez obelisk, is the Musée du Transmanche (April–June & Sept Tues–Sun 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–6pm; €3.80), which offers an overall history of Channel Tunnel exploits; the museum is housed in the basement of Le Thomé du Gamond, a rather pricey restaurant with panoramic views (open all year from noon; menus from €15). From here, 130m above sea level, you can spot the Channel craft plying the water to the north, while to the south you look down on Wissant and its enormous beach between the capes from which Julius Caesar set sail in 55 BC for a first look at Britain. Before arriving in Wissant, you pass through the small beachside town of Escalles, where you can stay at the clean, modern, and appropriately named Escale (☎03.21.85.25.00, 🌐www.hotel-lescale.com; 🍴; restaurant from €14).

WISSANT itself is a small and quietly attractive place, popular out of season with windsurfers and weekend Britons. The tourist office (May–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.21.82.48.00, 🌐www.ville-wissant.fr) is on place de la Mairie. The hotels here are expensive, which is not surprising given their proximity to the sea. First and foremost is the old, red-timbered Hôtel de la Plage, 1 place Edouard-Houssen (☎03.21.35.91.87, 🌐www.hotel-plage-wissant.com; 📍; good restaurant from €14), whose rooms are arranged around a wide courtyard. Alternatively, the two-star Bellevue, 10 rue P. Crampe, is less expensive than some of the one-stars in town (☎03.21.35.91.87, 🌐www.wissant-hotel-bellevue.com; 📍). Wissant also has a campsite, La Source (☎03.21.35.92.46; closed mid-Nov to March). The best place to eat in town is L'Auberge de l'Amiral Benbow, 7 rue Gambetta, where you can feast on oysters and filet mignon in the meticulously decorated rooms of an old house (menus from €25; ☎03.21.35.90.07, reserve; closed Jan & open Sat & Sun only in off season).

To Cap Gris-Nez and the Blockhaus at Audinghen

The GR du Littoral footpath passes through Wissant and continues up to Cap Gris-Nez, just 28km from the English coast. To get to the cape by road, take the turn-off north 1km outside AUDINGHEN, from which it's another three kilometres. Just after the Cap Gris-Nez turn-off beside the D940 is one of the many massive concrete Blockhäuser that stud the length of the Côte d'Opale though those with a real interest in the subject should visit the Blockhaus at Eperlecques (see p.230). The remainder of the drive along the D940 towards Boulogne-sur-Mer is lined with beautiful and undeveloped dunes with frequent turn-offs for walking paths to the shore, each of which is tempting on a fine day.

Boulogne-sur-Mer

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER is the most pleasant of the channel ports and although the ville basse is pretty unprepossessing, rising above the lower town is an attractive medieval quarter, the ville haute, contained within the old town walls and dominated by a grand, domed basilica that apes St Paul's in London. The basilica is a metaphor for the town itself, once grand but now in need of serious renovation.

Shopping in Boulogne

For the serious hypermarkets, catch bus #20 for the Leclerc or bus #8 for the huge Auchan complex, 8km along the N42 towards St-Omer – certainly the most convenient place for large-scale food and wine shopping. More fastidious foodies should stay in town and head for the Grande-Rue and streets leading off it, but be aware that most are closed all day Monday. For charcuterie, locals' favourite Bourgeois is at 1 Grande-Rue; for chocolates and other goodies, head for Timmerman at no. 40. Check out the fabulous fish displays at Aux Pêcheurs d'Étaples, at no. 31; you can also sample the seafood at the brasserie tucked behind. A shop definitely not to be missed is Philippe Olivier's famous fromagerie, just around the corner at 43 rue Thiers, which has a selection of over two hundred cheeses in various states of maturation. To go with it you'll find a great choice of wines at Les Vins de France, 10 rue Nationale, but for buying wine in bulk try Le Chais at 49 rue des Deux-Ponts, in the Bréquerque district by the train station. On Wednesday and Saturday mornings place Dalton hosts a market, or for basic groceries and a cheap cafeteria head for the Centre Commercial Liane on the corner of boulevards Diderot and Daunou.

The Town

Boulogne's number one attraction – and one of the most visited in northern France – is the Centre National de la Mer, or Nausicaá, on boulevard Ste-Beuve (daily: July & Aug 9.30am–7.30pm; Sept–June 9.30am–6.30pm, closed for 3 weeks in Jan; @ www.nausicaa.fr; €9.50–12.50, depending on time of year), though in May and June all of the floors are crawling with French and British school groups, and you may find it best to stay away altogether. With ultraviolet lighting and New Age music creating a suitably weird ambience, you wander from tank to tank while hammerhead sharks circle overhead, a shoal of tuna lurks in a diamond-shaped aquarium, and giant conger eels conceal themselves in rusty pipes. Compared with the startling colours of the tropical fish and the clownish antics of the sea lions at feeding time, some of the educational stuff (in French and English throughout – one in five visitors is British) is rather dull. Although little over a decade old, it's all beginning to look a bit tired and dated, though the 3D film show goes some way to alleviating the boredom. Environmental issues are touched on in some of the display materials but, perhaps, too timidly for some tastes. As you'd expect in France, the sea as a source of food is given a high level of importance – witness the chic Bistrot de la Mer where you can sample suitably fresh fish and wine, the latter probably a necessity for those adults who have lost their children several times in the labyrinthine five-storey layout.

The quiet cobbled streets of the ville haute, southeast of Nausicaá and uphill, make a pleasant respite from the noise and drabness of the ville basse. The most impressive sight here is the medieval walls themselves, which are decked out with rose beds, gravel paths and benches for picnicking, and provide impressive views of the city below; it takes about 45 minutes to complete the walk around them. Within the square walls, the domed Basilique Notre-Dame (summer 9am–noon & 2–6pm; winter 10am–noon 2–5pm) is an odd building – raised in the nineteenth century by the town's vicar without any architectural knowledge or advice – yet it seems to work. In the vast crypt (Tues–Sun 2–5pm; €2) you can see frescoed remains of the Romanesque building and relics of a Roman temple to Diana. In the main part of the church sits a bizarre white statue of the Virgin and Child on a boat-chariot, drawn here on its own wheels from Lourdes over the course of six years during a pilgrimage in the 1940s.

Nearby, the Château Musée (July & Aug Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–5pm, Sun 10am–5.30pm; Sept–June Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; closed 3 weeks in Jan; €3.50) contains Egyptian funerary objects donated by a local-born Egyptologist, an unusual set of Eskimo masks and a sizeable collection of Greek pots. A short walk down the main tourist street, rue de Lille, will bring you to the Hôtel de Ville, whose twelfth-century belfry is the most ancient monument in the old town, but is only accessible by arranging a guided tour with the tourist office.

Three kilometres north of Boulogne on the N1 stands the Colonne de la Grande Armée where, in 1803, Napoleon is said to have changed his mind about invading Britain and turned his troops east towards Austria. The column was originally topped by a bronze figure of Napoleon symbolically clad in Roman garb – though his head, equally symbolically, was shot off by the British navy during World War II. It's now displayed in the Château Musée (see above).

Eating and drinking

As you might expect from a large fishing port, Boulogne is a good spot to eat fresh fish and seafood. With dozens of possibilities for eating around place Dalton and the ville haute (mostly the rue de Lille) bear in mind the day-tripper trade and be selective. If you're just after a drink, there is a concentration of bars in place Godefroy-de-Bouillon, opposite the Hôtel de Ville, and a raft of lively bars in place Dalton, with Au Bureau and the Welsh Pub being the most popular.

L'Étoile de Marrakech 228 rue Nationale. A friendly and well-regarded Moroccan restaurant; olives, bread and spicy sausage come as complimentary starters, and the servings of couscous (from €11) are incredibly generous. Closed Wed.

Bar Hamiot 1 rue Faidherbe. Under the hotel of the same name, this brasserie remains as popular as ever with locals and tourists alike, offering a large range of dishes from €7 omelettes and €10–16 fish dishes to €14–19 menus.

Chez Jules 8 place Dalton ☎03.21.31.54.12. On the square of the ville basse and a great place to watch the Wednesday and Saturday markets. Typical brasserie fare with menus from €23.

La Matelote 80 bd Ste-Beuve ☎03.21.30.17.97. The best restaurant near the water, located opposite Nausicaá, featuring a dégustation menu at €60. If you'd rather not spend that much, you could go for the €30 menu or à la carte fish from €19. Loving care is taken over the food and service, but it's not especially creative and rather snooty. Closed Sun eve.

La Poivrière 15 rue de Lille ☎03.21.80.18.18. Set in a parade of rather mediocre eateries in the prettiest part of the haute ville, offering traditional French cuisine starting with a very reasonable €15 menu. Closed Tues & Wed.

Les Terrasses de l'Enclos 2 Enclos de l'Évêché ☎03.91.90.05.90 is the smartest restaurant in the ville haute and probably the whole area. Having no freezer, the restaurant focuses on freshness, with an excellent seafood menu. Menus from €19.50. Closed Sun eve & Tues.

South to Amiens

South of Boulogne the coast is as wild and magnificent as the Côte d'Opale but without your own transport it's hard to get down to the beach: a band of unstable dunes forces the D940 coast road and the Calais–Paris railway to keep a few kilometres inland. With the exception of Étaples, the seaside towns are artificial resorts of twentieth-century creation – only of interest in that they provide access to the beach. That, however, really is worth getting to, and its eerie beauty is best experienced by walking the coastal GR path or any one of the several marked trails that the local tourist offices promote, or by visiting the Marquenterre Bird Sanctuary. For car-drivers, the D119 between Boulogne and just north of Dannes is closer to the water with turn-offs directly into the dunes.

The quickest route south is the A16 Boulogne–Abbeville autoroute, which continues all the way to Paris. More interesting, if you want to take in the battlefield of Agincourt, is a winding cross-country route exploring some of the English-looking side valleys on the north side of the River Canche – such as the Crequoise, Planquette and Ternoise – whose farms and hamlets have been largely bypassed by the onward march of French modernity. For more information on the region consult www.somme-tourisme.com.

Le Touquet and around

Situated among dunes and wind-flattened tamarisks and pines, LE TOUQUET (officially called Le Touquet–Paris–Plage) is a kind of French Hollywood on the Channel coast, with ambitious villas freed from the discipline of architectural fashion hidden away behind its trees. Now dully suburban, the town was the height of fashion in the 1920s and 1930s and for a spell after World War II, ranking alongside places on the Côte d'Azur. An affordable treat worth indulging in – especially if you've got kids – is Le Touquet's Aqualud swimming complex right on the beach (July & Aug €14.50, Sept–June €11.50), which boasts three giant water slides and a series of indoor and outdoor themed pools; there's also the vast Bagatelle amusement park, 10km south of town on the D940 (April to mid-Sept daily 10am–7pm; €19).

Practicalities

To get to Le Touquet, take the train from Boulogne to Étaples, from where a local bus covers the last four kilometres. Alternatively, you can take a bus (Mon–Sat only) directly from Boulogne (☎03.21.83.88.52 in Boulogne or ☎03.21.05.09.43 in Le Touquet for times) from outside the ANPE office on boulevard Daunou; the bus heads on down the coast through Le Touquet to Berck-sur-Mer. Le Touquet's tourist office is in the Palais de l'Europe on place de l'Hermitage (Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–6pm; ☎03.21.06.72.00, www.letouquet.com), and can furnish you with a free map of the town.

If you're looking for somewhere reasonable to stay, try the hostel Riva Bella just 30m from the sandy beach at 12 rue Léon-Garet (☎03.21.05.08.22, www.rivabella-touquet.com; €15–23), or the two-star Armide, 56 rue Léon-Garet (☎03.21.05.21.76, ☎03.21.05.97.77; half-board Ⓢ). If you fancy splashing out, you have the choice of several luxurious hotels, including the palatial Le Manoir on avenue du Golf (☎03.21.06.28.28, www.opengolfclub.com/mnh; Ⓢ) and Le Westminster, 5 av du Verger (☎03.21.05.48.48, www.westminster.fr; Ⓢ). There's also a caravan site, the Stoneham (☎03.21.05.16.55, ☎03.21.05.06.48; closed late Nov to early Feb), on avenue François-Godin, 1km from the centre and 1km from the beach.

Places to eat are also generally expensive in Le Touquet. For a treat, visit Le Café des Arts, 80 rue de Paris, which specializes in fish dishes (menus from €16; ☎03.21.05.21.55; closed Tues & Wed), or for more traditional cuisine try the Auberge de la Dune aux Loups on the avenue of the same name (menus from €20; ☎03.21.05.42.54; closed Tues eve & Wed), where you can eat traditional French cuisine on the terrace. Less expensive than these is Les Sports, 22 rue St-Jean (☎03.21.05.05.22), a classic brasserie with a menu at €15.

Étaples

On the other side of the River Canche is the much more workaday ÉTAPLES, a picturesque fishing port whose charm lies in its relaxed air. Between April and September boat trips departing from the port can be booked via the tourist office (Mon–Fri 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sat 10am–noon & 3–6pm; ☎03.21.09.56.94) at Le Clos St-Victor on boulevard Bigot-Desceliers. You can choose between a fifty-minute sea jaunt (€7) and a more rigorous twelve-hour fishing stint with experienced fishermen (€50). Étaples also boasts a good seafood restaurant, Aux Pêcheurs d'Étaples, situated upstairs from the bustling and well-stocked fish market on quai de la Canche (from €13; ☎03.21.94.06.90).

Montreuil-sur-Mer

Once a port, MONTREUIL-SUR-MER is now stranded 13km inland from the sea, owing to the silting up of the River Canche. Perched on a sharp little hilltop above the river and surrounded by ancient walls, it's an immediately appealing place. Quite compact, it's easily walkable, with its hilltop ramparts offering amazing views. Laurence Sterne spent a night here on his Sentimental Journey, and it was the scene of much of the action in Victor Hugo's Les Misérables, perhaps best evoked by the steep cobbled street of pavée St-Firmin, first left after the Porte de Boulogne, a short climb from the gare SNCF.

Two heavily damaged Gothic churches grace the main square: the church of St-Saulve and a tiny wood-panelled chapelle tucked into the side of the red-brick hospital, now a three-star hotel (see p.238). To the south there are numerous cobbled lanes to wander down, all lined with half-timbered artisan houses. In the northwestern corner of the walls lies Vauban's Citadelle (March to mid-Dec daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €2.50) – ruined, overgrown and, after dark, pretty atmospheric, with subterranean gun emplacements and a fourteenth-century tower that records the coats of arms of the French noblemen killed at Agincourt. A path following the top of the walls provides views out across the Canche estuary.

In the second half of August, Montreuil puts on a surprisingly lively mini-arts festival of opera, theatre and dance, Les Malins Plaisirs, while between September and June the theatre/cinema Passerelles (☎03.21.81.57.78) on place St-Walloy puts on plays and dances, and shows old movies, with a special festival in May.

Practicalities

The tourist office is by the citadelle at 21 rue Carnot (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎03.21.06.04.27). For an accommodation treat, there's the classy and expensive Château de Montreuil (☎03.21.81.53.04, 🌐www.chateaudemontreuil.com; 📍; closed mid-Dec to Jan), which overlooks the citadelle and is popular with the English. It contains a top-class restaurant (closed Mon and out of season for lunch on Thurs), whose lunchtime menu is good value at €38. For delightful food and accommodation at more manageable prices, there's no beating Le Darnétal, in place Darnétal (☎03.21.06.04.87; 📍; closed Mon eve, Tues & first two weeks in July; restaurant from €18). Another good bet is the Clos des Capucins on the wide place de Gaulle, the shopping centre of the town (☎03.21.06.08.65, ✉clos-des-capucins@orange.fr; 📍; menu from €15). The former Hôtel Dieu on the main square now houses a large upmarket hotel, the Hermitage (☎03.21.06.74.74, 🌐www.hermitage-montreuil.com; 📍), with friendly and accommodating service and spacious if corporate-style rooms. There's also a newly renovated HI hostel (☎03.21.06.10.83; closed Nov–Feb; €7.70, plus extra for sheets and breakfast; reception open 2–6pm only), housed in one of the citadelle's outbuildings and giving access to the place long after the gates have been closed to the public. There's also a campsite, La Fontaine des Clercs, (☎03.21.06.07.28, 📍03.21.86.15.10; open all year) below the walls, by the Canche on rue d'Église.

The Agincourt and Crécy battlefields

Agincourt and Crécy, two of the bloodiest Anglo–French battles of the Middle Ages, took place near the attractive little town of HESDIN on the River Canche (a town that will be familiar to Simenon fans from the TV series Inspector Maigret). Getting to either site is difficult without your own transport.

Twenty kilometres southwest of Hesdin, at the Battle of Crécy, Edward III inflicted the first of his many defeats of the French in 1346. This was the first appearance on the continent of the new English weapon, the six-foot longbow, and the first use in European history of gunpowder. There's not a lot to see today: just the Moulin Édouard III (now a watchtower), 1km northeast of the little town of Crécy-en-Ponthieu on the D111 to Wadicourt, site of the windmill from which Edward watched the hurly-burly of battle. Further south, on the D56 to Fontaine, the battered croix de Bohème marks the place where King John of Bohemia – fighting for the French – died, having insisted on leading his men into the fight in spite of his blindness.

Ten thousand more died in the heaviest defeat ever of France's feudal knight-hood at the Battle of Agincourt on October 25, 1415. Forced by muddy conditions to fight on foot in their heavy armour, the French, though more than three times as strong in number, were sitting ducks to the lighter, mobile English archers. The rout took place near present-day AZINCOURT, about 12km northeast of Hesdin off the D928, and a colourful well-organized museum in the village, the Centre Historique Médiéval Azincourt (April–June & Sept–Oct daily 10am–6pm; July–Aug daily 9.30am–6.30pm; Nov–March daily 10am–5pm; €6.50) includes a short film about the battle. On the battle site itself notice boards are placed at strategic points to indicate the sequence of fighting. Just east of the village, by the crossroads of the D104 and the road to Maisoncelle, a cross marks the position of the original grave pits.

The Marquenterre Bird Sanctuary and around

Even if you know nothing about birds, the Parc ornithologique du Marquenterre (daily: Feb, March & Oct to mid-Nov 10am–6pm; April–Sept 10am–7.30pm; mid-Nov to Jan 10am–5pm; 🌐www.parcumarquenterre.com; €9.90), situated 30km south of Étapes off the D940 between the estuaries of the rivers Canche and Somme, will still be a revelation. In terms of landscape, it's beautiful and strange: all dunes, tamarisks and pine forest, full of salty meres and ponds thick with water plants. This is “new” land, formed by the erosion of the Normandy coast and the silting of the Somme estuary, where thousands of cattle are grazed today to give their meat the much-prized flavour of the “salt meadows”. One of only two bird sanctuaries in the whole of France, Marquenterre is a reserve in an area not known for valuing the fowl that pass through each year – though protected inside the park’s tiny boundaries, almost all species are prey to local hunters, and between September and January the sound of gunshot is common.

Binoculars can be hired (€3.50); otherwise you can rely on the guides posted at some of the observation huts, who set up portable telescopes and will tell you about the nesting birds. Once inside, there’s a choice of three itineraries – two longer, more interesting walks (2–3hr) and a shorter one (roughly 1hr 30min). The routes take you from resting area to resting area from where you can train your field glasses on dozens of species – ducks, geese, oyster-catchers, terns, egrets, redshanks, greenshanks, spoonbills, herons, storks, godwits – some of them residents, most taking a breather from their epic migratory flights. In April and May they head north, returning from the end of August to October, while in early summer the young nesting chicks can be seen learning to find food under the sharp eyes of their mothers.

Keen natural historians might also want to drop into the Maison de l’Oiseau on the other side of the bay, between St-Valéry-sur-Somme and Cayeux-sur-Mer, which has a display of stuffed birds, as well as live demonstrations with birds of prey (daily: April–Sept 10am–6pm; Oct–March 10am–5pm; ☎03.22.26.93.93 🌐www.maisondeloiseau.com; €6.20).

The nearest town of any size is RUE, 5km east of Marquenterre, one of a number of attractive former fishing villages in the area now stranded inland by the silting up of the Somme. It’s worth a halt for the splendid Gothic vaulting and facade of the Chapelle du St-Esprit (April–Oct daily 9.30am–5.30pm). The best place to eat is the Lion d’Or on rue Barrière (menus €13–29; ☎03.22.25.74.18, ☎03.22.25.66.63; closed Sun eve & all day Mon); it also has simple rooms (📍). Only 7km to the south, near the tiny hamlet of FAVIÈRES, you’ll find one of the area’s finest restaurants, the Clé des Champs on place des Frères-Caudron (menus €13–37; ☎03.22.27.88.00); excellent country cooking is served in a beautiful white farmhouse, its walls decorated with plates and copper pans.

The Somme estuary

After Rue, the D940 meanders through yet more dry fishing hamlets, whose cruching cottages are reminders of their former poverty. Some, like LE CROTOY, have enough sea still to attract the yachties, and are enjoying the second-home boom. Le Crotoy’s south-facing beach has attracted numerous writers and painters over the years: Jules Verne wrote Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea here, and Colette, Toulouse-Lautrec and Seurat were also frequent visitors. For accommodation, try the seaside Hotel Les Tourelles, 2–4 rue Pierre-Guerlain (☎03.22.27.16.33, 🌐www.lestourelles.com; 📍); or, for bed and breakfast in town, the Les Abris-Côtiers (☎03.22.27.0945, 🌐www.abris-cotiers.com; 📍) or La Villa Marine, 14 rue du Phare (☎03.22.37.84.56, 🌐www.villamarine.com; 📍).

At the mouth of the bay lies ST-VALÉRY-SUR-SOMME, accessible in summer by a steam train (Easter–June & Sept to mid-Oct Wed, Sat & Sun; July & Aug daily; 🌐www.chemin-fer-baie-somme.asso.fr; €7–14) from Le Crotoy and Noyelles, and by two buses a day from Noyelles. This is the place from which William, Duke of Normandy, set sail to conquer England in 1066. With its walled and gated medieval citadelle still intact and its brightly painted quays, free of modern development, looking out over mud flats and tilting boats, St-Valéry is the jewel of the coast. The only notable sight is the Écomusée Picarvie at 5 quai du Romerel (April–Sept Mon & Wed–Sun 2–6.30pm; July & Aug also open Tues; €5), with its interesting collection of tools and artefacts relating to vanished trades and ways of life. Otherwise, there are plenty of activities, including boat trips from €9 (☎03.22.60.74.68), cycling (bikes can be rented from €10; ☎03.22.26.96.80) and guided walks (☎03.22.26.92.30). Digging for shellfish is also popular, but you have to be extremely careful about the tide. When it's high it reaches up to the quays, but withdraws 14km at low tide, creating a dangerous current; equally, it returns very suddenly, cutting off the unwary.

▲ Boat at St-Valéry-sur-Somme

The town's tourist office (June–Aug daily 9.30am–noon & 2.30–6pm; Sept–May Tues–Sun 9.30am–noon & 2.30–5pm; ☎03.22.60.93.50) is situated on the quayside. There are two very attractive hotels, both with deservedly popular restaurants: the modest three-star Hôtel du Port et des Bains (☎03.22.60.80.09; 🌐www.hotelhpb.fr; 4; restaurant menu from €28), right on the quayside after the tourist office as you drive in from Rue; and the grander two-star Relais Guillaume de Normandie (☎03.22.60.82.36, 🌐www.guillaumedenormandy.com; 3; restaurant from €18, closed Tues) on the waterside promenade at the foot of the old town. Rue de la Ferté is lined with seafood restaurants; of these, Les Pilotes at no. 62 has over thirty different ways of serving mussels, with most options under €10.

About 9km to the east of St-Valéry, and 2km from the station in Noyelles-sur-Mer (served by the steam train) lies the hamlet of NOLETTE. This is home to one of the most unusual war graves in France: a Chinese cemetery, where 887 members of the Chinese Labour Corps are buried. Employed by the British army in World War I, most of them died of disease. Their neat headstones, sharing two or three rather perfunctory epitaphs, along with two lion statues donated by the Chinese, lie in a field just outside the village.

Abbeville

ABBEVILLE lies about halfway from Calais to Paris and makes a convenient stop-off on the N1. Until hit by a German air raid in May 1940, it was a very beautiful town. Nowadays, all that remain of its former glories are a superbly ornate Flemish-style gare SNCF; a belfry, reputedly the oldest in France; and the Gothic church of St-Vulfran, which was on a par with the cathedrals at Amiens and Beauvais. Restoration work on the church, which was badly scarred during the war, only finished in 1993. The western facade still bears superficial scars but the interior pillars have been replaced with exact copies and the keystones painted with their original colours. Also worth a visit is the eighteenth-century Château de Bagatelle, 2km south of town – not to be confused with the nearby amusement park of the same name – set in ten hectares of parkland (guided visits July & Aug daily except Tues 2–6pm; €8). When the château is closed you can sometimes visit the gardens (mid-May to mid-July & Sept to mid-Oct Mon–Fri 2–4.30pm; mid-July to Aug daily except Tues 2–6pm; €4), famed for their elaborate topiaries and rare species of tree.

The tourist office is at 1 place de l'Amiral-Courbet (☎03.22.24.27.92). It provides a free booking service and organizes guided visits to the church of St-Vulfran. For those who want to stay in style, two suites in the château are used for bed-and-breakfast accommodation (☎06.08.05.96.83, 🌐www.chateaubagatelle.com; 📍). Otherwise, Abbeville has a chain hotel at every price level, but few establishments with individual charm. The most comfortable and central of the chains is the Mercure Hôtel de France, in place du Pilori in the town centre (☎03.22.24.00.42, ☎03.22.24.26.15; 📍; menus from €16), while a very cheap local option is the neat but basic Le Liberty, 5 rue St-Catherine (☎ & ☎03.22.24.21.71; 📍). If you just want a meal then L'Escal en Picardie, at 15 rue des Teinturiers (menus from €20; ☎03.22.24.21.51), is highly commendable, and specializes in fresh fish with crisp white wines, while the pizzeria Le Céladon, 30 place du Grand Marché, is pastel plush and full of locals, with pasta dishes from under €7.

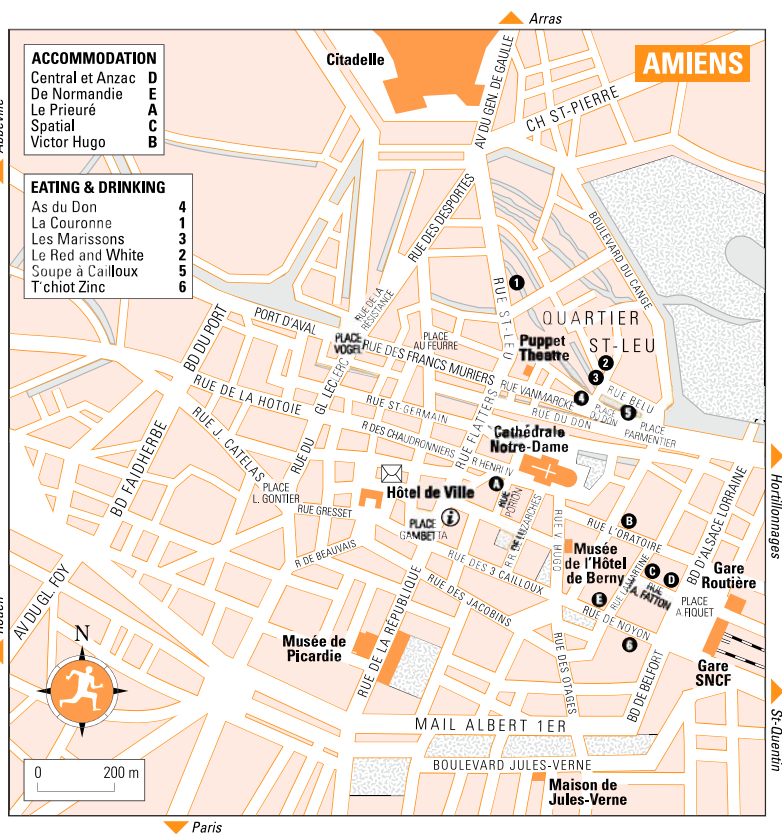

Amiens and the route south

AMIENS was badly scarred during both world wars, but, unlike so many towns in this area, it has been intelligently restored and the centre is pleasingly car-free. St-Leu, the medieval quarter north of the cathedral with its network of canals, has been renovated; the town's university makes its presence felt; and within a few minutes' walk from the train station the hortillonnages (see p.243) transport you into a peaceful rural landscape. Although no hotel in the town exudes character, there are some good mid-range options and there is plenty of life in the evening to make it worth staying at least one night.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The main gare SNCF (Amiens-Nord) and gare routière are both on the rectangular place A.-Fiquet. A two-storey shopping complex, Amiens 2, is connected to the train station and is useful for its supermarket and public toilets. The tourist office is south of the cathedral, just off place Gambetta at 6bis rue Dusevel (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9.30am–6pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎03.22.71.60.50, 🌐www.amiens.com/tourisme).

Amiens has many two-star hotels, all with similar prices, which tend to fill up fairly fast. The best value of these is the fully renovated Victor Hugo, 2 rue de l'Oratoire, just a block from the cathedral, whose ten rooms resemble those of an attractive country bed and breakfast (☎03.22.91.57.91, ☎03.22.92.74.02; 📍). Also near the cathedral is the slightly more upmarket Le Prieuré, 17 rue Porion (☎03.22.71.16.71, ☎03.22.92.46.16; 📍). If the Victor Hugo is full, try one of the two hotels next door to each other on rue Alexandre-Fatton, one of the streets opposite the station: the Spatial, at no. 15 (☎03.22.91.53.23, 🌐www.hotelspatial.com; 2), or, at no. 17, the Central et Anzac (☎03.22.91.34.08, 🌐www.hoteletcentralanzac.com; 2); the former is less expensive and more comfortable than its neighbour. Another option just around the corner on rue Lamartine is the Hôtel de Normandie (☎03.22.91.74.99, 🌐www.hotelnormandie-80.com; 2).

The City

The Cathédrale Notre-Dame (daily: April–Sept 8.30am–6.45pm; Oct–March 8.30am–noon & 2–5.30pm) provides the city’s very obvious focus. First of all, it dominates by sheer size – it’s the biggest Gothic building in France – but its appeal lies mainly in its unusual uniformity of style. Begun in 1220 under architect Robert de Luzarches, it was effectively finished by 1269, and so the building escaped the influence of succeeding architectural fads that marred the “purity” of some of its more leisurely built sisters. A laser scrub, used on the west front, has revealed traces of the original polychrome exterior, in stark contrast to its sombre, grey modern appearance. An evening light show (daily: June 15–June 30 10.45pm, July 10.30pm, Aug 10pm, Sept 9.45pm, Dec 15–Jan 6 8pm; free) gives a vivid idea of how the west front would have looked when coloured, with music added to create atmosphere, and an explanation of the various statues on the facade first in French and then in English. By way of contrast, the interior is all vertical lines and no fuss: a light, calm and unaffected space. Ruskin thought the apse “not only the best, but the very first thing done perfectly in its manner by northern Christendom”. The later embellishments, like the sixteenth-century choir stalls, are works of breathtaking virtuosity. The same goes for the sculpted panels depicting the life of St Firmin, Amiens’ first bishop, on the right side of the choir screen. The choir itself can be visited at 3.30pm daily but is otherwise locked. Those with strong legs can mount the cathedral’s front towers (Mon & Wed–Fri 3–4.30pm, Sat & Sun 2–5.15pm; €2.50). One of the most atmospheric ways of seeing the cathedral is to attend a Sunday morning Mass (10.15am), when there’s sublime Gregorian chanting.

Just north of the cathedral is the quartier St-Leu, a very Flemish-looking network of canals and cottages that was once the centre of Amiens’ thriving textile industry. The town still produces much of the country’s velvet, but the factories moved out to the suburbs long ago, leaving St-Leu to rot away in peace – until, that is, the property developers moved in. The slums have been tastefully transformed into neat brick cottages on cobbled streets, and the waterfront has been colonized by restaurants and clubs.

On the edge of town, the canals still provide a useful function as waterways for the hortillonnages – a series of incredibly fertile market gardens, reclaimed from the marshes created by the very slow-flowing Somme. Farmers travel about them in black, high-prowed punts and a few still take their produce into the city by boat for the Saturday morning market, the marché sur l’eau, on the riverbank of place Parmentier. The best way to see the hortillonnages is from the water: the Association des Hortillonnages provides inexpensive boat tours from its office at 54 bd de Beauvillé (April–Oct daily 2–6pm, ticket office open from 1.30pm – best to arrive early; €5.50). They also provide free maps so that you can wander some of the footpaths around the water gardens on foot.

If you’re interested in Picardy culture, you might take a look at Amiens’ two regional museums. Five minutes’ walk down rue de la République, south of central place Gambetta, an opulent nineteenth-century mansion houses the splendidly laid out Musée de Picardie (Tues–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €4), whose star exhibits are the Puvis de Chavannes paintings on the main stairwell, the room created by Sol LeWitt, and a collection of rare sixteenth-century paintings on wood donated to the cathedral by a local literary society. Close by the cathedral, in the seventeenth-century Musée de l’Hôtel de Berny (May–Sept Thurs–Sun 2–6pm; Oct–April Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €2) is an annexe to the main museum, with objets d’art and local history collections, including a portrait of Choderlos de Laclos, author of Les Liaisons Dangereuses, who was born in Amiens in 1741. A third museum, at 2 rue Dubois, was once the house of Jules Verne (mid-April to mid-Oct Mon & Wed–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Tues 2–6.30pm, Sat & Sun 11am–6.30pm; mid-Oct to mid-April Mon & Wed–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sat & Sun 2–6pm, closed Tues; €5). The author spent most of his life in Amiens, and died here. Although a historic and attractive building, with a romantic turret, the museum, which focuses on Verne’s life, is worth the trip for fans only.

Just to the west of the city, at Tirancourt off the N1 to Abbeville, a large museum-cum-park, Samara (from Samarobriva, the Roman name for Amiens), recreates the life of prehistoric man in northern Europe with reconstructions of dwellings and displays illustrating the way of life, trades and so on (mid-March to April & Sept to mid-Nov Mon–Fri 9.30am–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 9.30am–6.30pm; May Mon–Fri 9.30am–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 10am–7.30pm; June Mon–Fri 9.30am–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 9.30am–7.30pm; July & Aug daily 10am–7.30pm; 📞www.samara.fr; €9).

Eating, drinking and entertainment

By far the most attractive area to eat is around St-Leu, where many of the restaurants have outdoor seating overlooking a canal, especially on the rue Belu. Two favourite places are in the pretty, cobbled place du Don directly below the cathedral, with room to sit outside in good weather: the Soupe à Cailloux serves delicious cuisine, including regional dishes, for a reasonable price (weekday lunch menu at €11, other times from €15; ☎03.22.91.92.70; closed Mon in winter), and is consequently very popular; and the equally attractive As du Don, across the square, does a formule for €18 and has a heated terrace. Just over the canal by the Pont de la Dodane is Amiens' best gourmet restaurant, Les Marissons (menus from €40, carte from around €50, €20 for lunch; ☎03.22.92.96.66; closed Sat lunch & Sun). Also try La Couronne at 64 rue St-Leu (€22–30; ☎03.22.91.88.57; closed Sat lunch & Sun dinner), where delicious food at reasonable prices is served in pleasantly sober surroundings. In the upper town, the handsome T'chiot Zinc (menu at €14, plats for €8; closed Mon lunch & Sun), conveniently located at 18 rue Noyon, opposite the station, serves traditional country fare. Bars and pubs abound in the area, especially on la rue des Bondes, and there is a trendy late-night gay bar Le Red and White at 9 rue de la Dodane.

For one week in late March, Amiens bursts into life for its annual international jazz festival; on the third weekend in June, the local costumes come out for the Fête d'Amiens, which is the best time of year to visit the hortillonnages. Traditional Picardy marionette (cabotans) performances take place (July & Aug Tues–Sun; Sept–June Wed & Sun) at the Théâtre de Chés Cabotans d'Amiens, 31 rue Edouard-David; contact Théâtre d'Animation Picard (☎03.22.22.30.90, 📞www.ches-cabotans-damiens.com) for reservations – tickets are around €10. To purchase or take a look at hand-made marionettes, visit the workshop of Jean-Pierre Facquier at 67 rue du Don.

Beauvais

As you head south from Amiens towards Paris, the countryside becomes broad and flat; BEAUVAIS, 60km south of Amiens, seems to fit into this landscape. Rebuilt, like Amiens, after World War II, it's a drab, neutral place redeemed slightly by its Gothic cathedral, the Cathédrale St-Pierre (daily: May–Oct 9am–12.15pm & 2–6.15pm, Nov–April 9am–12.15pm & 2–5.30pm), which rises above the town. It's a building that perhaps more than any other in northern France demonstrates the religious materialism of the Middle Ages – its main intention was to be taller and larger than its rivals. The choir, completed in 1272, was once 5m higher than that of Amiens, though only briefly, as it collapsed in 1284. Its replacement, only completed three centuries later, was raised by the sale of indulgences – a right granted to the local bishops by Pope Leo X. This, too, fell within a few years, and, the authorities having overreached themselves financially, the church remained unfinished, forlorn and mutilated. In some respects the cathedral has succeeded in its original ambitious aim – at over 155m high, the interior vaults are undeniably impressive, giving the impression that the cathedral is of a larger scale than at Amiens. The building's real beauty, however, lies in its glass, its sculpted doorways and the remnants of the so-called Basse-Oeuvre, a ninth-century Carolingian church incorporated into the structure. It also contains a couple of remarkable clocks: one, a 12m-high astronomical clock built in 1865, above which on the hour 68 figures mimic scenes from the Last Judgement; the other, a medieval clock that's been working for seven hundred years.

Though the cathedral is the town's only remarkable sight, the church of St-Étienne, a few blocks to the south of the cathedral on rue de Malherbe, is worth a look for yet more spectacular Renaissance stained-glass windows. There are also: the Galerie Nationale de Tapisserie behind the cathedral (April–Sept daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–March daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; free), a museum of the tapestry for which Beauvais was once renowned, housing a collection ranging from the fifteenth century to the present day; and the Musée Départemental (daily except Tues: July–Sept 10am–6pm, Oct–June 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €2), devoted to painting, local history and archeology, in the sharp, black-towered building opposite. The rousing statue in the central square is of local heroine Jeanne Hachette, a fighter and inspiration in the defence of the town in 1472 against Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy.

Practicalities

Beauvais is just over an hour by train from Paris, and the gare SNCF is a short walk from the centre of town – take avenue de la République, then turn right up rue de Malherbe. Paris-Beauvais airport is just outside the town but there is no public transport into Beauvais (see p.91 for details of transport into Paris). The tourist office (Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, Sun 10am–5pm; ☎03.44.15.30.30) is opposite the Galerie Nationale de Tapisserie, at 1 rue Beauregard.

If you want to stay, plump for the modest Hôtel du Palais Bleu, within sight of the cathedral at 9 rue St-Nicolas (☎03.44.45.18.58, ☎03.44.15.06.94; 📍), or try The Cygne, 24 rue Carnot (☎03.44.48.68.40, 🌐www.hotelducygne-beauvais.com; 📍). There's a municipal campsite (☎03.44.02.00.22; closed mid-Sept to mid-May) just out of town on the Paris road. For fine food on the square, call in at Le Marignan, 1 rue de Malherbe (☎03.44.48.15.15), which has menus from €12 in the brasserie downstairs, and from €20 in the very good restaurant upstairs. Less expensive is the charming L'Auberge de la Meule, 8 rue du 27 Juin, which specializes in cheese-based dishes including fondues and cheesy salads, with plats at around €10.

The Flemish cities and world war battlefields

From the Middle Ages until the late twentieth century, great Flemish cities like Lille, Roubaix, Douai and Cambrai flourished, mainly thanks to their textile industries. The other dominating – though now all but extinct – presence in this part of northern France was the coalfields and related industries, which, at their peak in the nineteenth century, formed a continuous stretch from Béthune in the west to Valenciennes in the east. At Lewarde you can visit one of the pits, while in the region's big industrial cities you can see what the masters built with their profits: noble town houses, magnificent city halls, ornate churches and some of the country's finest art collections. Lille is now a major trans-European communications hub and, despite visible problems of post-industrial urban decay, has transformed itself into a city with a thriving centre of interest to locals and tourists alike.

On a more sombre note, Picardy, Artois and Flanders are littered with the monuments, battlefields and cemeteries of the two world wars, and nowhere as intensely as the region northeast of Amiens, between Albert and the appealing market town of Arras with its pair of handsome squares. It was here, among the fields and villages of the Somme, that the main battle lines of World War I were drawn. They can be visited most spectacularly at Vimy Ridge, just off the A26 north of Arras, where the trenches have been left in situ. Lesser sites, often more poignant, are dotted over the countryside around Albert and along the Circuit de Souvenir.

Lille and around

LILLE (Rijsel in Flemish), by far northern France's largest city, surprises many visitors with its impressive architecture, the winding streets of its tastefully restored old quarter (Vieux Lille), its plethora of excellent restaurants, and bustling nightlife scene. It boasts some vibrant and obviously prosperous commercial areas, modern residential squares, a large university, a new métro system, and a very serious attitude to culture, reflected in a busy music and arts scene and some great museums. At the same time, the city spreads far into the countryside in every direction, a mass of suburbs and largely abandoned factories, and for the French it remains the very symbol of the country's heavy industry and working-class politics. Lille is facing up to many of the tough issues of contemporary France: poverty and racial conflict, a crime rate similar to that of Paris and Marseille, and a certain regionalism – Lillois sprinkle their speech with a French-Flemish patois ("Ch'ti") and to some extent assert a Flemish identity. But Lille managed to scrub its streets, sights and monuments until they were squeaky clean for its stint as the European Capital of Culture in 2004, making itself worthy of its incredible location – it takes less than an hour to Paris and Brussels by train, and just an hour and forty minutes to London by Eurostar. While in the past Lille was unfamiliar as a tourist destination, today it is a deservedly popular place to spend a weekend.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The central Grand'Place is just a few minutes' walk from Gare Lille-Flandres (originally Paris's Gare du Nord, but brought here brick by brick in 1865), served by regional trains plus the hourly shuttle service to Paris. TGV and Eurostar services from London, Brussels and further afield stop at the modern Lille-Europe station, five minutes' walk further out from the centre, or one stop on the métro – check which station your train uses. If you arrive by air, a shuttle-bus service (☎03.20.90.79.79; €4.60 one way) whisks you to Euralille, just by Gare Lille-Flandres, in twenty minutes from Lesquin airport. Despite being the fifth-largest city in France, Lille's centre is small enough to walk round and, unless you choose to visit the modern art museum at Villeneuve-d'Ascq, or to travel to Roubaix for La Piscine, you won't even need to use the city's efficient métro system (tickets €1.15 per trip).

Musée d'Histoire Naturelle (50m)

The tourist office in place Rihour (Mon–Sat 9.30am–6.30pm, Sun & public hols 10am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎ 03.59.57.94.00, 🌐 www.lilletourisme.com), ten minutes' walk from the station along rue Faidherbe and through place du Théâtre and the Grand'Place, has a free hotel booking service. Hotels are expensive, with prices on par with Paris rather than with the other cities in the region. The two-stars are expensive, while the one-stars huddled around the train station are truly dismal, though there are enough of them to be confident that you'll find a room.

Hotels

Brueghel 3–5 parvis St-Maurice

☎ 03.20.06.06.69, 🌐 www.hotel-brueghel.com.

Very attractive and typically Flemish two-star hotel with antique-furnished rooms and charming, understated service. 5

Carlton 3 rue de Paris ☎ 03.20.13.33.13, 🌐 www

.carltonlille.fr. Smart four-star rooms decorated in Louis XV and Louis XVI style with marble bathrooms. Noted for its magnificent reception halls. 6

Continental 11 place de la Gare ☎ 03.20.06.22.24,

🌐 www.hotel-continental.fr. A quiet hotel with small but neat rooms by the station. Satellite TV and buffet breakfast included. 4

Flandre Angletterre 13 place de la Gare

☎ 03.20.06.04.12, 🌐 www.hotel-flandre-angletterre.fr. Much the classiest of the hotels near the train station: impressively large rooms, all with bath or shower and toilet. 3

Le Grand 51 rue Faidherbe ☎ 03.20.06.31.57,

🌐 www.legrandhotel.com. Comfortable two-star; all rooms with shower, toilet and TV. 4

De la Paix 46bis rue de Paris ☎ 03.20.54.63.93,

🌐 www.hotel-la-paix.com. The nicest, and most expensive, two-star in town, with a great location, a gleaming wooden staircase, and rooms decorated with classy modern art posters. All rooms come with shower, toilet and TV. 5

De la Treille 7–9 place Louise-de-Bettignies

☎ 03.20.55.45.46, 🌐 www.hoteldeletreille.com.

Bright, cheerful hotel, with marble bathrooms and pastel-walled bedrooms. 6

Hostel and campsite

Hostel 12 rue Malpart, off rue de Paris

☎ 03.20.57.08.94, 📧 lille@fuaj.org. HI hostel in a fairly central position. Dinner and breakfast are served if requested, and kitchen facilities are also available. €15.90 including breakfast.

Camping Les Ramiers Bondues ☎ &

☎ 03.20.23.13.42. Lille's nearest site is located in the village of Bondues, about 10km north of the city and is linked by bus 35. Closed Nov–April.

The City

The city's museums are all a bit of a walk from the pedestrianized centre, while the hottest museum associated with Lille is La Piscine, which is actually in Roubaix (see p.253). The focal point of central Lille is the Grand'Place (officially known as place du Général-de-Gaulle and often referred to as the place de la Déesse), which marks the southern boundary of the old quarter, Vieux Lille. To the south is the central pedestrianized shopping area, which extends along rue de Béthune as far as the adjacent squares of place Béthune and place de la République. On Saturdays especially, the area is so jammed with shoppers that you can hardly move, and crowded outdoor cafés add to the street life.

Vieux Lille

The east side of the Grand'Place is dominated by the old exchange building, the lavishly ornate Ancienne Bourse, as perfect a representative of its age as could be imagined. To the merchants of seventeenth-century Lille, all things Flemish were the epitome of wealth and taste; they were not men to stint on detail, either here or on the imposing surrounding mansions. Recently cleaned up, the courtyard of the Bourse is now a flea market, with stalls selling books and flowers in the afternoons. A favourite Lillois pastime is lounging around the fountain at the centre of the square, in the middle of which is a column commemorating the city's resistance to the Austrian siege of 1792, topped by La Déesse (the goddess), modelled on the wife of the mayor at the time – hence the square's alternative moniker.

In the adjacent place du Théâtre, you can see how Flemish Renaissance architecture became assimilated and Frenchified in grand flights of Baroque extravagance. The superlative example of this style is the Opéra, (☎03.28.38.40.40, @www.opera-lille.fr; closed July & Aug). It was built at the turn of the twentieth century by Louis Cordonnier, who also designed the extravagant belfry of the neighbouring Nouvelle Bourse – now the regional Chamber of Commerce – a small part of which is given over to the city's most central post office.

From the north side of these two squares, the smart shopping streets, rues Esquermoise and Lepelletier, lead towards the heart of Vieux Lille, a warren of red-brick terraces on cobbled lanes and passages. It's an area of great character and charm, successfully reclaimed and reintegrated into the mainstream of the city's life, having been for years a dilapidated North African ghetto. To experience the atmosphere of Vieux Lille, head up towards rue d'Angleterre, rue du Pont-Neuf and the Porte de Gand, rue de la Monnaie and place Lion-d'Or. Places to eat and drink are everywhere, interspersed with chic boutiques.

Vieux Lille's main sight is the Hospice Comtesse at 32 rue de la Monnaie. Twelfth century in origin, though much reconstructed in the eighteenth, it served as a hospital until as recently as 1945 and its medicinal garden, a riot of poppies and verbenas, is a delight. The old ward, the Salle des Malades, often used for concerts, and the chapel can both be visited (Mon 2–6pm, Wed–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €2.30).

Charles de Gaulle was born in this part of the town, at 9 rue Princesse, in 1890. His house is now a museum (Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €5), which normally exhibits, amongst de Gaulle's effects, the bullet-riddled Citroën in which he was driving when the OAS attempted to assassinate him in 1962

△ Grand'Place, Lille

(see Contexts, p.128). Another must for military buffs is the citadelle that overlooks the old town to the northwest, constructed in familiar star-shaped fashion by Vauban in the seventeenth century. Still in military hands, it can be visited on Sundays between May and August by guided tour (€7; tours depart from the citadelle's Porte Royale at 3pm). To get there, go along rue de la Barre from Vieux Lille.

Amid all the city's secular pomp, Lille's ecclesiastical architecture used to seem rather subdued. However, the facade of the cathedral, Notre-Dame-de-la-Treille, just off rue de la Monnaie, has broken the mould. The body of the cathedral is a fairly homogeneous though not unattractive Neo-Gothic construction begun in 1854; the new facade though, completed in 1999, is completely different – a translucent marble front supported by steel wires, best appreciated from inside, or at night when lit up from within. More traditional, but also impressive, is the church of St-Maurice, close to the station off place de la Gare, a classic red-brick Flemish Hallekerke, with the characteristic five aisles of the style.

South of the Grand'Place

Just south of the Grand'Place is place Rihour, a largely modern square flanked by brasseries and the remains of an old palace that now houses the tourist office, hidden behind an ugly war monument of gigantic proportions. Close by, the busiest shopping street, rue de Béthune, leads into place de Béthune, home to some excellent cafés, and beyond to the Musée des Beaux-Arts on place de la République (Mon 2–6pm, Wed–Sun 10am–6pm; €4.60). The late 1990s redesign is rather disappointing – too sleek and spacious to give any coherence to the collection – but the museum does contain some important works. Flemish painters form the core of the collection, from “primitives” like Dirck Bouts, through the northern Renaissance to Ruisdael, de Hooch and the seventeenth-century schools. Other works include Goya's interpretation of youth and old age, Les Jeunes et Les Vieilles, and a scattering of the nineteenth-century French greats including Renoir, Monet and Rodin. Look out for the temporary exhibitions, which cost more but can be worthwhile.

A few hundred metres to the south of the museum, near the green avenue Jean-Baptiste Lebas, is the Musée d'Histoire Naturelle, 19 rue de Bruxelles (Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–5pm, Sun 10am–5pm; €2.30). It's a small museum, a manageable size for children, with a lovely collection of dinosaur bones, fossils, and an impressive array of beautifully stuffed birds, including a dodo.

West of the Musée des Beaux-Arts, on rue de Fleurus, lies Maison Coilliot, one of the few houses built by Hector Guimard, who made his name designing the Art Nouveau entrances to the Paris métro – it's worth taking a look at the facade. Built at the height of the Art Nouveau movement, it's as striking today as it obviously was to the conservative burghers of Lille (there are no other such buildings in the city), but it also displays the somewhat muddled eclecticism of the style, coming over as half brick-faced mansion, half timber-framed cottage. East of the museum, near the triumphal arch of Porte de Paris, is the city's ugly but serviceable Hôtel de Ville, executed in a bizarre Flemish Art Deco style, with an extremely tall belfry.

Euralille

Thanks to Eurostar and the international extension of the TGV network, Lille has become the transport hub of northern Europe, a position it is trying to exploit to turn itself into an international business centre: hence Euralille, the burgeoning complex of buildings behind the old gare SNCF.

One definite architectural success is the new Lille-Europe station, composed of lots of props and struts and glass and sunscreens. It's lean, elegant and functional, a fitting setting for the magnificent TGV and Eurostar trains that use it. Some of the buildings in the complex are, however, less successful – for example, the boot-shaped tower treading on the roof of the new station, and the enormous shopping centre opposite with galvanized walkways, marbled malls and relentless muzak.

Villeneuve d'Ascq: the Musée d'Art Moderne

The suburb of Villeneuve d'Ascq is a mark of Lille's cultural ambition. Acres of parkland, an old windmill or two, and a whole series of mini-lakes form the setting for the Musée d'Art Moderne (daily except Tues 10am–6pm; €6.50), which houses an unusually good, if small, collection in its uninviting red-brick buildings. It's 8km from the city but accessible by public transport – to get there take the métro to Pont-de-Bois, then bus #41. The ground floor is generally given over to exhibitions of varying quality by contemporary French artists, while the permanent collection, on the first floor, contains canvases by Picasso, Braque, Modigliani, Miró and a whole room devoted to Fernand Léger and Georges Rouault. On the top floor, a small room – easy to miss but worth the search – contains graphics by many of the above. Meanwhile, outside on the grass, sculptures by Giacometti and Calder provide some playful picnic backdrops.

Eating, drinking and entertainment

A Flemish flavour and a taste for mussels characterize the city's traditional cuisine, with the main area for cafés, brasseries and restaurants around place Rihour and along rue de Béthune. But Lille is also gaining a reputation for gastronomic excellence, and for something more exotic, rue Royale has a selection of fairly pricey but generally very good options, ranging from Cambodian or Japanese to French with a twist. The best area for cheap restaurants is the student quarter along the rues Solférino and Masséna, while Vieux Lille in general is definitely fashionable, in particular the atmospheric rue de Gand. Foodies should also make a pilgrimage to Philippe Olivier's fromagerie with its 300 cheeses on 3 rue du Curé-St-Étienne.

The cafés around the Grand'Place and place Rihour are always buzzing with life. Rue de Paris has lots of tacky, loud, crushed bars raging at all hours, while up near the cathedral, rue Basse and place Louise-de-Bettignies have some trendier spots. West of place de la République, bars are thick on the ground in rues Solférino and Masséna, and attract a young crowd, while student bars, both trendy and friendly, fill up along the base of rue Royale. For gay bars, of which there are several, try Mum's Bar at 4 rue Doudin, Vice Versa on rue de la Barre, and, for lesbians, Miss Marple at 18 rue de Gand. Art and music events are always worth checking up on – there's a particularly lively jazz scene. Pick up a copy of the free weekly listings magazine, Sortir, from the tourist office, or look in the local paper, La Voix du Nord.

Restaurants and cafés

Alcide 5 rue Débris St-Étienne ☎03.20.12.06.95.

A Lillois institution, an upmarket brasserie tucked down a narrow alleyway near the Grand'Place. Reliable, hearty fare (flamiche, fish, crêpes à la cassonade) and home-made ice creams served in a wood-panelled dining room. Menus from €20, half-menu €15. Open daily, closed Sunday eve and mid-July to mid-Aug.

Café aux Arts 1 place du Concert. Good old-fashioned café with wicker chairs on its terrace, in an unbeatable vantage point over the market.

Brasserie de la Paix 25 place Rihour ☎03.20.54.70.41. Sumptuous brasserie, unrelated to its namesake hotel, specializing in mussels and seafood. Menus from €17.50. Closed Sun.

La Cave aux Fioles 39 rue de Gand
 ☎03.20.55.18.43. The jazz-related decor is backed by the music and mellow ambience. Food ranges from classics and Flemish specials to more adventurous fare. Menus from €33 or plats from €10. Closed Sat lunch & Sun.

Le Compostelle 4 rue St-Étienne
 ☎03.28.38.08.30. In a much renovated Knights Templar Renaissance palace, this airy restaurant with indoor trees offers refined versions of traditional French specialties, including vegetarian options. Menus from €27.

A Côté aux Arts 5 place du Concert
 ☎03.28.52.34.66. Friendly little brasserie serving dishes such as andouillette, stuffed pig's trotters, and magret of duck with fresh figs (€13–20 for main course). Closed Sun & Mon.

Domaine de Lintillac 43 rue de Gand
 ☎03.20.06.53.51. Unpretentious old-fashioned French cuisine specializing in foie gras, cassoulet and other produits du terroir from the owner's farm (the produits can also be purchased). Mains from €8. Closed Sun & Mon.

L'Envie 34 rue des Bouchers ☎03.20.15.29.39. Classically delicious French food served in creative ways in a small restaurant on a quiet street, but just steps away from the trendy bars on rue Royale. Menus from €13.50. Closed Sat lunch & Sun.

Flandre Liban 127 rue des Postes
 ☎03.20.57.28.69. Excellent, friendly Lebanese restaurant in a mainly North African and Middle Eastern quarter. Go for the meze menu at €18. Closed Sun eve.

 L'Huîtrière 3 rue des Chats-Bossus
 ☎03.20.55.43.41. A wonderful shop (worth a visit just to look and the mosaics and stained glass) with an expensive, chandelier-hung restaurant at the back – acclaimed as Lille's best – specializing in fish and oysters at €30-plus a dish; there's an impressive €120 menu. Closed Sun eve, hols & late July to late Aug.

Méert 25–27 rue Esquermoise ☎03.20.57.07.44. Decorated with mirrors and chandeliers this is Lille's most famous (and expensive) salon de thé specializing in gaufres as well as excellent cakes and teas. Closed Mon morning. Méert also runs the restaurant at La Piscine in Roubaix (see p.254).

Aux Moules 34 rue de Béthune ☎03.20.57.12.46. The best place to eat mussels; it's been serving them since 1930 in its Art Deco-style interior. Nothing costs much over €10, including the other brasserie fare, and it's all excellent value. Daily noon–midnight.

La Pâte Brisée 63–65 rue de la Monnaie
 ☎03.20.74.29.00. Delicious quiches and tarts in a bright, modern decor. Formules from €8.10.

Paul place du Théâtre, cnr rue Faidherbe
 ☎03.20.78.20.78. Paul is an institution in Lille; though it's now becoming a bit of a chain, it started here with the boulangerie, pâtisserie and salon de thé all under one roof. Daily 7am–7.30pm.

T'Rijsel 25 rue de Gand ☎03.20.15.01.59. Traditional Flemish estaminet, open eve only, serving the whole gamut of regional dishes and over 40 beers. Plats from €10. Closed Sun & Mon.

La Source 13 rue du Plat ☎03.20.57.53.07. Vegetarian restaurant and healthfood store, best at lunchtime. From €8

Bars and clubs

Bateau Ivre 41 rue Lepelletier. Loud music ranging from house to soul in a pleasant street in the old quarter (the interior includes a seventeenth-century vaulted cellar), with a mainly young crowd. Sun–Fri 3pm–3am, Sat 11am–3am.

Club le 30 30 rue de Paris ☎03.20.30.15.54. One of Lille's many jazz venues, this one probably attracts the best artists. Open every eve except Mon.

L'Imaginaire place Louise-de-Bettignies, next door to the Hôtel Treille. Arty young bar with paintings adorning the walls. Mon–Sat 10pm–2am.

La Part des Anges 50 rue de la Monnaie. Trendy wine bar with an enviable cellar, serving simple meals and snacks to accompany the wine.

La Pirogue 16 rue J.-J.-Rousseau. Antilles-themed bar with reasonably priced cocktails, especially popular with local students.

Les Trois Brasseurs 22 place de la Gare. Dark, smoke-stained dining stalls surround copper cauldrons in this genuine brasserie that brews its own beer. Food is also served but it's the beer that's the main attraction.

Listings

Banks All the banks have big branches on rue Nationale, and you can guarantee to find one open until 4pm on Saturday.

Books Le Furet du Nord, 11 place Général-de-Gaulle, is a huge, seven-storey bookshop (it claims to be Europe's biggest) with a wide selection of books in English.

Car rental is mostly from the two train stations: ADA, Gare Europe ☎03.20.55.18.18; Avis, Gare Flandres ☎03.20.06.35.55, Gare Europe ☎03.20.51.12.31; Hertz, Gare Flandres ☎03.28.36.28.70, Gare Europe ☎03.28.36.25.90.

Cinema Lille's two main cinemas, Le Majestic and UGC, are along the rue de Béthune; UGC at no. 40 shows blockbusters with usually at least one film in English, Le Majestic at nos. 54–56 is more arty and sometimes runs festivals. Le Métropole at 26 rue des Ponts-de-Comines normally shows original-language versions.

Doctors SOS Médecins ☎03.20.29.91.91.

Festivals The major festival of the year, the Grande Braderie, takes place over the first weekend of Sept, when a big street parade and vast flea market fill the streets of the old town by day, and the evenings see a moules-frites frenzy in all the restaurants, with empty mussel shells piled up in the streets.

Internet Cyber Office 20 place des Reignaux (open daily till late).

Laundry There are several outlets of Lavotec, the most central being at 72 rue Pierre-LeGrand, 57 rue des Postes and 137 rue Solférimo, open daily 6am–9pm.

Markets The loud and colourful Wazemmes flea market, selling food and clothes, spills around place de la Nouvelle Aventure, to the west of central Lille. Main day Sun but also open Tues and Thurs (7am–2pm). A smaller food market takes place in Vieux Lille on place du Concert (Wed, Fri & Sun 7am–2pm).

Post office 8 place de la République (☎03.28.36.10.20) and 13–15 rue Nationale (☎03.28.38.18.40); both Mon–Fri 8am–6.30pm, Sat 8.30am–12.30pm.

Taxi Gare ☎03.20.06.64.00; Taxi Union ☎03.20.06.06.06.

Roubaix

Just 15km northeast of Lille, right up against the Belgian border, ROUBAIX is another great Flemish city whose former wealth was founded on the wool industry. Nowadays it's best known in France as the origin of mail-order clothes, and as the destination of the gruelling 250-kilometre Paris–Roubaix cycle race, held in mid-April. In the nineteenth century, however, the Industrial Revolution turned Roubaix into one of France's most prosperous cities. The population multiplied fifteen-fold between 1800 and World War I, and the city's prosperity was reflected in great textile mills, Art Nouveau houses, parks, hospitals, a sophisticated social welfare system and a flamboyant Hôtel de Ville, whose architect was also responsible for Gare d'Orsay in Paris. Coincidentally, the main attraction of present-day Roubaix is a disused Art Deco swimming pool, La Piscine, converted into an outstanding museum of fine art and industry by the same architect responsible for the conversion of the Paris station into the Musée d'Orsay. Another worthwhile museum is housed in a working textile factory, and a couple of manufacturer outlets in town offer a chance to snap up bargain-priced clothing.

Arrival and information

The best way to get to Roubaix is via the métro from Lille, which takes twenty minutes and stops at Roubaix Gare/Jean-Baptiste-Lebas, Grand'Place and Eurotélépor, the last of which, immediately to the east of Grand'Place, is also the terminus of the tramway from Lille's Eurostar station. The tram has the sightseeing advantage of being overground, though the journey takes ten minutes extra (fares are the same – €1.15 one way). The gare SNCF is at the western end of avenue Jean-Baptiste-Lebas, a five-minute walk along which leads to the central Grand'Place.

The Town

Modern Roubaix is not a beautiful place, owing to severe world war bombardment and decades of industrial decline. The Grand'Place has a desolate feel, not helped by the opulence of the Hôtel de Ville, built in 1911. But the city has been earnestly trying to overcome its difficulties in recent years, and nowhere is this more manifest than in La Piscine, or the Musée d'Art et d'Industrie

(Tues–Thurs 11am–6pm, Fri 11am–8pm, Sat & Sun 1–6pm; €3 for the permanent collection, plus €3 for temporary exhibitions, or €5 joint ticket), one of most original art museums in the country, halfway between the gare SNCF and the Grand Place at 23 rue de l'Espérance. This fascinating, partly interactive museum opened its doors in 2001, after years of work to convert one of France's most beautiful swimming pools and water cure complexes. Originally built in the early 1930s by local architect Albert Baert, contemporary architect Paul Philippon retained various aspects of the baths – part of the pool, the shower-cubicles, the changing-rooms and the bathhouses – and used each part of the complex to display a splendid collection of mostly nineteenth- and early twentieth-century sculpture and painting, plus haute couture clothing, textiles and a collection of photographs of the swimming pool in its heyday. A fine set of sculptures is reflected in the water, and don't miss the water-filter machinery in the museum's excellent shop. Interesting temporary exhibitions are staged throughout the year.

A short way to the southeast of central Roubaix, at 25 rue de la Prudence, is the massive La Manufacture des Flandres, a working tapestry factory, where you'll find the Musée du Jacquard (Tues–Sun 1.30–5pm; €5). One-hour guided tours take you round an interesting collection of looms and other machinery, plus tapestries from the Middle Ages to the present day, and end up in a boutique selling the factory's wares.

Although the choice and range are nothing like as good as at Troyes (see p.281), there are some good deals to be had on designer-label clothing in Roubaix, with prices at up to fifty percent off normal shop prices. Two major factory outlets are worth investigating: L'Usine (Mon–Sat 10am–7pm), at 228 av Alfred-Motte, a short distance away from the centre; and McArthur Glen (same opening hours), at 44 Mail de Lannoy, right in the centre – Cacharel, Bruce Field, Adidas and Reebok are just a few names which may entice you.

Eating and drinking

There are plenty of restaurants in Roubaix, many serving regional specialities. One of the best is in the Piscine museum itself – a gastronomic restaurant and salon du thé run by Méert, the Lillois patisserie (☎03.20.57.07.44; open daily except Mon for lunch, Fri only for dinner). The Grand Hôtel Mercure, a nineteenth-century palace, offers a beautiful brasserie for a stylish lunch at 22 av J-B Lebas (☎03.20.73.40.00, menus from €18). Another establishment of high repute is the Auberge de Beaumont, 143 rue de Beaumont (☎03.20.75.43.28; closed Wed lunch, Sun & Mon eve; menus from €23), with appealingly rustic decor, while Chez Charly, 127 av J-B Lebas is an excellent place for lunch (☎03.20.70.78.58; closed eves and all day Sun; menus €17–29), serving classic food in a cosy wood-panelled dining room. For couscous and other North African fare head for Les Hammadites, 45 rue du Chemin de Fer, or for a drink there's La Grande Brasserie de l'Impératrice Eugénie at 22 place de la Liberté.

Douai and around

Right at the heart of mining country, 40km south of Lille, and badly damaged in both world wars, DOUAI is a surprisingly attractive and lively town, its handsome streets of eighteenth-century houses cut through by both the River Scarpe and a canal. Once a haven for English Catholics fleeing Protestant oppression in Tudor England, Douai later became the seat of Flemish local government under Louis XIV, an aristocratic past evoked in the novels of Balzac.

The Town

Centre of activity is the place d'Armes, where life focuses around a fountain, while rue de la Mairie, leading west, is overlooked by the massive Gothic belfry of the Hôtel de Ville (guided tours: July & Aug daily 10am, 11am & hourly 2–6pm; Sept–June Mon 3pm, 4pm & 5pm Tues–Sun 11am, 3pm, 4pm & 5pm; €3.50), popularized by Victor Hugo and renowned for its carillon of 62 bells – the largest single collection in Europe. It rings every fifteen minutes, and there are hour-long concerts every Saturday at 11am, and on public holidays at 11.30am.

One block north of the town hall, on rue Bellegambe, is an outrageous Art Nouveau facade fronting a very ordinary haberdashery store. At the end of the street, rising above the old town, are the Baroque dome and tower of the church of St-Pierre, an immense, mainly eighteenth-century church with – among other treasures – a spectacular carved Baroque organ case. East of the place d'Armes, Douai's oldest church, the twelfth-century church of Notre-Dame, suffered badly in World War II but has been refreshingly modernized inside. Beyond the church is the better of the town's two surviving medieval gateways, the Porte Valenciennes. With the exception of the 1970s extension to the old Flemish Parliament building, the riverfront west of the town hall is pleasant to wander along. Between the river and the canal to the west, at 130 rue des Chartreux, the Ancienne Chartreuse has been converted into a wonderful museum (Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm, Sun 10am–noon & 3–6pm; €3), with a fine collection of paintings by Flemish, Dutch and French masters, including Van Dyck, Jordaens, Rubens and Douai's own Jean Bellegambe. The adjacent chapel, shows off to full effect an array of sculptures including a poignant Enfant prodige by Rodin.

Practicalities

The gare SNCF is a five-minute walk from the centre – from the station head left down avenue Maréchal-Leclerc, then right onto the place d'Armes. The tourist office (April–Sept Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–7pm Sun & public hols 3–6pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; ☎03.27.88.26.79, 🌐www.ville-douai.fr) is housed within the fifteenth-century Hôtel du Dauphin on the square.

For accommodation there's the central but shabby Hôtel au Grand Balcon, on 26 place Carnot (☎03.27.88.91.07; 📍). A far classier option is La Terrasse, a swanky four-star in the narrow terrasse St-Pierre (☎03.27.88.70.04, 🌐www.laterrasse.fr; 📍), to one side of the church of St-Pierre; its restaurant is well regarded, with menus from €25.

Lewarde

A visit to the colliery at LEWARDE, 7km east of Douai, is a must for admirers of Zola's Germinal, perhaps the most electrifying “naturalistic” novel ever written. The bus from Douai heads east across the flat and featureless beet fields, down a road lined with poor brick dwellings that recall the company-owned housing of Germinal, intersected by streets named after Pablo Neruda, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Georges Brassens and other luminaries of the French and international Left. This is the traditional heart of France's coal-mining country, always dispiriting and now depressed by closures and recession. Even the distinctive landmarks of slag heaps and winding gear are fast disappearing in the face of demolition and landscaping.

The bus puts you down at the main square, leaving a fifteen-minute walk down the D132 towards Erchin to get to the colliery. The Centre Historique Minier (guided tours: March–Oct daily 9am–5.30pm; Nov–Feb Mon–Sat 1–5pm, Sun 10am–5pm; 2hr; March–Oct €10.60, Nov–Feb €9.40) is on the left in the old Fosse Delloye, sited, like so many pits, amid woods and fields. Visits are guided by retired miners, many of whom are not French, but Polish, Italian or North African.

The main part of the tour – in addition to film shows and visits to the surface installations of winding gear, machine shops, cages, sorting areas and the rest – is the exploration of the pit-bottom roadways and faces, equipped to show the evolution of mining from the earliest times to today. These French pits were extremely deep and hot, with steeply inclined narrow seams that forced the miners to work on slopes of 55 degrees and more, just as Étienne and the Maheu family do in Zola's story. Accidents were a regular occurrence in the old days: the northern French pits had a particularly bad record in the last years of the nineteenth century. The worst mining disaster occurred at Courrières in 1906, when 1100 men were killed. Incredibly, despite the fact that the owners made little effort to search for survivors, thirteen men suddenly emerged after twenty days of wandering in the gas-filled tunnels without food, water or light. The first person they met thought that they were ghosts and fainted in fright. More incredible still, a fourteenth man surfaced alone after another four days.

Cambrai and around

Despite the tank battle of November 1917 (see box opposite) and the fact that the heavily defended Hindenburg Line ran through the town centre for most of World War I, CAMBRAI has kept enough of its character to make a passing visit worthwhile, though it is less attractive than either Douai, its sister town 27km to the north, or Arras to the northwest.

The huge, cobbled main square, place Aristide-Briand, is dominated by the Neoclassical Hôtel de Ville, and still suggests the town's former wealth, which was based on the textile and agricultural industries. Unlike most places, Cambrai's chief ecclesiastical treasure is not its cathedral – the medieval one was dismantled after the Revolution – but the Church of St-Géry, off rue St-Aubert west of the main square, worth a visit for a celebrated Mise au Tombeau by Rubens. The appealingly presented Musée de Cambrai (10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3, free first weekend of every month) at 15 rue de l'Épée, a short way south of the town square, is also worthwhile. Paintings by Velázquez, Utrillo and Ingres feature prominently alongside works by various Flemish old masters, plus great twentieth-century artists like Zadkine and Van Dongen. Don't turn down the audio-guided tour and don't leave out the archeological display in the basement, where you can see some fascinating exhibits including elegant statues rescued from the decimated cathedral. Look out for the gourde eucharistique de Concevieux, an amazingly well-preserved sixth-century bronze hipflask.

Cambrai's tourist office is housed in the Maison Espagnole on the corner of avenue de la Victoire at 48 rue de Noyon (Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 3–6pm; ☎03.27.78.36.15, 🌐www.cambraiofficedetourisme.com). Central accommodation includes Le Mouton Blanc, 33 rue d'Alsace-Lorraine

At dawn on November 20, 1917, the first full-scale tank battle in history began at Cambrai, when over 400 British tanks poured over the Hindenburg Line. In just 24 hours, the Royal Tank Corps and British Third Army made an advance that was further than any undertaken by either side since the trenches had first been dug in 1914. A fortnight later, however, casualties on both sides had reached 50,000, and the armies were back where they'd started.

Although in some respects the tanks were ahead of their time, they still relied on cavalry and plodding infantry as their back-up and runners for their lines of communication. And, before they even reached the "green fields beyond", most of them had broken down. World War I tanks were primitive machines, operated by a crew of eight who endured almost intolerable conditions – with no ventilation system, the temperature inside could rise to 48°C. The steering alone required three men, each on separate gearboxes, communicating by hand signals through the din of the tank's internal noise. Maximum speed (6kph) dropped to almost 1kph over rough terrain, and refuelling was necessary every 55km. Consequently, of the 179 tanks lost in the battle at Cambrai, very few were destroyed by the enemy; the majority broke down and were abandoned by their crews.

(☎03.27.81.30.16, 📧mouton-blanc.com; 📍), a convenient and moderately priced hotel close to the station, with a posh restaurant inside (from €18; closed Sun eve & Mon, plus the eves of public hols & Aug 1–15). Alternatively, there is a small, family-oriented hostel, L'Étape, 1.5km southeast of the centre of town on Sentier de l'Église (☎03.27.37.80.80, 📧educrotois@l-etape.asso.fr; €11.70). The nearest campsite is Les Colombes at Aubencheul-au-Bac (mid-March to mid-Oct; ☎03.27.89.25.90), 10km away off the N43 to Douai. Crêperie La Sarrazine opposite the tourist office at 1 place St-Sépulcre is the best bet for an economical meal (closed Sun).

Le Cateau-Cambrésis

Twenty-two kilometres east of Cambrai along an old Roman road, the small town of LE CATEAU-CAMBRÉSIS is the birthplace of Henri Matisse (1869–1954), and as a gift to his home town, the artist bequeathed it a collection of his works. Some of them are displayed in the Musée Matisse (daily except Tues: June–Sept 10am–6pm; Oct–May 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4.50, free first Sun of month), housed in Palais Fénelon in the centre of town. Although no major works are displayed, this is the third-largest Matisse collection in France, and the paintings here are no less attractive and interesting than the better-known ones exhibited elsewhere. The collection includes several studies for the chapel in Vence, plus a whole series of his characteristically simple pen-and-ink sketches. Also worth looking at is the work of local Cubist Auguste Herbin, particularly his psychedelic upright piano. For somewhere to stay and eat there's the simple but comfortable Hostellerie du Marché at 9 rue Landrecies (☎03.27.84.09.32, 📧www.hostellieriedumarche.com; 📍; menus €14 & €20).

Arras, Albert and the Somme battlefields

Around Arras and Albert some of the fiercest and most futile battles of World War I took place. The beautiful town of Arras, easily accessible from Paris and Lille by TGV, is the best base for exploring the battlefields. Nearby to the north, at the moving Vimy Ridge, Canadians fell in their thousands, while at Notre-Dame de Lorette, the French suffered the same fate; the battlefields and cemeteries of the Somme lie to the south, around Albert and Péronne, home to a fascinating museum devoted to explaining and remembering the war.

Arras

ARRAS, with its fine old centre, is one of the prettiest towns in northern France. It was renowned for its tapestries in the Middle Ages, giving its name to the hangings behind which Shakespeare's Polonius was killed by Hamlet. Subsequently the town fell under Spanish control, and many of its citizens today claim that Spanish blood runs in their veins. Only in 1640 was Arras returned to the kingdom of France, with the help of Cyrano de Bergerac. During World War I, the British used it as a base, digging tunnels under the town to try to surprise the Germans to the northeast.

Although destroyed by the Germans in World War I, the town bears few obvious battle scars. Reconstruction here, particularly after World War II, has been careful and stylish, and two grand arcaded Flemish- and Dutch-style squares in the centre – Grand'Place and the smaller Place des Héros – preserve their historic, harmonious character, though both resemble large car parks today. On every side are restored seventeenth- and eighteenth-century mansions and, on place des Héros, there's a grandly ornate Hôtel de Ville, its entrance hall housing a photographic display documenting the wartime destruction of the town and sheltering a set of géants (festival giants) awaiting the city's next fête.

Also inside the town hall is the entrance to the belfry viewing platform, 150m high – to which a lift fortunately takes you up almost all the way (€2.60) – and les souterrains (or les boves) – cold, dark passageways and spacious vaults tunnelled since the Middle Ages, and completed by the British during World War I, beneath the centre of the city (frequent bilingual guided tours – ask for times in the tourist office; €4.60). Once down, you're escorted on a 40-minute tour and given an interesting survey of local history. The rooms – many of which have fine, tiled floors and lovely pillars and stairways – were used as a British barracks and hospital. Pictures from this period are on display, as is a bilingual newspaper published for the soldiers. In the spring, some of the rooms are converted into an underground garden.

Next to its enormous cathedral is Arras's other main sight, the Benedictine Abbaye St-Vaast, a grey-stone classical building – still pockmarked by wartime shrapnel – erected in the eighteenth century by Cardinal Rohen. The abbey now houses the Musée des Beaux-Arts, with its entrance at 22 rue Paul-Donnier (daily except Tues 9.30am–noon & 2–5.30pm; €4), which contains a motley collection of paintings, including a couple of Jordaens and Brueghels, plus fragments of sculpture and local porcelain. Only one of the tapestries or arras that made the town famous in medieval times survived the wartime bombardments. Figuring among the highlights are a pair of delicately sculpted thirteenth-century angels, the Anges de Saudemont, and a room on the first floor filled with vivid seventeenth-century paintings by Philippe de Champaigne and his contemporaries, including his own Présentation de la Vierge au Temple.

Nearby, on the small, dark rue Maximilien-Robespierre, opposite a ghostly mask and costume shop, is the Maison Robespierre, home between 1787 and 1789 to the revolutionary leader before his hands were stained with blood, and now a small museum (9.30am–noon & 2–5.30pm; free).

Thirty minutes away by foot on the mournful western edge of town, along boulevard Général-de-Gaulle from the Vauban barracks (which although a citadelle was monikered “la belle inutile” because it served no purpose in protecting the city, even when it was built in 1668), is a war cemetery and memorial by the British architect Sir Edwin Lutyens. It’s a movingly elegiac, classical colonnade of ivy-covered brick and stone, commemorating 35,928 missing soldiers, the endless columns of their names inscribed on the walls. Around the back of the barracks, alongside an overgrown moat, is the Mémorial des Fusillés, a stark wall accessed via the avenue of the same name; its plaques commemorate two hundred Resistance fighters shot by firing squad in World War II – many of them of Polish descent, nearly all of them miners, and most of them Communists.

On a lighter note, if you are in Arras for the last Sunday of August, the town transforms itself into an open-air bistro for La Fête de l’Andouillette, with parades, colourful costumes and tasting of the sausage itself.

Practicalities

From the gare SNCF it’s a ten-minute walk up rue Gambetta then rue Désiré-Delansorne, to the tourist office, located in the Hôtel de Ville on place des Héros (May–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2.30–6.30pm; Oct–April Mon 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm; ☎03.21.51.26.95, 🌐www.ot-arras.fr); the tourist office is worth consulting for details of transport and tours of local battlefields (see “Vimy Ridge and around”, p.260). To reach the Vimy memorial, you can also rent a car from Hertz, boulevard Carnot (☎03.21.23.11.14), or Euroto, 15 av Paul-Michonneau (☎03.21.55.05.05).

There are two good, inexpensive hotels on the beautiful squares in the centre: the Diamant, 5 place des Héros (☎03.21.71.23.23, 🌐www.arras-hotel-diamant.com; Ⓢ), a comfortable, reliable two-star; and Ostel Les Trois Luppars, 47 Grand’Place (☎03.21.60.02.03, 🌐www.ostel-les-3luppars.com; Ⓢ), a friendly family-run place with modern facilities in a characterful old building. For a more luxurious night, go to the Univers, a beautiful former monastery around a courtyard at 3 place de la Croix-Rouge, near the Abbaye St-Vaast (☎03.21.71.34.01, 🌐www.hotel-univers-arras.com; Ⓢ; restaurant €20–42). Near the train station there are hotels in nearly every price range, including the shabby but inexpensive one-star, Le Passe Temps (☎03.21.50.04.04, ☎03.21.50.33.78; Ⓢ); and the top-of-the-range Hotel d’Angleterre (☎03.21.51.51.16, 🌐www.hotelangleterre.info; Ⓢ). The newly modernized hostel is extremely well positioned at 59 Grand’Place (☎03.21.22.70.02, ☎03.21.07.46.15; closed Dec & Jan; €11.70, HI cardholders only). The municipal campsite at 166 rue du Temple (☎03.21.71.55.06; closed Feb & March) lies 1km out of town on the Bapaume road.

Restaurants worth trying include La Rapière, 44 Grand’Place (☎03.21.55.09.92), with excellent regional food and menus from €14.50; and, for a splurge, the gourmet La Faisanderie, across the square at no. 45 (☎03.21.48.20.76; from €23). Nearer the station at 26 bd de Strasbourg is an attractive, old-fashioned brasserie, La Coupole, where you’ll find locals and tourists eating oysters and other fresh seafood, as well as traditional brasserie dishes (☎03.21.71.88.44; €29 menu; closed Sat lunch).

There’s a good fromagerie, Jean-Claude Leclercq, at 39 place des Héros (closed Mon). Saturdays are the best day for food and wine, when the squares are taken up with a morning market, and Resto Cave, an extensive sixteenth-century wine cellar run by the delightfully large and quirky proprietor of the Trois Luppars, is open for the sale of fine wines (10am–1pm & 3–8pm).

Vimy Ridge and around

Eight kilometres north of Arras on the D49, Vimy Ridge, or Hill 145, was the scene of some of the worst trench warfare of World War I: almost two full years of battle, culminating in its capture by the Canadian Corps in April 1917. It's a vast site, given in perpetuity to the Canadian people out of respect for their sacrifices, and the churned land has been preserved, in part, as it was during the conflict. You really need your own transport to get there as the nearest bus stop is 45 minutes' walk away (for details contact the tourist office in Arras). Alternatively, a private taxi tour can be booked in advance with Mr Ishak (☎06.16.20.34.38), whose father and grandfather fought with the Canadian forces. It is well worth the journey – of all the battlefields, it is perhaps easiest here to gain an impression of the lay of the land, and of how it may actually have felt to be part of a World War I battle.

2

THE NORTH

Arras, Albert and the Somme battlefields

There's an information centre (daily 10am–6pm; ☎03.21.50.68.68) supervised by friendly, bilingual Canadian students, who run free guided tours (daily 10am–5.30pm; call to book, or check in at the office near the trenches upon arrival). Tours are run either of the “subway”, the Canadian term for the series of interlinking underground tunnels used as secret passageways and to hoard ammunition and equipment, or of the cemeteries and battlefields. No children under 12 are allowed underground and it is advisable to have something warm to wear.

Near the information centre, long worms of neat, sanitized trenches meander over the now grassy ground, still heavily pitted by shell bursts beneath the planted pines. Grenades and shrapnel are still found here, and pedestrians are warned not to stray from the directed paths on to the grassy areas. Filled in by topsoil and grass, some of the craters have become smaller over time, but the ground remains sufficiently damaged and uneven, almost a hundred years later, to relay the impact of these battles. Beneath the ground lie some 11,000 bodies still unaccounted for and countless rounds of unexploded ammunition.

On the brow of the ridge to the north of the trenches, overlooking the slag-heap-dotted plain of Artois, a great white monument reaches for the heavens, inscribed with the names of 11,285 Canadians and Newfoundlanders whose bodies were never found. It must have been an unenviable task to design a fitting memorial to such slaughter, but this one, aided by its setting, succeeds with great drama. Nearby is a subdued but informative museum (same hours as the information centre; free), which illustrates the well-planned Canadian attack and its importance for the Canadians. This was the first time that they were recognized as fighting separately from the British, thus adding to their growing sense of nationhood.

Back from the ridge lies a memorial to the Moroccan Division who also fought at Vimy, and in the woods behind, on the headstones of another exquisitely maintained cemetery, you can read the names of half the counties of rural England.

La Targette, Neuville-St-Vaast and Notre-Dame de Lorette

At the crossroads (D937/D49) of LA TARGETTE, 8km north from the centre of Arras and accessible from there by bus, the Musée de la Targette (daily 9am–8pm; €3) contains an interesting collection of World War I and II artefacts. It's the private collection of one David Bardiaux, assembled with passion and meticulous attention to detail under the inspiration of tales told by his grandfather, a veteran of the 1916 Battle of Verdun. Its appeal lies in the absolute precision with which the thirty-odd mannequins of British, French, Canadian and German soldiers are dressed and equipped, down to their sweet and tobacco tins and such rarities as a 1915 British-issue cap with earflaps – very comfortable for the troops but withdrawn because the top brass thought it made their men look like yokels. All the exhibits have been under fire; some belonged to known individuals and are complete with stitched-up tears of old wounds.

More cemeteries lie a little to the south of La Targette, nominally at NEUVILLE-ST-VAAST, though the village is actually 1km away to the east. There's a small British cemetery, a huge French one, and an equally large and moving German cemetery, containing the remains of 44,833 Germans, four to a cross or singly under a Star of David. In the village itself a Polish memorial – among the Poles that died in action here was the sculptor Henri Gaudier-Brzeska, in 1915 – and a Czech cemetery face each other across the main street.

On a bleak hill a few kilometres to the northwest of Vimy Ridge (and 5km north of Neuville-St-Vaast) is the church of Notre-Dame de Lorette, scene of a costly French offensive in May 1915. The original church was blasted to bits during the war and rebuilt in grim Neo-Byzantine style in the 1920s, grey and dour on the outside but rich and bejewelled inside. It now stands at the centre of a vast graveyard with over 20,000 crosses laid out in pairs, back to back, each one separated by a cluster of roses. There are 20,000 more buried in the ossuary, and there's the small Musée Vivant 1914–1918 (daily 9am–8pm; €3) behind the church, displaying photographs, uniforms and other military paraphernalia. You can reach Notre-Dame de Lorette by bus from Arras, direction “Lens”.

Albert and around

The church at ALBERT, 40km south of Arras and 30km northeast of Amiens – now, with the rest of the town, completely rebuilt – was one of the minor landmarks of World War I. Its tall tower was hit by German bombing early on in the campaign, leaving the statue of the Madonna on top leaning at a precarious angle. The British, entrenched over three years in the region, came to know it as the “Leaning Virgin”. Army superstition had it that when she fell the war would end, a myth inspiring frequent hopeful pot shots by disgruntled troops. Before

The Battle of the Somme

On July 1, 1916, the British and French launched the Battle of the Somme to relieve pressure on the French army defending Verdun. The front ran roughly northwest–southeast, 6km east of Albert across the valley of the Ancre and over the almost treeless high ground north of the Somme – huge hedgeless wheat fields now. These windy open hills had no intrinsic value, nor was there any long-term strategic objective – the region around Albert was the battle-site simply because it was where the two Allied armies met.

There were 57,000 British casualties on the first day alone, approximately 20,000 of them dead, making it the costliest defeat the British army has ever suffered. Sir Douglas Haig is the usual scapegoat for the Somme, yet he was only following the military thinking of the day, which is where the real problem lay. As historian A.J.P. Taylor put it, “Defence was mechanized: attack was not.” Machine guns were efficient, barbed wire effective, and, most important of all, the rail lines could move defensive reserves far faster than the attacking army could march. The often ineffective heavy bombardment that presaged an advance was favoured by both sides but only made matters worse, since the shells forewarned the enemy of an offensive and churned the trenches into a giant muddy quagmire.

Despite the bloody disaster of the first day, the battle wore on until bad weather in November made further attacks impossible. The cost of this futile struggle was roughly 415,000 British, 195,000 French and 600,000 German casualties.

embarking on a visit of the region's battle sites and war cemeteries, otherwise known as the Circuit de Souvenir (see below), you might want to stop in at the Musée "Somme 1916" (daily: Feb–May & Oct to mid-Dec 9am–noon & 2–6pm; June–Sept 9am–6pm; €4), an underground museum which has re-enactments of fifteen different scenes from life in the trenches of the Somme in 1916. The mannequins look slightly too jolly and eager but it does go some way to bringing the props to life. The museum's final section recreates the actual battle scene, complete with flashing lights and the sound of exploding shells. Enthusiastically portrayed, some may find this a little tasteless, though to others it may in part succeed in explaining how soldiers, forced to live in these conditions for long periods, returned home with shell-shock.

As you arrive (trains from Amiens or Arras), the town's new tower, capped now by an equally improbably posed statue, is the first thing that catches your eye. The tourist office is close by at 9 rue Gambetta (April–Sept Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6.30pm, Sun 9.30am–noon; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 3–5pm; ☎03.22.75.16.42). Cobbers Tours (☎06.80.08.68.63, ✉cobbers@tiscali.fr) is based in Albert and specializes in offering an Australian accent to story of the battlefields. Of the town's hotels, La Paix, a friendly establishment with a decent restaurant, at 43 rue Victor-Hugo (☎03.22.75.01.64, ☎03.22.75.44.17; 🍷; menus from €14), is the only one that can be recommended.

The Circuit de Souvenir

Was it for this the clay grew tall?

O what made fatuous sunbeams toil

To break earth's sleep at all?

Wilfred Owen, Futility

The Circuit de Souvenir conducts you from graveyard to mine crater, trench to memorial. There's not a lot to see; certainly no evidence of the shocking atrocities and scenes of destruction that happened here less than a hundred years ago. Neither do you get much sense of movement or even of battle tactics. But you will find that, no matter what the level of your interest in the Great War, you have in fact embarked on a sort of pilgrimage, in which each successive step becomes more harrowing and oppressive.

The cemeteries are the most moving aspect of the region – beautiful, the grass perfectly mown, an individual bed of flowers at the foot of every gravestone. And there are tens of thousands of gravestones, all identical, with a man's name, if it's known (nearly half the British dead have never been found), and his rank and regiment. In the lanes between Albert and Bapaume you'll see the cemeteries everywhere: at the angle of copses, halfway across a wheat field, in the middle of a bluebell wood, terrible in their simple beauty.

Lying on minor roads, the circuit can be explored by either car or bicycle. Both Albert to the west and Péronne to the southeast (see p.264) make good starting points, the tourist offices and museums in either town are able to provide you with a free map of the circuit. Once en route, sights of interest are marked along the road by arrows and poppy symbols, with Commonwealth graves also indicated in English. It would be difficult to see all of the 400 British and Commonwealth cemeteries in the area, though getting off the beaten track to visit one or two small ones can be rewarding. What follows is necessarily just a selected handful of some of the better-known sites.

If you start from Albert the first town you'll reach is BEAUMONT-HAMEL (7km north), where the 51st Highland Division walked abreast to their deaths with their pipes playing. Here, on the hilltop where most of them died, a series of trenches, now grassed over and eroding, is preserved. Just across the river, towards the village of THIEPVAL, the 5000 Ulstermen who died in the Battle of the Somme are commemorated by the incongruously Celtic Ulster Memorial, a replica of Helen's Tower at Clondeboyne near Belfast (information bureau open Mon–Sat 11am–5pm; closed Dec & Jan). Probably the most famous of Edwin Lutyens' many memorials is south of Thiepval: the colossal Memorial to the Missing, in memory of the 73,357 British troops whose bodies were never recovered at the Somme.

Five kilometres east at POZIÈRES on the Albert–Bapaume road is perhaps the oddest memorial. Here, Le Tommy café has a permanent World War I exhibition (daily 9.30am–6pm; free) in its back garden, consisting mainly of a reconstructed section of trench and “equipped” with genuine battlefield relics, all accompanied by a recorded loop of patriotic British war songs. It's a bit amateurish, but worth a look if you're passing through. The French owner of the café had first collected objects from the battlefield as a boy to sell for pocket money. Farmers apparently still turn up several tonnes of shells every year – not surprising when you think the British alone fired one and a half million shells in the last week of June 1916.

Delville Wood, known as “Devil's Wood”, lies another 5km to the east at LONGUEVAL. Here, thousands of South Africans lost their lives, and a memorial to the dead from both world wars has been erected, as well as a small museum (daily except Mon: April–Oct 10am–5.45pm, Nov & March 10am–3.45pm) relating not just the battle in France but also the longest march of the war, undertaken thousands of kilometres away, when South African troops walked 800km to drive the Germans out of East Africa (now Tanzania).

The most informative of all the World War I museums in the surrounding départements is at PÉRONNE, on the River Somme some 25km east of Albert – the Historial de la Grande Guerre (mid-Jan to mid-Dec 10am–6pm; €7.50). All kinds of exhibits – such as newsreel and film footage, newspapers, posters, commemorative plates, Otto Dix drawings and artificial limbs – combine with displays of hardware to provide a broad, modern view of the whole catastrophe. It also provides an excellent history of the complex political and cultural tensions that led to war, something that is lacking in most of the other sights.

There's a TGV station about 15km away from Péronne – the Gare Haute Picardie – which is thirty minutes from the Eurostar stop at Lille–Europe; for a taxi to or from the station, call Mouret (☎03.22.84.15.83) or Fouque (☎03.22.84.52.49). The tourist office is at 1 rue Louis XI, opposite the museum (June–Aug Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 3–6pm; Sept–May closed Sun; ☎03.22.84.42.38). Accommodation includes the old-fashioned Hostellerie des Remparts, on the opposite side of the main square at 23 rue Beaubois (☎03.22.84.01.22, ☎03.22.84.38.96; 🍷; restaurant from €16), or the modern Campanile (☎03.22.84.22.22, ☎03.22.84.16.86; 🍷), part of a chain, just out of town on the N17 to Roye and Paris.

To the southwest of the main circuit near VILLERS-BRETONNEUX, 18km southwest of Albert near the River Somme, stands another fine Lutyens memorial. As at Vimy, the landscaping of the Australian Memorial here is dramatic – for the full effect, climb up to the viewing platform of the stark white central tower. The monument was one of the last to be inaugurated, in July 1938, when the prospects for peace were again looking bleak.

Aisne and Oise

2

THE NORTH

Laon

To the southeast of the Somme, away from the coast and the main Paris through-routes, the often rainwashed and dull province of Picardy becomes considerably more inviting. In the départements of Aisne and Oise, where the region merges with neighbouring Champagne, there are some real attractions amid the lush wooded hills. Laon, Soissons and Noyon all centre around handsome Gothic cathedrals, while at Compiègne, Napoleon Bonaparte and Napoléon III enjoyed the luxury of a magnificent château and embellished it to their hearts' content. The most rewarding overnight stop is off the beaten track in the tiny fortified town of Coucy-le-Château-Auffrique, in the forest and on a hill between Soissons and Laon. Transport is good, too, with a network of bus connections from Amiens and good train and bus links with Paris.

Laon

Looking out over the plains of Champagne and Picardy from the spine of a high narrow ridge, still protected by its gated medieval walls, LAON (pronounced "Lon") is one of the highlights of the region. Dominating the town, and visible for miles around, are the five great towers of one of the earliest and finest Gothic cathedrals in the country. Of all the cathedral towns in the Aisne, Laon is the one to head for.

Arrival, information and accommodation

Arriving by train or road, you'll find yourself in the disappointingly shabby and characterless lower town, or ville basse. To get to the upper town – ville haute – without your own transport, you can make the stiff climb up the steps at the end of avenue Carnot, or take the Poma 2000 (Mon–Sat 7am–8pm every 3–6 min, irregularly on Sun 2.30–6pm in summer only; one-day return ticket €1), a fully automated, rubber-tyred, overland métro, Laon's pride and joy; you board next to the train station and alight by the town hall (Terminus "Hôtel de Ville") on place Général-Leclerc; from there a left turn down rue Sérurier brings you nose to nose with the cathedral.

The tourist office (daily 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; ☎03.23.20.28.62, @www.tourisme-paysdelaon.com) is right by the western end of the cathedral, housed within the impressive Gothic Hôtel-Dieu, built in 1209; ask for information about local gîtes and guesthouses. If you need accommodation in the ville basse (if you arrive too late to take the Poma), try Hôtel Welcome (☎03.23.23.06.11, @hotel-welcome.laon@orange.fr; 📍), at 2 av Carnot, straight in front of the gare SNCF. Otherwise, in the ville haute, Hôtel de la Paix, 52 rue St-Jean (☎03.23.79.06.34; 📍; restaurant from €11, closed Sat & Sun), is inexpensive, though you'd do better at the charming and characterful old Les Chevaliers, at 3–5 rue Sérurier, near the Poma stop (☎03.23.27.17.50, @hotelchevaliers@aol.com; 📍). Laon's smartest accommodation is at the three-star Hôtel de la Bannière de France, 11 rue Franklin-Roosevelt (☎03.23.23.21.44, @www.hoteldelabannieredefrance.com; 📍); decent traditional restaurant from €20). La Chênaie (☎03.23.20.25.56; Jan–Sept), Laon's campsite, is on allée de la Chênaie, on the northwest side of town.

The Town

Laon really only has one attraction, its magnificent Cathédrale Notre-Dame (daily 9am–6.30pm; guided tours at 3pm from tourist office: July & Aug daily; Sept–June Sat, Sun & public hols only). Built in the second half of the twelfth century, the cathedral was a trendsetter in its day, elements of its design – the gabled porches, the imposing towers and the gallery of arcades above the west front – being repeated at Chartres, Reims and Notre-Dame in Paris. When wrapped in thick mist, the towers seem otherworldly. The creatures craning from the uppermost ledges, looking like reckless mountain goats borrowed from a medieval bestiary, are reputed to have been carved in memory of the valiant horned steers who lugged the cathedral's masonry up from the plains below. Inside, the effects are no less dramatic – the high white nave is lit by the dense ruby, sapphire and emerald tones of the stained glass, which at close range reveals the appealing scratchy, smoky quality of medieval glass.

Crowded in the cathedral's lee is a web of quiet, grey, eighteenth-century streets. One – rue Pourier – leads past the post office and onto the thirteenth-century Porte d'Ardon, which looks out over the southern part of the ville basse. A left turn at the post office along rue Ermant leads to the little twelfth-century octagonal Chapelle des Templiers – the Knights Templar – set in a secluded garden. Next door is the Musée de Laon, 32 rue Georges-Ermant (June–Sept Tues–Sun 11am–6pm; Oct–May Tues–Sun 2–6pm; €3.20), which contains a pitifully displayed collection of classical antiquities, albeit with some fine Grecian ceramics among them, and a jumble of furniture and paintings, including an acclaimed seventeenth-century work, Le Concert, by local lad Mathieu Le Nain. The rest of the ville haute, which rambles along the ridge to the west of the cathedral into the Le Bourg quarter around the early Gothic church of St-Martin, is enjoyable to wander round, with fine views from the ramparts.

Eating, drinking and entertainment

Simple snacks and basic meals can be had at the Brasserie du Parvis, which overlooks the west front of the cathedral (plats around €10); at Crêperie L'Agora, an inexpensive Breton place near the cathedral at 16 rue des Cordeliers (open until 1am; closed Sat lunch & Mon; menu €7.50); at La Bonne Heure, specializing in quiche-like tourtinettes (€6 each) at 53 rue Châtelaine; or at the lively Brasserie les Chenizelles, 1 rue du Bourg, the continuation of rue Châtelaine (menus from €13.50). Proper restaurants in Laon tend to be expensive: La Petite Auberge, the gourmets' favourite, at 45 bd Pierre-Brossolette in the ville basse near the station, falls into this category, serving traditional French cuisine using the freshest ingredients (menus from €23; ☎03.23.23.02.38, booking recommended; closed Sat lunch, Sun and Mon eve). They also own the bistro next door, which is slightly less pricey. There's also an excellent selection of wine shops, boulangeries and fromageries along pedestrianized rue Châtelaine, in the ville haute.

There's usually something going on at the Maison des Arts de Laon (MAL), based in a theatre on the place Aubry to the north of the cathedral – including a concentration of events during the Fêtes Médiévales de Laon held in late May. October sees a series of big-name classical concerts during the Festival de Laon, either in the cathedral or MAL venues (details from the tourist office), while for a week in June Laon plays host to hundreds of antique cars, which come and follow a circuit of the city and surrounding region (☎03.23.79.83.58 for details). Le Welcome, next door to MAL arts complex on the place, is an Irish-style bar and a good place for a drink.

Soissons and around

Half an hour by train, or 30km down the N2, southwest of Laon, SOISSONS can lay claim to a long and highly strategic history. Before the Romans arrived it was already a town, and in 486 AD it was here that the last Roman ruler, Syagrius, suffered a decisive defeat at the hands of Clovis the Frank, making Soissons one of the first real centres of the Frankish kingdom. Napoleon, too, considered it a crucial military base, a judgement borne out in the twentieth century by extensive war damage.

The town boasts the fine, if not well-known, Cathédrale Notre-Dame – thirteenth century for the most part with majestic glass and vaulting – at the west end of the main square, place F-Marquigny. More impressive still is the ruined Abbaye de St-Jean-des-Vignes, to the south of the cathedral down rue Panleu and then right down rue St-Jean. The facade of the tremendous Gothic abbey church rises sheer and grand, impervious to the now empty space behind it. The rest of the complex, save for remnants of a cloister and refectory (free to visit), was dismantled in 1804. Near the abbaye is the impressive eighteenth-century Hôtel de Ville with its grand stone gate.

Practicalities

Soissons is relatively compact. From the gare SNCF (with good services to Laon and Paris) the main square is a fifteen-minute walk away along avenue du Général-de-Gaulle, which becomes rue St-Martin. The gare routière is closer to the centre by the river on Le Mail; buses leave for Compiègne early in the morning, at lunchtime and at the end of the afternoon. The tourist office is on place F-Marquigny behind the cathedral (mid-June to mid-Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–6.30pm, Sun 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎03.23.53.17.37).

The town is more of a place to stop en route than to stay but if you're keen to explore the nearby forest or are just stuck, try the reasonably priced two-star hotel Terminus by the station at 56 av du Général-de-Gaulle (☎03.23.53.33.59; 📍; closed Sun & Aug), or the campsite (☎03.23.74.52.69), 1km from the station on avenue du Mail. An excellent place for galettes is La Galetière (closed Mon) at 1 rue du Beffroi by the cathedral, and there's a good Tunisian restaurant, the Sidi Bou, at 4 rue de la Bannière down towards the river.

Coucy-le-Château-Auffrique

About 30km west of Laon, and just over 15km north of Soissons, in hilly countryside on the far side of the forest of St-Gobain, lie the stragglng ruins of one of the greatest castles of the Middle Ages, Coucy-le-Château (daily: April & Sept 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; May–Aug 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; Oct–March Mon–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; €4.60). The castle's walls still stand, and encircle the attractive village of COUCY-LE-CHÂTEAU-AUFFRIQUE. In the past this was a seat of great power and the influence of its lords, the Sires de Coucy, rivalled and often even exceeded that of the king – “King I am not, neither Prince, Duke nor Count. I am the Sire of Coucy” was Enguerrand III's proud boast. The retreating Germans capped the destruction of World War I battles by blowing up the castle's keep as they left in 1917, but enough remains, crowning a wooded spur, to be extremely evocative.

Enter the village through one of three original gates, squeezed between powerful, round flanking towers – there's a footpath all around the outside which is open even when the castle is closed. A small museum, the Tour de Coucy Musée Panorama (daily: May–Sept 2.30–6.30pm; Oct–April 2.30–6pm; free), in the tower at the Porte de Soissons on the south side of the walled part of town, has a display of photographs showing how it looked pre-1917, which can be compared with today's remains from the vantage point of the roof.

Practicalities

It's hard to get to Coucy-le-Château without a car, though several Laon–Soissons trains stop at Anizy-Pinon – which cuts the distance by about half and there is an infrequent bus to or from Soissons. The tourist office is in the central square (May–Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; Sept–April Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎03.23.52.44.55), just north of the Porte de Soissons. There are so many medieval spectacles offered in this magical non-Disney town that checking ☞www.coucy.com in advance of your visit to book some tickets is highly recommended.

Staying the night here, especially if you have children, is something special. For accommodation, try the Hôtel Le Belle Vue within the walls, although the bedrooms have seen better days (☎03.23.52.69.70, ☞www.hotel-bellevue-coucy.com; 📍; closed last week Dec); its restaurant specializes in Picardy cuisine (menus from €20), and serves special “medieval” meals (€17) on certain summer nights, when medieval re-enactments are held across the city.

Compiègne and around

Thirty-eight kilometres west of Soissons lies COMPIÈGNE, whose reputation as a tourist centre rests on the presence of a vast royal palace, built at the edge of the Forêt de Compiègne in order that generations of French kings could play at “being peasants”, in Louis XIV's words. Although the town itself is a bit of a one-horse place with a bland, Sunday-afternoon feel, it's worth a visit for the opulent palace interiors, and a good base for walks in the surrounding forest and a day-trip to the cathedral town of Noyon.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gares routière and SNCF are adjacent to each other, just a few minutes' walk away from the centre of town: cross the wide River Oise and go up rue Solférino to place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville. The tourist office (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9.15am–12.15pm & 1.45–6.15pm, Sun 10am–12.15pm & 2.15–5pm; Oct–March Mon 1.45–5.15pm, Tues–Sat 9.15am–12.15pm & 1.45–5.15pm, Sun 10am–12.15pm & 2.15–5pm; ☎03.44.40.01.00) takes up part of the ornate Hôtel de Ville. It offers free hotel bookings, and will provide you with a plan of the town, on which is conveniently marked an exhaustive visitors' route, including the forest paths (see p.270).

As for accommodation, there are cheap rooms at the Hôtel St-Antoine, 17 rue de Paris (☎03.44.23.22.27; 📍), concealed above a Chinese restaurant. A little more expensive but much more comfortable is the Hôtel Vega, 4 rue du Général-Leclerc (☎03.44.23.32.17; 📍). Hôtel de Flandre, at 16 quai de la République (☎03.44.83.24.40, 🌐hoteldeflandre.com; ①–③), has some good-value, simple top-floor rooms with hall showers and is near the train station overlooking the river.

The Town

Compiègne itself is plain disappointing, though that shouldn't come as a surprise, as a platoon of German soldiers burnt it down in 1942 to provide their commander with evidence of a subjugated community. Fortunately, however, they spared the town's star attraction, the large and opulent Palais National, with its extensive gardens, which make excellent picnicking ground. The seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Palais stands two blocks east of the Hôtel de Ville (see below) on rue des Minimes, and for all its pompous excess, inspires a certain fascination, particularly its interior, which can only be visited on a guided tour (March–Oct 10am–6pm; Nov–Feb 10am–4.30pm; €4.50, €5.50 for combined ticket with the Musée de la Voiture). The lavishness of Marie-Antoinette's rooms, the sheer vulgar sumptuousness of the First and Second Empire and the evidence of the unseemly haste with which Napoleon I moved in, scarcely a dozen years after the Revolution, are impressive. The palace also houses the Musée du Second Empire and the Musée de la Voiture (same hours as Palais National but closed on Tuesday; €4, €5.50 combined ticket), the latter containing a wonderful array of antique bicycles, tricycles and fancy aristocratic carriages, as well as the world's first steam coach. The Théâtre Impérial, planned (but never finished) by Napoléon III, was finally completed in 1991 at a cost of some thirty million francs. Originally designed with just two seats for Napoléon and his wife, it now seats 900 and is regularly used for concerts.

If you don't want to take the guided tour, a visit to the palace gardens or petit parc (daily: summer 7.30am–8pm; winter 8am–6.30pm) is a pleasant alternative. Much of the formal French-style gardens were replaced with a jardin à l'Angletterre during the first Empire, which explains the long, lightly landscaped avenue which extends far into the Forêt de Compiègne (see p.270) on the edge of town.

The centre of town is much less picturesque, though several half-timbered buildings remain on the pedestrianized rue Napoléon and rue des Lombards, south of the main place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville. The Hôtel de Ville itself – Louis XII Gothic – has ebullient nineteenth-century statuary including the image of Joan of Arc, who was captured in this town by the Burgundians before being handed to the English.

By the side of the town hall is the Musée de la Figurine Historique (Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; closes at 5pm in winter; €2), which features reputedly the world's largest collection of military figurines in mock-up battles from ancient Greece to World War II. Also of specialist interest is the Musée Vivenel, on rue d'Austerlitz (same hours and price), which has one of the best collections of Greek vases in the world, notably a series illustrating the Panathenaic Games from Italy; it's a welcome dose of classical restraint and good taste compared with the palace. There's also a section on the flora and fauna of the Forêt de Compiègne, which includes a wild boar the size of an armoured car.

Eating and drinking

Compiègne lacks a wide variety of good places to eat. Notable places include: Le Cordelier, 1 rue des Cordeliers (from €14, ☎03.44.40.23.38; closed all day Mon plus Sun and Tues eves), and Le Bistrot de Flandre, 2 rue d'Amiens, next to the hotel of the same name. Next to the Hôtel des Beaux-Arts, at 35 cours Guynever, is one of Compiègne's best restaurants, the Bistrot des Arts, serving traditional bistro food with a twist, accompanied by excellent wines, for around €25 a head (☎03.44.20.10.10; closed Sat lunch and Sun). Le Saint Clair, 6 rue des Lombards (☎03.44.40.58.18; from €12), guarantees a good meal, a comprehensive selection of Belgian beers and a warm welcome for gay travellers. There is an Internet café, L'évasion at 5 rue St-Martin. On Saturdays, there's a big all-day market in the square by place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville.

The Forêt de Compiègne and the Clairière de l'Armistice

Very ancient, and cut by a succession of hills, streams and valleys, the Forêt de Compiègne, with the GR12 running through it, is ideal for walkers and cyclists. East of Compiègne, some 6km into the forest and not far from the banks of the Aisne, is a green and sandy clearing guarded by cypress trees, known as the Clairière de l'Armistice. Here, in what was then a rail siding for rail-mounted artillery, World War I was brought to an end on November 11, 1918. A plaque commemorates the deed: "Here the criminal pride of the German empire was brought low, vanquished by the free peoples whom it had sought to enslave." To avenge this humiliation, Hitler had the French sign their capitulation on June 22, 1940, on the same spot, in the very same rail carriage. The original car was taken immediately to Berlin, then destroyed by fire in the last days of the war. Its replacement, housed in a small museum (daily except Tues: April–Sept 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–March 9am–noon & 2–5.30pm; €3), is similar, and the objects inside are the originals.

Vieux-Moulin and St-Jean-aux-Bois are picturesque villages worth heading for right in the heart of the forest, the latter retaining part of its twelfth-century fortifications; while 13km southeast of Compiègne at PIERREFONDS there's a classic medieval château (May–Aug 10am–6.30pm; Sept–April 10am–1pm 2–5.30pm; €6.50), built in the twelfth century, and heavily restored since, to make it into a model castle – a fantastic fairy-tale affair of turrets, towers and moat. The inside is unfurnished but displays some beautiful tapestries.

Noyon

Further up the Oise, and a possible day-trip from Compiègne, is NOYON, another of Picardy's cathedral towns. Its quiet provinciality belies a long, illustrious history, first as a Roman prefecture, then as seat of a bishopric from 531. Here, in 768, Charlemagne was crowned king of Neustria, largest of the Frankish kingdoms; in 987, Hugues Capet was crowned king of France; and John Calvin was born here in 1509.

Rowing along the Oise on his Inland Journey of 1876, Robert Louis Stevenson stopped briefly at Noyon, which he described as "a stack of brown roofs at the best, where I believe people live very respectably in a quiet way". It's still like that, though the cathedral, to which Stevenson warmed, is impressive, at least in passing. Spacious and a little stark, it successfully blends Romanesque and Gothic, and is flanked by the ruins of thirteenth-century cloisters and a strange, exquisitely shaped Renaissance library that contains a ninth-century illuminated Bible (only open to the public on the two days of the year, normally the third weekend of September, known as jours du patrimoine). On the south side of the cathedral, the old episcopal palace now houses the Musée du Noyonnais (Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Nov–March closes 5pm; €2.50), a small, well-presented collection of local archeological finds and cathedral treasure. Close by, signs direct you to the Musée Calvin (same hours; €2.50), ostensibly on the site of the reformer's birthplace. The respectable citizens of Noyon were never among their local boy's adherents and tore down the original building long before its tourist potential was appreciated.

The tourist office is in the Hôtel de Ville on place Bertrand Labarre (Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6.15pm, closed Mon morning; in summer also open Sun 10am–noon; ☎03.44.44.21.88, 🌐www.noyon.com). The best accommodation option is Le St Eloi, at 81 bd Carnot (☎03.44.44.01.49, 🌐www.hotelsainteloi.fr; 🍴; restaurant €23), just off the roundabout between the train station and the cathedral. The nearest campsite, La Montagne (☎03.44.76.98.29, ☎03.44.76.98.29; open all year), is 5km out of town along the N32 to Compiègne. Local buses leave from outside the gare SNCF. Big days in Noyon are Saturday morning, when a colourful market spills out across place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville, and the first Tuesday of the month, when a livestock market takes over virtually the entire town centre.

Champagne and the Ardennes

The bubbly stuff is the reason why most people visit Champagne. The cultivation of vines was already well established in Roman times, when Reims was the capital of the Roman province of Belgae (Belgium), and by the seventeenth century still wines from the region had gained a considerable reputation. Contrary to popular myth, however, it was not Dom Pérignon, cellar master of the Abbaye de Hautvillers near Épernay, who then “invented” champagne. He was probably responsible for the innovation of mixing grapes from different vineyards but the wine's well-known tendency to re-ferment within the bottle was not controllable until eighteenth-century glass-moulding techniques (developed in Britain) produced sufficiently strong vessels to contain the natural effervescence.

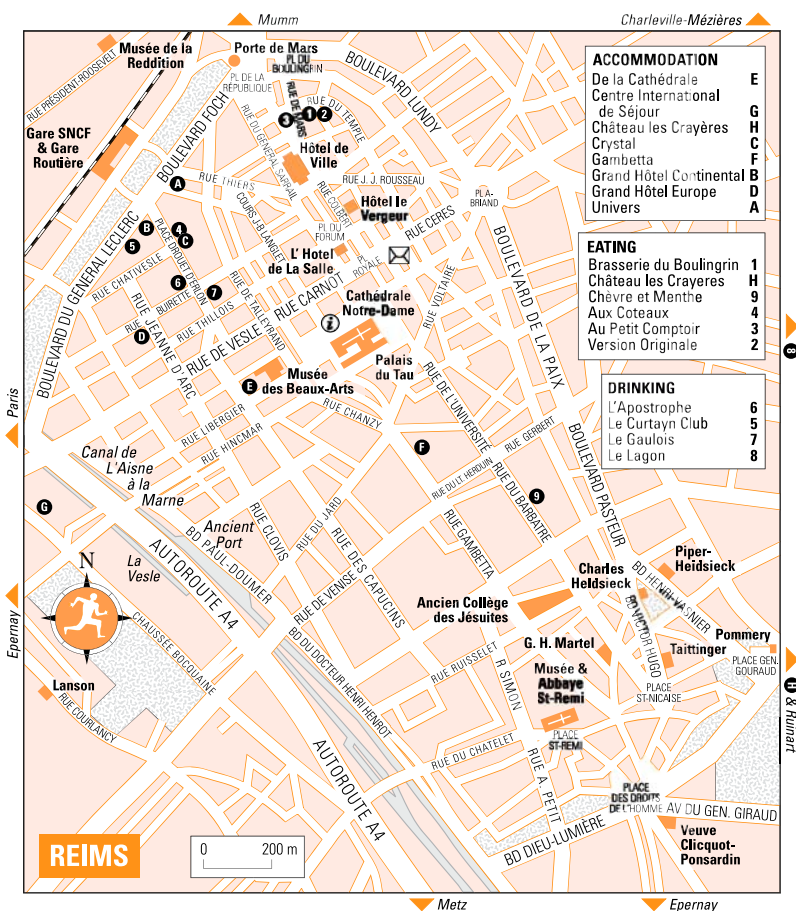

Away from the vineyards with their serried ranks of vines, the region's rolling plains are an uninspiring sight, growing more wheat and cabbages per hectare than any other region of France, though it seems to bring the villages no great benefit. Some places look so run-down it looks like the shutters would fall off if you popped a paper bag.

At least the official capital of Champagne, the cathedral city of Reims, is worth a visit, and has a reasonably full cultural calendar. Some of the most extravagant champagne houses are found here, the caves beneath them notable for their vaulted ceilings and kilometres of bottles. Épernay, a smaller town surrounded by vineyards, is the scenic heart of the region. The champagne maisons here are not hidden among city streets but set aside on their own avenue, enabling visitors to float from one house to another like so many bubbles. Across the plains, neither Châlons-en-Champagne nor the smaller further-flung towns like Chaumont or Langres, dotted along the Marne towards its source, are much of an incentive to break your journey. The only real attraction in the rest of the region is the town of Troyes, some way off to the southwest. Smaller than Reims, it's a great place to stay to stroll through the cobbled streets, admire the city's ancient timbered houses, to sample some excellent food (though visitors won't find much in the way of sparkling wine here), and to buy inexpensive clothing.

Reims

Laid flat by the bombs of World War I, REIMS (pronounced like a nasal "Rance", and traditionally spelled Rheims in English) may give the first impression of being a large industrial centre with little to redeem it. Despite appearances however, the city centre is a walkable size, while lurking beneath its dull streets lie its real treasure – kilometre upon kilometre of bottles of fermenting champagne. Moreover,

Champagne: the facts

Nowhere else in France, let alone the rest of the world, are you allowed to make a drink called champagne, though many people do all the same, calling it “champan”, “shampanskoye” and all manner of variants. You can blend grape juice harvested from chalk-soil vineyards, double-ferment it, store the result for years at the requisite constant temperature and high humidity in sweating underground caves, turn and tilt the bottles little by little to clear the sediment, add some vintage liqueur, and finally produce a bubbling golden (or pink) liquid; but in accordance with national and international trade law you may refer to it only as the “méthode champenoise”. It’s perhaps an outrageous monopoly guarded to keep the region’s sparkling wines in the luxury class, although the locals will tell you the difference comes from the squid fossils in the chalk, the lay of the land and its critical climate, the evolution of the grapes, the regulated pruning methods and the legally enforced quantity of juice pressed.

Three authorized grape varieties are used in champagne: chardonnay, the only white grape, growing best on the Côte des Blancs and contributing a light and elegant element; pinot noir, grown mainly on the Montagne de Reims slopes, giving body and long life; and pinot meunier, cultivated primarily in the Marne valley, adding flowery aromas.

The vineyards are owned either by maisons, who produce the grande marque champagne, or by small cultivators called vignerons, who sell the grapes to the maisons. The vignerons also make their own champagne and will happily offer you a glass and sell you a bottle at two-thirds the price of a grande marque (ask at any tourist office in the Champagne region for a list of addresses). The difference between the two comes down to capital. The maisons can afford to blend grapes from anything up to sixty different vineyards and to tie up their investment while their champagne matures for several years longer than the legal minimum (one year for non-vintage, three years vintage). So the wine they produce is undoubtedly superior – and not a lot cheaper here than in a good discount off-licence/liquor store in Britain or the US.

If you could visit the head offices of Cartier or Dior, the atmosphere would probably be similar to that in the champagne maisons, whose palaces are divided between Épernay and Reims. Visits to the handful of maisons that organize regular guided tours are not free, and some require appointments, but don’t be put off – their staff all speak English and a generous dégustation is nearly always thrown in. Their audiovisuals and (cold) cellar tours are on the whole very informative, and do more than merely plug brand names. Local tourist offices can provide full lists of addresses and times of visits.

If you want to work on the harvest, contact any of the smaller maisons direct; the Agence Nationale pour l’Emploi, Cour de la Gare, Épernay (☎03.26.54.88.29), or 40 rue de Talleyrand, Reims (☎03.26.89.52.60); or try the hostel in Verzy, 22km from Reims, at 16 rue du Bassin (☎03.26.97.90.10), where casual workers are often recruited and work is advertised.

beyond its status as champagne capital of the world, Reims possesses one of the most impressive Gothic cathedrals in France – formerly the coronation church of dynasties of French monarchs going back to Clovis, first king of the Franks. For those interested in the field of education and/or Roman Catholicism, Reims is the birthplace of St Jean-Baptiste de la Salle, the patron saint of educators and home to the world’s main museum on his life.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The cathedral is less than ten minutes’ walk from the gare SNCF and gare routière. The tourist office, 2 rue Guillaume-de-Machault (Easter to mid-Oct Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–6pm; mid-Oct to Easter Mon–Sat

Museum pass

If you're planning to visit more than one of Reims' museums, a museum pass (€3) from the tourist office gives entry to the Musée des Beaux-Arts, Musée St-Remi, Ancien Collège des Jésuites and the Musée de la Reddition. Alternatively €12 will buy you, in addition to the museum pass, a one-day bus pass, a visit and dégustation at one of the champagne houses, and a some biscuits roses de Reims, pink champagne biscuits traditionally dunked in a glass of bubbly. Private tours are offered by the tourist office and range in price from €5 to €15.

9am–6pm, Sun 10am–5pm; ☎ 03.26.77.45.00, 🌐 www.tourisme.fr/reims,, is located next door to the cathedral in a picturesque ruin. Reliable Internet access is available at Clique et Croque, a cybercafé serving snacks throughout the day, located in a shopping gallery at 27 rue de Vesle (Mon–Sat 10am–12.30am, Sun 2–9pm).

Rooms are at city sizes and prices in Reims, which is to say, smaller and more costly than anywhere in the surrounding region, but they are fairly easy to come by. Bear in mind too that Reims is an easy day-trip from Épernay or Paris, so it may not be necessary to stay at all.

Hotels

De la Cathédrale 20 rue Libergier

☎ 03.26.47.28.46, 🌐 hoteldelacathedrale

@orange.fr. Old-fashioned but comfortable two-star near, as the name suggests, the cathedral. Ⓜ

Château Les Crayères 64 bd Henry-Vasnier

☎ 03.26.82.80.80, 🌐 www.gerardboyer.com. Ideal for a very special occasion, this refined hotel in a restored eighteenth-century château is a member of Relais & Châteaux. It has a beautiful garden, luxurious rooms and impeccable service, as well as one of the region's most sophisticated restaurants (see p.278). Ⓜ

Crystal 86 place Drouet-d'Erlon ☎ 03.26.88.44.44,

🌐 www.hotel-crystal.fr. Small rooms, pleasant service and a small courtyard which blocks out much of noise from the lively street below. Ⓜ

Gambetta 13 rue Gambetta ☎ 03.26.47.22.00,

☎ 03.26.47.22.43. Neat, well-designed, modern rooms, all with shower and toilet above an excellent restaurant, Le Vonelly. Ⓜ

Grand Hôtel Continental 93 place Drouet-d'Erlon

☎ 03.26.40.39.35, 🌐 www.grandhotelcontinental.com.

Well-situated hotel, with quiet rooms, all with bathroom and TV. Ⓜ

Grand Hôtel Europe 29 rue Buirette

☎ 03.26.47.39.39, 🌐 www.hotel-europe-reims.com.

A quiet fin-de-siècle four-storey three-star. Ⓜ

Univers 41 bd Foch ☎ 03.26.88.68.08, 🌐 www

.hotel-univers-reims.com Handsomely located on the tree-lined Hautes Promenades, this smart neo-Art Deco-style establishment, with double-glazing, is the best mid-range hotel in the city. Ⓜ

Hostel

Centre International de Séjour 1 chaussée

Bocquaine, Parc Léo Lagrange ☎ 03.26.40.52.60,

🌐 www.cis-reims.com. A large, well-run HI hostel with single (€28 with shower, €18 without) or double rooms (€16 per person with bath, €12 without). Either take bus H to "Pont de Gaulle", or it's a fifteen-minute walk from the station on the other side of the canal: cross over the big roundabout in front of the station, turn right down bd du Général-Leclerc to Pont de Vesle; chaussée Bocquaine is the first left after the bridge. Bike hire available.

The City

The old centre of Reims stretches from the cathedral and its adjacent episcopal palace north to place de la République's triumphal Roman arch, the Porte de Mars, punctuated by the grand squares of place Royale, place du Forum and place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville. To the south, about fifteen minutes' walk from the cathedral, is the other historical focus of the town, the Abbaye St-Remi, and nearby the Jesuits' College. To the east of here are most of the champagne maisons and, further east still, a museum of cars.

The cathedral and around

The thirteenth-century Cathédrale Notre-Dame (daily 7.30am–7.30pm) features prominently in French history: in 1429 Joan of Arc succeeded in getting the Dauphin crowned here as Charles VII – an act of immense significance when France was more or less wiped off the map by the English and their allies. In all, 26 kings of France were crowned in the Gothic glory of this edifice.

The lure of the cathedral's interior is the kaleidoscopic patterns in the stained glass, with fantastic Marc Chagall designs in the east chapel and champagne processes glorified in the south transept. But the greatest appeal is outside: an inexplicable joke runs around the restored but still badly mutilated statuary on the west front – the giggling angels who seem to be responsible for disseminating the prank are a delight. Not all the figures on the cathedral's west front are originals – some have been removed to spare them further erosion and are now at the former bishop's palace, the Palais du Tau. The towers of the cathedral are open to the public (April to Sept daily 10–11am & 2–5pm; Oct–March Sat & Sun 10–11am & 2–5pm; €4.60, or combined ticket with the Palais du Tau €7.50); as well as a walk round the transepts and chevet, you get to see inside the framework of the cathedral roof; tickets available from the Palais du Tau.

At the Palais du Tau (daily: May–Aug 9.30am–6.30pm; Sept–April 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; €6.10, or combined ticket with the towers €7.50), next door to the cathedral, you can appreciate the expressiveness of the statuary from close up – a view that would never have been possible in their intended monumental positions on the cathedral. Apart from the grinning angels, there is also a superb Eve, shifflily clutching the monster of sin, while embroidered tapestries of the Song of Songs line the walls. The palace also preserves, in a state of unlikely veneration, the paraphernalia of Charles X's coronation in 1824, right down to the dauphin's hat box.

Just west of the cathedral on rue Chanzy, the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues & public hols 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3) is the city's principal art museum, which, though ill-suited to its ancient building, effectively covers French art from the Renaissance to the present. Few of the works are among the particular artists' best but the collection does contain one of David's replicas of his famous Marat death scene, a set of 27 Corots, two great Gauguin still lifes, and some beautifully observed sixteenth-century German portraits.

Just north of the cathedral, L'Hôtel de La Salle (daily except Sun 9am–noon & 2.30–6pm; ☎03.26.47.73.21; 1hr guided tour), 4bis rue de l'Arbalète, was the birthplace in 1651 of St Jean-Baptiste de la Salle, the patron saint of teachers. Built in 1545, the building retains some original features and houses a private museum illuminating the revolutionary pedagogical methods of this inspirational educator, as well as some personal effects, including his cilice. De La Salle founded the first-ever teacher training college, and his educational ventures led to the foundation of the order known as the De La Salle Brothers, or Christian Brothers, today active in some 87 countries. Five minutes' north of the cathedral, there's another museum in the Musée-Hôtel Le Vergeur, 36 place du Forum (Tues–Sun 2–6pm; €3.90). It's a stuffed treasure house of all kinds of beautiful objects, including two sets of Dürer engravings – an Apocalypse and Passion of Christ – but you have to go through a long guided tour of the whole works. By the museum there's access to sections of the partly submerged arcades of the crypto portique Gallo-Romain (mid-June to mid-Sept Tues–Sun 2–5pm; free), which date back to 200 AD. Reims' other Roman monument, the quadruple-arched Porte de Mars, on place de la République, belongs to the same era.

West of the Porte, behind the station in rue Franklin-Roosevelt, is the Musée de la Reddition ("Museum of Surrender"); daily except Tues & public hols 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3), based around an old schoolroom that served as Eisenhower's HQ from February 1945. In the early hours of May 7, 1945, General Jodl agreed to the unconditional surrender of the German army here, thus ending World War II in Europe. The room has been left exactly as it was (minus the ashtrays and carpet), with the Allies' battle maps on the walls. The visit includes a good documentary film and numerous photographs and press cuttings.

The Abbaye St-Remi, Jesuits' College and surrounding museums

Most of the early French kings were buried in Reims' oldest building, the eleventh-century Basilique St-Remi, fifteen minutes' walk from the cathedral on rue Simon (Mon–Wed, Fri & Sun 8am–dusk, Thurs & Sat 9am–dusk, closed

Champagne tasting in Reims

Tours of the Reims champagne houses and caves range from the Disney-esque to the extremely technical. A tour at an appointment-only house does not necessarily guarantee personal attention – central houses such as Pommery and Veuve Cliquot often host quite large groups. Those in the southern part of town near the Abbaye St-Remi tend to have the most impressive cellars – some have been carved in cathedral-esque formations from the Gallo-Roman quarries used to build the city, long before champagne was invented.

Non-appointment houses

G. H. Martel & Co 17 rue des Créneaux, near the Basilique St-Remi ☎03.26.82.70.67, 🌐www.champagnemartel.com. At €4.50, this is the best-value tour, with a dégustation of three champagnes including a vintage and a rosé. Though the cellars are average, in the caves there is a display of the old tools used for each step of the process, and the tour can be truly informative as you're likely to have a small group. Open daily year round (10am–7pm), this is a good option when most other houses are closed (over lunch or after 5pm).

Mumm 34 rue du Champ-de-Mars ☎03.26.49.59.70, 🌐www.mumm.com. Known by its red-slashed Cordon Rouge label, Mumm's un-French-sounding name is the legacy of its founders, affluent German wine-makers from the Rhine Valley who established the business in 1827. The tour is fairly informal – you can wander freely about its cellar museum and throw questions at the approachable guides – though you pick up the basics from a corny pre-tour video. It all ends with a generous glass of either Cordon Rouge, the populist choice; the sweeter Cordon Vert; or their Extra Dry. March–Oct daily 9–11am & 2–5pm; Nov–Feb by appointment only; tour 45min; €7.50–18 depending on what you taste.

Piper-Heidsieck 51 bd Henry-Vasnier ☎03.26.84.43.44, 🌐www.piper-heidsieck.com. At twenty minutes, and complete with animated characters, this is something of a Mickey Mouse tour. Although founded in 1785, Piper is better known in the New World than the Old, having been the champagne of the American movie industry since first appearing – with Laurel and Hardy – in the 1934 classic Sons of the Desert. The only folk who'll get anything out of the tour – which ends up at a gallery of celebrity snaps – are confirmed film buffs and lovers of tackiness: the antique caves are toured in a five-seater shuttle resembling a ghost train; out of the darkness and timed to a cliché-ridden narration loom giant fibreglass grapes and life-size lumpy figures positioned as cellar masters. You emerge to a much-needed drink. March–Dec daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; tariff starts at €7.50 for one tasting.

Taittinger 9 place St-Nicaise ☎03.26.85.84.33, 🌐www.taittinger.com. Similar to Mumm's tour, with information on the making of champagne and a stroll through the during services; music & light show July–Sept Sat 9.30pm; free), part of a former Benedictine abbey named after the 22-year-old bishop who baptized Clovis and 3000 of his warriors. An immensely spacious building, with aisles wide enough to drive a bus along, it preserves its Romanesque transept walls and ambulatory chapels, some of them with modern stained glass that works beautifully. The spectacular abbey buildings alongside the church house the Musée St-Remi (Mon–Fri 2–6.30pm, Sat & Sun 2–7pm; €1.50), the city's archeological and historical museum, whose eclectic collection includes some fine tapestries on St Remi's life, plus sixteenth-century weapons and armour. Its twelfth- to thirteenth-century chapter house has been listed as a UNESCO World Heritage site.

The Ancien Collège des Jésuites (tours daily 10am, 11am, 2.15pm, 3.30pm & 4.45pm, Tues afternoon hours only, Sat & Sun morning hours only; €3), a ancient cellars, some of which have doodles and carvings added by more recent workers; there are also statues of St Vincent and St Jean, patron saints respectively of vignerons and cellar hands. Mid-March to mid-Nov daily 9.30am–1pm & 2–5.30pm; mid-Nov to mid-March Mon–Fri same hours, closed Sat & Sun; tour 1hr; €7.

Appointment-only houses

These houses prefer that you call or email a week in advance, but in summer you may often be able to walk right in, or at least just show up in the morning and reserve something for the afternoon. More upmarket hotels can make reservations, and some will offer discounts for tours as well. This is not a comprehensive list of all the maisons in the city, but includes the most visitor-friendly places. If the marque that's always on your table isn't listed here, it's worth looking the house up and calling – there's a good chance they'll be able to show you around.

Lanson 66 rue de Courlancy ☎03.26.78.50.50, 🌐www.lanson.fr. It's worth the trip across the river to tour the factory of the champagne of Tesco and Waitrose. Small and in-depth, the tours here actually bring you into the factory, and demonstrate the mechanized day-to-day process of champagne making. On most days you'll be able to see the machines degorging the bottles, as well as labelling and filling them in preparation for the second fermentation. A refreshing change from those houses that just talk about the process and show their cellars. Mon–Fri only, closed Aug; €7.

Pommery 5 place du Général-Gouraud ☎03.26.61.62.56, 🌐www.pommery.fr. The creator of the cute one-eighth size “Pop” bottles has excavated Roman quarries for its cellars – it claims to have been the first maison to do so. The tour descends a 116-step stairway into the cellars, which are a showcase for contemporary art and often a greater focus than the champagne itself. Tours 1hr–1hr 30min; €8.

Ruinart 4 rue des Crayères ☎03.26.77.51.51, 🌐www.ruinart.com. The fanciest of the champagne houses, in a swanky mansion. Reserved and upmarket, the tours are nonetheless informative. €11–36, depending on number of tastings.

Veuve Clicquot-Ponsardin 1 place des Droits-de-l'Homme ☎03.26.89.54.41, 🌐www.veuve-clicquot.com. In 1805 the prematurely widowed Mme Clicquot not only took over her husband's business – veuve means “widow” in French – but also later bequeathed it to her business manager rather than to her children, a radical break with tradition. She also took great interest not only in the business of champagne but in its fabrication, inventing the first riddling table – a method of settling sediment from the second fermentation in the bottles' necks that many houses still use. In keeping with its innovative past, the maison is one of the least pompous, and its caves some of the most spectacular, sited in ancient Gallo-Roman quarries, with high vaulted ceilings. Tours last 1hr 30min with tasting; from €7.50.

short walk north on rue du Grand-Cerf, was founded in Reims in 1606, and the building completed in 1678. Guided tours in French take you round the refectory, kitchens and, highlight of the visit, the beautifully ornate carved wooden fittings of the library. The books on the shelves are false and remain from the filming of La Reine Margot, for which they were made.

If you have even a passing interest in old cars you should make for the Musée de l'Automobile, 84 av Georges-Clemenceau (daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €6), fifteen minutes' walk southeast of the cathedral. All the vehicles are part of the private collection of Philippe Charbonneaux, designer of a number of the postwar classics on display. In addition to the full-scale cars, there's an impressive selection of models, antique toys and period posters.

Eating and drinking

Place Drouet-d'Erlon, a wide pedestrianized boulevard lined with bars and restaurants, is where you'll find most of the city's nightlife, such as it is. For self-catering, there's a big Wednesday and Saturday market in place du Boulingrin (6am–1pm).

Brasserie du Boulingrin 48 rue de Mars
 ☎ 03.26.40.96.22. Charming and good-value brasserie, dating back to 1925, famed for its seafood platters and fondant au chocolat. Weekday menus at €16 and €23, including wine. Open until midnight, closed Sun.

Château les Crayères 64 bd Henry-Vasnier
 ☎ 03.26.82.80.80. Reputed to be one of France's finest gastronomic restaurants – with prices and style to match. Closed Mon & Tues lunch; menus from €140.

Chèvre et Menthe 63 rue de Barbâtre
 ☎ 03.26.05.17.03. A homely, inexpensive establishment recommended for vegetarians with a range of gourmet salads from €5.50. Daily carte dishes (some contain meat) might include mous-saka (€7) as well as more traditional choices, plus the eponymous goat's cheese and fresh mint quiche. Closed Sun & Mon.

Aux Coteaux 86–88 place Drouet d'Erlon
 ☎ 03.26.47.08.79. The best of the many restaurants on this popular street, with a wide range of pizzas and salads from under €8. Closed Sun & Mon.

Au Petit Comptoir 17 rue de Mars
 ☎ 03.26.40.58.58. Close to the Marché du Boulingrin, with traditional and inventive dishes from €15 and a menu at €26, served in modern surroundings – a subtle grey decor with white leather chairs. Champagne by the glass. Closed Sun & Mon.

Version Originale 25bis rue du Temple
 ☎ 03.26.02.69.32. Creative, fresh menus with flavours from all over the world in a small restaurant with tasteful but informal decor. A great deal at lunchtime with menus at €14.50 and €17, à la carte only for dinner with mains from €14. Closed Sun.

Nightlife and entertainment

For drinking into the early hours there are plenty of large terrace cafés on place Drouet-d'Erlon; try Le Gaulois, at nos. 2–4, which serves excellent cocktails. One of the trendiest nightspots in town is L'Apostrophe at no. 59, for tapas, cocktails, special music nights and a designer decor. If you want to dance, try Le Curtayn Club at 7 bd Général-Leclerc (daily 10pm–4am ☎ 03.26.49.09.02) or Le Lagon at 1 rue de Nice (☎ 03.26.07.61.34), the best gay club in Reims.

Azimuth Productions (☎ 03.26.04.56.38) puts on a rock festival, Octob'Rock, every October, while the Opéra Cinema, 3 rue T.-Dubois (☎ 03.26.47.29.36), shows undubbed films. From July 1 to mid-August, over a hundred classical concerts – many of them free – take place as part of Les Flâneries Musicales d'Été; pick up a leaflet at the tourist office.

Épernay and around

ÉPERNAY is 26km south of Reims and a more attractive place to stay, beautifully situated below rolling, vine-covered hills, with opulent tree-lined streets. It's a small town but contains some of the most famous champagne maisons as well as several smaller houses. Épernay also makes an excellent base for exploring the surrounding villages and vineyards.

Arrival, information and accommodation

Épernay's gare SNCF is a five-minute walk north of place de la République, down rue Jean-Moët. The gare routière is on the corner of rues Dr-Verron and Dr-Rousseau one block northeast from place de la République. The tourist office is at 7 av de Champagne (Easter to mid-Oct Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sun 11am–4pm; mid-Oct to Easter Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–5.30pm; ☎03.26.53.33.00) and has information about a huge selection of guided tours ranging from minibuses to hot-air balloons. If you feel like roaming around the vineyards on a mountain bike (VTT), either independently or in an organized group, contact Bulleo, in Parc Roger Menu (☎03.26.53.35.60; from €10 per half day).

The best of the cheap hotels in Épernay is the excellent one-star St-Pierre, 1 rue Jeanne-d'Arc (☎03.26.54.40.80, ☎03.26.57.88.68; 📍), in a quiet street away from the centre. More comfortable rooms are to be had at the excellent-value Les Berceaux, at 13 rue des Berceaux (☎03.26.55.28.84, 🌐www.lesberceaux.com; 📍), which also has one of the best restaurants in town (see p.280); or failing that the Best Western-run Hôtel de Champagne, 30 rue E.-Mercier (☎03.26.53.10.60, 🌐www.bw-hotel-champagne.com; 📍). Classiest of all in town is the elegant Clos Raymi, 3 rue Joseph-de-Venoge (☎03.26.51.00.58, 🌐www.closraymi-hotel.com; 📍), in a beautiful red-brick house once belonging to the Chandon family. For even more luxurious accommodation out of town, head for the Royal Champagne, 5km north on the N2051 to Champillon, (☎03.26.52.87.11, 🌐www.royalchampagne.com; 📍), which has luxurious rooms with vineyard views (see also p.280). At the opposite end of the scale, the local campsite is 2km to the north on route de Cumières in the Parc des Sports, on the south bank of the Marne (☎03.26.55.32.14; closed Oct–May).

The Town

The first place to head for in Épernay is the appropriately named avenue de Champagne, running east from the central place de la République. Dubbed “the most drinkable street in the world” by champagne-lover Winston Churchill, it's worth a stroll for its impressive eighteenth- and nineteenth-century mansions and champagne maisons.

The largest, and probably the most famous maison of all, though neither the most beautiful nor necessarily the most interesting to tour, is Moët et Chandon, 20 av de Champagne (9.30–11.30am & 2–4.30pm; mid-Nov to March closed Sat & Sun; €8 including dégustation of the brut Impérial); one of the keystones of the LVMH (Louis Vuitton, Moët and Hennessy) empire which owns Mercier, Veuve Clicquot, Krug and Ruinart, and a variety of other concerns, including Dior perfumes. The house is also the creator of the iconic Dom Pérignon label. The tour is rather generic, beginning with a mawkish video, followed by a walk through the cellars, which are adorned with mementos of Napoleon (a good friend of the original M. Moët), and concluding with a tasting of their truly excellent champagne.

Just next door at no. 26 is Perrier Jouët (Mon–Fri 9–11.15am & 2–4.15pm, tour with tasting of the cuvée Belle Époque €9; call or email in advance for more expensive vineyard tours ☎03.26.53.38.07; 🌐www.perrier-jouet.com). Another upmarket brand, its belle-époque bottles are recognizable by the flowers painted on the exterior. The maison is beautiful, full of Art Nouveau furniture, paintings, and stained glass to match its bottles, while the tour here is much more personalized than at Moët et Chandon. At the other end of the scale, Esterlin, just across the street at 25 av de Champagne (daily 10am–noon & 2–5pm; free) will sit you down with a glass of free champagne in front of a ten-minute video, no questions asked.

Further up the street, Mercier, at 70 av de Champagne, runs a fairly rewarding tour around its cellars in an electric train (mid-March to mid-Nov 9.30–11.30am & 2–4.30pm; €6.50, including dégustation). Nowadays Mercier is known as the lower-end champagne of French supermarkets, showing that M. Mercier was successful in his goal: he founded the house, aged 20, in 1858 with a plan to make champagne more accessible to the French people. In 1889 he carted a giant barrel that held 200,000 bottles' worth to the Paris Exposition, with the help of 24 oxen – only to be upstaged by the Eiffel Tower. The barrel is on display in the lobby – you can drop in to see it without taking the tour.

Castellane, by the station at 57 rue de Verdun (March–Dec daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €7 including dégustation), provides Épernay with its chief landmark: a tower looking like a kind of Neoclassical signal box. As well as the inevitable cellars, the visit shows off the working assembly lines that fill the champagne bottles, and the huge vats that hold the grape juice prior to fermentation. After the tour you can wander the little museum freely and climb the tower, which reveals a great view of the surrounding vineyards.

Épernay has a few other grandes maisons that can be visited by appointment, but perhaps more worthwhile are the many smaller houses. Since these houses have fewer employees it's best to call or email well in advance. Two which offer tours with dégustation, as well as visits to their vineyards, are located on rue Chaude-Ruelle, west of avenue de Champagne, with views over the town: Leclerc-Briant is at no. 67 (☎03.26.54.45.33, 🌐www.leclercbriant.com). For €8 they give a tour of their presshouse, museum and cellars, as well as a tasting of three vintages and a souvenir champagne glass. Janisson-Baradon is across the street at no. 65 (☎03.26.54.45.85, 🌐www.champagne-janisson.com), and offers personalized tours and tastings for €7.

Eating and drinking

Restaurants in Épernay are not generally cheap but there is superb value to be had at Les Berceaux, 13 rue des Berceaux (☎03.26.55.28.84; closed Mon, Tues & last two weeks of August; menus from €30), which also has a wine bar. La Table Kobus, 3 rue Dr-Rousseau, is highly recommended for its traditional French cuisine (☎03.26.51.53.53; €25). There are several cheaper places on rue Gambetta, between the gare and place de la République: call in advance to squeeze into La Cave à Champagne at no. 16 (☎03.26.55.50.70; from €15), or stop in for inexpensive Italian at Le Rimini across the street at no. 17. For a major blowout, the Royal Champagne, north of town (see p.279), serves a surprise dégustation menu at €95, weekday lunchtime menus from €25, and evening menus from €50.

Around Épernay

The villages in the appealing vineyards of the Montagne de Reims, Côte des Blancs and Vallée de la Marne which surround Épernay promote a range of curiosities: the world's largest champagne bottle and cork in Mardeuil; the world's largest champagne glass and an artisan chocolate producer in Pierry; a snail farm in Olizy-Violaine; a museum of marriage in Oger; and a traditional vigneron's house and early twentieth-century school room at Oeuilly. Many of the villages have conserved their sleepy old stone charm: Vertus, 16km south of Épernay, is particularly pretty, and so too is Hautvillers, 6km north of town, where you can see the abbey of Dom Pérignon fame (though it is unfortunately closed to the public).

The best reason for taking yourself out into the countryside, though, is simply to view the vines and taste less well known but often delicious champagnes. One such house is Charlier & Fils, set in an attractive maison surrounded by flowers at 4 rue des Pervenches, MONTIGNY-SOUS-CHATILLON, 15km west of Épernay (☎03.26.58.35.18, 🌐www.champagne-charlier.com). For a champagne experience a bit more down-to-earth than Épernay, head to 🏠 J. Desautels Père et Fils, 13 rue de la Côte, OGER (☎03.26.57.54.75), where twelve generations of the Desautels family have passed the vineyard from father to son; Jérôme, the present "J", will personally show you how he turns the bottles and tell the story of how the big champagne houses depend on smaller growers such as he and his family. For a more upmarket tasting, make an appointment at the Château de Bligny, in the village of BLIGNY (☎03.25.27.40.11) where you can even organize a private meal in their dining room.

For somewhere to stay that offers a real treat in an atmosphere of faded elegance, base yourself at 🏠 Château d'Étoges, 4 rue Richebourg, Étoges (☎03.26.59.30.08, 🌐www.etoges.com; 📍). This small château, which was regularly frequented by eighteenth-century French monarchs, offers twenty bedrooms full of individual character and a top-notch restaurant.

Troyes

It is easy to find charm in the leaning medieval half-timbered houses and many churches of TROYES, the ancient capital of the Champagne region. The town also offers top-quality museums and shopping outlets, and is the best place around to try the regional speciality, andouillette (see p.224).

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare SNCF and gare routière are side by side off boulevard Carnot (part of the ring road). Not all buses use the main station, though, and if you're heading for the outlet stores or the countryside it's best to check first with the tourist office (🌐www.tourisme-troyes.com). There are two branches: the station branch is at 16 bd Carnot (Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; ☎03.25.82.62.70); and the town-centre branch is on rue Mignard facing the Église St-Jean (April, May & mid-Sept to Oct Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon and 2–5pm; July to mid-Sept daily 10am–7pm; Nov–March closed; ☎03.25.73.36.88). For information concerning the Aube département, of which Troyes is the capital, consult 🌐www.aube-champagne.com or visit the Aube tourist office on place de la Libération (Mon–Fri 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm). If you want to rent a car try ADA at 2, rue Voltaire near the station (☎03.25.73.41.68).

Places to stay around the station are plentiful, though for not much more you can find accommodation right in the centre of the old town. Outside term-time there may be room in the city's foyers for longer stays – the tourist office

Museum pass

The museum pass (€12) to visit all of the city's museums is well worth the fee if you plan to visit the Musée d'Art Moderne, La Maison de l'Outil et de la Pensée Ouvrière and one other. It also includes a dégustation of two champagnes from a local shop, an hour's free parking, thirty minutes of Internet use, and discount vouchers for the factory outlets. It's only valid for one visit to each establishment, but can be used over the course of a year. Buy it from the tourist office or in any of the city's museums. It's worth noting as well that all the museums are free for those under 18 and for students under 26.

has details, along with information about chambres d'hôtes and places to stay in the wine villages around Troyes.

Hotels

Les Comptes de Champagne 54 rue de la Monnaie ☎03.25.73.11.70. Central and charming two-star in a twelfth-century house with slanted floors. Friendly proprietors and covered parking. ②

Grand Hôtel/Patiotel 4 av Mal-Joffre ☎03.25.79.90.90, 🌐www.grand-hotel-troyes.com. Right opposite the station, a big three-star hotel with swimming pool and garden; "Patiotel" rooms are less grand (only two-star) and accordingly cheaper. ③–④

La Maison de Rhodes 18 rue Linard-Gonthier ☎03.25.43.11.11, 🌐www.maisonderhodes.com. A fine Renaissance house, with Templar links, near the cathedral, which has been transformed into a four-star boutique hotel with contemporary interior decor and an abundance of medieval wooden beams. The lovely internal courtyard is a tranquil place for a quality evening meal. ⑦

Le Relais St-Jean 51 rue Paillot-de-Montabert ☎03.25.73.89.90, 🌐www.relais-st-jean.com. Posh hotel in a half-timbered building on a narrow street right in the centre. ⑤

Royal 22 bd Carnot ☎03.25.73.19.99, 🌐www.royal-hotel-troyes-com. Decent, pleasantly restored hotel behind a stern facade near the station; spacious bathrooms and a copious breakfast. ④

Splendid 44 bd Carnot ☎03.25.73.08.52, ☎03.25.73.41.04. The best of the cheap places near the station; rooms have shower and TV. ②

Hostel and campsite

Camping municipal 7 rue Roger-Salengro, Pont Ste-Marie ☎ & ☎03.25.81.02.64. Attractive grassy campsite, situated 5km out on the N60 to Châlons, on the left, with good facilities including washing machines and children's play area. Minimum two-night reservation, closed mid-Oct to March.

HI hostel chemin Ste-Scholastique, Rosières ☎03.25.82.00.65, 🌐www.fuaj.org/aj/troyes. Decent hostel located in a former fourteenth-century priory, 5.5km out of town on the Dijon road; take bus #8 direction "Rosières", stop "Liberté". Opposite the sign saying "Vielaines", a path leads down to the priory. Open year round; HI card required. Beds in 5–6-person dorms €8.80, breakfast and bedding extra.

The Town

The central part of Troyes between the station and the cathedral is scattered with marvellous churches, four of which are open to the public. Leading the way, and the first you come to, on rue de Vauluisant, is the sumptuous, high-naved church of St-Pantaléon (daily 10am–noon & 2–5pm; July & Aug till 6pm), almost a museum of sculpture. A short walk to the north is Troyes' oldest remaining church, twelfth-century Ste-Madeleine, on the road of the same name (same hours as St-Pantaléon). It was considerably remodelled in the sixteenth century, when the delicate stonework rood screen (jubé) – used to keep the priest separate from the congregation – was added; it's one of the few left in France. A short way to the southeast, between rues Émile-Zola and Champeaux and opposite the municipal tourist office, is the church of St-Jean-au-Marché. It's historically important as the church where Henry V of England married Catherine of France after being recognized as heir to the French throne in the 1420 Treaty of Troyes, known to the French as the "shameful treaty". Between it and the cathedral is the elegant Gothic Basilique St-Urbain, on place Vernier (same hours as St-Pantaléon), its exterior dramatizing the Day of Judgement.

Across the Canal de la Haute Seine lies the city's most outstanding museum, the Musée d'Art Moderne (Tues–Sun 11am–6pm; €5, or part of the museum pass, see box p.283), magnificently housed in the old bishops' palace next to the cathedral on place St-Pierre. The museum displays part of an extraordinary private collection, particularly rich in Fauvist paintings by the likes of Vlaminck and Derain (including the famous paintings of Hyde Park and Big Ben) – along with other first-class works by Degas, Courbet, Gauguin, Bonnard, Braque, Modigliani, Rodin, Robert Delaunay and Ernst. One room is given over to a beautiful collection of African masks and other carvings. Belonging to Pierre and Denise Lévy, the collection is not just impressive for its breadth, but for its impeccable taste and its depth, with several rooms devoted entirely to a single artist.

This is the ancient quartier de la Cité, an area with many of the city's oldest buildings. These all huddle around the Cathédrale St-Pierre-et-St-Paul (daily: July to mid-Sept 10am–7pm; mid-Sept to June 9am–noon & 2–5pm), whose pale Gothic nave is stroked with reflections from the wonderful stained-glass windows. On the other side of the cathedral from the Musée d'Art Moderne, at 1 rue Chrétien-de-Troyes, the once glorious Abbaye St-Loup houses the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4 or part of museum pass scheme, see box p.283), seemingly endless galleries of mostly French paintings, including a couple by Watteau, an impressive collection of medieval sculpture, and some dismally displayed natural history and archeological exhibits. Down rue de la Cité, but with its entrance round the corner on quai des Comtes de Champagne, is the apothicairerie, a richly decorated sixteenth-century pharmacy (Mon, Wed, Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4.60 or part of museum pass scheme, see box p.283) occupying one corner of the majestic eighteenth-century Hôtel-Dieu-le-Comte; rows of painted wooden "simple" boxes dating from the eighteenth century adorn its shelves.

Despite being raked by numerous fires since the Middle Ages, Troyes has retained many of its timber-framed buildings in the streets and alleyways of the old town, off the pedestrianized rue Champeaux, and around the maze of streets south of the main shopping thoroughfare, rue Émile-Zola. Indeed, the most famous fire, in 1524, led to a massive rebuilding scheme that resulted in Troyes' wealth of Renaissance palaces. An outstanding example, just to the east of the church of St Pantaléon, is the beautiful sixteenth-century Hôtel de Mauroy, 7 rue de la Trinité, once an orphanage, then a textile factory, but now occupied by the Maison de l'Outil et de la Pensée Ouvrière (10am–6pm; €6.50 or part of the museum pass scheme, see box p.283). Troyes' most original tourist attraction by far, this surprisingly fascinating museum of tools, with exhibits from the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, provides a window into the world of workers who used them and the people who crafted them. State-of-the-art techniques somehow transform shoals of hammers and spanners, flocks of axes and chisels, and myriad implements used by coopers, wheelwrights and tile-makers into jewel-like treasures.

Clothes shopping in Troyes

Troyes made its name in the clothing trade, and today the industry still accounts for more than half of the town's employment. Buying clothes from factory outlets is one of the chief attractions: designer-label clothes can be picked up at two-thirds or less of the normal shop price. Espace Belgrand in rue Belgrand, off boulevard du 14-Juillet (Mon 2–7pm, Tues–Fri 10am–7pm, Sat 9am–7pm), has quite a range, while rues Émile-Zola and des Bas Trévois are also worth a wander. Better still you can go out to the manufacturers on the outskirts, where gigantic warehouse stores defy any preconceived notions about petite French boutiques. Dozens of factory shops sell clothes, shoes and leather goods designed for everyone, from Nike to Laura Ashley, Boss to Kenzo, and Yves St-Laurent to Jean-Paul Gaultier. The best array is in the four giant sheds of Marques Avenue, 114 bd de Dijon, St-Julien-les-Villas, a couple of kilometres south of the city on the N71 to Dijon or on bus #2 (Mon 2–7pm, Tues–Fri 10am–7pm, Sat 9.30am–7pm, plus some Sun; extended hours during sale periods; @ www.marquesavenue.com); there's also a special "shed" for household goods a few blocks towards town, including luxury glass- and chinaware. At Pont-Ste-Marie, a short way to the northeast of Troyes along the D960 to Nancy, are Marques City, on rue Marc-Verdier (@ www.marquescity.com), and McArthur Glen, on rue Danton (@ www.mcarthurglen.fr), both with the same hours as Espace Belgrand. Buses for the outlets on the outskirts of town depart from the bus stops by Marché les Halles (ask at the tourist offices for details).

Nearby, along rue Brunneval, which is lined with another row of wooden houses (in varying states of repair), is Troyes' synagogue, inaugurated in the 1980s in memory of the Jewish scholar, Rachi (1040–1105). He was a member of the small Jewish community that flourished for a time during the eleventh and twelfth centuries under the protection of the counts of Champagne. His commentaries on both the Old Testament and the Talmud are still important to academics today: the Rachi University Institute opposite is devoted to studying his work.

As tourist pamphlets are at pains to point out, the ring of boulevards round the town is shaped like a champagne cork. In fact it also looks a bit like a sock – a shape that's just as suitable, since hosiery ("bonneterie") and woollens have been Troyes' most important industry since the late Middle Ages. In the seventeenth century Louis XIII decreed that charitable houses had to be self-supporting and the orphanage of the Hôpital de la Trinité (the Hôtel de Mauroy) set its charges to knitting stockings. Some of the old machines and products used for creating garments can be seen in the sixteenth-century palace, the Hôtel de Vauluisant, at 4 rue de Vauluisant, part of which houses the Musée de la Bonneterie (June–Sept daily except Tues 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; Oct–May Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3 or part of the museum pass scheme, see box p.283); well restored and visually appealing, it sets an example for all crafts museums with its respect for traditions and lack of sentimentality. The palace also houses the Musée Historique de Troyes et de la Champagne Méridionale (same hours and ticket), which contains some fascinating and original religious paintings on wooden shutters. The exteriors are painted in black and white trompe l'oeil, but when thrown open (as they have would be on holidays) reveal beautifully coloured paintings beneath. An impressively steep tower staircase leads to a cellar with a small exhibit of ceramic floor tiles.

Eating, drinking and entertainment

Self-caterers should head for the Marché les Halles, a daily (except Sun) covered market on the corner of rue Général-de-Gaulle and rue de la République, close to the Hôtel de Ville. Vegetarians and the health-conscious will think they're in heaven at Coopérative Hermès, 39 rue Général-Saussier, an excellent healthfood store. Central Troyes is packed with places to eat, mostly economical but unexciting. Along rue Champeaux there are several crêperies, and the restaurant Le Gaulois at no. 12 (☎03.25.43.90.27), where skewers of meat are grilled and served with bowls of sauces for €13. A great place to try the regional speciality of andouillette (see box on "Regional food and drink", p.224), along with delicious homestyle cooking, is the classic Bistroquet on place Langevin (☎03.25.73.65.65; closed Sun eve; menus from €16.50). La Marinière, 3 rue de la Trinité, behind the Musée d'Outil, has an oceanic theme and specializes in fish (☎03.25.73.77.29, closed Sun, from €11). Although the interior decor doesn't quite work, gastronomic delights from around the world at reasonable prices can be had at Le Valentino, 11 cours de la Rencontre (☎03.25.73.14.14, reservations essential; closed Mon & Sat lunch, Sun dinner & for 3 weeks in Aug & Sept; menus €22 for lunch, from €29 for dinner). Perhaps the best restaurant in town is La Mignardise, 1 ruelle des Chats (☎03.25.73.15.30; closed Sun eve and Mon during low season), set in a sixteenth-century building with a quiet courtyard and serving a traditional French menu from €22.

Le Tricasse is a perennially popular bar, with tables and the occasional live band, at 2 rue Charbonnet, on the corner with narrow rue Paillot-de-Montabert. You'll find a few more bars down this street, including the tiny and consistently packed-out Bar des Bougnets des Pouilles. A real delight for a relaxing, convivial evening is 🍷 Aux Crieurs de Vins, at 4 place Jean-Jaurès, an uncomplicated wine bar (and shop), with a painted concrete floor and a jumble of different furniture. The accent is on good wine and simple but quality dishes to accompany it: plates cost from €8 (try the delicious pressed pigs' cheeks with gherkins if it's on the menu), and there's always a choice of different andouillette on offer.

From late June to mid-September, the city organizes a series of free Ville en Lumière concerts in outdoor venues around town – pick up a schedule at the tourist office.

The Plateau de Langres

The Seine, Marne, Aube and several other lesser rivers rise in the Plateau de Langres between Troyes and Dijon, with main routes from the former to the Burgundian capital skirting this area. To the east, the N19 (which the train follows) takes in Chaumont and Langres, two towns that could briefly slow your progress if you're in no hurry, and the home village of Charles de Gaulle, Colombey-les-Deux-Églises.

Chaumont

Situated on a steep ridge between the Marne and Suize valleys, CHAUMONT (Chaumont-en-Bassigny to give its full name), 93km east of Troyes, is best approached by train, which enables you to cross the town's stupendous mid-nineteenth-century viaduct, which took an average of 2500 labourers working night and day two years to construct. It's possible to walk across the viaduct, which gives you fine views of the Suize valley.

The town's most interesting historic building is the Basilique St-Jean-Baptiste. Though built with the same dour, grey stone of most Champagne churches, it has a wonderful Renaissance addition to the Gothic transept of balconies and turreted stairway. The decoration includes a fifteenth-century polychrome Mise en Tombeau with muddy tears but expressive faces, and an Arbre de Jessé of the early sixteenth-century Troyes school, in which all the characters are sitting in the tree, dressed in the style of the day.

You shouldn't leave without taking a look at Les Silos, 7–9 av Foch, near the gare SNCF (Tues, Thurs & Fri 2–7pm, Wed & Sat 10am–6pm; free), a 1930s agricultural co-op transformed into a graphic arts centre and médiathèque. As well as hosting temporary exhibitions, it's the main venue for Chaumont's international poster festival (Festival de l'Affiche), held every year from mid-May to mid-June. As for the rest of the old town, there's not much to do except admire the strange, bulging towers of the houses, through which the shapes of wide spiral staircases are visible.

The tourist office is on place du Général-Charles-de-Gaulle (Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎03.25.03.80.80). If you decide to stay, try Le Terminus Reine, on the place (☎03.25.03.66.66, 🌐www.grand-hotel-terminus-reine-chaumont.federal-hotel.com; 📍4), an old-fashioned hotel with great charm; its restaurant, La Chaufferie, is the best place to eat. For a cheap room, there's a small hostel at 1 rue Carcassonne (☎03.25.03.22.77; bus #2 from the gare SNCF to “La Suize”; €10–12 including breakfast).

Colombey-les-Deux-Églises

Twenty-seven kilometres northwest of Chaumont, on the N19 to Troyes, is COLOMBEY-LES-DEUX ÉGLISES, the village where Gaullist leaders come to pay their respects at the grave of General Charles de Gaulle. The former president's family home, La Boiserie, opens its ground floor to the public (Feb–Nov daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; €4), but the most impressive memorial is the pink-granite Cross of Lorraine, symbol of the French Resistance movement, standing over 40m high on a hill just west of the village, signposted off the N19.

The best place to stay here is the splendid newly Michelin-starred 🌟 Hostellerie La Montagne, ruelle des Charmilles (☎03.25.01.51.69, 🌐www.hostellerieiamontagne.com; 📍7; menus from €28), where the rooms are individually designed and truly top-notch. Run by a father and son team, it's really a restaurant with rooms: there are three intimate dining rooms, or, if you have a fascination with fine cuisine, you can take the table located in a private corner of the new third-of-a-million-euro kitchen and observe your dinner being cooked. A more modest option, with a simple country dining room and smartly renovated rooms with hi-tech bathrooms, is La Grange du Relais (☎03.25.01.50.40; 📍9; menus from €15.90) on the RN19 at the bottom of the town.

Langres

LANGRES, 35km south of Chaumont and just as spectacularly situated above the Marne, suffered very little damage during the war and retains its encirclement of gateways, towers and ramparts. Walking this circuit, which gives views east to the hills of Alsace and southwest across the Plateau de Langres, is the best thing to do if you're just stopping for an hour or so. Don't miss the St-Fejeux tower with its beautiful metal sculpture, Air and Dreams. Wandering inside the walls is also rewarding – Renaissance houses and narrow streets give the feel of a place time has left behind, swathed in the mists of southern Champagne. Langres was home to the eighteenth-century Enlightenment philosopher Diderot for the first sixteen years of his life, and people like to make the point that, if he were to return to Langres today, he'd have no trouble finding his way around.

The Hôtel du Breuil de St-Germain, at 2 rue Chambrûlard, is one of the best of the town's sixteenth-century mansions, though it can only be viewed from the outside. The Musée d'Art et Histoire on place du Centenaire, near the cathedral (daily: April–Oct 10am–noon & 2–6pm; until 5pm in winter; free) has a section devoted to Diderot, with his encyclopedias and various other first editions of his works, a portrait by Van Loos and collections of local archeology. The highlight of the museum is the superbly restored Romanesque chapel of St Didier in the old wing, housing a fourteenth-century painted ivory Annunciation. Sets of dining knives, a craft for which this area was famous for several centuries, are also on display along with other decorative arts. Local faïence – glazed terracotta – is featured, though these nicely crafted pieces are upstaged by the sixteenth-century tiles from Rouen in one of the nave chapels of the Cathédrale St-Mammès. This grey-stone edifice has not been improved by the eighteenth-century addition of a new facade, but there's an amusing sixteenth-century relief of the Raising of Lazarus, in which the apostles watch, totally blasé, while other characters look like kids at a good horror movie.

Practicalities

The tourist office is just inside the town's main gate, the Porte des Moulins, on place Bel'Air (April & Oct Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 1.30–6pm; May–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 1.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Nov–March Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 1.30–5.30pm; ☎03.25.87.67.67, 🌐www.tourisme-langres.com), on the other side of town from the gare SNCF (infrequent connections to Troyes and Dijon; staff can give you a useful map of the main sights in town, and also have information on the four lakes in the surrounding region. The bus timetable from the train station to the Porte des Moulins is loosely based on the train timetable; note though that the last bus leaves at 7pm Monday to Friday, 4pm on Saturday and there's no connection on Sunday.

For accommodation, there's a hostel close by the Porte des Moulins on place Bel'Air (☎03.25.87.09.69, ☎03.25.87.76.74; book ahead for Sat & Sun as the reception closes at weekends; 🍳, breakfast and bedding extra), and the reasonable Auberge Jeanne d'Arc, 26 rue Gambetta (☎03.25.86.87.88; 🍷), in the centre of town. More comfortable rooms can be had at the characterful Cheval Blanc, in a converted church at 4 rue de l'Estrés (☎03.25.87.07.00, 🌐www.hotel-langres.com; 🍷), or in the seventeenth-century, though rather less elegant, Grand Hôtel de l'Europe, 23–25 rue Diderot (☎03.25.87.10.88, ☎03.25.87.60.65; 🍷). For good but expensive food, try Restaurant Diderot at the Cheval Blanc (closed Tues eve & Wed lunch). Better value is to be had at the Lion d'Or (☎03.25.87.03.30), a restaurant and hotel just outside the town on the route de Vesoul with views of the surrounding lakes. Langres has its own highly flavourful, strong-smelling – and excellent – cheese, which you can buy at the Friday market on place Jenson.

The Ardennes

To the northeast of Reims, the scenery of the Ardennes region along the Meuse valley knocks spots off any landscape in Champagne. Most of the hills lie over the border in Belgium, but there's enough of interest on the French side to make it well worth exploring.

In war after war, the people of the Ardennes have been engaged in protracted last-ditch battles down the valley of the Meuse, which, once lost, gave invading armies a clear path to Paris. The rugged, hilly terrain and deep forests (frightening even to Julius Caesar's legionnaires) gave some advantage to World War II's Resistance fighters when the Ardennes was annexed to Germany, but even during peace time life has never been easy. The land is unsuitable for crops, and the slateworks and ironworks, which were the main source of employment during the nineteenth century, were closed in the 1980s. The only major investment in the region has been a nuclear power station in the loop of the Meuse at Chooz, to which locals responded by etching "Nuke the Élysée!" high on a half-cut cliff of slate just downstream.

This said, tourism, the main growth industry, is developing apace – there are walking and boating possibilities, plus good train and bus connections – though the eerie, isolated atmosphere of this region remains.

Charleville-Mézières

The twin towns of CHARLEVILLE and MÉZIÈRES provide a good starting point for exploring the northern part of the region, which spreads across the meandering Meuse before the valley closes in and the forests take over. Of the two, Charleville is the one to head for.

The seventeenth-century place Ducale, in the centre of Charleville, was the result of the local duke's envy of the contemporary place des Vosges in Paris. Despite the posh setting, the shops in the arcades remain very down-to-earth and the cafés charge reasonable prices to sit outside: a very good position on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, when the market is held here. From 31 place Ducale you can reach the complex of old and new buildings that house the Musée de l'Ardenne (Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4, combined ticket with Musée Arthur Rimbaud, see below), which covers the different economic activities of the region over the ages through local paintings, prehistoric artefacts, legends, puppetry, weapons and coins. You need to keep up a good pace to get round all the rooms, but it's fun and informative.

The most famous person to emerge from the town was Arthur Rimbaud (1854–91), who ran away from Charleville four times before he was 17, so desperate was he to escape from its quiet provincialism. He is honoured in the Musée Arthur Rimbaud, housed in a very grand stone windmill – a contemporary of the place Ducale – on quai Arthur-Rimbaud, two blocks north of the main square (Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4 combined ticket with Musée de l'Ardenne, see above). It contains a host of pictures of him and people he hung out with, including his lover Verlaine, as well as facsimiles of his writings and related documents. A few steps down the quayside is the spot where he composed his most famous poem, Le Bateau Ivre. After penning poetry in Paris, journeying to the Far East and trading in Ethiopia and Yemen, Rimbaud died in a Marseille hospital. His body was brought back to his home town – probably the last place he would have wanted to be buried – and true Rimbaud fanatics can visit his tomb in the cemetery west of the place Ducale at the end of avenue Charles Boutet.

Charleville is also a major international puppetry centre (its school is justly famous), and every three years it hosts one of the largest puppet festivals in the world, the Festival Mondial des Théâtres de Marionnettes (www.marionnette.com). As many as 150 professional troupes – some from as far away as Mali and Burma – put on something like fifty shows a day on the streets and in every available space in town. Tickets are cheap, and there are shows for adults as well as the usual stuff aimed at kids. If you miss the festival you can still catch one of the puppet performances in the summer months every year (03.24.33.72.50 for booking and information; tickets around €12), or if you're passing by the Institut de la Marionnette between 10am and 9pm, you can see one of the automated episodes of the Four Sons of Aymon enacted on the facade's clock every hour, or all twelve scenes on Saturday at 9.15am.

Practicalities

From the gare SNCF, place Ducale is a five-minute ride away on buses #1, #3 or #5; the gare routière is a couple of blocks northeast of the square, between rues du Daga and Noël. The regional tourist office for the Ardennes is at 22 place Ducale (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sun 2–7pm; 03.24.56.06.08), with Charleville-Mézières' tourist office at no. 4 (July & Aug Mon–Fri 9.30am–noon & 1.30–7pm, Sat & Sun 9.30am–noon & 1.30–6pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–noon & 1.30–6pm; 03.24.55.69.90, www.charleville-mezieres.org).

Three fairly central hotels that are worth trying are: the Hôtel de Paris, 24 av G.-Corneau, which offers free Internet access, though make sure to ask for a newly renovated room in the main building (03.24.33.34.38, www.hoteldeparis08.fr; 2); the Central, 23 av du Maréchal-Leclerc (03.24.33.33.69, 03.24.59.38.25; 3); and Le Relais du Square, 3 place de la Gare (03.24.33.38.76, www.hotel-charleville-mezieres.com; 5), a two-star hotel in a tree-filled square near the station. The town's campsite, Camping du Mont Olympe (03.24.33.23.60, camping-charlevillemezieres@orange.fr; open May to mid-Oct), is north of place Ducale, over the river and left along rue des Paquis. There are plenty of places to eat and drink. For something a bit special, La Côte à l'Os, at 11 cours Aristide-Briand (03.24.59.20.16), specializes in fruits de mer and local cuisine; daily menus start at €13.50. La Cigogne, at 40 rue Dubois-Crancé (03.24.33.25.39; closed Sun eve, Mon & first week Aug), also serves good regional dishes, with menus from €15. At 33 rue du Moulin, La Clef des Champs (03.24.56.17.50) offers menus from €15 and is known for family cooking.

North of Charleville

George Sand wrote of the stretch of the Meuse that winds through the Ardennes that “its high wooded cliffs, strangely solid and compact, are like some inexorable destiny that encloses, pushes and twists the river without permitting it a single whim or any escape”. What all the tourist literature emphasizes, however, are the legends of medieval struggles between Good and Evil whose characters have given names to some of the curious rocks and crests. The grandest of these, where the schist formations have taken the most peculiar turns, is the Roc de la Tour, also known as the “Devil's Castle”, up a path off the D31, 3.5km out of Monthermé. MONTHERMÉ itself is a slate-roofed little town with nothing of great interest except a twelfth-century church with late medieval frescoes.

The journey through this frontier country should ideally be done on foot or skis, or by boat. The alternatives for the latter are: good old bateau-mouche-type cruises (RDTA; April–June & Sept–Oct weekends only; July & Aug Tues–Sun; ☎03.24.33.77.70), which depart from the Vieux Moulin (Musée Rimbaud) in Charleville–Mézières and the quai des Paquis in Monthermé; or live-in pleasure boats – not wildly expensive if you can split the cost four or six ways. These can be rented out, with bikes on board, from Ardennes Plaisance in Charleville–Mézières, 76 rue des Forges–St-Charles (☎03.24.56.47.61), and Ardennes Nautisme in SEDAN, 16 rue du Château (☎03.24.27.05.15, 🌐www.ardennes-nautisme.com), the next town downstream from Charleville. The latter moor their boats just east of Dom–Le–Mesnil on the D764 at the junction of the Meuse and the Canal des Ardennes. The regional tourist office at Charleville (see opposite) can provide information on hiking, canoeing, biking or riding. For public transport from Charleville, trains follow the Meuse into Belgium, and a few buses run up to Monthermé and LES HAUTES-RIVIÈRES, the latter on the River Semoy.

The GR12 is a good walking route, circling the Lac des Vieilles Forges, 17km northwest of Charleville, then meeting the Meuse at Bogy and crossing over to Hautes–Rivières in the even more sinuous Semoy Valley. There are plenty of other tracks, too, though beware of chasse (hunting) signs – French hunters tend to hack through the undergrowth with their safety catches off and are notoriously trigger-happy. Wild boar are the main quarry being hunted – they are nowhere near as dangerous as their pursuers, and would seem to be more intelligent, too, rooting about near the crosses of the Resistance memorial near REVIN, while hunters stalk the forest. A good place to stay, overlooking the river at Revin, is the Hôtel François-1er, 46 quai Camille–Desmoulins (☎03.24.40.15.88, 🌐www.francois1.fr; 📍), which rents out bikes and canoes, and gives good advice on walks.

The abundance of wild boar is partly explained when you rummage around on the forest floor yourself and discover, between the trees to either side of the river, an astonishing variety of mushrooms, and, in late summer, wild strawberries and bilberries. For a quaint insight into life in the forest, stop at the Musée de la Forêt, situated right on the edge of the Ardennes, 2km north of Renwez on the D40 (☎03.24.54.82.66, March–May & mid–Sept to mid–Nov daily 9am–noon & 2–5pm; June to mid–Sept daily 9am–7pm; mid–Nov to Feb Mon–Fri 9am–noon & 2–5pm; €8). All manner of wood-cutting, gathering and transporting is enacted by wooden dummies along with displays of utensils and flora and fauna of the forest; it's also a tranquil spot for a picnic.

Travel details

Trains

Amiens to: Arras (10 daily; 40–50min); Compiègne (5 daily; 1hr 20min); Laon (6 daily; 1hr 40min); Lille (frequent; 1hr 20min); Paris (hourly; 1hr 20min);

Arras to: Albert (10 daily; 25min); Douai (very frequent; 15–30min); Lille (several daily; 1hr); Paris (frequent; 50min).

Beauvais to: Paris (hourly; 1hr 10min).

Boulogne-Ville to: Amiens (8 daily; 1hr 15min); Arras (4 daily; 2hr–2hr 30min); Calais-Ville (very frequent; 30min); Étaples-Le Touquet (hourly; 20min); Montreuil-sur-Mer (7 daily; 30–40min); Paris (8 daily; 2hr 40min; very frequent connections to Calais for TGV; 2hr 10min).

Calais-Ville to: Boulogne-Ville (very frequent; 30min); Étaples-Le Touquet (9 daily; 1hr); Lille, via the Calais–Fréthun Eurostar station (3 daily; 30min, otherwise frequent; 1hr–1hr 50min); Paris (TGV 6 daily; 1hr 30min).

Compiègne to: Paris (frequent; 40–50min).

Dunkerque to: Arras (10 daily; 1hr 20min); Calais-Ville (frequent; 1hr–1hr 15min via Hazebrouck); Paris (TGV frequent; 2hr 20min via Arras).

Laon to: Paris (8 daily; 1hr 40min–2hr); Reims (10 daily; 40min); Soissons (1 hourly; 30min).

Lille to: Arras (TGV frequent; 40min; otherwise very frequent; 40min–1hr); Brussels (TGV 6 daily; 40min); Cambrai (frequent, mostly via Douai; 1hr); Douai (very frequent; 20–30min); Lyon (TGV 7 daily; 3hr–3hr 30min; or 4hr via Paris); Marseille (TGV several daily; 4hr 50min–6hr, sometimes via Lyon); Paris (TGV 1 hourly; 1hr).

Reims to: Charleville-Mézières (almost hourly; 50min); Épernay (frequent; 30min); Paris (frequent; 1hr 30min–2hr).

Troyes to: Chaumont (hourly; 50min); Langres (6 daily; 1hr 15min); Paris (frequent; 1hr 30min).

Buses

Amiens to: Abbeville (2 daily; 1hr 30min); Albert (4 daily; 40min); Arras (2 daily; 2hr); Beauvais (4 daily; 1hr 15min).

Boulogne to: Calais (4 daily; 1hr); Le Touquet (4 daily; 1hr).

Calais to: Boulogne (4 daily; 1hr); Le Touquet (4 daily; 2hr).

Dunkerque to: Calais (2–9 daily; 30min).

Reims to: Troyes (1–3 daily; 2hr 30min).

Alsace and Lorraine

- * Spire of Strasbourg Cathedral This Gothic steeple soars over the city like some medieval Chrysler building. See p.302
- * Vineyards and castles in the Vosges Eyrie-like forts and bastions clinging to craggy peaks along Alsace's Route du Vin. See p.311
- * The Issenheim Altarpiece, Colmar Luridly expressive, this Renaissance masterpiece alone makes picturesque Colmar worth a visit. See p.317
- * Bugattis at Mulhouse's Cité de l'Automobile
A unique collection of vintage motors in the city where the French car industry was set in motion. See p.321
- * Place Stanislas, Nancy
This elegant eighteenth-century city square is one of the world's finest. See p.325
- * Chagall windows, Metz Cathedral Moses and co. captured in glorious technicolour glass. See p.330

△ Hôtel de Ville, Nancy

Alsace and Lorraine

France's easternmost provinces, Alsace and Lorraine, are invariably coupled together, at times even hyphenated, in part because they share a tumultuous history. Disputed throughout the Middle Ages by the French kings and the princes of the Holy Roman Empire, more recently they were involved in a tug-of-war between France and Germany, culminating in some of the worst conflicts of both world wars. This has bequeathed a mixed legacy: alongside splendid palaces built for powerful bishops and magical hill-top fortresses, you will find massive war cemeteries, solemn memorials and France's only Nazi concentration camp.

On the ground, there are more contrasts than similarities. The introverted people of Alsace, many of whom converse in Elsässisch, a Germanic dialect, tend to display a Mitteleuropa taste for Hansel-and-Gretel-type decoration – oriel windows, carved timberwork and Toytown gables. Buildings are maintained in pristine condition and window-boxes overflow with geraniums. The combination of French and German influences makes for a distinct culture and atmosphere seen at its most vivid in the numerous wine villages that punctuate the Route du Vin, along the eastern margin of the tree-clad Vosges mountains. The crisp white wines that give this route its name are an attraction in themselves; giving rise to no end of harvest festivities, they accompany a cuisine that mostly revolves around pork, cabbage and pungent cheese. The handsome regional (and European Union) capital, Strasbourg, and smaller, more postcardish Colmar, are home to some of France's finest art and architecture, with outstanding museums and churches, and winding streets lined with half-timbered houses. Conservative yet cosmopolitan, and known for a strong musical tradition, Alsace is a noticeably wealthy province, whose productive industries churn out cars, textiles, machine tools and telephones, plus half the beer in France.

Alsace's long-time (but much less prosperous) rival, Lorraine, sharing borders with Luxembourg, Germany and Belgium, is part farmland, part rust belt. Though not a province packed with unmissable sights, it's well worth visiting for its elegant former capital, Nancy, home to a major school of Art Nouveau; Metz, the green cathedral city and current capital; and the morbid World War I battlefields near Verdun, as impressive as they are horrific. While it is gastronomically less renowned than other French provinces, it has given the world one of its most popular savoury pies, the quiche lorraine. Although the Lorrains also have their own Germanic dialect, it is little used and the people have more in common with the Walloons, across the border in Belgium, when it comes to lifestyle and aesthetics.

ALSACE AND LORRAINE

Alsace

3

ALSACE AND LORRAINE

Alsace

Although it sometimes runs the risk of chocolate-box quaintness, there's no denying that Alsace is attractive, thanks to its old stone and half-timbered towns and villages set along the fertile Rhine valley and amid the thickly wooded hills of the Vosges. Strasbourg, the dynamic Alsatian capital and one of the "capitals" of the European Union, is one of the most handsome cities in France, its architecture harmoniously spanning several centuries. The lively market towns of Saverne and Wissembourg, to the north, give access

The food and wine of Alsace

The cuisine of Alsace is quite distinct from that of other regions of France, its predilection for smoked or salted pork clearly showing the region's German origins – albeit tempered by Gallic refinement. The classic dish is choucroute, the aromatic pickled cabbage known in German as sauerkraut. The secret here is the inclusion of juniper berries in the pickling stage and the addition of goose grease or lard. Traditionally it's served with large helpings of smoked pork, ham and a variety of sausages, but some restaurants offer a succulent variant replacing the meat with fish (choucroute aux poissons), usually salmon and monkfish. The qualification à l'alsacienne after the name of a dish means "with choucroute". Foie gras, both duck and goose, is another prized delicacy and locals swear theirs is better than the stuff from the southwest.

Strasbourg sauisages and boiled potatoes are another common ingredient in Alsatian cooking. One of the best culinary incarnations of the spud is the three-meat hotpot, baeckoffe, which consists of layers of potato, pork, mutton and beef marinated in wine and cooked for a couple of hours in a baker's oven. Onions, too, are a favourite ingredient, either in the form of a tart (tarte à l'oignon), made with a béchamel sauce, or flammeküche (tarte flambée in French), a mixture of onion, cream and pieces of chopped smoked pork breast and baked on a base of thin pizza-like pastry. Noodles are also a common feature, and don't miss the chance to sample a matelote (a stew of river fish cooked in Riesling) or Vosges trout cooked au bleu (briefly boiled in Riesling with a dash of vinegar).

Like the Germans, Alsations are fond of their pastries. The dessert fruit tarts made with rhubarb (topped with meringue), wild blueberries, apple or red cherries, red quetsch or yellow mirabelle plums – tartes alsaciennes – are delicious. Cake-lovers should try kugelhopf, a moulded dome-shaped cake with a hollow in the middle and made with raisins and almonds, and birewecks, made with dried fruit marinated in Kirsch.

All of these delights can be washed down with the region's outstanding white wines, renowned for their dry, clean-tasting fruitiness and compatibility with any kind of food. The best known of them are the tart Rieslings, flowery Gewürztraminers, refreshing Sylvaners and the three Pinots (blanc, gris and noir – dry white, fruity white and dark rosé, respectively), named after the type of grape from which they are made. There are, incidentally, a few reds – light in colour and bouquet – from Ottrott, Marlenheim and Cleebourg.

Alsace also shares the German predilection for beer – look out for the flavoursome Christmas and March brews – and has long been the heartland of French hop-growing. Look out, too, for the clear fruit brandies, sold in elegant bottles, especially kirsch, made from cherries, and quetsch and mirabelle, distilled from the two varieties of plum also used in tarts. They round off a hearty Alsatian feast perfectly, often trickled over mouthwatering sorbets made with the same fruit.

to some spectacular ruined castles in the northern Vosges, while south of Strasbourg, along the Route du Vin there are countless picturesque medieval hamlets and yet more ruined fortresses. A very different, horribly sobering experience is the concentration camp of Le Struthof, hidden away near the wine village of Barr.

Pretty Colmar, parts of which are admittedly twee, is well worth a visit, in particular for Grünewald's amazing Issenheim altarpiece, one of the most spectacular works of art in the whole country. By contrast, Mulhouse is thoroughly industrial but boasts some wonderful museums devoted to subjects as varied as cars, trains, wallpaper and printed fabric.

Every town has a tourist office (📧 www.tourisme-alsace.com), which is often housed in the mairie or Hôtel de Ville in smaller places. Special tourist maps are on sale, but free maps containing a reasonable amount of information are always available too.

Strasbourg

STRASBOURG owes both its Germanic name – “the City of the Roads” – and its wealth to its strategic position on the west bank of the Rhine, long one of the great natural transport arteries of Europe. Self-styled le Carrefour de l'Europe (“Europe’s Crossroads”), it lies at the very heart of Western Europe, closer to Frankfurt, Zurich and even Milan than to Paris, although the much awaited TGV has recently halved the four-hour train journey from the French capital. The city’s medieval commercial pre-eminence was damaged by its involvement in the religious struggles of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but recovered with the absorption into France in 1681. Along with the rest of Alsace, Strasbourg was annexed by Germany from 1871 to the end of World War I and again from 1940 to 1944.

Today old animosities have been submerged in the European Union, with Strasbourg the seat of the Council of Europe, the European Court of Human Rights and the European Parliament. Prosperous, beautiful and easy to get around, with an orderliness that is more Teutonic than Gallic, the city is big enough – with a population of over a quarter of a million people – to have a metropolitan air without being overwhelming. It has one of the loveliest cathedrals in France and one of the oldest and most active universities; that, plus the great variety of museums, the considerable range of cultural activities and a host of excellent restaurants make it a leading destination in its own right.

Arrival and information

The gare SNCF lies on the west side of the city centre, barely fifteen minutes’ walk from the cathedral along rue du Maire-Kuss and rue du 22-Novembre. The airport shuttle bus (navette), departing Entzheim international airport every twenty minutes (5.30am–11pm), drops off at Baggersee, south of the centre, from where you can catch the very convenient and futuristic tram into central Strasbourg (€5.10 combined ticket).

The main tourist office is at 17 place de la Cathédrale (daily 9am–7pm; ☎03.88.52.28.28, 📧 www.strasbourg.com), with the regional office for the Bas-Rhin département (northern Alsace) nearby at 9 rue du Dôme (Mon–Fri 9am–noon & 1.30–5pm; ☎03.88.15.45.85/88). The tourist office can provide you with a map (€1 for one with museums and sights marked on it; free otherwise), though not all street names are marked. There’s also a tourist office in the new underground shopping complex just in front of the train station (Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 9am–6pm), and another at the airport (daily 8.30am–12.30pm & 1.15–5pm). It may be worth investing in a Strasbourg Pass (€10.90), which entitles you to one free museum entry, one half-price museum entry, a boat tour, a full day of bike hire and the cathedral tower and clock.

With much of the city centre now pedestrian-only, several car parks (www.parcus.com) cater for those who are driving into town; those on the outskirts of the city are either free or include tram tickets for the journey into the town centre. Strasbourg must be a strong contender for France's most bicycle-friendly city; 300km of bicycle lanes and particularly inexpensive bicycle hire (see "Listings", p.307) make cycling a tempting option.

Accommodation

When looking for a place to stay, bear in mind that once a month (except August, but twice in October) the European Parliament is in session for the best part of a week, bringing hundreds of MEPs and their numerous entourages into town. This puts all the city's facilities under pressure, especially hotel accommodation, which gets block-booked months ahead. The hostels, at least, are less affected, though even they play host to one or two MEPs. To find out in advance when the parliament is sitting, contact the main tourist office. The station area has the usual clutch of hotels – useful, if occasionally seedy, standbys.

Hotels

Beaucour Romantik 5 rue des Bouchers

☎ 03.88.76.72.00, www.hotel-beaucour.com.

Very central but rather overpriced boutique hotel, just off place du Corbeau, in a handsome old house with its own courtyard. ⑤

 Cathédrale 12–13 place de la Cathédrale

☎ 03.88.22.12.12, www.hotel-cathedrale

.fr. Extremely smart rooms, some of which offer stunning views of the cathedral; breakfast is served in the stylish bar. ⑦

Cerf d'Or 6 place de l'Hôpital ☎ 03.88.36.20.05,

☎ 03.88.36.68.67. Attractive sixteenth-century hotel with its own bar and smart restaurant (menu from €19–24; closed most of July) on the south side of the River Ill. Closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan. ⑤

Diana Dauphine 30 rue de la 1^{er}-Armée

☎ 03.88.36.26.61, www.hotel-diana-dauphine.com.

This welcome newcomer a few hundred metres south of the Ill is the city's first conscious attempt at an accessible boutique hotel, with plush, sleek designer furniture and fittings, albeit it in a you-wouldn't-look-at-twice building. ⑤

Dragon 2 rue de l'Écarlate ☎ 03.88.35.79.80, www.dragon.fr. Fully modernized luxury hotel popular with European Parliament employees. Closed Christmas. ⑤

Hannong 15 rue du 22-Novembre

☎ 03.88.32.16.22, www.hotel-hannong.com.

Beautiful parquet floors and tasteful furnishings in the rooms go some way to justifying the room rates; the cocktail bar is open late and serves snacks till midnight. ⑦

De l'III 8 rue des Bateliers ☎ 03.88.36.20.01, www.hotel-ill.com. The best bargain in Strasbourg; a quiet, comfortable, family-run place just 50m from the river, in sight of the cathedral. Closed end of Dec to mid-Jan. ④

Kléber 29 place Kléber ☎ 03.88.32.50.41, www.hotel-kleber.com. Comfortably modern, designer-furnished, no-smoking hotel right at the heart of the city, whose bijou rooms – with names like gourmet ice-cream flavours – are done out in different fabrics and colours. ④

Maison Rouge 4 rue des Francs-Bourgeois

☎ 03.88.32.08.60, www.maison-rouge.com.

Lavishly decorated hotel with a sitting-room on every floor and comfortable bedrooms. ⑤

Patricia 1a rue du Puits ☎ 03.88.32.14.60,

☎ 03.88.32.19.08. Decent rooms in a great location in the backstreets of the old town not far from place Gutenberg. ③

Suisse 2–4 rue de la Râpe ☎ 03.88.35.22.11, www.hotel-suisse.com. The rooms are cramped but the location, just underneath the mass of the lofty cathedral, is impressive. ⑤

Hostels and campsite

CIARUS 7 rue Finkmatt ☎ 03.88.15.27.88/90, www.ciarus.com. Protestant-run hostel near the Palais de Justice, just north of the centre. Bus #10 or #20 from the station to place Pierre. €17 including breakfast, or double rooms (€).

Des Deux Rives rue des Cavaliers

☎ 03.88.45.54.20, ☎ 03.88.45.54.21. Large HI hostel set in a park on the banks of the Rhine close to the Pont de l'Europe over the Rhine to Germany. Bus #21 from place Gutenberg, direction "Kehl", stop "Parc du Rhin". €19 including breakfast, for cardholders.

La Montagne-Verte 2 rue Robert-Forrer

☎ 03.88.30.25.46. A well-equipped campsite, located behind the René-Cassin hostel. Mar–Oct.

René-Cassin 9 rue de l'Auberge-de-Jeunesse

☎ 03.88.30.26.46, ✉ strasbourg.rene-cassin@fuaj.org. Large and fully equipped HI hostel 3km southwest of the city centre. Bus #3, #23 from Homme de Fer, stop "Auberge de Jeunesse". €18 including breakfast, for cardholders.

The City

It isn't difficult to find your way around Strasbourg on foot, as the flat city centre is concentrated on a small island encircled by the River Ill and an old canal. The magnificent filigree spire of the pink-sandstone cathedral is visible throughout the city. It dominates not just Strasbourg but much of Alsace, though its silhouette at the time of writing was deformed by scaffolding likely to be in place for some time, owing to urgent restoration work. Immediately south of this building are the best of the museums, while to the northwest, unappealing place Kléber lies at the heart of the commercial district. To the south, the more intimate place Gutenberg is nominally the main square. About a ten-minute walk west, on the tip of the island, is picturesque La Petite France, where timber-framed houses and gently flowing canals hark back to the city's medieval trades of tanning and dyeing. Across the canal to the east of the centre is the late nineteenth-century German quarter and the city's European institutions, including the European Parliament building.

The cathedral and place Gutenberg

The Cathédrale de Notre-Dame (daily 7–11.30am & 12.40–7pm; closed during services) soars out of the close huddle of medieval houses at its feet with a single spire of such delicate, flaky lightness that it seems the work of confectioners rather than masons. It's worth logging up the 332 steps to the

The Alsatian language

Travelling through the province, you might well mistake the language being spoken in the shops and streets for German. In fact, it is Elsässisch, or Alsatian, a High German dialect known to philologists as Alemannic. To confuse matters further, there are two versions, High and Low Alemannic, plus an obscure Frankish dialect spoken in the Wissembourg region and a Romance one called Welche from the valleys around Orbey. You'll hear a different version spoken in almost every town.

In many ways, it's a miracle that the language has survived. During the French Revolution, it was suppressed in favour of French for nationalistic reasons, only to be ousted by German when the Prussians annexed the region in 1870. On its return to French rule, all things Germanic were disdained, and many Alsations began to speak French once more ... until the Nazi occupation brought in laws that made the speaking of French and even the wearing of berets imprisonable offences.

Nowadays, most daily transactions are conducted in French, and Elsässisch has still not made it onto the school curriculum. Yet it remains a living language, with a rich medieval literary legacy, and is still spoken by young and old throughout Alsace – especially in rural areas – and even parts of Lorraine. A renaissance of regional identity has meant that Elsässisch is also beginning to reappear on signs and to be spoken at official level too.

spire's viewing platform (daily: March & Oct 9am–5.30pm; April–June & Sept 9am–6.30pm; July & Aug 8.30am–7pm; Nov–Feb 9am–4.30pm; €4.40) for the superb view of the old town, and, in the distance, the Vosges to the west and the Black Forest to the east.

The interior, too, is magnificent, the high nave a model of proportion enhanced by a glorious sequence of stained-glass windows. The finest are in the south aisle next to the door, depicting the life of Christ and the Creation, but all are beautiful, including, in the apse, the modern glass designed in 1956 by Max Ingrand to commemorate the first European institutions in the city. On the left of the nave, the cathedral's organ perches precariously above one of the arches, like a giant gilded eagle, while further down on the same side is the late fifteenth-century pulpit, a masterpiece of intricacy in stone by the aptly named Hans Hammer.

In the south transept are the cathedral's two most popular sights. The Pilier des Anjes is a slender triple-tiered central column, decorated with some of the most graceful and expressive statuary of the thirteenth century. The huge and enormously complicated astrological clock (tickets can be bought from the postcard stand 9am–11.30am, then at the cash desk at the south door 11.50am–12.20pm; €0.80, children free) was built by Schwilgué of Strasbourg in 1842. It is a favourite with the tour-group operators, whose customers roll up in droves to witness the clock's crowning performance of the day, striking the hour of noon, which it does with unerring accuracy at 12.30pm – that being 12 o'clock "Strasbourg time", as the city lies well east of the Greenwich meridian. Death strikes the chimes; the apostles parade in front of Christ, who occupies the highest storey of the clock and gives each one his blessing.

Narrow rue Mercière, busy with drinkers, shoppers and cathedral-gazers, funnels west to place Gutenberg, with its steep-pitched roofs and brightly painted facades. It was named after the printer and pioneer of moveable type who lived in the city in the early fifteenth century and whose statue occupies the middle of the square. On the west side stands the sixteenth-century Hôtel de Commerce, where the writer Arthur Young watched the destruction of the magistrates' records during the Revolution; excellent art exhibitions are often held on the ground floor.

South of the cathedral

Most of Strasbourg's museums lie to the south of the cathedral, between the tree-lined place du Château and the river. Check with the tourist office for museum passes/discounts (see p.299) if you're planning to visit them all.

Right next to the cathedral, place du Château is enclosed to the east by the Lycée Fustel and to the south by the imposing Palais Rohan, both eighteenth-century buildings; the latter was designed for the immensely powerful Rohan family, who, for several generations in a row, cornered the market in cardinals' hats. There are three museums in the Palais Rohan itself (daily except Tues 10am–6pm; closed public hols; €4 each): the Musée des Arts Décoratifs; the Musée des Beaux-Arts, which has a decent collection of European paintings from Giotto to the nineteenth century; and the rather specialist Musée Archéologique. Of the three collections, the Arts Décoratifs, with its eighteenth-century faïence tiles crafted in the city by Paul Hannong, stands out. The rooms of the palace are vast and ostentatious but not especially interesting.

Next door, in the mansion lived in by the cathedral architects, the excellent Musée de l'Oeuvre Notre-Dame (daily except Tues 10am–6pm; €4) houses the original sculptures from the cathedral exterior, damaged in the Revolution and replaced today by copies; both sets are worth seeing. Other treasures here include: glass from the city's original Romanesque cathedral; the eleventh-century Wissembourg Christ, said to be the oldest representation of a human figure in stained glass; and the architect's original parchment drawings for the statuary, done in fascinating detail down to the expressions on each figure's face.

Past the picturesque place du Marché-aux-Cochons-de-Lait and the much restored Musée Historique (closed for lengthy renovation at time of writing; reopening scheduled for late 2007) and across the river, in a typically Alsatian house at quai St-Nicolas, is the charming Musée Alsacien (daily except Tues 10am–6pm; €4), which contains elaborately painted furniture and other quaint local artefacts.

Musée d'Art Moderne et Contemporain

The latest addition to Strasbourg's museums is the Musée d'Art Moderne et Contemporain (Tues, Wed & Fri–Sun 11am–7pm; Thurs noon–10pm; €5), 1 place Hans-Jean Arp, housed in a mega-budget, purpose-built, glass-fronted building overlooking the river and Vauban's dam (see below) to the west of the centre. It's a light and airy space and its collection is well presented, making up for its shortcomings by acknowledging the importance of some lesser-known artists. The ground floor confronts the themes and roots of modern European art from the late nineteenth century through to the 1950s by way of the Impressionists, Symbolists and a good section on Surrealism, with plenty of folkloric, mystical paintings by Brauner, plus a room devoted to the voluptuous curves sculpted by Strasbourg's own Arp. The chronology continues upstairs with conceptual art and Arte Povera, and finishes up with stripey creations by Daniel Buren and video art by Bill Viola. The temporary exhibitions – devoted to the likes of Le Corbusier and Picasso – have been reliably good.

La Petite France and the rest of the old city

On the south side of the Pont du Corbeau, the medieval street, Impasse du Corbeau, still looks much as it must have done in the fourteenth century. Downstream, to the east, the quai des Bateliers was part of the old business quarter, and the streets leading off it – rue Ste-Madeleine, rue de la Krutenau and rue de Zürich – are still worth a wander.

Two bridges upstream, the Pont St-Thomas leads to the church of St-Thomas (Jan & Feb Sat & Sun 2–5pm; March, Nov & Dec daily 10am–noon & 2–5pm; April–Oct daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; closed Sun morning for services; ☎03.88.32.14.46), with a Romanesque facade and Gothic towers. Strasbourg was a bastion of the Reformation and since 1549 it has been the principal Protestant church of the city; one of its leaders, Martin Bucer, preached here. The amazing piece of sculpture behind the altar is Jean-Baptiste Pigalle's tomb of the Maréchal de Saxe, a French military commander active against the Duke of Cumberland in the War of the Austrian Succession in the middle of the eighteenth century.

From here, it's a short walk upstream to the Pont St-Martin, which marks the beginning of the district known as La Petite France, where the city's millers, tanners and fishermen used to live. At the far end of a series of canals are the so-called Ponts Couverts (they are in fact no longer covered), built as part of the fourteenth-century city fortifications and still punctuated by watchtowers. Just beyond is a dam built by Vauban (daily 9am–7.30pm; mid-March to mid-Oct till 8pm; free) to protect the city from waterborne assault. The whole area is picture-postcard pretty, with winding streets – most notably rue du Bain-aux-Plantes – bordered by sixteenth- and seventeenth-century houses adorned with flowers and elaborately carved woodwork.

The area east of the cathedral, where rue des Frères leads to place St-Étienne, is good for a stroll, too. Place du Marché-Gayot, off rue des Frères behind the cathedral, is very lively, almost southern in feel, with a row of trendy studenty cafés on the north side and a mixed bunch of eateries opposite. From the north side of the cathedral, rue du Dôme leads to the eighteenth-century place Broglie, with the Hôtel de Ville, the bijou Opéra and some imposing eighteenth-century mansions. It was at 4 place Broglie in 1792 that Rouget de l'Isle first sang what later became known as the Marseillaise for the mayor of Strasbourg, who had challenged him to compose a rousing song for the troops of the army of the Rhine.

The German quarter (Neustadt) and the European institutions

Across the canal from place Broglie, place de la République is surrounded by vast German Neo-Gothic edifices erected during the post-1870 Imperial Prussian occupation, one example being the main post office on avenue de la Marsellaise. At the centre of the square, amid the magnolias, is a war memorial showing a mother holding two dead sons in her arms, neither of which, unusually for such monuments, wears a military uniform. This testifies to the horrific family divisions faced by Alsatian families, whose members often found themselves fighting on opposing sides in World War II. At the other end of avenue de la Liberté, across the confluence of the Ill and Aar, is the city's university, where Goethe studied. Adjacent, at the beginning of boulevard de la Victoire, are the splendidly Teutonic municipal baths, the Grand Établissement Municipal de Bains, where you can take a sauna or Turkish bath (€11.50) or just swim (consult the complicated opening hours on the board outside).

From in front of the university, the wide, straight allée de la Robertsau, flanked by confident fin-de-siècle bourgeois residences and beautiful early twentieth-century buildings including some Art Nouveau masterpieces, leads to the headquarters of three major European institutions: the bunker-like Palais de l'Europe, 1970s-built home of the 44-member Council of Europe; the glass and steel curvilinear European Parliament building, opened in 1999; and Richard Rogers' European Court of Human Rights, completed in 1995, which incorporates a curving glass entrance and silver towers that rise to a boat-like superstructure overlooking a sweep of canal. To visit the European Parliament (☎03.88.17.20.07; free) or the European Court of Human Rights and the Council of Europe, which are visited together (☎03.90.21.49.40; free), you have to book.

Opposite the Palais, the Orangerie is Strasbourg's best bit of greenery, and hosts a variety of exhibitions and free concerts. Here the storks, to be seen perching on many buildings in the town, have their main nesting site. There's also a zoo with small animals, such as monkeys, and exotic birds including flamingos.

Eating and drinking

For the classic Strasbourg (and Alsatian) eating experience, you should go to a winstub, loosely translated as a "wine bar", a cosy establishment with bare beams, panels and benches, and a noisy, convivial atmosphere. In the classic version there is a special table, a Stammtisch, set aside for the patron's friends and regulars. The food revolves around the Alsatian classics, all accompanied by local wines (or, especially in a bierstüb, beer), though the more sophisticated ones offer interesting variations on these themes. Traffic-free place du Marché-Gayot

△ Bierstub, Strasbourg

(“PMG”) near the cathedral is one of the best spots for cafés, most of which open until late, while there is a good selection of less touristy restaurants in rue du Faubourg Saverne. The city and rest of the region have more than their fair share of gastronomic awards; some of the best (for which you’ll have to book ahead) are listed among the options below.

Restaurants

Le Buerehiesel 4 parc de l’Orangerie

☎ 03.88.45.56.65, @ www.buerehiesel

.com. This outstanding and prestigious restaurant, delightfully housed in a farmhouse in the Parc de l’Orangerie, is the ideal place for an extravagant bout of self-pampering. Menus €60–150.

Le Clou 32 rue du Chaudron ☎ 03.88.32.11.67.

This has become the most reliable, traditional winstub in the city centre, making reservations a must; the liver dumplings are unbeatable, as are the desserts. Closed Wed & Sun.

Au Coin des Pucelles 12 rue des Pucelles

☎ 03.88.35.35.14. Reasonably priced winstub popular with theatre-goers because of its late opening hours, serving traditional fare with an original twist and reliable wines. Closed Tues & Sun.

Flam’s 1 rue de l’Épine, with another at the corner of rues des Frères and du Faisan. A good place to sample the local speciality, tarte flambée (the Alsatian equivalent of pizza), with an €11 all-you-can-eat tarte flambée menu (includes dessert). Meals from €6.

Fleurdesel 22 quai des Bateliers

☎ 03.88.36.01.54. Trendy place serving adventurous food with an emphasis on exotic flavourings and combinations, such as the prawn and pineapple brochettes for starters. Main dishes are €15, the lunchtime menu is €25. Closed Sun & Mon.

Le Panier du Marché 15 rue Sainte-Barbe

☎ 03.88.32.04.07. Stylish gourmet restaurant with a young clientele and fixed menu (€27 without drinks) for which seasonal ingredients are used to compose meals of outstanding quality. Closed Sat & Sun.

La Place 3 place des Tripiers ☎ 03.88.22.22.20.

Ultra-trendy brasserie that is now one of the places to be. Surprisingly, the well-prepared, delicious bistro-style food is not overpriced, and comes in copious helpings, with half-portions on offer. Open daily till late and has a very popular summer terrace.

Poêles de Carottes 2 place des Meuniers

☎ 03.88.32.33.23. The best vegetarian, organic restaurant in town, in a quiet square tucked away near picturesque Petite France. Lunch €10, dinner €17. Closed Sun.

 S'Munsterstuwel 8 place du Marché-aux-Cochons-de-Lait ☎ 03.88.32.17.63, © munsterstuwel@orange.fr. A very special winstub on one of the city's most attractive squares, this serves both traditional and more unusual dishes till late, with excellent wines to match. Closed Sun & Mon. Meals around €45.

Les Trois Brasseurs 22 rue des Veaux. Wonderful bierstub, which brews its own beer: the enormous copper brewing equipment is part of the decor. Tarte flambée starts at €5, and other Alsatian specialities are available. Happy hour 5–7pm.

Cafés and bars

Académie de la Bière 17 rue Adolphe-Seyboth. Strasbourg's most famous bierstub, open daily till very late.

Les Aviateurs 12 rue des Soeurs. "Les Aviat", as it's known locally, is regularly packed with Strasbourg's fashionable intelligentsia sipping cocktails or draught Guinness until the early hours.

BnG 6 rue des Bouchers. A new "modern bar", as its publicity states, run by friendly management, with chill-out music, cocktails and a tiny terrace for the warmer months.

L'Épicerie 6 rue du Vieux Seigle. Tucked away in the labyrinthine side streets, this appealing little reconstruction of an old-fashioned grocer's dishes up a wide variety of tartines (open sandwiches), along with a range of beers, ciders and soft drinks.

Le Roi et Son Fou 37 rue du Vieil-Hôpital. Friendly brasserie with a sunny terrace looking on to a quiet square, popular with locals for its low-priced lunchtime specials, decent breakfasts and daytime drinks and coffees.

La Salamandre 3 rue Paul-Janet ☎ 03.88.25.79.42. A popular bar-disco (free entrance) famous for its rock concerts (tickets €10–25) and theme nights (€5).

Le Trolleybus 14 rue Sainte-Barbe. Much-frequented focal point in this stretch of newly pedestrianized backstreet – where crowds are drawn by an Irish pub, a Lebanese restaurant, a sushi bar and a couple of other trendy joints; in the warmer months, you can drink and people-watch outside, and there's occasionally live music playing too.

Entertainment

Strasbourg usually has lots going on, particularly when it comes to music. Pick up free monthly magazine Spectacles à Strasbourg et alentours (www.spectacles-publications.com), with entertainment info and practical listings and, in summer months, the free Saison d'Été listings leaflet, both available from the tourist offices. If you're here during university term-time, you might want to check the notice boards at the university as well. Free concerts are held regularly in the Parc des Contades and Parc de l'Orangerie, which also boasts a bowling alley.

The best of the annual festivals focus on classical music in mid-June, jazz in July, and "contemporary classical" music – Musica – from mid-September to early October. In addition, there's Les Nuits de Strasbourg, a firework, light and music display at the Ponts Couverts during July and August, and an impressive illumination of the cathedral facade every summer evening. At the Christkindelsmärik or Marché de Noël (late Nov to Dec 24), an increasingly commercial event dating back over 400 years, central Strasbourg is taken over by wooden stalls selling mulled wine, crafts of varying quality and spicy Christmas cookies known as bredele.

Listings

Bike rental Bicycles can be hired from 4 rue du Maire Kuss, Parking Ste-Aurélié, place du Château and Impasse de la Grande Écluse (near the Ponts Couverts) for €5 a day.

Boat trips Strasbourg Fluvial (☎ 03.88.84.13.13, www.strasbourg.port.fr) runs cruises on the Ill all year round. Cruises depart from the landing stage in front of the Palais Rohan (daily: April–Nov every 30min 9.30am–9pm; Dec–March four departures 10.30am–4pm). The itinerary includes Petite-France, the Vauban dam and the Palais de l'Europe. Evening cruises depart at 9.30 and 10pm May to September only. The trip costs €7, half-price for students and children (€7.40 for evening cruises) and lasts 1hr 10min.

Books FNAC, 22 place Kléber, for a huge selection of books, records and concert tickets; Librairie Internationale Kléber, 1 rue des Francs-Bourgeois, sells new books, some in English; La Librocasse, 2 quai des Pêcheurs, sells secondhand books; Quai des Brumes, 120 Grand'Rue, has a very good range; Bookworm, 4 rue de Pâques, is a small English bookshop with new and used books, plus greetings cards.

Buses Eurolines has an office at 5 rue des Frères (☎03.88.22.73.74). Some out-of-town buses leave from place des Halles.

Car rental Europcar, airport ☎03.88.68.95.55; 15 place de la Gare ☎03.88.15.55.66; Avis, Galérie Marchande, place de la Gare ☎03.88.32.30.44; Hertz, 6 bd de Metz by the gare SNCF ☎03.88.32.57.62.

Cinemas Le Star, 27 rue du Jeu-des-Enfants (☎03.88.22.73.20) and Le Star St Exupéry, 18 rue du 22-novembre (☎03.88.22.28.79); L'Odyssée,

3 rue des Francs-Bourgeois (☎03.88.75.10.47), a sumptuous restored cinema with red velvet seats, shows a combination of classic and contemporary films, many in v.o.

Internet NET SUR COUR, 18 quai des Pêcheurs.

Markets The city's biggest fruit and vegetable market takes place every Tues and Sat morning on bd de la Marne; mostly organic local produce, including foie gras and honey, is sold on the small square next to the forecourt of the Palais Rohan every Sat morning; the Marché aux Puces (Wed & Sat) is on rue du Vieil-Hôpital (near the cathedral).

Post offices 5 av de la Marseillaise and place de la Cathédrale.

Taxis Novotaxi ☎03.88.75.19.19; Taxis 13 ☎03.88.36.13.13.

The northern Vosges

The northern Vosges begin at the Saverne gap northwest of Strasbourg and run up to the German border, where they continue as the Pfälzerwald. They don't reach the same heights as the southern Vosges (see p.311), nor do they boast particularly photogenic villages or famous vineyards but, as a result, they're spared the mass tourism of the southern range. Much of the region comes under the auspices of the Parc Régional des Vosges du Nord, and there are numerous hiking possibilities, plus a couple of attractive towns – Saverne and Wissembourg – built in the characteristic red sandstone of the area.

Transport here is erratic, as elsewhere in Alsace, though not hopeless. SNCF buses wind their way through the villages and apple orchards around Haguenau, and the Strasbourg–Sarreguemines and Hagenau–Bitche train lines cut across the range. Saverne and Wissembourg are also linked to Strasbourg by rail. Even so, the ideal way to explore the region is with your own transport – hilly but rewarding work, if it's a bike.

Saverne and around

SAVERNE, seat of the exiled Catholic prince-bishops of Strasbourg during the Reformation, commands the only easy route across the Vosges into Alsace, at a point where the hills are pinched to a narrow waist. The best launch pad from which to explore the northern Vosges, it's a small and friendly town, with plenty of the region's characteristic steep-pitched roofs and window boxes full of geraniums.

One of the sights worth visiting is the vast red-sandstone Château des Rohan, on place de Gaulle, built in rather austere classical style by one of the Rohans who was prince-bishop at the time, and now housing the Musée Rohan (March–June & Sept–Nov daily except Tues 2–5pm; July & Aug daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Dec–March Sun only 2–5pm; €2.70) and hostel. A feature of the museum is the collection of local Resistance journalist Louise Weiss. The River Zorn and the Marne–Rhine canal both weave their way through the town, the latter framing the château's formal gardens in a graceful right-angle bend. Alongside the château, the church of Notre-Dame-de-la-Nativité contains another finely carved pulpit by Hans Hammer. Horticultural distraction can be found in the town's famed rose garden, La Roseraie (June–Sept daily 10am–7pm; ☎03.88.71.83.33; 🌐www.roseraie-saverne.fr; €2.50), to the west of the centre by the river, which boasts over four hundred varieties, and the botanical gardens, 3km out of town off the N4 Metz–Nancy road (May, June & first two weeks in Sept Mon–Fri 9am–5pm, Sun 2–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Fri 9am–5pm, Sat & Sun 2–7pm; €2.50).

There are several relatively easy walks around Saverne (the tourist office can give details), the most popular taking in the ruined Château du Haut-Barr, which takes about two hours there and back. Follow rue du Haut-Barr southeast along the canal past the leafy suburban villas until you reach the woods, where a signboard indicates the various walks possible. Take the path marked “Haut-Barr” through woods of chestnut, beech and larch, and you’ll see the castle standing dramatically on a narrow sandstone ridge, with fearsome drops on both sides and views across the wooded hills and eastward over the plain towards Strasbourg. Approaching by road you’ll pass the reconstruction of a late eighteenth-century relay tower (July & Aug Wed–Sun 1–6pm; €1.50) that was part of the optical telegraph link between Paris and Strasbourg until the middle of the nineteenth century. An audiovisual presentation inside explains the pioneering system invented by Claude Chappe in 1794.

If you’re driving, you can easily get to the beautiful small towns and villages around Saverne, in particular Bouxwiller, Neuwiller, Pfaffenhoffen and Ingwiller, from where an alternative road to Bitche leads through the densely wooded heart of the northern Vosges. A short way outside Ingwiller, the much-restored Château of Lichtenburg (March & Nov Mon–Sat 1–4pm, Sun 10am–7pm; April, May, Sept & Oct Mon 1.30–6pm, Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 1.30–4pm, Sun & hols 10am–7pm; June–Aug Mon 1.30–6pm, Tues–Sat 10am–6pm, Sun & hols 10am–7pm; €2.50) dates back to the thirteenth century.

Practicalities

The tourist office is at 37 Grand’ Rue (Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–7pm; May–Oct also open Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; ☎03.88.91.80.47, 🌐www.ot-saverne.fr); they can provide a map of walks in the area published by the Saverne Centre de Randonnées Pedestres (part of the Club Vosgien). For accommodation in town, try the Europe, at 7 rue de la Gare (☎03.88.71.12.07, 🌐www.hotel-europe-fr.com; 📍), with bright, modern rooms. Alternatively, the Hotel/Restaurant Chez Jean, 3 rue de la Gare (☎03.88.91.10.19, 🌐www.chez-jean.com; 📍), has a restaurant with good Alsatian food (menus €17–45). A less expensive option is the National, 2 Grand’ Rue (☎03.88.91.14.54, 🌐www.hotel-national-saverne.com; 📍); more reasonable still is the friendly HI hostel in the Château Rohan, on place de Gaulle (☎03.88.91.14.84, 📧saverne@fuaj.org; reception open 8–10am & 5–10pm; cardholders only). There’s also a campsite about 1km from town, below the Château du Haut-Barr on rue du Père-Liebermann (☎03.88.91.35.65; April–Sept).

As for food, gourmets will appreciate the 🍷 Taverne Katz on the main street, 80 Grand’ Rue (☎03.88.71.16.56; closed Tues eve & Wed; menu €15–25): a beautiful old house with an ornately carved facade and plush decor within, it offers excellent traditional cuisine, with very good baeckoffe and divine sorbets. Restaurant Staeffele, 1 rue Poincaré (☎03.88.91.63.94; closed Wed, Thurs lunch & Sun eve; menus €35–50), is also worth a visit for impeccably prepared Alsatian fare in stylish surroundings. More modest and with a local ambience, the Restaurant de la Marne, 5 rue du Griffon (☎03.88.91.19.18; closed Mon), overlooks the Marne–Rhine canal in the centre of town and serves copious salads amongst a varied menu. There’s also a restaurant specializing in foie gras at the Château du Haut-Barr (see p.309; ☎03.88.91.17.61; closed all day Mon and Thurs dinner; menus €18–40).

Wissembourg

3

WISSEMBOURG, 60km north of Strasbourg and right on the German border, is a small town of cobbled and higgledy-piggledy prettiness, largely given over to moneyed German weekenders. The townspeople have a curious linguistic anomaly; they speak an ancient dialect derived from Frankish, unlike their fellow Alsatians whose language is closer to modern German.

At the end of rue Nationale, the town’s main commercial street, stands the imposing Gothic church of St-Paul-et-St-Pierre, with a Romanesque belfry and some fine twelfth- and thirteenth-century stained glass, once attached to the town’s abbey. Beneath the apse, the meandering River Lauter flows under the Pont du Sel beside the town’s most striking secular building and first hospital, the Maison du Sel (1450), in a part of town dubbed la Petite Venise (Little Venice). A few minutes’ walk away, at 3 rue du Musée on the northern edge of town, another fine old building, with beautifully carved woodwork round its windows, contains the town’s folk museum, the Musée Westercamp (closed for renovation at the time of writing). Along the southern edge of town, following the riverbank from the Tour des Husgenossen in the western corner, a long section of the medieval walls survives intact, built – like the houses – in the local red sandstone.

Practicalities

Wissembourg’s tourist office is at 9 place de la République (May–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 2–5.30pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–5.30pm; ☎03.88.94.10.11, 🌐www.ot-wissembourg.fr). From the gare SNCF the “Office du Tourisme” signs are for cars – if you’re on foot the quickest route is to turn left out of the station and walk to the roundabout, where you’ll see signs of café life. Turn right and you’re in town.

For accommodation, the most attractive hotel is the Hôtel du Cygne, 3 rue du Sel, next to the town hall on the central place de la République (☎03.88.94.00.16, ☎03.88.54.38.28; 🍷; closed two weeks in Feb & two weeks in July; restaurant €20–54). The friendly Hôtel de la Gare, opposite the train station (☎03.88.94.13.67, ☎03.88.94.06.88; 🍷), has a well-priced restaurant (closed Sun; menu at €14–27). In the main street, the hotel-restaurant L’Escargot, 40 rue Nationale (☎03.88.94.90.29, ☎03.88.94.90.29; 🍷; closed Sun; menu at €11.50–23), has a restaurant that serves traditional Alsatian cuisine.

In addition to the hotel restaurants above there are some reasonable places to eat on the main rue Nationale, such as Au Petit Dominicain, 36 rue Nationale (☎03.88.94.90.87; closed Mon and Tues; menu at €9–20), which serves traditional Alsatian food. A much fancier establishment, with a chef who serves his own inventive variations on the traditional regional cuisine, is 🍷 À l’Ange, 2 rue de la République (☎03.88.94.12.11; closed Tues eve, Wed & last two weeks in Feb), in a beautiful old house by the stream next to place du Marché-aux-Choux; the cheapest menu is the lunchtime €28, otherwise you’re looking at twice that. For simple tartes flambées (from €6), Au Saumon, behind the Maison du Sel, has a delightful garden and outdoor oven. La Mirabelle, 3 rue Général-Leclerc, is an agreeable outdoor café for summer meals, also from €6.

The southern Vosges

The major attractions of the southern Vosges, which stretch all the way down to Belfort (see p.961), are conveniently located along the Route du Vin (“Wine Route”). Every turn in the road, which follows the foot of the mountains along the western edge of the wide and flat Rhine valley, reveals yet another exquisitely preserved medieval town or village. Many of these, such as Colmar, the main centre for the route, suffer from an overdose of visitors, so to escape from the crowds, you need to head for the hills proper, along the Route des Crêtes, which traces the central ridge of the Vosges to the west.

The Route du Vin

Set against the “blue line of the Vosges”, the Route du Vin winds from Marlenheim, west of Strasbourg, to Thann, near Mulhouse, through endless terraced vineyards which produce the region’s famous white wines. Opportunities for tasting the local produce are plentiful, with free dégustations along the roadside and in the caveaux of most villages (though you’re expected to buy at least a couple of bottles), and also at the region’s countless wine festivals – mostly coinciding with the October harvest. For a closer look at the vines themselves you can follow various sentiers vinicoles (vineyard paths); Strasbourg and local tourist offices have details. In the midst of this sea of vines are dozens of typically picturesque Alsatian villages, which outdo each other to have the biggest display of window-box geraniums. Many are dominated from the nearby craggy heights by an extraordinary number of ancient ruined castles, testimony to the province’s turbulent past.

The Route du Vin is deceptively hilly work on a bike, but getting around is definitely easier with your own transport. Otherwise you’re dependent either on the train, which narrowly misses some of the best villages, or the region’s so-so bus service. In summer and autumn there’s a food or wine festival each weekend in a different town or village, with wine-tastings, tarte flambée and other local delicacies, arts and crafts and, if you’re unlucky, traditional Alsatian music.

Obernai and around

Picturesque little OBERNAI, on the D422, is the first place most people head for when travelling south along the route from Strasbourg. Miraculously unscathed by the last two world wars, Obernai has retained almost its entire rampart system, including no fewer than fifteen towers, along with street after street of carefully maintained medieval houses. Not surprisingly, it also gets more than its fair share of visitors; this shouldn’t put you off as the town is just about big enough to absorb the crowds, but do try to come on a weekday in the summer. The tourist office, on place du Beffroi (May–Oct Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–7pm, Sun 9am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; Nov–April Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎03.88.95.64.13), has lots of useful information about wine and easy-to-follow routes for exploring the region. There are a couple of moderately priced hotels, the Maison du Vin, 1 rue de la Paille (☎03.88.95.46.82, ☎03.88.95.54.00; 📍), whose pretty rooms are above a wine shop; and La Diligence, 23 place de la Mairie (☎03.88.95.55.69, 🌐www.hotel-diligence.com; 📍), with a charming and reasonably priced salon de thé serving petits plats all day. For something more special, you could try the appealing boutique hotel Le Colombier (☎03.88.47.63.33, 🌐www.hotel-colombier.com; 📍), at 6–8 rue Dietrich. La Halle au Blé is a good café for a hot chocolate after a hard day’s hiking in the Vosges.

ROSHEIM, 7km north of Obernai and up in the hills a little to the west of the D422, is relatively off the beaten track. Its two main sights are the Romanesque church of St-Pierre-et-St-Paul, whose roof is peppered with comical sculptured figures contemporary with the building, and the twelfth-century Heidenhüs, at 24 rue de la Principale, thought to be the oldest building in Alsace. The simple, clean, friendly family-run Hôtel Alpina, 39 rue du Lion (☎03.88.50.49.30, ☎03.88.49.25.75; 📍), with an attractive terrace and breakfast room, is a great place to stay. Rosenwiller, a couple of kilometres up the hill among the vineyards, has a prettily sited and atmospherically overgrown Jewish cemetery at the edge of the woods, testimony to Alsace's once flourishing Jewish community.

From Rosheim's gare SNCF, 1.5km northeast of the village, a steam train runs up the valley on Sundays and holidays to Ottrott, which produces one of the few red wines of Alsace. An elegantly restored and modernized village house at 11 rue des Châteaux has been transformed into a rather luxurious hotel, the Hostellerie des Châteaux (☎03.88.48.14.14, 🌐www.hostellerie-chateaux.fr; 📍), with a sauna, swimming pool and overpriced restaurant.

Ottrott brings you within hiking distance – 6km – of Mont Ste-Odile (763m), whose summit is surrounded by a mysterious prehistoric wall (known as the Mur Païen, or Pagan Wall), originally built in the tenth century BC. The wall is almost 10km in length and in parts reaches a height of 3.5m. St Odilia herself is buried in the small chapel on top of the hill, a pilgrimage site even today. According to tradition, she was cast out by her father at birth on account of her blindness, but miraculously regained her sight during childhood and returned to found the convent on Mont Ste-Odile, where she cured thousands of cases of blindness and leprosy.

Barr

For some reason, BARR, west of the main road, is overlooked by mass tourism. Every bit as charming as Obernai, it's easy to while away a couple of hours wandering its twisting cobbled streets, at their busiest during the mid-July wine festival and on Sundays when the vintners come to ply their wines. The town has just one specific sight, La Folie Marco, at 30 rue du Docteur-Sultzer (June & Oct Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; July–Sept daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.88.08.94.72; €3), an unusually large eighteenth-century house on the outskirts of town along the road to Obernai, which has displays of period French and Alsatian furniture. There are regular dégustations in the garden cellar, and a festival of dance and waltz at the end of May. There's also a restaurant serving Alsatian specialities (menus €17–24, tarte flambée €7). Some interesting walks begin behind the Hôtel de Ville, including one to Mont Ste-Odile (14km; 3–4 hours).

The nearest gare SNCF is in the neighbouring village of Gertwiller, 1km to the east. The nicest place to stay in Barr is the superb 🏡 Hôtel Le Manoir, 11 rue St-Marc (☎03.88.08.03.40, ☎03.88.08.53.71; 📍), on the edge of town, with light, spacious rooms and a splendid buffet breakfast. Alternatively, there are two campsites: the Camping St-Martin, at rue de l'Îll, near the Catholic church (☎03.88.08.00.45; June to mid-Oct), and municipal campsite, Ste-Odile "Wepfermatt", 3km out of town at 137 rue de la Vallée (☎03.88.08.02.38; May–Oct). St-Pierre, 3km south of Barr, also has a campsite – the Beau Séjour (☎03.88.08.52.24 or 03.88.08.90.79; mid-May to Sept). For a really good tarte flambée in a restaurant with great atmosphere, try Les Caveau des Tanneurs, 32 rue Neuve (☎03.88.08.91.50; tarte flambée from €6; Wed–Sun dinner only): the Munster (a pungent kind of cheese) with cumin seeds is particularly good.

Winstub S'Barrer Stubbel, 5 place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville (☎03.88.08.57.44), also serves good local specialities at reasonable prices.

Le Struthof concentration camp

Deep in the forests and hills of the Vosges, over 20km west of Barr, Le Struthof-Natzwiller (daily: March, April & mid-Sept to Dec 10am–5pm; May to mid-Sept 9am–6pm; closed Jan & Feb; ☎03.88.97.04.49, 🌐www.struthof.fr; €5) was the only Nazi concentration camp to be built on French soil (though at the time, of course, it was part of the Greater German Reich). The site is almost perversely beautiful, its stepped terraces cut into steep hillside, giving fantastic views across the Bruche valley. Set up shortly after Hitler's occupation of Alsace-Lorraine in 1940, it is thought that over 10,000 people died here. When the Allies liberated the camp on November 23, 1944, they found it empty – the remaining prisoners had already been transported to Dachau.

The barbed wire and watchtowers are as they were, though only two of the prisoners' barracks remain, one of which is now a museum of the deportations. An arson attack on the museum by neo-Nazis in 1976 only served to underline the need for such displays; captions are in French only, but the pictures suffice to tell the story. At the foot of the camp is the crematorium with its ovens still intact, while a couple of kilometres down the road to the west, towards Schirmeck, the Germans built a gas chamber – proof that Le Struthof was a fully integrated part of the Nazi killing machine. To the east, the two main granite quarries worked by the internees still survive, clearly signposted from the main road.

Sélestat and around

Back on the Route du Vin, SÉLESTAT, midway between Strasbourg and Colmar, is a delightful old town, and a good base for exploring the central and most popular section of the route. The choice of reasonable accommodation is better than average, and the town itself contains a couple of interesting churches and a great museum for bibliophiles.

The oldest and finest of the two churches is the church of Ste-Foy. Built by the monks of Conques, it has been much restored since but its clean, austere Romanesque lines have not been entirely wiped out. Close by, to the north, the much larger Gothic church of St-Georges sports spectacularly multicoloured roof tiles and some very fine stained glass. For a brief period in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, Sélestat was the intellectual centre of Alsace, owing mainly to its Latin School, which attracted a group of humanists led by Beatus Rhenanus, whose personal library was one of the most impressive collections of its time. At the Bibliothèque Humaniste, founded in the fifteenth century and housed in the town's former corn exchange just by St-Georges (July & Aug Mon & Wed–Fri 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sat 9am–noon & 2–5pm, Sun 2–5pm; Sept–June Mon & Wed–Fri 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sat 9am–noon; €3.70), Rhenanus' collection is now on display along with some unusual and very rare books and manuscripts from as far back as the seventh century. A highlight for many is the 1507 manuscript Cosmographiae Introductio, the first document ever to use the word "America".

Sélestat is comparatively well served transport-wise, with frequent train connections to Strasbourg and Colmar; the gare SNCF is west of the town centre down avenue de la Liberté. Information is available from the tourist office by the ring road on boulevard du Général-Leclerc (May–Sept Mon–Fri 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sat 9am–noon & 2–5pm, Sun 9am–3pm; Oct–April Mon–Fri 8.30am–noon & 1.30–6pm, Sat 9am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎ 03.88.58.87.20, 🌐 www.selestat-tourisme.com). For a place to stay, there's none better than the comfortable, friendly Auberge des Alliés, 39 rue des Chevaliers, in the middle of town (☎ 03.88.92.09.34, 🌐 www.auberge-des-allies.com; 🕒; closed Sun eve & Mon); its restaurant is good value and worth a look for its splendid tiled stove (menus €18–40). A modern alternative is the Vaillant on place de la République (☎ 03.88.92.09.46, 🌐 www.hotel-vaillant.com; 🕒; restaurant €17–37). There's a campsite, Les Cigognes (☎ 03.88.92.03.98; May to mid-Oct), south of the centre behind Vauban's remaining ramparts.

Castles around Sélestat

Within easy range of Sélestat is a whole host of ruined castles. Seven kilometres north, and accessible by train, the village of DAMBACH-LA-VILLE, with its walls and three fortified gates all intact, is one of the highlights of the route. A thirty-minute climb west of the village is the formidable Castle of Bernstein. This is a typically Germanic mountain keep: tall and narrow with few openings and little use for everyday living. Around it are residential buildings enclosed within an outer wall, the masonry cut into protruding knobs giving it a curious pimpled texture. You can also go on a mini-train tour of the town and local vineyards (July & Aug Mon, Thurs & Sat 5pm; €5), leaving from the main town square. Dambach has an inexpensive municipal campsite (☎ 03.88.92.48.60; mid-May to mid-Oct), 1km east on the D210, and a small but most attractive and inexpensive restaurant, À la Couronne, 13 place du Marché (☎ 03.88.92.40.85; closed Thurs, Feb 12 to March 1 & Nov 15–30; menus €11–23).

The best cluster of castles, though, is southwest of Sélestat. Four kilometres from the village, KINTZHEIM boasts a small but wonderful ruined castle built around a cylindrical refuge-tower. Today it's an aviary, the Volerie des Aigles, for birds of prey, with magnificent displays of aerial prowess by eagles and vultures (April–Nov; ☎ 03.88.92.84.33 for details of afternoon demonstrations, 🌐 www.voleriedesaigles.com; adults €9, children under 15 €6). If watching Barbary apes at play in the Vosgian jungle takes your fancy, you can do just that a couple of kilometres further west at the Montagne des Singes (daily: April, Oct & Nov 10am–noon & 1–5pm; May, June & Sept 10am–noon & 1–6pm; July & Aug 10am–6pm; 🌐 www.montagnedesinges.com; €7.50, children €4.50).

Another 5km on from Kintzheim, the ruins of Oudenbourg Castle, its sizeable hall preserved among the trees, are dwarfed by the massive Haut-Koenigsbourg (daily: March & Oct 9.45am–5pm; April, May & Sept 9.30am–5.30pm; June, July & Aug 9.30am–6.30pm; Nov–Feb 9.45am–noon & 1–5pm; ☎03.88.82.50.60, 🌐www.haut-koenigsbourg.net; €7.50, free for children and on first Sun of month Oct–March), one of the biggest, most visited castles in Alsace, and – astride its 757-metre bluff – by far the highest. Ruined after an assault in 1633, it was heavily restored in the early years of the twentieth century for Kaiser Wilhelm II. It's easy to criticize some of the detail of the restoration, but it's an enjoyable experience and a remarkably convincing re-creation of a castle-palace of the period. There are guided tours, but it's best explored on your own, taking in the fantastic views. There's a winding road down to Bergheim from here (see below), if you'd rather not retrace your tracks to Sélestat.

▲ Barbary apes at the Montagne des Singes

Ribeauvillé and around

RIBEAUVILLÉ is the largest town between Sélestat and Colmar – not as pretty as some of its immediate neighbours, but right at the foot of the mountains and well placed for exploring the many castles and villages that surround it. If you wish to stay, you could try the fancy but friendly little Hôtel de la Tour, in a converted winery at 1 rue de la Mairie (☎03.89.73.72.73, 🌐www.hotel-la-tour.com; 📍; closed Jan to mid-March), with a Turkish bath and a winstub. Two local campsites are Camping des Trois Châteaux (☎03.89.73.20.00; July & Aug), to the north of Ribeauvillé, and the much plusher Pierre-de-Courbertin site (☎03.89.73.66.71; March–Nov) to the south.

Nearby are the romantic ruins of a trio of fortresses built by the counts of Ribeaupierre, all open to the public, free of charge: St-Ulrich, an hour's haul up a marked path; just north of it the smaller Girsberg, balanced on a pinnacle which somehow provides room for a bailey, two towers and other buildings; and, further on, the ruins of the Château du Haut-Ribeaupierre, whose keep is inaccessible for safety reasons.

BERGHEIM, 3.5km northeast of Ribeauvillé, retains a good part of its old fortifications, with three towers still surviving – despite being one of the most beautiful Alsatian villages, it rarely attracts the attentions of the tour groups. Also within easy walking range of Ribeauvillé, this time to the south, the village of HUNAWIHR is another beguiling hamlet, with a fourteenth-century walled church standing out amid the green vines. Hunawihir is at the forefront of the Alsatian ecological movement aimed at protecting the stork – the cigogne – of the region, and there's a reserve for them plus otters (loutres) and other fishing mammals to the east of the village, the Centre de Réintroduction des Cigognes et des Loutres (April, May & Sept to mid-Nov daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; June–Aug daily 10am–6pm; call to check show times, ☎03.89.73.72.62, 🌐www.cigogne-loutre.com; €8).

Lastly, nearer to the hub of Colmar are a couple of very busy tourist targets, which are best visited midweek or out of season. A couple of kilometres south of Hunawihir, the walled village of RIQUEWIHR is exceptionally well preserved, with plenty of medieval houses and a château containing a postal museum, the Musée d'Histoire des PTT d'Alsace (April–Oct & Dec daily except Tues 10am–5.30pm; €4); consequently it suffers more visitors per annum than any other village along the route. KAYSERSBERG, still further southwest, boasts a fortified bridge and a handsome sixteenth-century wooden altarpiece in the main church. But the town's principal renown is as the birthplace of theologian, philosopher and Nobel Peace Prize-winner Albert Schweitzer, who spent most of his extremely active, and not always peaceful, life at the leprosy hospital he founded at Lambaréné in French Equatorial Africa, now Gabon. He is honoured with the Centre Culturel Albert Schweitzer, 126 rue du Général-de-Gaulle (Easter & May–Oct daily 9am–noon & 2–6pm; €2).

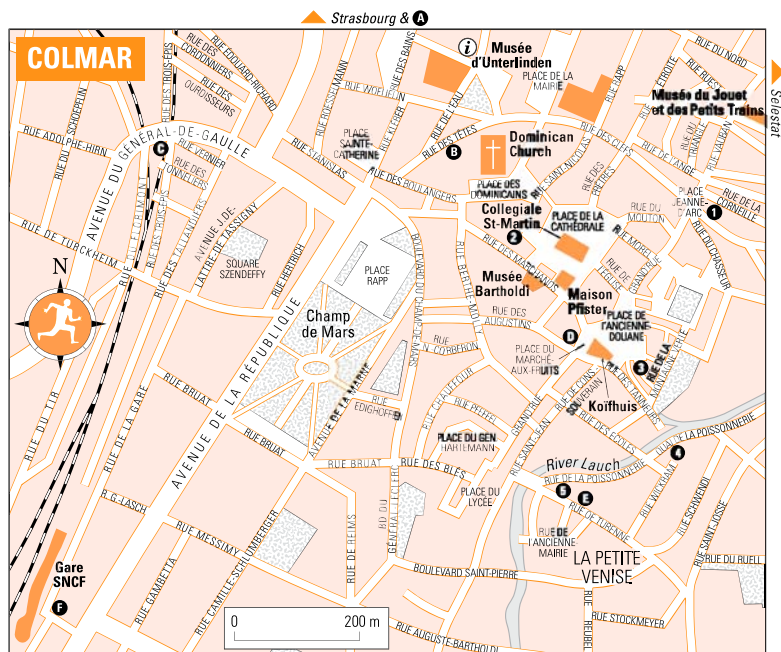

Colmar

The old centre of COLMAR, a fifty-minute train ride south of Strasbourg, is totally echt Alsatian, with crooked houses, half-timbered and painted, on crooked lanes – all extremely picturesque, and very busy with tourists virtually year round. Colmar is also the proud home to one of the most extraordinary of all Gothic paintings – the altarpiece for St Anthony's monastery at Issenheim, painted by Mathias Grünewald.

Arrival, information and accommodation

From the gare SNCF it's a ten-minute walk down avenue de la République to the tourist office on place d'Unterlinden (April–June, Sept & Oct Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 10am–2pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 9.30am–2pm; Nov–March Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–2pm; ☎ 03.89.20.68.92, @ www.ot-colmar.fr). Besides selling Club Vosgien hiking maps and a booklet of day walks in the hills behind the town, they'll also give you details of the buses to the towns and villages of the Route du Vin, which leave from outside the gare SNCF. Bikes can be rented from a number of outlets in town.

Accommodation is not as overpriced as you might expect, with a wide range of places to stay, including an excellent boutique hotel, plus a popular youth hostel. You could also ask at the tourist office for a list of recommended chambres d'hôtes and fermes auberges (farms with guest rooms) in and near the city.

ACCOMMODATION

Auberge de Jeunesse
Mittelhardt
Colbert
Le Colombier

A Grand Hôtel Bristol
C St Martin
E Les Têtes

F
D
B

EATING

Le Restaurant du Marché
Le Petit Gourmand
Le Streusel

À la Ville de Paris 1
Winstub Brenner 5

Hotels

Colbert 2 rue des Trois-Épis ☎ 03.89.41.31.05, ☎ 03.89.23.66.75. A plain, run-of-the-mill place but quiet, comfortable and conveniently located. ②

 Le Colombier 7 rue Turenne ☎ 03.89.23.96.00, 🌐 www.hotel-le-

-colombier.fr. Colmar's only boutique hotel, right in the heart of the Petite Venise quarter, has charming air-conditioned rooms and a garage. ⑦

Grand Hôtel Bristol 7 place de la Gare ☎ 03.89.23.59.59, 🌐 www.grand-hotel-bristol.fr. Directly opposite the station exit, this relic of the grand old prewar days of tourism is now comfortably refurbished and part of a chain. ⑥

St-Martin 38 Grand'Rue, ☎ 03.89.24.11.51, 🌐 www.hotel-saint-martin.com. Chintzy furnishings with a riot of checks, flowers and flounces but this impeccably maintained hotel is still unbeatable for its central location. ⑤

Les Têtes 19 rue des Têtes ☎ 03.89.24.43.43, 🌐 www.ila-chateau.com/tetes. Like its gourmet restaurant set in the atmospheric courtyard, this well-appointed hotel in a historic building is a touch old-fashioned, verging on the starchy, but still an obvious choice for a special visit. ⑥

Hostel and campsite

Auberge de Jeunesse Mittelhardt 2 rue Pasteur ☎ 03.89.80.57.39, ☎ 03.89.80.76.16. The town's only youth hostel is perfectly decent but gets extremely busy in summer with teenagers. Take bus #4 from the station or rue d'Unterlinden, stop "Lycée Technique".

Camping Colmar-Horbouurg-Wihr rte de Neuf-Brisach ☎ 03.89.41.15.94. Acceptable campsite, the nearest to the town centre, 2km away. Take bus #1 from the station, direction "Wihr", stop "Plage de l'III". March–Dec.

The Town

The pièce de résistance of the unmissable Musée d'Unterlinden, housed in a former Dominican convent at 1 rue d'Unterlinden (May–Oct daily 9am–6pm; Nov–April daily except Tues 9am–noon & 2–5pm; closed public hols; €7; 🌐 www.musee-unterlinden.com) is the Issenheim altarpiece. Originally designed as a single piece, on the front was the Crucifixion, almost luridly expressive: a tortured Christ with stretched ribcage and outside hands turned upwards, fingers splayed in pain, flanked by his pale, fainting mother and saints John and Mary Magdalene. Then it unfolded, relative to its function on feast days, Sundays and weekdays, to reveal an Annunciation, Resurrection, Virgin and Child, and finally a sculpted panel depicting saints Anthony, Augustine and Jerome. Completed in 1515, the painting is affected by Renaissance innovations in light and perspective while still rooted in the medieval spirit, and visitors are invariably struck by the "modern" appearance of some details. Also worth a look is the collection of modern paintings in the basement, which includes works by Picasso, Léger and Vasarely.

A short walk away, the austere Dominican church on rue des Serruriers (April–Dec daily 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; €1.50) has some fine glass and, above all, a radiantly beautiful altarpiece known as The Virgin in a Bower of Roses, painted in 1473 by Martin Schongauer, who is also represented in the Musée d'Unterlinden. At the other end of the street you come to the Collégiale St-Martin on a busy café-lined square. Known locally as "the cathedral", it's worth a quick peek for its stonework and stained glass, as is the sixteenth-century Maison Pfister, on the south side of the church, for its external painted panels. Frédéric Auguste Bartholdi, the nineteenth-century sculptor responsible for New York's Statue of Liberty, was born at 30 rue des Marchands. This has been turned into the Musée Bartholdi (March–Dec daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; closed public hols; €4.10), containing Bartholdi's personal effects, plus the original designs for the statue, along with sundry Colmarabilia.

Rue des Marchands continues south to the Ancienne Douane or Koïfhus, its gaily painted roof tiles loudly proclaiming the city's medieval prosperity. This is the heart of Colmar's old town, a short step away from the archly picturesque quarter down the Grand'Rue, cut through by the River Lauch and known as La Petite Venise (Little Venice). The dolly-mixture colours of the old fishing cottages on quai de la Poissonnerie, contrast with the much taller, black-and-white, half-timbered tanners' houses on rue des Tanneurs, which leads off from the Koifhus. The openings on the top floor were designed for drying hides. A stroll through the old town also takes you to the Musée Animé du Jouet et des Petits Trains, 40 rue Vauban (July–Sept daily 9am–6pm; Oct–June daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4), whose collection of toys and toy trains is great fun for children.

Eating and drinking

There is no lack of cafés and tearooms in Colmar, dotted all around the central streets and squares, but restaurants are generally overpriced, particularly the Alsatian ones located along the tourist trail. A tempting alternative is to amass a sumptuous picnic from the town's patisseries, charcuteries, and fruit and vegetable markets (every Thursday around the Koifhus; every Saturday on place St-Joseph).

Le Restaurant du Marché 20 place de la Cathédrale. More sophisticated cuisine than elsewhere – the chef occasionally wields a wok – based on French cordon bleu, making a change from the pig-based local fare but at a price: main courses €17–24. Closed Wed & Sun.

Le Petit Gourmand quai de la Poissonnerie ☎03.89.41.09.32. Unassuming little Alsatian restaurant with a delightful little waterside terrace. Closed Mon and Tues eve.

Le Streusel 4 passage de l'Ancienne Douane. Slightly hidden away, despite being close to the touristy Grand'Rue and near the Petite Venise.

Excellent salads and other vegetarian dishes are served, in addition to traditional choucroute and the like, and first-class pastries for afternoon tea and coffee.

À la Ville de Paris 4 place Jeanne-d'Arc. This atmospheric little winstub is a preferred haunt of locals; ham, pork and river fish main courses €12–16, or from €27 à la carte. Closed Tues.

Winstub Brenner 1 rue Turenne. Traditional mainstay Petite Venise winstub serving delicious, generous meals, with a lovely summertime waterside terrace; menu €22. Closed Tues & Wed.

Munster and the Route des Crêtes

MUNSTER owes its existence and its name to a band of Irish monks who founded a monastery here in the seventh century, some 19km west of Colmar up the narrowing valley of the River Fecht, and overlooked by Le Petit Ballon (1267m) and Le Hohneck (1362m), among the highest peaks of the Vosges. Its name today is particularly associated with a rich, creamy and exceedingly smelly cheese, the crowning glory of many an Alsatian meal. The town makes a peaceful and verdant base either for exploring further into the mountain range, much of which lies within the Parc Régional des Ballons des Vosges, or for visiting Colmar and other places along the Route du Vin. It also holds a reputed jazz festival in early May each year (@jazzalsace@aol.com).

Munster is accessible by train from Colmar. The tourist office, 1 rue du Couvnet (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.89.77.31.80), has lots of information about hiking in the Munster valley and the parc régional. However, the Maison du Parc, 1 cour de l'Abbaye (May–Sept daily except Mon 9am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct–April Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.89.77.90.20), is the best place to get information about the park.

If you want to stay, you could try the large, modern Hôtel Verte-Vallée, 10 rue Alfred-Hartmann (☎03.89.77.15.15, 🌐www.verte-vallee.com; 📍), in the depths of the wooded valley, which, with its spa, squeaky-clean atmosphere and pastel colours, makes a perfect haven for a day or two. It has a good restaurant specializing

Hiking in the southern Vosges

There's no shortage of waymarked paths in the southern Vosges. Six GRs cross the Vosges and are a good way to see the less-frequented castles.

GR7: Ballon d'Alsace to Remiremont.

GR53: Wissembourg to Belfort (part of the route coincides with GR5).

GR59: Ballon d'Alsace to Besançon.

GR531: Wissembourg to the Ballon d'Alsace.

GR532: Soultz-sous-Forêts to Belfort.

GR533: Sarrebourg to Belfort, along the west flank of the Vosges.

There are five treks of between five and eleven days' duration described in Les Grandes Traversées des Vosges, published by the Office Départemental du Tourisme du Bas-Rhin, 9 rue du Dôme, 67000 Strasbourg (☎ 03.88.15.45.80), with details of accommodation, access and so on. Another useful contact for information is the Association Départementale du Tourisme du Haut-Rhin, 1 rue Schlumberger, 68006 Colmar (☎ 03.89.20.10.62/68, 🌐 www.tourisme68.asso.fr).

Organized walks, involving guides or luggage transport or both, are arranged by tourist offices and a handful of companies, the most reliable of which is Horizons d'Alsace, 7 Grand' Rue, Kientzheim (☎ 03.89.78.35.20, 🌐 www.horizons-alsace.com). Three- to six-night walks, with emphasis on wine-tasting and gourmet cuisine, cost on average €400–600 per person, meals included.

Belfort, in Franche-Comté (see p.961), is another good place to base a hiking trip in the southern Vosges. The Ballon d'Alsace, in the centre of the Parc Régional des Ballons des Vosges, is the meeting point of the GR5, GR7 and GR59, and a discovery trail has been marked out around the summit. A number of PR trails (rambles) begin from here. The Malsaucy lake along the GR5 trail is another popular hiking area. Contact the Belfort tourist office for maps and information.

in traditional French dishes, with a terrace overlooking the stream (closed most of Jan; menu €18–52, carte from €33). Munster's campsite, Camping municipal du Parc de la Fecht, is on the route de Gunsbach (☎ 03.89.77.31.08; May to mid-Sept).

The Route des Crêtes

Above Munster the main road west to Gérardmer crosses the mountains by the principal pass, the Col de la Schlucht, where it intersects the "Route des Crêtes", built for strategic purposes during World War I. It's a spectacular trail, traversing thick forest and open pasture, where the herds of cows that produce the Munster cheese graze in summer; in winter it becomes one long cross-country ski route. Starting in Cernay, 15km west of Mulhouse, it follows the main ridge of the Vosges, including the highest peak of the range, the Grand Ballon (1424m), north as far as Ste-Marie-aux-Mines, 20km west of Sélestat, once at the heart of a silver-mining district. From Munster it's also accessible by a twisting minor road through Hohrodberg, which takes you past beautiful glacial lakes, the Lac Blanc and the Lac Noir, and the eerie World War I battlefield of Linge, where the French and German trenches, once separated by just a few metres, are still clearly visible.

Mulhouse and around

A large sprawling industrial city 35km south of Colmar, MULHOUSE was Swiss until 1798 when, at the peak of its prosperity (based on printed cotton fabrics and allied trades), it voted to become part of France. Even now many people who live here work in Basel, Switzerland. It's also the birthplace of Alfred Dreyfus, the unfortunate Jewish army officer who was wrongly convicted of espionage in 1894 (see "Contexts", p.1278). Not having much of an old town, it is not ideal for strollers, but there are a handful of outstanding – and rather unusual – museums in and around the town that delve into the region's manufacturing past: wallpaper and printed fabrics, locomotives and automobiles are all given their platform, along with some even quirkier themes. The jazz festival in August is a good time to be out partying, with concerts in the museums, the schools, the streets, the cafés and the bars.

The Town

Close to the gare SNCF, just along the canal to the right, is the interesting Musée de l'Impression sur Étoffes, 14 rue Jean-Jacques-Henner (daily except Mon 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €6, combined with the Musée du Papier-Peint in Rixheim, €10; www.musee-impression.com). Its vast collection of the most beautiful fabrics imaginable, including the eighteenth-century Indian and Persian imports that revolutionized the European ready-to-wear market in their time and made Mulhouse a prosperous manufacturing centre, is mostly displayed in temporary exhibitions lasting several months; there are also shows dedicated to related art forms such as patchwork quilts. Try and coincide with one of the demonstrations – consult the website for details. Also in the centre, the Hôtel de Ville on central place de la Réunion contains a beautifully presented history of the city and its hinterland in the Musée Historique (daily except Tues: July & Aug 10am–noon & 2–6.30pm; Sept–June 10am–noon & 2–6pm; free), which also exhibits seventeenth- and eighteenth-century furnishings.

Some way to the west of the centre, in the direction of the A36 autoroute, is the recently revamped Cité du Train – Musée Français du Chemin de Fer, 2 rue Alfred-de-Glehn (daily 10am–5/6pm, Jan closed weekday mornings; €10, combined ticket with Cité de l'Automobile, €15.50; take bus #20 from gare SNCF to stop "Musées"; www.citedutrain.com). Slicker and more interactive than ever after an early millennium makeover, including the introduction of info about the TGV, its main attractions remain the impressive railway rolling stock on display, including Napoléon III's aide-de-camp's drawing room, decorated by Viollet-le-Duc in 1856, and a luxuriously appointed 1926 diner from the Golden Arrow. There are cranes, stations, signals and related artefacts, but the stars of the show are the big locomotive engines with brightly painted boilers, gleaming wheels and pistons, and tangles of brass and copper piping – real works of art.

△ Bugatti at the Cité de l'Automobile, Mulhouse

A couple of kilometres north of the city centre, with a shining new entrance showing off some hi-tech displays, the Cité de l'Automobile, Musée National-Collection Schlumpf, 192 av de Colmar (daily 10am–5/6pm, Jan closed weekday mornings; €10.50, combined ticket with Cité du Train, €15.50; take tram #1 from gare SNCF or place Porte-Jeune to stop “Musée Auto”; www.collection-schlumpf.com), houses an overwhelming collection of over six hundred cars, originally the private collection of local Schlumpf brothers. Lined up in endless row after endless row under massive hangars, the impeccably preserved vehicles range from the industry's earliest attempts, like the extraordinary wooden-wheeled Jacquot steam “car” of 1878, to 1968 Porsche racing vehicles and contemporary factory prototypes. The largest group is that of locally made Bugatti models: dozens of alluringly displayed, glorious racing cars, coupés and limousines, the pride of them being the two Bugatti Royales, out of only seven that were constructed – one of them Ettore Bugatti's own, with bodywork designed by his son. Car freaks will want to spend hours (there is a restaurant and a café-bar).

Practicalities

Relatively picturesque place de la Réunion is five minutes' walk north of the gare SNCF. The tourist office is on the ground floor of the Musée Historique, in the brightly painted Hôtel de Ville (July, Aug & Dec daily 10am–7pm, Jan–June & Sept–Nov Mon–Sat 10am–6pm, Sun and public holidays 10am–noon & 2–6pm; T03.89.66.93.13, www.tourisme-mulhouse.com). The city's public transport network has been revolutionized by the two new tram lines – for details of them and new bus routes consult www.solea.info.

As for accommodation, rooms are generally overpriced in Mulhouse, but the three following hotels are all central, comfortable and affordable: St-Bernard, 3 rue des Fleurs (T03.89.45.82.32, www.hotel-saint-bernard.com; S), with Internet access in the “library” in the foyer; Schoenberg, 14 rue Schoenberg, behind the station (T03.89.44.19.41, F03.89.44.49.80; S); and Central, 15–17 passage Central (T03.89.46.18.84, F03.89.56.31.66; S). For something more luxurious there's the stylish Hôtel du Parc (T03.89.66.12.22, www.hotelduparc-mulhouse.com; S), with spacious rooms, some overlooking a shady garden, at 26 rue de la Sinne. The HI hostel is some way to the west of the centre at 37 rue de l'Illberg (T03.89.42.63.28, F03.89.59.74.95; tram #2, stop “Palais des Sports”; closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan; €13), and also has facilities for camping. Otherwise there's another pleasant campsite, Camping de l'Ill, at 1 rue Pierre-de-Coubertin, near the suburb of Dornach, 4km from the city centre on the banks of the River Ill (T03.89.06.20.66; closed Oct–March); take a bus from place Porte-Jeune.

Mulhouse's Alsatian restaurants can get very busy, but there are plenty of them, some aimed at tourists to judge by the multilingual menus. One of the best, in a pleasantly tranquil street off the place de la Réunion – where tables are put outside, weather permitting – is the Winstub Henriette at 9 rue Henriette, with all the usual dishes, such as pot-au-feu, for €11–19. The Crêperie Crampous Mad, 14 impasse des Tondeurs (menu €9–17; closed Sun), due north of the place, is a good standby, while superb seafood is served at Le Bistrot à Huîtres, to the southwest of the gare SNCF at 2 rue Moenschberg (T03.89.64.01.60; menus from €24; closed Sun & Mon). You can drown your sorrows at Gambrinus, 5 rue des Franciscains, northwest of place de la Réunion (menu €8–27; closed Sun & Mon), which boasts over thirty beers on tap and offers simple dishes to help keep you sober.

At the beginning of August you can see some of the vintage cars from the Musée de l'Automobile in gear as part of a Grande Parade, and in late August, Mulhouse hosts the region's hottest jazz festival (festival dates and information ☎03.89.45.63.95). To find out what's going on throughout the year, get hold of a copy of Spectacles, the free regional listings monthly, or L'Echo Mulhousien, also free but focused on events in the city; the tourist office stocks both.

Rixheim and Ungersheim

In the village of RIXHEIM, 6km east of Mulhouse, the Musée du Papier-Peint, 28 rue Zuber (10am–noon & 2–6pm, Oct–May closed Tues; €6, combined ticket with Musée de l'Impression sur Étoffes, €10; 🌐www.museepapierpeint.org), is housed in the splendid former headquarters of the Teutonic Knights, a branch of the medieval crusaders. A wallpaper museum may not be everyone's idea of a fun afternoon out, but this space contains a stunning cornucopia of antique painted wallpaper, notably in a series of luxuriant panoramas, as well as impressive antique machinery. The thematic temporary exhibitions are often excellent, and the frequent printing demonstrations (June–Sept Tues, Thurs & Sat at 3.30pm) bring the place to life. Rixheim can be reached from Mulhouse either by train or on bus #10, direction “Commanderie”, stop “Centre Europe”.

Just past Pulversheim, 10km northwest of Mulhouse off the D430 at Ungersheim, the Écomusée d'Alsace (daily: March–June & Sept 10am–6pm; July & Aug 9.30am–7pm; Oct–Feb 10am–5pm; €12.50–15, children €7–9.50, depending on time of year; ☎03.89.74.44.74, 🌐www.ecomusee-alsace.com) is an open-air museum presenting regional traditions and customs. It's plenty of fun for adults and kids, with over fifty traditional Alsatian buildings spanning the centuries, plus on-site craft workers doing their various things. A regional bus runs frequent services Monday to Saturday from Mulhouse's gare SNCF, direction “Guebwiller” (€7 one way).

Lorraine

Lorraine derives its name from the Latin, Lotharii regnum, “the kingdom of Lothar”, one of the three grandsons of Charlemagne, among whom his empire was divided in 843 AD. Much of the province is a rolling, windswept plateau of dull farmland; that said, the focal point of the city of Nancy, its smart former capital, is a harmoniously proportioned Neoclassical square regarded by many as the finest in France. The Ecole de Nancy, a prominent branch of Art Nouveau, added to the city's attractions with some sumptuous paintings, furniture and glassware, which are displayed in a set of outstanding museums. North of Nancy, the handsome present-day capital of Metz is justly famed for its magnificent cathedral; beyond, the province's northern reaches peter out into moribund coalfields and heavy industrial wastelands along the Belgian and German frontiers.

West of Metz, several sites connected with the province's bloody history make an interesting detour. During World War II, when de Gaulle and the Free French chose Lorraine's double-barred cross as their emblem, they were making a powerful point. For over a thousand years Lorraine has been the principal route of invasion from the German lands across the Rhine, even though the trench-like valleys of the rivers Meuse and Moselle form a main line of defence. Joan of Arc was born in 1412 at Domrémy-la-Pucelle on the Meuse, when Lorraine was disputed by the dukes of Burgundy and the kings of France – it only finally became part of the kingdom of France in 1766. In 1870 Napoléon III's armies suffered a humiliating defeat at the hands of the Prussians on the heights above Metz. Then, in the twentieth century, the two world wars saw terrible fighting in the area, both ultimately involving Allied troops alongside the French armies. Of all the killing fields, the bloodiest was Verdun, due west from Metz, where the French army fought one of the most costly and protracted battles of all time from 1916 to 1918. Poignant memorials to these horrors built at or near the battlefields draw many visitors, not least relatives of the myriad victims.

Nancy

The city of NANCY, on the River Meurthe, is justly famed for the magnificent place Stanislas, cited as a paragon of eighteenth-century Neoclassical urban planning, but also has on offer some of the most impressive examples of Art Nouveau furniture and glassware you are likely to see anywhere. Unlike much of Lorraine, the city was not occupied by the Prussians after 1870, and its centre, largely unaffected by the undistinguished modern sprawl that blights the valley sides, is simply spectacular. For this, it has the last of the independent dukes of Lorraine to thank, the dethroned king of Poland and father-in-law of Louis XV, Stanislas Leszczyński. During the twenty-odd years of his office in the mid-eighteenth century, he ordered some of the most successful construction of the period in all France.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The part of Nancy you're likely to want to see extends to no more than a ten- or fifteen-minute walk either side of rue Stanislas, the main axis and shopping street connecting the gare SNCF and the principal place Stanislas. The tourist office, on the south side of place Stanislas in the Hôtel de Ville (April–Oct Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun & hols 10am–5pm; Nov–March Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎03.83.35.22.41, 🌐www.ot-nancy.fr), is well stocked with information about both the city and region, and organizes the petit train touristique, a frequent 45-minute guided tour of the town (May–Sept; €6; departure from place de la Carrière), along with several other themed visits of the town. Regional buses depart from rue de l'Île de Corse and boulevard d'Austrasie, both on the eastern side of town. Internet access is available at the excellent e-café, 11 rue des Quatre-Églises.

Reasonable accommodation is not hard to find in Nancy. There are plenty of hotels visible from the station, and signs directing you to most of the others – all are within ten to fifteen minutes' walk of the station. For somewhere special out of town, try the Château d'Adoménil near Lunéville, 37km southeast by the A33 autoroute (☎03.83.74.04.81, 🌐www.relaischateaux.fr/adomenil; 📍; closed Sun out of season); it has seven beautifully furnished rooms overlooking water, orchards and a home farm, and its small restaurant is highly rated (cheapest menu €40; carte upwards of €70).

EATING & DRINKING

Arom	5
Chez Bagot (Le Chardon Bleu)	3
Le Blitz	9
L'Excelsior	7
Pinocchio	1
Les Pissenlits	10
La Place	6
Réservoir Café	4
Le Stanislas	B
Théâtre le Vertigo	8
La Toque Blanche	2

ACCOMMODATION

Château de Rémicourt	G
Grand Hôtel de la Reine	B
De Guise	A
Jean-Jaurès	F
Poincaré	E
Portes d'Or	C
Des Prélats	D

Campsite & G

Hotels

Grand Hôtel de la Reine 2 place Stanislas
 ☎ 03.83.35.03.01, 🌐 www.concorde-hotels.com. The grandest hotel in town, for both location and luxury. The same goes for its chic restaurant, Le Stanislas, featuring a succulent business lunch at €31 and an extravagant dinner menu including pigeon, lamb and all kinds of fish at €62. ③

De Guise rue de Guise, just off Grande-Rue ☎ 03.83.32.24.68, 🌐 www.hoteldeguise.com. Atmospherically furnished with antiques, this hotel is located in the old part of Nancy, and is the former residence of the countess of Bressy. All rooms en suite. ⑤

Jean-Jaurès 14 bd Jean-Jaurès ☎ 03.83.27.74.14, 🌐 www.hotel-jeanjaures.fr. Slightly weary and worn, but a friendly place in a pretty location. ③

Poincaré 81 rue Raymond-Poincaré
 ☎ 03.83.40.25.99. Pleasant and clean, with a special bargain rate at weekends: stay Friday and Saturday night, and you get Sunday night for free. ②

Portes d'Or 21 rue Stanislas ☎ 03.83.35.42.34,
 🌐 www.hotel-lesportesdor.com. Double glazing protects you from city-centre noise at this place whose location and home-from-home comfort make this an unbeatable choice. ④

Des Prélats 56 place du Monseigneur-Ruch
 ☎ 03.83.30.20.20, 🌐 www.hoteldesprelats.com. Welcome newcomer in a neatly converted seventeenth-century house that belonged to the prime of Lorraine – comfortable rooms, some with four-poster beds, and all mod cons, including air-con and Wi-Fi. ⑥

Hostel and campsite

Camping de Brabois ☎03.83.27.18.28. Set in a large park near the hostel. To get there take bus #26 direction “Villers Clairlieu”, stop “Camping”. April to mid-Oct.

Château de Rémicourt 149 rue de Vandoeuvre ☎03.83.27.73.67, @aubergeremicourt@mairie-nancy.fr. Spacious and pretty hostel, set in a sixteenth-century castle, but a fair distance from the centre in the suburb of Villers-lès-Nancy, to the southwest off the N74 Dijon road/av Général-Leclerc, near the Rond-Point du Vélodrome. To get there, take bus #16 on rue des Carmes, to the end of the line, “Villers-Lycée Stanislas”, or the #26, direction “Villers Clairlieu”, stop “Fiacre”. €14 including breakfast in dorm; ② in double room.

The Town

Pride of place in Nancy must go to the beautiful place Stanislas, the middle of which belongs to the solitary statue of its inspirer, the portly Stanislas himself, who was responsible for laying out the square in the 1750s. On the south side stands the imposing Hôtel de Ville, its roof-line topped by a balustrade ornamented with florid urns and amorini, while along its walls lozenge-shaped lanterns dangle from the beaks of gilded cockerels; similar motifs adorn the other buildings bordering the square – look out for the fake, two-dimensional replacements. Its entrances are closed by magnificent wrought-iron gates, with the best work of all in the railings of the northeastern and northwestern corners, which frame glorious fountains dominated by statues of Neptune and Amphitrite. Since 2005, when the square was given a complete makeover, with much improved illuminations, it has been totally pedestrianized.

In the corner where rue Stanislas joins the square, the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues 10.30am–6pm; €6) has an excellent presentation of French nineteenth- and twentieth-century art on the ground floor, with a good selection of paintings by Émile Friant and Nancy’s own Victor Prouvé, together with a Manet, a Matisse and a Picasso. The rest of the collection upstairs, encompassing Italian, German, northern European and more French painting, is less interesting. Time is better spent in the basement, where works from Nancy’s glass company, Daum, are beautifully lit in black rooms. The layout of the basement follows the shape of fortifications constructed from

Stanislas Leszczyński

Stanislas Leszczyński, born in the Polish-Ukrainian city of Lemberg (now Lviv) in 1677, lasted just five years as the elected king of Poland before being forced into exile by the Russian Tsar Peter the Great. For the next twenty-odd years he lived on a French pension in Wissembourg, along with a motley entourage of Polish expats. After fifteen years of relatively humdrum existence in the town’s Ancien Hôpital, south of the main church, Stanislas’ luck changed when he managed, against all odds, to get his daughter, Marie, betrothed to the 15-year-old king of France, Louis XV. Marie was not quite so fortunate: married by proxy in Strasbourg Cathedral, and having never even set eyes on the groom, she subsequently had a total of ten children, only to be ultimately rejected by Louis, who preferred hunting and the company of his two more powerful mistresses, Mme de Pompadour and Mme du Barry. Bolstered by his daughter’s marriage, Stanislas had another brief spell on the Polish throne from 1733 to 1736, but eventually gave it up in favour of the comfortable dukedom of Barr and Lorraine. He lived out his final years in true aristocratic style in the capital, Nancy, which he transformed into one of France’s most beautiful towns.

the fifteenth century through to Vauban's seventeenth-century alterations, which were found during the museum's 1990s renovation. For a glimpse of Daum's contemporary creations you can visit their shop, also on place Stanislas. A short walk east of the square is the excellent Muséum-Aquarium de Nancy, at 34 rue Ste-Cathérine (daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3.80). Upstairs is a colossal collection of stuffed animals and birds, while downstairs is a startling aquarium of exotic fish whose colours surpass even the daring of Matisse.

On its north side, place Stanislas opens into the long, tree-lined place de la Carrière, a handsome eighteenth-century transformation of what was originally a jousting ground. Its far end is closed by the classical colonnades of the Palais du Gouvernement, former residence of the governor of Lorraine. Behind it, housed in the fifteenth-century Palais Ducal and entered through a handsome doorway surmounted by an equestrian statue of one of the dukes, is the Musée Lorrain, 64 Grande-Rue (daily except Tues 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, closed public hols; €3.10, €4.60 combined ticket with the Musée des Cordeliers). Dedicated to the history and traditions of Lorraine, it contains, among other treasures, a room full of superb etchings by the Nancy-born seventeenth-century artist, Jacques Callot, whose concern with social issues, evident in series such as The Miseries of War and Les Gueux (or The Beggars), presaged much nineteenth- and twentieth-century art. Next door, in the Église des Cordeliers et Chapelle Ducale, is the Musée des Cordeliers (same hours as Musée Lorrain; €3.10, €4.60 combined ticket with the Musée Lorrain), where rural life in the region in days gone by is illustrated. On the other side of the Palais du Gouvernement, you can play crazy golf, admire the deer or just collapse with exhaustion on the green grass of the Parc de la Pépinière, a sort of cross between a formal French garden and an English park. There's also a free zoo.

A half-hour walk southwest of the train station, the Musée de l'École de Nancy, 36 rue Sergent-Blandan (Wed–Sun 10.30am–6pm; €6), is housed in a 1909 villa built for the Corbin family, founders of the Magasins Réunis chain of department stores. Even if you're not into Art Nouveau, this collection is exciting. Although not all of it belonged to the Corbins, the museum is arranged as if it were a private house. The furniture is outstanding – all swirling curvilinear forms – and the standards of workmanship are superlative, with a fair sprinkling of Gallé's work on display, too. The beautiful gardens are worth exploring – they're planted with irises, magnolias, saxifrages and all kinds of other plants that inspired the School of Nancy's creations.

Eating and drinking

There are plenty of places to eat and drink in Nancy, led by the excellent Le Stanislas restaurant in the Grand Hôtel de la Reine. Good streets for restaurants include Grande-Rue, rue des Maréchaux (“gourmet row”) and rue des Ponts. Place Stanislas is a good place to start an evening, and perfect for a coffee, day or night. There are several bar-cafés that make good vantage points to watch Nancy go by: Grand Café du Commerce, Jean Lamour, new Le Cinq and, restored to its original splendour, the sumptuous Grand Café Foy. Later on you should head up the Grande-Rue or down the rue des Ponts and their parallels/offshoots, where you will certainly find a late-night bar – possibly not on Sunday, though, when most are closed. A good website to consult is www.nancybynight.com.

Restaurants

Arom 26 rue Héré. One of several restaurants with see-and-be-seen terraces along this stumpy street, offering a vantage point of place Stanislas. The food, served on square glass plates, is modish but delicious all the same. Closed Sun eve & Wed.

Chez Bagot (Le Chardon Bleu) 45 Grande-Rue ☎03.83.37.42.43. Fresh fish dishes cooked to Breton recipes served up in an appropriately decorated restaurant. Menus from €14. Closed Sun eve, Mon, & Tues lunch.

L'Excelsior 50 rue Henri-Poincaré, opposite the train station. A fin-de-siècle Art Nouveau brasserie, frequented by everyone who aspires to be anyone in Nancy. Now part of the Flo brasserie chain but managing to retain its superb interior and good classic food (menus at €20 and €27). It's also the best daytime stop for coffee.

Les Pissenlits 25bis rue des Ponts. Real old-fashioned bistro fare on a menu at €15, with an appealing atmosphere. Closed Sun & Mon.

La Toque Blanche 1 rue Mgr-Trouillet, just off place St-Epvre ☎03.83.30.17.20. One of the finest gourmet restaurants in Nancy. The €22 menu is a bargain; à la carte costs €60 and more. Closed Sun eve & Mon.

Cafés and bars

Le Blitz 76 rue St-Julien. One of several lively bars along this street, with danceable music and a trendy clientele.

Pinocchio 9 place St-Epvre. Features stylish wooden interior furnishings and a terrace facing the church of St-Epvre; good for drinks at all hours.

La Place 7 place Stanislas. Extravagant decor and varied music attracts a mixed crowd of drinkers, boppers and general revellers.

Réservoir Café 13 rue Callot. Leather armchairs and mellow music add to the cosiness of this fashionable café-bar known for its stiff cocktails.

Théâtre le Vertigo 29 rue de la Visitation. Post-modern gargoyles contribute to its interesting theatrical atmosphere. Bands and other performances regularly.

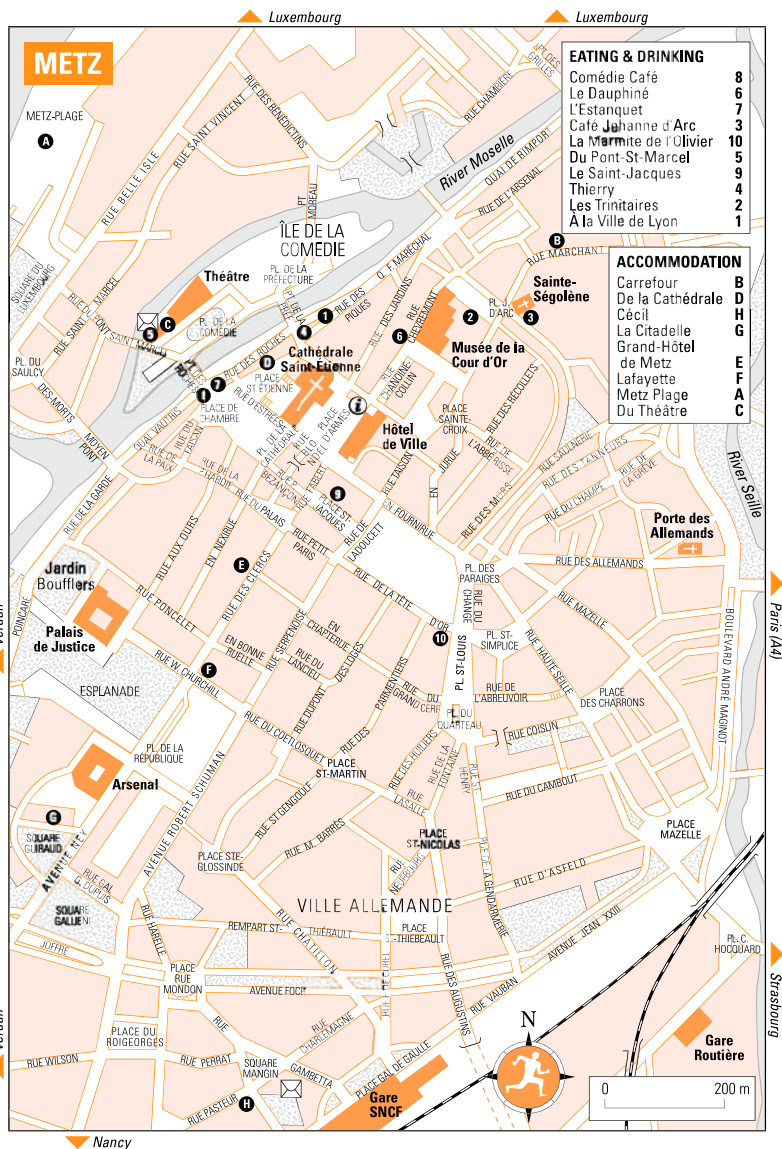

Metz and around

METZ (pronounced “Mess”), the capital of Lorraine, lies on the east bank of the River Moselle, close to the Autoroute de l’Est, linking Paris and Strasbourg, and the main Strasbourg–Brussels train line. Its origins go back at least to Roman times, when, as now, it stood astride major trade routes. On the death of Charlemagne it became the capital of Lothar’s portion of his empire, managing to maintain its prosperity in spite of the dynastic wars that followed. By the Middle Ages it had sufficient wealth and strength to proclaim itself an independent republic, which it remained until its absorption into France in 1552. A frontier town caught between warring influences, Metz has endured more than its share of historical hand-changing. In 1870, when Napoléon III’s defeated armies were forced to surrender to Kaiser Wilhelm I, it was ceded to Germany. It recovered its liberty at the end of World War I in 1918, only to be re-annexed by Hitler in 1940 before being liberated again by Allied troops in 1944.

Although its only really important sight is the magnificent cathedral, beautifully lit at night, Metz is not at all the dour place you might expect from its northern geography and industrial background – indeed it deserves its self-styled title of Ville jardin or Garden City, with impeccable flower-beds, the warm hues of mustard-yellow stone buildings and the waters of the Moselle all making for an appealing cityscape. The university founded here in the 1970s is at least partly responsible for its liveliness.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The huge granite gare SNCF stands opposite the post office at the end of rue Gambetta. The gare routière is east of the train station and on the other side of the railway tracks on avenue de l’Amphithéâtre. The tourist office (July & Aug

Mon–Sat 9am–9pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5pm; ☎ 03.87.55.53.76, 🌐 www.ot-metz.fr is located by the side of the Hôtel de Ville on place d’Armes in the old town. Almost any bus from the station will take you there.

Metz offers a fair range of hotels and budget accommodation, including an HI hostel, foyer (the tourist office has information about other foyers available in summer) and campsite, plus a couple of ritzy establishments.

Hotels

De la Cathédrale 25 place de Chambre
 ☎ 03.87.75.00.02, 🌐 www.hotelcathedrale-metz.fr. Charming, wonderfully located hotel with original beams and stained-glass windows. 5

Cécil 14 rue Pasteur ☎ 03.87.66.66.13, 🌐 www.cecilhotel-metz.com. Extremely welcoming hotel whose functional rooms are spacious, as are its bathrooms, and done out in eye-catching pink and yellow shades; there is also a garage. 4

La Citadelle 5 av Ney ☎ 03.87.17.17.17, 🌐 www.citadelle-metz.com. Recently opened and impressively smart hotel housed in an impeccably converted fifteenth-century military building. Every detail in the rooms is state-of-the-art design, and the pricey restaurant (menus from €49 to €82) has already earned prestigious awards. 9

Grand-Hôtel de Metz 3 rue des Clercs
 ☎ 03.87.36.16.33, 🌐 www.grandhotelmets.com. A characterful old establishment, with friendly staff; the decor is on the prissy side, though. 4

Lafayette 24 rue des Clercs ☎ 03.87.75.21.09. Cheap and cheerful place – but be warned, the street can get noisy. 2

Du Théâtre 3 rue du Pont-St-Marcel ☎ 03.87.31.10.10, 🌐 www.port-saint-marcel.com. Smart hotel with pastel-hued decor, in a prime riverside location with cathedral vistas. Facilities include a swimming pool. 7

Hostels and campsites

Camping municipal allée de Metz-Plage
 ☎ 03.87.68.26.48, ☎ 03.87.38.03.39. Quiet, grassy campsite right next door to Metz Plage (see below). May–Sept.

Carrefour 6 rue Marchant ☎ 03.87.75.07.26, ✉ ascarrefour@orange.fr. Friendly HI hostel (membership compulsory), with double rooms (2) and dorms (€10.20 per person), located in an atmospheric district near lively bars. Internet access available.

Metz Plage 1 allée de Metz-Plage
 ☎ 03.87.30.44.02, ☎ 03.87.33.19.80. Clean, friendly hostel on the picturesque Île Chambière. Bus #3 or #11 (stop “Pontiffroy”) from the gare SNCF. Around €15 including breakfast.

The City

Metz in effect is two towns: the original French quarters, gathered round the cathedral, and the ville allemande, undertaken as part of a once-and-for-all process of Germanification after the Prussian occupation in 1870. To the south the latter, unmistakably Teutonic in style, has considerable elegance and grandeur. The gare SNCF sets the tone, a vast and splendid granite structure of 1870 in Rhenish Romanesque, a bizarre cross between a Scottish laird's hunting lodge and a dungeon. Its gigantic dimensions reflect the Germans' long-term strategic intention to use it as the fulcrum of their military transport system in subsequent wars against the French. It's matched in style by the post office opposite and by some imposing bourgeois apartment buildings in the surrounding streets, some of them in an attractive Art Nouveau style. The whole quarter was meant to serve as a model of superior town planning, in contrast to the squalid Latin hugger-mugger of the old French neighbourhoods a short way to the north.

△ The Moselle at Metz

The place de la République is a major parking area, bounded on the east side by shops and cafés, with army barracks to the south and the formal gardens of the Esplanade, overlooking the Moselle, to the west. To the right, as you look down the esplanade from the square, is the handsome classical Palais de Justice in the city's characteristic yellow stone. To the left, a gravel drive leads past the old arsenal, now converted into a prestigious concert hall (L'Arsenal) by the postmodernist architect Ricardo Bofill.

From the north side of place de la République, rue des Clercs cuts through the attractive, bustling and largely pedestrianized heart of the old city, where most of the shops are located. Past the place St-Jacques, with its numerous outdoor cafés, you come to the eighteenth-century place d'Armes, where the lofty Gothic Cathedral of St-Étienne towers above the pedimented and colonnaded classical facade of the Hôtel de Ville. Its nave is the tallest in France – after Beauvais and Amiens cathedrals – but its best feature is without doubt the stained glass (vitraux), both medieval and modern, including windows dating from the thirteenth century. Pride of place, however, goes to Chagall's 1963 masterpiece in the western wall of the north transept, representing the Garden of Eden, while his slightly earlier works in the ambulatory vividly depict Old Testament scenes – Moses and David, Abraham's Sacrifice and Jacob's Dream.

From the cathedral, a short walk up rue du Chanoine Collin brings you to the city's main museum complex, the Musées de la Cour d'Or, 2 rue du Haut-Poirier (Mon & Wed–Fri 9am–5pm, Sat & Sun 10am–5pm; €4.60, free first Sun of month), a treasure house of Gallo-Roman sculpture, but equally strong on mock-ups of vernacular architecture from the medieval and Renaissance periods. The art museum is less impressive, although it includes works by Corot and Delacroix. When the complex was extended in the 1930s, the remains of Roman baths were discovered, and they are now one of the most interesting things about the museums.

For the city's most compelling townscape, plus the most dramatic view of the cathedral, you have only to go down to the riverbank and cross to the tiny Île de la Comédie, dominated by its classical eighteenth-century square and theatre (the oldest in France) and a rather striking Protestant church erected under the German occupation. An older and equally beautiful square is the place St-Louis with its Gothic arcades some ten minutes' walk to the east of the cathedral along En-Fournirue. On the way, wander up into the Italianate streets climbing the hill of Sainte-Croix to your left, the legacy of the Lombard bankers who came to run the city's finances in the thirteenth century. It's also worth continuing east from the place des Paraiges, at the end of En-Fournirue, down the rue des Allemands to have a look at the Porte des Allemands – a massive, fortified double gate that once barred the eastern entrances to the medieval city.

Eating and drinking

Finding somewhere to eat is not difficult in Metz, but the food on offer is much of a muchness, with few places straying from staple fare such as quiche lorraine or suckling-pig with mirabelle plums. The many cafés on place St-Jacques are popular with locals and tourists, while late-night drinking is mostly focused on place Jeanne-d'Arc.

Restaurants

Le Dauphiné 8 rue du Chanoine-Collin. Spruce little place in a handy location, popular for its reasonable lunchtime menus (€10–22), the more expensive ones featuring delicacies such as frogs' legs and duck breast. Closed Sun & Mon–Thurs eve.

L'Estantquet 27 rue des Roches. Riverside wine-bar offering a wide selection of keenly priced salads and snacks, especially pleasant in the summer months when there is a large terrace. Closed Sun.

La Marmite de l'Olivier 9 place Saint-Louis. Both cosy interior and the outdoor tables under the arches get packed, especially at lunchtime, for expertly prepared traditional fare (dishes €11–19), including the inevitable pork and plums favourite. Closed Sun.

Du Pont-St-Marcel 1 rue du Pont-St-Marcel ☎03.87.30.12.29. A seventeenth-century establishment, distinctive for its excellent regional cuisine and staff dressed in regional costume. Menus at €18 and €28, including eel and suckling-pig, and wines from the French Moselle. Closed Sun eve & Mon.

Thierry 5 rue des Piques ☎03.87.36.64.51. Modern decor and a charming patio combine with some of the most adventurous cuisine in the city (a fusion of North African, southeast Asian and traditional French, with lots of fresh coriander thrown in) and an intelligent wine-list to make this a place that needs advance booking. Menu €22; closed Sun & Wed.

À la Ville de Lyon 7 rue des Piques ☎03.87.74.01.23. A rather formal restaurant, a couple of doors along from Thierry, specializing in the best traditional cooking, including dishes from Lyon (as the name suggests), such as quenelles and saucisson. From €35; closed Sun eve, Mon & during Aug.

Cafés and bars

Comédie Café quai Vautris. Rather poky but atmospheric, studenty bar/café with games, juke-box and TV. Open daily.

Café Jehanne d'Arc place Jeanne-d'Arc. Medieval beams and frescoes inside, and an attractive balmy-weather terrace on the square, dominated by the lofty towers of Ste-Ségolène church. There are free jazz concerts outside every Thurs evening in summer.

Le Saint-Jacques 10 place Saint-Jacques. Open daily till late, this is one of the busiest of the many bars on this lively square – and doubles up as a cybercafé.

Les Trinitaires 10–12 rue des Trinitaires ☎03.87.20.03.03, @www.lestrinitaires.com. The place to go for serious jazz, rock, folk and chanson, enhanced by the Gothic cellars. Live music some days at 9pm. Closed Sun & Mon.

The Amnéville complex

Most people heading north from Metz whizz along the A31 autoroute towards Luxembourg and Belgium to avoid numbingly dull towns like Thionville. But that means missing out on the attractions in the Bois de Coulange, 3km south of the industrial town of Amnéville.

At the top of most people's list of the complex's attractions is the Musée de la Moto et du Vélo (Tues, Thurs & Fri 1.30–6pm; Wed, Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 1.30–6pm; €5). Monsieur Chapleur started collecting bikes and motorbikes in the 1930s when he was a mechanic at Citroën, and the museum has over 200 models of different origins on display, all overhauled and in working order. And they are beauties – works of art in copper, brass, chrome and steel, with some of the bicycles dating back to 1865, and the motorbikes from 1900 to 1940. A unique object to look out for is the 1906 René Gillet 4.5hp belt-driven tandem.

But the complex has other draws as well. At Thermapolis (Mon–Wed 10am–10pm, Thurs 9am–10pm, Fri & Sat 10am–midnight, Sun 9am–8pm; closed Sept, Christmas and New Year; €10.50 for two hours), you can soak away pains or just relax in a series of pools fed by a ferruginous spring; kitsch decor adorns the saunas, hammams and rest areas. There's also a zoo, an aquarium and all kinds of other curiosities, plus a multiplex cinema.

For more information about all tourist attractions contact the tourist office (☎03.87.70.10.40, 🌐www.amneville.com). The Amnéville complex can be reached from Metz by a combination of local train, several times a day, to Hagondange, and shuttle bus (navette), more frequent at weekends.

Verdun and the battlefield

The small country town of VERDUN lies in a bend of the River Meuse, some 70km west of Metz. Of no great interest in itself, what makes it remarkable is its association with the ghastly battle that took place on the bleak uplands to its north between 1916 and 1918.

In the aftermath of German victory in the 1870–71 war, Verdun and its environs became the most heavily fortified military region in France, the lynch-pin of its northeastern defences. For this reason, and in order to break the stalemate of trench warfare, the German General Erich von Falkenhayn chose it as the target for an offensive that, in 1916, was the most devastating ever launched in the annals of war (see opposite). He advanced to within 5km of the town, but never succeeded in taking it. Gradually the French clawed back the lost ground, but final victory came only in the last months of the war in 1918 and then only with the aid of US troops under the command of General Pershing. Hundreds of thousands of men died in the battle, both French and German, but it was particularly devastating for the French: the battle was fought on their native soil against the enemy who had humiliated them so badly in 1870, and it decimated the country's young male population. Most of the names inscribed on the thousands of sad memorials that stand in every village, hamlet and town of France belong to men who died at Verdun.

The Town

Given the pounding it received in World War I and the bomb damage of World War II, Verdun is not as grim as you might expect. The liveliest part lies between the river and the steep little hill dominated by the cathedral, along rues St-Paul and Mazel. Near the railway station, the Rodin memorial, a suitably disturbing statue of a winged Victory, stands beside a handsome eighteenth-century gateway at the northern end of rue St-Paul, where it joins avenue Garibaldi. Nearby is a simple engraving listing all the years between 450 and 1916 that Verdun has been involved in bloody conflict. Another fine gate, the fourteenth-century Porte Chaussée, guards the river-crossing in the middle of town. Beyond it, further along rue Mazel, a flight of steps climbs up to the Monument de la Victoire, where a helmeted warrior leans on his sword in commemoration of the 1916 battle, while in the crypt below a roll is kept of all the soldiers, French and American, who took part. Beyond the monument, on rue de la Belle Vierge, lies the Musée de la Prinerie (April–Oct daily except Tues 9.30am–noon & 2–6pm; €3), a small museum housed in a sixteenth-century town house exhibiting ceramics, furniture and paintings from Verdun's ancient and religious history.

The rue de la Belle Vierge leads round to the Cathedral of Notre-Dame, whose outward characteristics are Gothic: its earlier Romanesque origins were only uncovered by shell damage in 1916. The superbly sober crypt was subsequently dug out, revealing some of the original carved capitals; the new replacements show scenes from the World War I fighting. The rather beautiful bishop's palace behind it has been converted into a Centre Mondial de la Paix et des Droits de l'Homme (Feb–May & Sept–Dec daily except Mon 9.30am–noon & 2–6pm; June–Aug daily 9.30am–7pm; €3), hosting exhibitions and conferences about peacekeeping and human rights.

Rue du Rû, the continuation of rue Mazel, takes you to the underground galleries of the Citadelle (daily 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; €6), used as shelter and hospital for thousands of soldiers during the battle. The Unknown Soldier, whose remains now lie under the Arc de Triomphe in Paris, was chosen from among the dead who lie here.

Practicalities

The gare SNCF and the bus station are both on avenue Garibaldi. The tourist office (May–Sept Mon–Sat 8.30am–6.30pm, Sun 9am–5pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–5.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎03.29.86.14.18, 🌐www.verdun-tourisme.com) lies just across the River Meuse from the Porte Chaussée opposite the end of the bridge. Staff run daily four-hour minibus tours of the battlefield (in French only: May–Sept 2pm; €25.50); they're not exactly cheap, but the guides are interesting and the experience is not one that you're likely to repeat. Call ahead to try and arrange an English-speaking guide if your French is not up to it.

As for accommodation, there's much more to choose from in Metz or Nancy. However, if you do need to spend the night in Verdun, head for the very friendly Hôtel St-Paul, 12 place St-Paul (☎ & 📞03.29.86.02.16; 📍; closed Dec 7–Jan 7), close to the Rodin memorial. Decent and inexpensive alternatives are Hôtel Montaubain, 4 rue de la Vieille-Prison (☎03.29.86.00.47; 📍), and the Auberge de Jeunesse (☎03.29.86.28.28, 📞03.29.86.28.82; 📍; closed Jan), located between the cathedral and Centre Mondial, with a fantastic view over the town and its surroundings.

You shouldn't have trouble finding somewhere to eat: there are plenty of brasseries and crêperies along the river, and Hôtel St-Paul (see above) has a good traditional restaurant with menus from €16. For drinking, L'Estaminet, on rue des Rouyers, has a great selection of beers and a pleasant terrace, and is open until 3am.

The battlefield

The Battle of Verdun opened on the morning of February 21, 1916, with a German artillery barrage that lasted ten hours and expended two million shells. It concentrated on the forts of Vaux and Douaumont, which the French had built after the 1870 Franco–Prussian War. By the time the main battle ended ten months later, nine villages had been pounded to nothing. Not a single trace of them is detectable in aerial photos taken at the time. The heavy artillery shells ploughed the ground to a depth of 8m and, although much of it is now reforested, there are parts even today that steadfastly refuse anchorage to any but the coarsest vegetation.

The most visited part of the battlefield extends along the hills north of Verdun, but the fighting also spread well to the west of the Meuse, to the hills of Mort-Homme and Hill 304, to Vauquois and the Argonne, and south along

The Maginot Line

Like the Séré de Rivières forts constructed along the line of the rivers Meuse and Moselle after the 1870–71 war, the Maginot Line was designed to keep the Germans out. Constructed between 1930 and 1940, it was the brainchild of the French Minister of War (1929–31), André Maginot. Spanning the entire length of the French–German border – plus a section of the French–Belgian border – it comprised a complete system of defence in depth. There were advance posts equipped with anti-tank weapons and machine guns. There were fortified police stations close to the frontier. But the main line consisted of a continuous chain of underground strong points linked by anti-tank obstacles and equipped with state-of-the-art machinery. It was of course hugely expensive and, when put to the test in 1940, proved to be worse than useless: the Germans simply violated Belgian neutrality and drove round the other end of the Line.

One of the largest forts, the Fort de Fermont, situated about 50km north of Verdun near the small town of Longuyon, is open to the public (guided visits: April, May & Sept Sat & Sun 2pm & 3.30pm; June–Aug Mon–Fri 3pm, Sat & Sun 2pm & 3.30pm; ☎03.82.39.21.21; €6; times are susceptible to change so check in advance). The entrance is hidden in woodland and nothing shows above ground but the scarcely noticeable cupolas of the gun turrets. Armed with nine fire points, it was served by 6km of underground tunnels and a garrison of six hundred. The tunnels are equipped with power plants, electric trains, monorails, elevators and all the other technological paraphernalia necessary to support such a lunatic enterprise. The place has the feel of a nuclear bunker.

Getting there without your own transport is not easy. There are trains to Longuyon from Metz and Verdun (change at Conflans), but you'll have to hitch or walk the last 5km to the fort.

the Meuse to St-Mihiel, where the Germans held an important salient until dislodged by US forces in 1918. The only really effective way to explore the area is with your own transport. The main sights are reached via two minor roads that snake through the battlefields, forming a crossroads northeast of Verdun: the D913 and D112.

The monument to André Maginot and the Fort de Souville

The D913 branches left from the main N3 to Metz, 5km east of Verdun; the D112 leaves the same N3 opposite the Cimetière du Faubourg-Pavé on the eastern outskirts of Verdun and is soon enclosed by appropriately gloomy conifer plantations. If you take the D112, on the right you pass a monument to André Maginot, who was himself wounded in the battle and under whose later stewardship at the Ministry of War the famous Maginot Line (see box above) was built.

Shortly afterwards, a sign points out a forest ride to the Fort de Souville, the furthest point of the German advance in 1916. The site is not on the main tourist beat, and is a very moving, if rather frightening, twenty-minute walk over ground absolutely shattered by artillery fire, with pools of black water standing in the now grassy shell-holes. The fort itself lies half-hidden among the scrub, the armoured gun turrets still louring in their pits, the tunnels to their control rooms dank and dangerous with collapse. A little way beyond the fort, where the D112 intersects the D913, a stone lion marks the precise spot at which the German advance was checked. To the left the D913 continues to Fleury, 1km from the crossroads, and on to Douaumont, before curling back round to the D964.

Fleury and the Fort de Vaux

The horrifying story of the battle is graphically documented at FLEURY, in the Musée-Memorial de Fleury (daily: Feb, March & mid-Nov to mid-Dec 9am–noon & 2–5pm; April to mid-Sept 9am–6pm; mid-Sept to mid-Nov 9am–noon & 2–6pm; €5), which is included in the Verdun tourist office's guided tour. Contemporary newsreels and photos present the stark truth, and in the well of the museum, a section of the shell-torn terrain that was once the village of Fleury has been reconstructed as the battle left it.

Another major monument is the Fort de Vaux, 4km east of Fleury (Feb to Dec 23 daily 9am–5pm; €3), where, after six days' hand-to-hand combat in the confined, gas-filled tunnels, the French garrison were left with no alternative but surrender. On the exterior wall of the fort a plaque commemorates the last messenger pigeon sent to the command post in Verdun vainly asking for reinforcements. Having safely delivered its message, the pigeon expired as a result of flying through the gas-filled air above the battlefield. It was posthumously awarded the Légion d'Honneur.

Douaumont

The principal memorial to the carnage stands in the middle of the battlefield a short distance along the D913 beyond Fleury. It is the Ossuaire de Douaumont (daily: March & Oct 9am–noon & 2–5.30pm; April 9am–6pm; May–Aug 9am–6.30pm; Sept 9am–noon & 2–6pm; Nov 9am–noon & 2–5pm; €3.50), a vast and surreal structure with the stark simplicity of a Romanesque crypt or a Carolingian sarcophagus, from which rises a central tower shaped like a projectile aimed at the heavens. Its vaults contain the bones of thousands upon thousands of unidentified soldiers, French and German, some of them visible through windows set in the base of the building. When the battle ended in 1918, the ground was covered in fragments of corpses; 120,000 French bodies were identified, perhaps a third of the total killed.

Across the road, a cemetery contains the graves of 15,000 men who died more or less whole – Christians commemorated by rows of identical crosses, Muslims of the French colonial regiments by gravestones aligned in the direction of Mecca. Nearby, a wall commemorates the Jewish dead, beneath a treeless ridge-top on whose tortured, pitted ground around the remains of the Fort de Thiaumont some of them must have died.

The Fort de Douaumont (daily: Feb, March & Oct–Dec 10am–1pm & 2–5pm; April–June & Sept 10am–6pm; July & Aug 10am–7pm; closed Jan;

St-Mihiel and the Voie Sacrée

In an attempt to cut Verdun off as early as 1914, the Germans captured the town of St-Mihiel on the River Meuse to the south, which gave them control of the main supply route into Verdun. The only route left open to the French – and that far from safe – was the N35, winding north from Bar-le-Duc over the open hills and wheat fields. In memory of all those who kept the supplies going, the road is called La Voie Sacrée (The Sacred Way) and marked with milestones capped with the helmet of the poilu (the slang term for the French infantryman). In St-Mihiel itself, the Église St-Michel contains the Sépulcre or Entombment of Christ, by local sculptor Ligier Richier – a set of thirteen stone figures, carved in the mid-sixteenth century and regarded as one of the masterpieces of the French Renaissance. Just beyond the town to the east, on the Butte de Montsec, is a memorial to the Americans who died here in 1918 and a US cemetery at Thiancourt on the main road.

€3.50) is 900m down the road from the cemetery. Completed in 1912 and commanding the highest point of land, it was the strongest of the 38 forts built to defend Verdun. In one of those inexplicable aberrations of military top brass, however, the armament of these forts was greatly reduced in 1915, and when the Germans attacked in 1916, twenty men were enough to overrun the garrison of 57 French territorials. The fort is on three levels, two of them underground, and its claustrophobic, dungeon-like galleries are hung with stalactites. The Germans, who held it for eight months, had 3000 men housed in its cramped quarters with no toilets – continuously under siege, its ventilation ducts blocked for protection against gas, infested with fleas and lice and plagued by rats that attacked the sleeping and the dead indiscriminately.

Travel details

Trains

Colmar to: Mulhouse (every 30min; 20min); Munster (hourly; 30min).

Metz to: Amnéville (hourly, 20min); Hagondange (for Thérmapolis; 4 hourly; 15min); Nancy (hourly; 1hr); Paris-Est (TGV 10 daily; 1hr 30min); Strasbourg (every 2hr; 1hr 30min).

Nancy to: Paris-Est (TGV 10 daily; 1hr 30min); Saverne (3 daily; 1hr); Strasbourg (every 2hr; 1hr 20 min).

Sélestat to: Ste-Marie-aux-Mines (hourly; 35min).

Strasbourg to: Barr (9 daily; 55min); Basel (hourly; 1hr 30min–2hr); Colmar (every 40min; 40–50min); Dambach (9 daily; 1hr); Dole (10 daily; 3hr 30min); Kehl, Germany (hourly; 10min); Mulhouse (hourly; 1hr); Obernai (9 daily; 40min); Paris-Est (TGV 10 daily; 2hr 20min); Rosheim (9 daily; 25min); Sélestat (every 40min; 30min); Wissembourg (direct, hourly; 1hr).

Verdun to: Metz (4 daily; 1hr–1hr 15min); Nancy (2 daily; 1hr 40min); Paris-Est (up to 5 daily; 3hr).

Buses

Colmar to: Mulhouse (at least 1 hourly; 1hr); Sélestat (hourly; 1hr).

Metz to: Verdun (5 daily Mon–Sat; 2hr).

Saverne to: Molsheim (2 daily; 1hr).

Normandy

- * Rouen This fine old medieval city would still seem familiar to Joan of Arc, whose life came to a tragic end in its main square. See p.355
- * Château Gaillard Richard the Lionheart's sturdy fortress commands superb views of the River Seine. See p.363
- * Giverny Claude Monet's house and garden remain just as he left them. See p.364
- * The war cemeteries Memories of D-Day abound in Normandy, but nowhere more so than in the American cemetery at Colleville-sur-mer. See p.375
- * The Bayeux Tapestry One of the world's most extraordinary historical documents, embroidering the saga of William the Conqueror in every colourful detail. See p.379
- * Barfleur This beautiful ancient port makes a great last-night stop for ferry passengers returning to England. See p.385
- * Mont St-Michel Second only to the Eiffel Tower as France's best-loved landmark, the merveille of Mont St-Michel is a magnificent spectacle. See p.389
- * The Pays d'Auge With luscious meadows and half-timbered farmhouses, the Pays d'Auge is a picture-perfect home for Camembert and other legendary cheeses. See p.395

△ Mont St-Michel

Normandy

Though firmly incorporated into the French mainstream, the seaboard province of Normandy has a history of prosperous independence as one of the crucial powers of medieval Europe. Colonized by Scandinavian Vikings (or Norsemen) from the ninth century onwards, it in turn began to colonize during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, with military expeditions conquering not only England but as far afield as Sicily and areas of the Near East. Later, as part of France, it was instrumental in the settlement of Canada.

Normandy has always had large ports: Rouen, on the Seine, is the nearest navigable point to Paris, while Dieppe, Le Havre and Cherbourg have important transatlantic trade. Inland, it is overwhelmingly agricultural – a fertile belt of tranquil pastureland, where the chief interest for most visitors will be the groaning restaurant tables of regions such as the Pays d’Auge. Significant portions of the seaside are overdeveloped, whether because of industry, as with the huge sprawl of Le Havre, or tourism – in the second half of the nineteenth century, the last French emperor created a “Norman Riviera” around Trouville and Deauville, and an air of pretension still hangs about their elegant promenades. However, more ancient harbours such as Honfleur and Barfleur remain visually irresistible, and there are numerous seaside villages with few crowds or affectations. The banks of the Seine, too, hold several delightful little communities, including Caudebec and Jumièges.

Normandy also boasts extraordinary Romanesque and Gothic architectural treasures, although only the much-restored capital, Rouen, retains a complete medieval centre. Elsewhere, the attractions are more often single buildings than entire towns. Most famous of all is the spectacular merveille on the island of Mont St-Michel, but there are also the monasteries at Jumièges and Caen, the cathedrals of Bayeux and Coutances and Richard the Lionheart’s castle above the Seine at Les Andelys. In addition, Bayeux has its vivid and astonishing tapestry, while among more recent creations are Monet’s garden at Giverny and, at Le Havre, a fabulous collection of paintings by Dufy and Boudin, as well as other Impressionists. Furthermore, Normandy’s vernacular architecture makes it well worth exploring inland – the back roads through the countryside are lined with splendid centuries-old half-timbered manor houses. It’s remarkable how much has survived – or, less surprisingly, been restored – since the Allied landings in 1944 and the subsequent Battle of Normandy, which has its own legacy in a series of war museums, memorials and cemeteries.

NORMANDY

Cap de la Hague

ENGLISH CHANNEL

See "The Invasion Beaches" map for detail

COTENTIN

BESSIN

NORMANDE

PAYS D'AUGE

CAUX

Rosslare

Portsmouth

Portsmouth

Portsmouth

Newhaven

Boulogne, Calais

Orléans

Le Mans & Tours

The food of Normandy owes its most distinctive characteristic – its gut-bursting, heart-pounding richness – to the lush orchards and dairy herds of its agricultural heartland, and most especially the area southeast of Caen known as the Pays d’Auge. Menus abound in meat such as veal (veau) cooked in vallée d’Auge style, which consists largely of the profligate addition of cream and butter. Many dishes also feature orchard fruit, either in its natural state or in successively more alcoholic forms – either as apple or pear cider, or perhaps further distilled to produce brandies.

Normans have a great propensity for blood and guts. In addition to gamier meat and fowl such as rabbit and duck (a speciality in Rouen, where the birds are strangled to ensure that all their blood gets into the sauce), they enjoy such intestinal preparations as andouilles, the sausages known in English as chitterlings, and tripes, stewed for hours à la mode de Caen. A full blowout at a country restaurant in one of the small towns of inland Normandy – places like Conches, Vire and the Suisse Normande – will also traditionally entail one or two pauses between courses for the trou normand: a glass of the apple brandy Calvados that lets you catch your breath before struggling on with the feast.

Normandy’s long coastline ensures that it is also a wonderful region for seafood. Many of the larger ports and resorts have long waterfront lines of restaurants competing for attention, each with its “copieuse” assiette de fruits de mer. Honfleur is probably the most enjoyable of these, but Dieppe, Étretat and Cherbourg also offer endless eating opportunities. The menus tend to be much the same as those on offer in Brittany, if perhaps slightly more expensive.

The most famous products of Normandy’s meadow-munching cows are, of course, their cheeses. The tradition of cheese-making in the Pays d’Auge is thought to have started in the monasteries during the Dark Ages. By the eleventh century the local products were already well defined; in 1236, the Roman de la Rose referred to Angelot cheese, identified with a small coin depicting a young angel killing a dragon. The principal modern varieties began to emerge in the seventeenth century – Pont l’Évêque, which is square with a washed crust, soft but not runny and Livarot, which is round, thick and firm, and has a stronger flavour. Although Marie Herel is generally credited with having invented Camembert in the 1790s, a smaller and stodgier version of that cheese had already existed for some time. A priest fleeing the Revolution seems to have stayed in Mme Herel’s farmhouse at Camembert, and suggested modifications in her cheese-making in line with the techniques he’d seen employed to manufacture Brie de Meaux – a slower process, gentler on the curd and with more thorough drainage. The rich full cheese thus created was an instant success in the market at Vimoutiers, and the development of the railways (and the invention of the chipboard cheesebox in 1880) helped to give it a worldwide popularity.

To the French, at least, the essence of Normandy is its produce. This is the land of Camembert and Calvados, cider and seafood, and a butter- and cream-based cuisine with a proud disdain for most things nouvelle. Economically, however, the richness of the dairy pastures has been Normandy’s downfall in recent years. EU milk quotas have liquidated many small farms, and stringent sanitary regulations have forced many small-scale traditional cheese factories to close. Parts of inland Normandy are now among the most depressed in the whole country, and in the forested areas to the south, where life has never been easy, things have not improved.

Seine Maritime

4

NORMANDY

Dieppe

The département of Seine Maritime comprises three very distinct sections: Normandy's dramatic northern coastline, home not only to major ports like Dieppe and Le Havre but also to such delightful resorts as Étretat; the meandering course of the River Seine, where unchanged villages stand both up- and downstream of the provincial capital of Rouen; and the flat chalky Caux plateau, which makes for pleasant cycling country but holds little of note to detain visitors.

Dieppe in particular offers a much more appealing introduction to France than its counterparts further north in Picardy, and with the impressive white cliffs of the aptly named Côte d'Albâtre (Alabaster Coast) stretching away to either side it could easily serve as the base for a long stay. The most direct route to Rouen from here is simply to head due south, but it's well worth tracing the shore all the way west to Le Havre, and then following the Seine inland.

Driving along the D982 along the northern bank of the Seine, you'll often find your course paralleled by mighty tankers and container ships out on the water. Potential stops en route include the medieval abbeys of Jumièges and St-Wandrille, but Rouen itself is the prime destination, its association with the execution of Joan of Arc merely the most compelling episode in its fascinating and conspicuous history. Further upstream, Monet's wonderful house and garden at Giverny and the redoubtable English frontier stronghold of Château Gaillard at Les Andelys also justify taking a slow route into Paris.

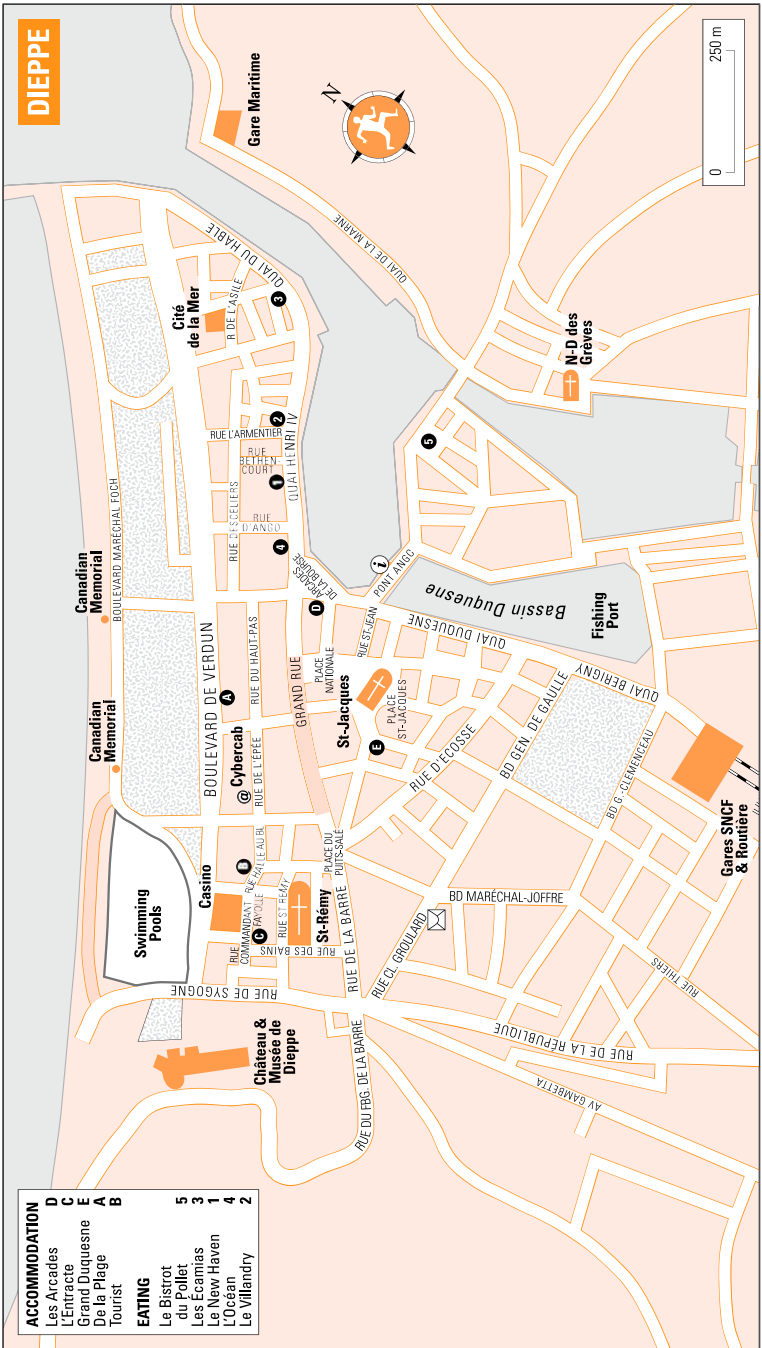

Dieppe

Squeezed between high cliff headlands, DIEPPE is an enjoyably small-scale port that used to be more of a resort. During the nineteenth century, Parisians came here by train to take the sea air, promenading along the front while the English colony indulged in the peculiar pastime of swimming. These days, it's not a place many travellers go out of their way to visit, but it's one of the nicer ferry ports in northern France, and you're unlikely to regret spending an afternoon or evening here before or after a Channel crossing. With kids in tow, the aquariums of the Cité de la Mer are the obvious attraction; otherwise, you could settle for admiring the cliffs and the castle as you stroll the extravagant seafront lawns. The business of the port goes on as ever, with Dieppe's commercial docks unloading half the bananas of the Antilles and forty percent of all shellfish destined to slither down French throats. The markets sell fish right off the boats, displayed with the usual Gallic flair, and the sole, scallops and turbot available in profusion at the restaurants may well tempt you to stay.

Arrival and information

Dieppe's tourist office is on the pont Anglo, which separates the ferry harbour from the pleasure port (May, June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎02.32.14.40.60, 🌐www.dieppetourisme.com). Bicycles can be rented very cheaply from Vélo Service, just across the bridge (☎06.24.56.06.27). The main post office is at 2 bd

DIEPPE

- | | |
|----------------------|----------|
| ACCOMMODATION | D |
| Les Arcades | C |
| L'Entracte | E |
| Grand Duquesne | A |
| De la Plage | B |
| Tourist | |
| EATING | |
| Le Bistrot | 5 |
| du Poillet | 3 |
| Les Ecumias | 1 |
| Le New Haven | 4 |
| L'Océan | 2 |
| Le Villandry | |

Maréchal-Joffre (Mon–Fri 8am–6pm, Sat 8am–noon); Internet access is available both there, and at Cybercafé Art au Bar – Cybercab for short, 19 rue de Sygogne (Mon–Thurs 10am–12.30am, Fri & Sat 10am–2pm).

The only ferry services between Dieppe's gare maritime, east of the town centre, and Newhaven in England are the four-hour crossings operated by Transmanche Ferries, using conventional vessels (1–4 daily; ☎08.00.65.01.00, 🌐www.transmancheferries.com). Motorists coming off the boats are directed away from the town, and have to double back west to reach it; foot passengers can easily walk the 500m to the tourist office.

Dieppe's gare SNCF is another 500m south of the tourist office, on boulevard Clemenceau, and trains are much the quickest way to get to Rouen or Paris. Buses along the coast leave from the gare routière alongside.

Accommodation

Dieppe has plenty of hotels, with the more expensive ones concentrated along the seafront – which is among the quietest areas of town – and especially at the western end of the boulevard de Verdun, closest to the castle.

Hotels

Les Arcades de la Bourse 1–3 arcades de la Bourse ☎02.35.84.14.12, 🌐www.lesarcades.fr. Long-established central hotel, under the arcades facing the port. The restaurant has full, good-value menus from €18. 4

L'Entracte 39 rue du Commandant Fayolle ☎02.35.84.26.45. Extremely inexpensive, no-frills rooms above a little bar behind the casino, plus some en-suite ones at slightly higher rates. 1

Grand Duquesne 15 place St-Jacques ☎02.32.14.61.10, 🌐augrandduquesne.free.fr. This small, central hotel is unusually plain for the Logis de France organization, but offers acceptable en-suite rooms and simple menus at low prices, and there's also an exceptionally good-value family room, capable of sleeping four. 3

La Plage 20 bd de Verdun ☎02.35.84.18.28, 🌐www.plagehotel.fr.st. Slightly upmarket rooms, all en suite with cable TV, facing the sea and set back somewhat from the street, alongside the Windsor. No restaurant. 4

Tourist Hôtel 16 rue de la Halle au Blé ☎02.35.06.10.10. Plain en-suite rooms with phone and TV, above a Turkish restaurant in a converted town house one block from the beach behind the casino. 3

Hostel and campsite

HI hostel 48 rue Louis-Fromager ☎02.35.84.85.73, 🌐dieppe@fuaj.org. Welcoming and comfortable, if somewhat inconveniently located hostel, 2km southwest of the gare SNCF in the quartier Janval, offering dorm beds for €8 (not including breakfast or bed linen). Served by bus route #2 from the tourist office (direction "Val Druel", stop "Château Michel"). Closed Oct to late May, plus weekends during June.

Camping Vitamin chemin des Vertus ☎02.35.82.11.11. Three-star site, well south of town in an unremarkable setting in St-Aubin-sur-Scie that's really only convenient for motorists, even if it is served by the #2 bus route. Closed mid-Oct to March.

The Town

Modern Dieppe is laid out along the three axes dictated by its eighteenth-century town planners, though these central streets have become a little run-down. The boulevard de Verdun runs for over a kilometre along the seafront, from the fifteenth-century castle in the west to the port entrance, and passes the Casino, along with the grandest and oldest hotels. A large area near the Casino, scheduled to open in 2007, has recently been re-landscaped to hold a massive complex of indoor and outdoor swimming pools. A short way inland, parallel to the seafront, is the rue de la Barre and its pedestrianized continuation, the Grande Rue. Along the harbour's edge, an extension of the Grande Rue, quai Henri IV has a colourful backdrop of cafés, brasseries and restaurants.

The place du Puits Salé, at the centre of the old town, is dominated by the huge, restored Café des Tribunaux, built as an inn towards the end of the seventeenth century. Two hundred years later, it was favoured by painters and writers such as Renoir, Monet, Sickert, Whistler and Pissarro. For English visitors, its most evocative association is with the exiled and unhappy Oscar Wilde, who drank here regularly. It's now a cavernous café, popular with college students and open until after midnight.

As for monuments, the obvious place to start is the medieval castle overlooking the seafront from the west, home of the Musée de Dieppe and two showpiece collections (June–Sept daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct–May daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €3). The first collection is a group of carved ivories – virtuoso pieces of sawing, filing and chipping of the plundered riches of Africa, shipped back to the town by early Dieppe explorers. The other permanent exhibition is made up of a hundred or so prints by the co-founder of Cubism, Georges Braque, who went to school in Le Havre, spent summers in Dieppe and is buried just west of the town at Varengeville-sur-Mer. Other galleries upstairs hold paintings of local scenes by the likes of Pissarro, Renoir, Dufy, Sickert and Boudin, while a separate, much newer wing of the castle stages temporary exhibitions.

An exit from the western side of the castle takes you out onto a path up to the cliffs. On the other side, a flight of steps leads down to the square du Canada, originally named in commemoration of the role played by Dieppe sailors in the colonization of Canada. Now a small plaque is dedicated to the Canadian soldiers who died in the suicidal 1942 raid on Dieppe, justified later as a trial run for the 1944 Normandy landings.

Cité de la Mer

On the eastern end of town just back from the harbour, the Cité de la Mer, at 37 rue de l'Asile-Thomas, sets out simultaneously to entertain children and to serve as a centre for scientific research, and succeeds in both without being all that interesting for the casual adult visitor (daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; 📍 estrancitedelamer.free.fr; €5). Kids are certain to enjoy learning the principles of navigation by operating radio-controlled boats. Thereafter, the museum traces the history of seagoing vessels, featuring a Viking drakkar under construction, following methods depicted in the Bayeux Tapestry. Next comes a very detailed geological exhibition covering the formation of the local cliffs, in which you learn how to convert shingle into sandpaper. Visits culminate with large aquariums filled with the marine life of the Channel: flat fish with bulbous eyes and twisted faces, retiring octopuses, battling lobsters and hermaphrodite scallops (the white part is male, the orange female). A lack of sentimentality means that jars of fish soup, whose exact provenance is not made explicit, are on sale at the exit.

Eating and drinking

The most promising area to look for restaurants in Dieppe is along the quai Henri IV, which makes a lovely place to stroll and compare menus of a summer's evening.

The beach itself holds no formal restaurants, but it does have a couple of open-air cafés selling mussels, salads and so on, and plenty of crêpe stands. As well as the daily spectacle of the fish on sale in the fishing port, there's an all-day open-air market in the place Nationale and Grande Rue on Saturday. The largest of several hypermarkets in the area is Auchan (Mon–Sat 8.30am–10pm), out of town at the Centre Commercial du Belvédère on the route de Rouen (RN 27), and reached by free courtesy buses from the tourist office.

Le Bistrot du Pollet 23 rue du Tête du Boeuf ☎02.35.84.68.57. Little local restaurant just east of Pont Ango, especially cosy on a winter's evening, which sells fresh seafood at low prices. Closed Mon, Sun, two weeks in March & all Aug.

Les Écamias 129 quai Henri IV ☎02.35.84.67.67. Small, friendly traditional French restaurant at the quieter seaward end of the main quay, offering dishes such as skate with capers; the €15.50 option includes moules marinières. Closed Mon.

Le New Haven 53 quai Henri IV ☎02.35.84.89.72. Reliable seafood specialist, towards the quieter end of the quayside, with good menus from €16. The €21 menu de la Jetée is fine if you hanker after fish livers, while €19 buys you a choucroute de la mer (seafood sauerkraut). Closed Tues eve, plus Mon & Wed in winter.

L'Océan 23 quai Henri IV ☎02.32.90.97.80. Big, sprawling quayside bistro that's ideal for a large group; its long menu combines a wide variety of meat, fish and shellfish, with set menus from €10 to €30 and good-value formules besides.

Le Villandry 85 quai Henri IV ☎02.35.82.55.49. Harbourfront restaurant that has an indoor dining room, but is at its best in summer, when tables spread onto its large, uncovered pavement patio. The €16.50 menu features oysters and mussels, followed by solid fish courses and basic desserts.

4

NORMANDY

The Côte d'Albâtre

The Côte d'Albâtre

The shoreline of the Côte d'Albâtre is eroding at a ferocious rate, and it's conceivable that the small resorts here, tucked in among the cliffs at the ends of a succession of valleys, may not last more than another century or so. For the moment, however, they are quietly prospering, with casinos, sports centres and yacht marinas ensuring a modest but steady summer trade. To the east of Dieppe Le Tréport is pleasant enough, but the obvious direction to head is west, where you can take your pick of St-Valéry, Fécamp and the best of the bunch, Étretat.

Le Tréport

Thirty kilometres east of Dieppe, on the border with Picardy, LE TRÉPORT is a seaside resort that has clearly seen better days. It was already something of a bathing station when the railways arrived in 1873 and promoted this as "the prettiest beach in Europe, just three hours from Paris". It remained the capital's favoured resort until the 1950s – and is still served by around five trains daily – but it can't ever have been that pretty, and these days its charms are definitely fading.

Le Tréport divides into three sections: the flat wedge-shaped seafront area, bounded on one side by the Channel, on another by the harbour at the mouth of the River Bresle, and on the third by imposing 100-metre-high white chalk cliffs; the old town, higher up the slopes on safer ground; and the modern town further inland. Only the parts closest to the shore are of any interest to visitors. The seafront itself is entirely taken up by a hideous pink-and-orange concrete apartment block, with one or two snack bars but no other sign of life, facing the Casino and a drab grey shingle beach. The more sheltered harbour-side quai François-1er around the corner holds most of the action, lined with restaurants, souvenir shops and cafés. The assorted stone jetties and wooden piers around the harbour make an enjoyable stroll, watching the comings and goings of the fishing boats.

Climbing up from the quai, you come to the heavily nautical Église St-Jacques, built in the fifteenth century to replace an eleventh-century original that crumbled into the sea, along with the cliff on which it stood. Nearby, next to the fortified former town hall that is now the local library, successive flights of steps, 365 of them in all, climb to the top of the cliffs.

Practicalities

Trains and buses arrive in Le Tréport on the far side of the harbour, a short walk from the main quai. Turning left as you hit the main drag will bring you to the tourist office, on quai Sadi-Carnot (April–June & Sept Mon–Thurs 10am–noon & 3–6pm, Fri & Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5pm; July & Aug daily 10am–7pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 3–6pm; ☎02.35.86.05.69, 🌐www.ville-le-treport.fr). Of the hotels, the best in terms of a sea view and good-quality food is the Richelieu at 50–51 quai François-1er (☎02.35.86.26.55; 🍷), which has comfortable, colourful rooms with showers and a wide range of menus starting at €15 for a “bistro” meal. The St-Louis, 43 quai François le Premier (☎02.35.86.20.70), is a quayside seafood restaurant with a high gourmet reputation.

Varengeville

If the museum in Dieppe (see p.345) awakened your interest in Georges Braque, you may be interested in visiting his grave in the clifftop church some way further up the coast of VARENGEVILLE, 8km west of Dieppe (25min ride on bus #311 or #312, afternoon only). Braque’s marble tomb is topped by a sadly decaying mosaic of a white dove in flight. More impressive is his vivid blue Tree of Jesse stained-glass window inside the church, through which the sun rises in summer.

Back along the road towards Dieppe from the church, the house at the Bois des Moutiers, built for Guillaume Mallet from 1898 onwards and un-French in almost every respect, was one of architect Edwin Lutyens’ first commissions. Lutyens, then aged just 29, was at the start of a career that was to culminate during the 1920s when he laid out most of the city of New Delhi. The real reason to visit, however, is to enjoy the magnificent gardens, designed by Mallet in conjunction with Gertrude Jekyll, which are at their most spectacular in the second half of May (house open mid-March to mid-Nov daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; gardens open April–Oct 10am–8pm; €8 entry to house & gardens during May & June, otherwise €7). Enthusiastic guides lead you through the highly innovative engineering of the house and grounds, full of quirks and games – you must take the tour of the house, but can walk freely through the gardens. The colours of the tapestry by British painter Edward Burne-Jones hanging in the stairwell were copied from Renaissance cloth in William Morris’s studio; the rhododendrons were chosen from similar samples. Outside, paths lead through vistas based on paintings by Poussin, Lorrain and other seventeenth-century artists.

While the village of Varengeville offers little choice of accommodation, its one available option is absolutely irresistible – the lovely 🌟 Hôtel de la Terrasse, a Logis set amid the pines on the route de Vastérial, (☎02.35.85.12.54, 🌐www.hotel-restaurant-la-terrasse.com; closed mid-Oct to mid-March; 🍷). Reached via a right turn off the main highway as you head west of town, it’s perched high above the cliffs, with great sea views. Fish menus in its panoramic dining room cost from €20, and you can follow footpaths down through narrow cracks in the cliffs to reach the rocky beach below.

St-Valéry-en-Caux

The first sizeable community west of Dieppe is ST-VALÉRY-EN-CAUX, a rebuilt town that is the clearest reminder of the fighting – and massive destruction – of the Allied retreat of 1940. A monument on the western cliffs pays tribute to the French cavalry division who faced Rommel's tanks on horseback, brandishing their sabres with hopeless heroism, while beside the ruins of a German artillery emplacement on the opposite cliffs another commemorates a Scottish division, rounded up while trying to fight their way back to Le Havre and the boats home.

Much the most attractive house to survive in St-Valéry, the Renaissance Maison Henri-IV on the quai d'Aval serves as the tourist office (Feb–March & Oct–Dec 11am–1pm & 2.30–6pm; April–May Sat & Sun 11am–1pm & 3–7pm; June & Sept Wed–Sun 11am–1pm & 3–7pm; July & Aug daily 10.30am–1pm & 3–7pm; ☎02.35.97.00.63, 🌐www.ville-saint-valery-en-caux.fr). The only hotel facing the sea is at 22 rue le Perrey; formerly known as the Terrasse, it should have reopened by mid-2007 as La Maison des Galets, with a contemporary-style refurbishment (☎02.35.97.11.22; phone hotel for details), and have a tearoom but not a restaurant. Several other hotels surround the main market square, including the Eden, above a brasserie at 21 place du Marché (☎02.35.97.11.44; 📍📍; closed Mon & Sun eve in low season), where not all rooms are en suite, while in high season the 149 comfortable if characterless rooms of the Hôtel du Casino, 500m back from the seafront at 14 av Clemenceau (☎02.35.57.88.00, 🌐www.hotel-casino-saintvalery.com; 📍), can be a godsend. There are also two campsites: the large four-star D'Etennemare (☎02.35.97.15.79), set back from the sea southwest of the harbour and open year round, and the one-star Falaise d'Amont (☎02.35.97.05.07; closed mid-Nov to mid-March), on the eastern cliffs. The Restaurant du Port, overlooking the harbour at 18 quai d'Amont (☎02.35.97.08.93; closed Mon, plus Sun eve in low season), serves a delicious €21 seafood menu.

Fécamp

FÉCAMP, just over halfway from Dieppe to Le Havre, is a serious fishing port with an attractive seafront promenade. One compelling reason to pay a brief visit is to see the Benedictine Distillery on rue Alexandre-le-Grand, in the narrow strip of streets running parallel to the port towards the town centre. Tours (daily: early Feb to March & Oct–Dec 10.30–11.45am & 2–5pm; April to early July & early Sept to Oct 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; early July to early Sept 10am–6pm; admission by 90 min guided tours only; €5.80) start with a small museum, set firmly in the Middle Ages with props of manuscripts, locks, testaments, lamps and religious paintings beneath a nightmarish mock-Gothic roof. The first whiff of Benedictine – a sweet herby liqueur often combined with brandy – comes in the grim rust-and-grey-coloured Salle des Abbés, and at this point the script abruptly changes – from mysterious monks to PR for an exclusive product. The boxes of ingredients are a rare treat for the nose (take it easy with the myrrh), and there's further theatricality in the old distillery, where boxes of herbs are flung with gusto into copper vats and alembics, though commercial production has long since moved to an out-of-town site. Finally you're offered a dégustation in their bar across the road – neat, in a cocktail, or on crêpes; make sure you hold onto your ticket to qualify.

If your aesthetic sensibilities need soothing after this, head for the soaring medieval nave and Renaissance carved screens of the church of the Trinité, up in the town centre, or the modern Musée des Terres-Neuvas et de la Pêche, on the seafront at 27 bd Albert 1er (July & Aug daily 10am–7pm; Sept–June daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; €3). Spreading across two floors, with lots of miniature model boats and amateur paintings, it focuses on the long tradition whereby the fishermen of Fécamp decamp en masse each year to catch cod in the cold, foggy waters off Newfoundland. Sailing vessels continued to make the trek from the sixteenth century right up until 1931; today vast refrigerated container ships have taken their place.

Practicalities

Fécamp's main tourist office is opposite the distillery at 113 rue Alexandre-le-Grand (Sept–March Mon–Fri 9am–6pm, Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; April–June Mon–Fri 9am–6pm, Sat & Sun 10am–6.30pm; July & Aug daily 9am–6.30pm; ☎02.35.28.51.01, 🌐www.fecamptourisme.com). Most of the hotels are set back away from the sea on odd side streets, but there are a couple of good options near the waterfront, well worth booking in advance. Only the higher rooms at the smarter of the two, the rather genteel Hôtel de la Plage, 87 rue de la Plage (☎02.35.29.76.51, 📍), have sea views, but almost all have been well refurbished and the location is quiet. The De la Mer, on the seafront at 89 bd Albert 1er (☎02.35.28.24.64, 🌐www.hotel-dela-mer.com; 📍), is good value, and nicer inside than it looks from the outside. There's also a superb camp-site, the Camping de Renneville (☎02.35.28.20.97, 🌐www.campingdereneville.com; closed mid–Nov to mid–March), five minutes' walk up from the seafront, in a dramatic location on the western cliffs, with magnificent views but plenty of shade if you need it.

There are a number of well-priced fish restaurants: La Marée, 75 quai Bérigny (☎02.35.29.39.15; closed Sun eve & Mon), is attached to a fish shop and offers menus from €18; and the friendly little Marine, 23 quai de la Vicomté (☎02.35.28.15.94), is open daily for €15 lunches and serves a great choucroute de la mer.

Étretat

Here the alabaster cliffs are at their most spectacular – their arches, tunnels and the solitary “needle” will doubtless be familiar from tourist brochures – and the town itself has grown up simply as a pleasure resort. There isn't even a port of any kind: the seafront consists of a sweeping unbroken curve of concrete above a shingle beach.

Thanks partly to its superb setting, and the lovely architectural ensemble that surrounds its central place Foch, Étretat is a very pretty little place. The old wooden market halles still dominate the main square, the ground floor now converted into souvenir shops, but the beams of the balcony and roof are bare and ancient. As soon as you step onto the beach you'll see the cliff formations to either side. To the west, on the Falaise d'Aval, a straightforward walk – made unnerving by the scary drops nearby – leads up the crumbling side of the cliff, with lush lawns and pastures to the inland side and German fortifications on the shore side extending to the point where the turf abruptly stops, occasionally ripped by the latest rock fall. From the windswept top you can see further rock formations and sometimes even glimpse Le Havre, but the views back to the town sheltered in the valley, and the Falaise d'Amont – which Maupassant compared to an elephant dipping its trunk into the ocean – on its eastern side, are what stick in the memory. The cliff itself presents an idyllic rural scene, with a gentle footpath winding up the green hillside to the little chapel of Notre-Dame.

△ Étretat

Practicalities

Étretat's tourist office is alongside the main road through the centre of town, on place M. Guillard (mid-March to mid-June & mid-Sept to mid-Nov Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-June to mid-Sept daily 10am–7pm; mid-Nov to mid-March Fri & Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm ☎02.35.27.05.21, 🌐www.étretat.net). Of the four well-priced hotels that crowd the corners of place Foch, the Hôtel la Résidence, 4 bd René-Coty (☎02.35.27.02.87; ②–⑦), is most picturesque, a dramatic half-timbered old mansion with beautiful wooden carvings decorating its every nook and cranny – the quality of rooms, however, is variable, and few are as elegant as the facade. The Hôtel des Falaises, opposite at 1 bd René-Coty (☎02.35.27.02.77; ③), is more reliable – in fact from its modernized rooms you get a better view of the Résidence than if you're actually staying there. L'Escale, on place Foch itself (☎02.35.27.03.69; ④), has simple but pleasant rooms, and a snack restaurant downstairs specializing in moules-frites and crêpes. The grand, modern Dormy House, perched above town on the coastal route du Havre to the west (☎02.35.27.07.88, 🌐www.dormy-house.com; ⑤–⑥), offers comfortable rooms with superlative views, and a good restaurant. Campers will find the municipal campsite 1km out on rue Guy-de-Maupassant (☎02.35.27.07.67; closed mid-Oct to mid-March).

The top restaurant in town is the Galion, distinct from the adjoining Résidence at 4 bd René-Coty (☎02.35.29.48.74; closed Tues & Wed in low season), where the €22 menu makes a definitive introduction to all that's best in Norman cuisine.

Le Havre

Most ferry passengers head straight out of the port of LE HAVRE as quickly as the traffic will allow to escape a city that guidebooks tend to dismiss as dismal and gargantuan. While it's hardly picturesque or tranquil, however, it's not such a soulless urban sprawl, even if the port – the largest in France after Marseille – does take up half the Seine estuary, extending way beyond the town. The city was originally built in 1517 to replace the ancient ports of Harfleur and Honfleur, then silting up. Under the simple name of Le Havre – “The Harbour”, it became the principal trading post of France's northern coast, prospering especially during the American War of Independence and thereafter, importing cotton, sugar and tobacco. In the years before 1939, it was the European home of the great luxury liners such as the Normandie, Île de France and France.

Le Havre suffered heavier damage than any other port in Europe during World War II. Following its near-total destruction, it was rebuilt to the specifications of a single architect, Auguste Perret, between 1946 and 1964, an enterprise visibly circumscribed by constraints of time and money. The sheer sense of space can be exhilarating: the showpiece monuments have a winning self-confidence, and the few surviving relics of the old city have been sensitively integrated into the whole. Admittedly, the endless mundane residential blocks can be dispiriting, but with the sea visible at the end of almost every street and open public space and expanses of water at every turn, even those visitors who fail to agree with Perret's famous dictum that "concrete is beautiful" should enjoy a stroll around his city.

Arrival and information

P&O having discontinued its service, ferries to Le Havre have dwindled to just one sailing daily from either England or Ireland. Operated from Portsmouth by LD Lines (☎08.25.30.43.04, 🌐www.ldlines.co.uk), these arrive at the Terminal de Grande Bretagne, not far from the train and bus stations in the Bassin de la Citadelle (☎08.25.01.30.13).

Le Havre's rather inconspicuous and not very central tourist office is on the main seafront drag, at 186 bd Clemenceau (May–Oct Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm; Nov–April Mon–Fri 9am–6.30pm, Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎02.32.74.04.04, 🌐www.lehavre-tourisme.com). The post office at 62 rue Jules-Siegfried (Mon–Fri 8am–7pm, Sat 8am–noon) offers Internet access, as does Cybermetro, facing the gare SNCF at 15 cours de la République (Mon–Sat 7am–midnight; ☎02.32.73.04.28).

Accommodation

Le Havre holds two main concentrations of hotels: one group faces the gare SNCF, while most of the rest lie within walking distance of the ferry terminal.

The nearest campsite is the surprisingly attractive four-star Forêt de Montgeon (☎02.35.46.48.84, ✉chlorophile@orange.fr; closed Jan–April), north of the town centre in a three-kilometre square forest; take bus #1 from the Hôtel de Ville or gare SNCF, direction “Jacques-Monod”.

Best Western Art Hôtel 147 rue Louis-Brindeau ☎02.35.22.69.44, ✉www.bestwestern.com. Very smart, comfortable non-smoking hotel on the north side of the Espace Oscar Niemeyer, facing the Volcano. All rooms have flat-screen LCD TVs and Wi-Fi access. ⑥

Celtic 106 rue Voltaire ☎02.35.42.39.77, ✉www.hotelceltic.com. Facing the Art Hôtel, this has some much cheaper rooms (with shared toilets), which are good value. There is Internet access in the lobby. ②

Parisien 1 cours de la République ☎02.35.25.23.83. Well-appointed place, with congenial management, facing the gare SNCF on a busy corner. All rooms have shower and TV. If you ask, you might be able to get 25 percent reductions on Fri & Sat Dec–March. ③

Le Richelieu 135 rue de Paris ☎02.35.42.38.71, ✉hotel.lerichelieu@orange.fr. For a friendly mid-priced hotel in a very central location with comfortable rooms – many of which have been recently renovated – this hotel is hard to beat. ③

Vent d'Ouest 4 rue de Caligny ☎02.35.42.50.69, ✉www.ventdouest.fr. Plain, cream-coloured cement building, beside the main entrance to the St-Joseph church, where the good-quality, well-renovated rooms, each decorated according to a mountain, countryside or seaside theme, have TV plus either bath or shower. ⑦

The Town

One reason visitors often dismiss Le Havre out of hand is that it's easy to get to and from the city without ever seeing its downtown area. For those who do make the effort, the Perret-designed central Hôtel de Ville is a logical first port of call, a long, low, flat-roofed building topped by a seventeen-storey concrete tower. Surrounded by pergola walkways, flower beds and flowing water from an array of fountains, it's an attractive, lively place with a high-tech feel, and is often the venue for imaginative exhibitions.

Perret's other major creation, clearly visible southwest of the town hall, is the church of St-Joseph, built on a cross of which all four arms are equally short. From the outside it's a plain mass of speckled concrete, the main doors thrown open to hint at dark interior spaces within. When you get inside it all makes sense: the altar is right in the centre, with the hundred-metre bell tower rising directly above it. Very simple patterns of stained glass, all around the church and right the way up the tower, create a bright interplay of coloured light, focusing on the altar.

Le Havre's boldest specimen of modern architecture is even newer – the cultural centre known as the Volcano (or less reverentially as the “yoghurt pot”), dominating the Espace Oscar Niemeyer. Niemeyer, a Brazilian architect, is best known for overseeing the construction of Brasilia, and was still hard at work – at the age of 98 – when this book went to press. He designed this slightly asymmetrical smooth gleaming white cone during the 1970s; it's cut off abruptly just above the level of the surrounding buildings, so that its curving planes are undisturbed by doors or windows.

The Bassin du Commerce, which stretches away from the complex, is of minimal commercial significance. Kayaks and rowing boats can be rented to explore its regular contours, and a couple of larger boats are moored permanently to serve as clubs or restaurants – it's all disconcertingly quiet, serving mainly as an appropriate stretch of water for the graceful white footbridge of the Passarelle du Commerce to cross.

Overlooking the harbour entrance, the modern Musée Malraux & Ancien Havre (Mon & Wed–Fri 11am–6pm, Sat & Sun 11am–7pm; €5) ranks among the best-designed art galleries in France, making full use of natural light to display an enjoyable assortment of nineteenth- and twentieth-century French paintings. Its principal highlights are over two hundred canvases by Eugène Boudin, including greyish landscapes produced all along the Norman coastline with views of Trouville, Honfleur and Étretat, as well as an entire wall of miniature cows and a lovely set of works by Raoul Dufy (1877–1953), which make Le Havre seem positively radiant, whatever the weather outside.

If you have the time to spare, you might like to see what old Le Havre looked like in the prewar days when Jean-Paul Sartre wrote La Nausée here. He taught philosophy for five years during the 1930s in a local school, and his almost transcendent disgust with the place cannot obscure the fascination he felt in exploring the seedy dockside quarter of St-François, in those spare moments when he wasn't visiting Simone de Beauvoir in Rouen. Little survives of the city Sartre knew, but pictures and artefacts gathered from the rubble are on display in one of the few buildings that escaped World War II intact, the Musée de l'Ancien Havre at 1 rue Jérôme-Bellarmato, just south of the Bassin du Commerce (Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €1.50).

Eating and drinking

Few of the restaurants in Le Havre are worth making a fuss about. There are, however, lots of bars, cafés and brasseries around the gare SNCF, and all sorts of crêperies and ethnic alternatives in the backstreets of the St-François district. If you're shopping for food to take home, try the central market, just west of place Gambetta, or two Auchan hypermarkets (both Mon–Sat 8.30am–10pm): the larger, at the Mont Gaillard Centre Commercial, is reached by following cours de la République beyond the gare SNCF; the other, at Montivilliers, is signposted off the Tancarville road.

Le Lyonnais 7–9 rue de Bretagne

☎02.35.22.07.31. Small, cosy restaurant with chequered tablecloths and an English-speaking owner (hence the menu translated into English). The house speciality is baked fish, though dishes from Lyon, such as andouillettes, are also available on menus from €12.50 for lunch, €16 for dinner. Closed Sun.

La Maison Poi 25 rue du Bastion

☎02.35.22.99.45. Trendy, Parisian-style "café-brunch" place where fixed menus are replaced by poichonas de Poi – fried snacks equivalent to tapas – and some good salads for around €12. It's also a good place for an evening. Closed Sun & Mon. In summer, another branch on the Promenade de la Plage, facing the beach, is open daily until 2am.

L'Odysée 41 rue Général-Faidherbe

☎02.35.21.31.42. First-rate seafood restaurant close to the ferry terminal in the old town, serving a reliable €21 weekday lunch menu and a more adventurous €27 dinner option. Closed Sat lunch, Sun eve, Mon & first three weeks in Aug.

La Petite Brocante 75 rue Louis-Brindeau

☎02.35.21.42.20. Lively central bistro, where the set menus are a little pricey at €25 and up. There's always a good-value plat du jour, though, as often as not fresh fish. Closed Sun & first three weeks in Aug.

Along the Seine to Rouen

Until relatively recently, no bridges crossed the Seine any lower than Rouen, which made the river an all but impassable barrier for motorists heading between Upper and Lower Normandy. Since 1995, however, the enormous Pont de Normandie has spanned the rivermouth, enabling motorists to zip across from Le Havre to Honfleur (for a hefty €5 toll), while further inland the immense Tancarville suspension bridge and magnificent Pont de Brotonne, just upstream from Caudebec, offer alternative routes across the river. If Rouen is your destination from Le Havre, however, it makes much more sense to stick to the north bank of the river. A succession of quiet roads follow the Seine's every loop, leading through sleepy towns such as Caudebec-en-Caux and past intriguing ruins like the abbey of Jumièges.

Caudebec-en-Caux

The first town of any size on the right bank of the Seine is CAUDEBEC-EN-CAUX. Most traces of its long past were destroyed by fire in the last war, after which it was rebuilt. The damage – and previous local history – is recorded in the thirteenth-century Maison des Templiers, one of the few buildings to be spared (hours variable: notionally summer Wed & Fri 3–6pm, Sat 10am–12.30pm & 3.30–6.30pm; €5). A more specific and contemporary look at the role of the Seine in Norman history – the river's tidal swell still threatens at this narrow point to swamp unwary promenaders – is taken by the Musée de la Marine de Seine, avenue Winston–Churchill (daily: April–Sept 2–6.30pm; Oct–March 2–5.30pm; €3.25). A market has been held every Saturday since 1390 in the main square.

Caudebec's tourist office is slightly south of the centre, in place Charles-de-Gaulle (April–Nov daily 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm; Dec–March Mon–Sat 3–6pm, Sun 10am–noon & 3–6pm; ☎02.32.70.46.32, 🌐www.caudebec-en-caux.com). Two indistinguishable Logis de France face the river side by side from quai Guilbaud, with similar room rates: the Normotel La Marine at no. 18 (☎02.35.96.20.11, 🌐www.normotel-lamarine.fr; 🍴; restaurant closed Fri eve, Sat lunch & Sun eve), and the Normandie at no. 19 (☎02.35.96.25.11, 🌐www.le-normandie.fr; 🍴; restaurant closed Sun eve). There's also a riverside campsite to the north, the Barre Y Va (☎02.35.96.26.38; closed Nov–March).

Abbaye de St-Wandrille

Just beyond the Pont de Brotonne as you continue towards Rouen, the medieval abbey in ST-WANDRILLE was founded – so legend has it – by a seventh-century count who, with his wife, renounced all earthly pleasures on the day of their wedding. The abbey's buildings make an attractive if curious architectural ensemble: part ruin, part restoration and, in the case of the main buildings, part transplant – a fifteenth-century barn brought in a few years ago from another Norman village miles away.

St-Wandrille remains an active monastery, home to fifty Benedictine monks who in addition to their spiritual duties turn their hands to money-making tasks that range from candle-making to running a reprographic studio; they also show visitors around the abbey on guided tours (Easter–Oct Mon & Wed–Sat 3.30pm, Sun 11.30am & 3.30pm; Nov–Easter Sun 11.30am; €3.50; 🌐www.st-wandrille.com). You can wander through the grounds (daily 5.15am–1pm & 2–9.15pm) for no charge, and you can also listen to the monks' Gregorian chanting in their new church (Mon–Sat 5.25am, 7.30am, 9.45am, 12.45pm, 2.15pm, 5.30pm & 8.35pm; Sun 5.25am, 7.30am, 10am, 12.45pm, 2.30pm, 5pm & 8.35pm).

There's a crêperie opposite the abbey, and, a few doors along in the place de l'Église, the more upmarket Deux Coronnes restaurant (☎02.35.96.11.44; closed Sun evening & Mon), a seventeenth-century inn – half-timbered, naturally – serving delicious menus priced at €15 for lunch and €25 for dinner.

Abbaye de Jumièges

In the next loop of the Seine, 12km on from St-Wandrille, comes the highlight of the Seine valley: the majestic abbey in JUMIÈGES (mid-April to June and first fortnight of Sept Mon–Fri 9.30am–1pm & 2.30–6.30pm, Sat & Sun 9.30am–6.30pm; July Mon–Fri & Sun 9.30am–6.30pm, Sat 9.30am–6.30pm & 10.30pm–12.30am; Aug Mon–Fri & Sun 9.30am–6.30pm, Sat 9.30am–6.30pm & 9.30pm–12.30am; mid-Sept to mid-April daily 9.30am–1pm & 2.30–5.30pm; €5), said to have been founded by St Philibert in 654 AD, just five years after St-Wandrille. A haunting ruin, the abbey was burned by marauding Vikings in 841, rebuilt a century later, then destroyed again – as a deliberate act – during the Revolution. Its main surviving outline, as far as it can still be discerned, dates from the eleventh century – William the Conqueror himself attended its re-consecration in 1067. The twin towers, 52m high, are still standing, as is one arch of the roofless nave, while a one-sided yew tree stands in the centre of what were once the cloisters. The Auberge des Ruines, across from the abbey at 17 place de la Mairie (T 02.35.37.24.05; closed Sun eve, Tues eve, Wed and over Christmas and New Year), is a truly superb restaurant, with outdoor seating on a shaded terrace. Its menus start at €18 for lunch and go up to €55 for a gastronomic evening feast.

Rouen

ROUEN, the capital of Upper Normandy, is one of France's most ancient cities. Standing on the site of Roman Rotomagus, the lowest point on the river then capable of being bridged, it was laid out by the Viking Rollo shortly after he became Duke of Normandy in 911. Captured by the English in 1419, it was the stage in 1431 for the trial and execution of Joan of Arc, and returned to French control in 1449.

Over the centuries, Rouen has suffered repeated devastation; there were 45 major fires in the first half of the thirteenth century alone. It has had to be almost entirely rebuilt during the last sixty years, and now you could spend a whole day wandering around the city without realizing that the Seine ran through its centre. Wartime bombs destroyed all its bridges, the area between the cathedral and the quais, and much of the industrial quarter. The riverside area has never been adequately restored, and what you might expect to be the most beautiful part of the city is in fact something of an abomination.

Enormous sums have, however, been lavished on an upmarket restoration job on the streets a few hundred metres north of the river, which turned the centre into the closest approximation to a medieval city that modern imaginations could come up with. The suggestion that for historical authenticity the houses should be painted in bright, clashing colours was not deemed appropriate, but so far as it goes, the whole of this inner core can be very seductive, and its churches are impressive by any standards.

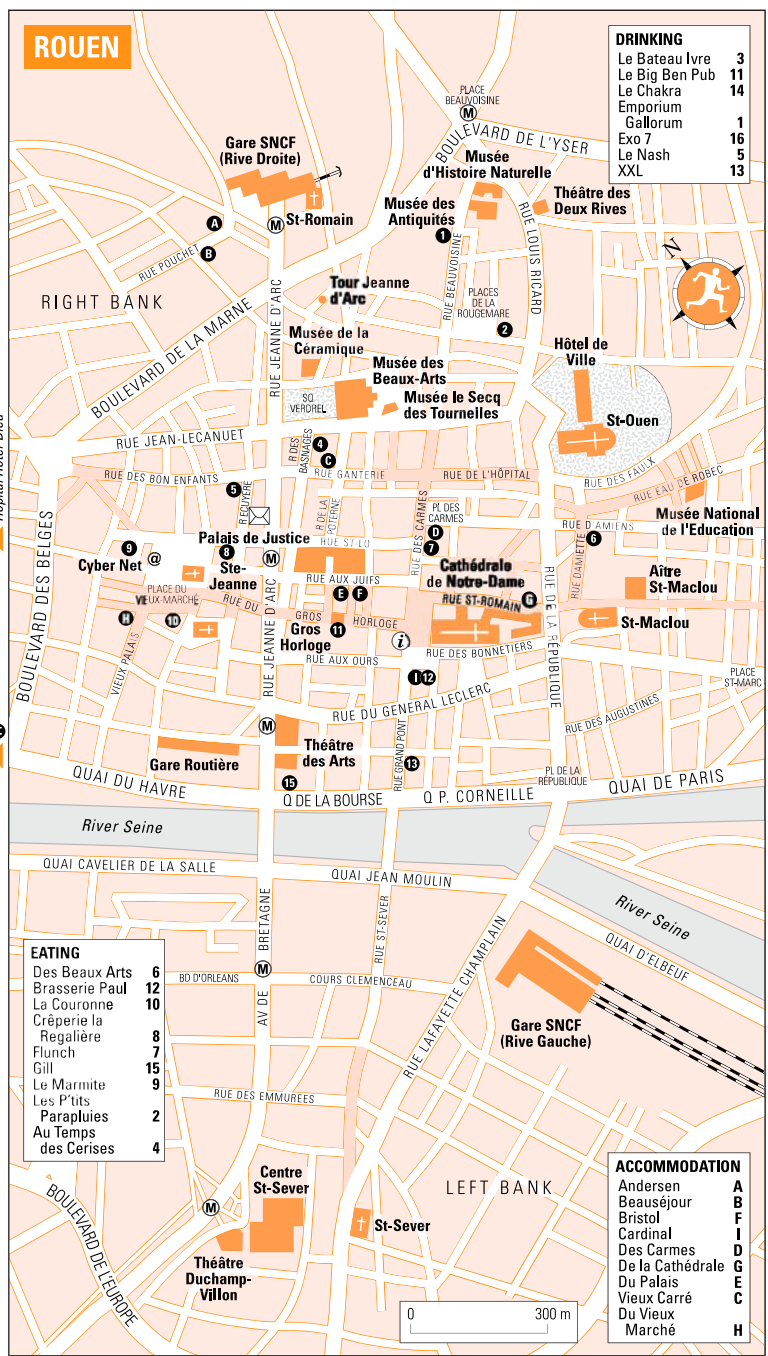

Outside the renovated quarters, things are rather different. While Rouen proper is home to a population of 100,000, the metropolitan area holds four times that number. The city spreads deep into the loop of the Seine, with its docks and industrial infrastructure stretching endlessly away to the south, and it is increasingly expanding up into the hills to the north as well. As the nearest point that large container ships can get to Paris, this remains the fourth-largest port in the country; it's also the biggest exporter of foodstuffs in the European Union, and the biggest in the world for wheat.

Arrival

Rouen is currently a difficult and unpleasant city to drive into, with all traffic funnelled into the hideous multi-lane highways that line both banks of the

ROUEN

DRINKING
Le Bateau Ivre	3
Le Big Ben Pub	11
Le Chakra	14
Emporium
Gallorum	1
Exo 7	16
Le Nash	5
XXL	13

EATING
Des Beaux Arts	6
Brasserie Paul	12
La Couronne	10
Crêperie la Régalière	8
Flunch	7
Gill	15
Le Marmite	9
Les P'tits
Parapluies	2
Au Temps des Cerises	4

ACCOMMODATION
Andersen	A
Beauséjour	B
Bristol	F
Cardinal	I
Des Carmes	D
De la Cathédrale	G
Du Palais	E
Vieux Carré	C
Du Vieux Marché	H

river. The city's sixth and largest bridge across the Seine, designed to connect the motorways just west of the city, was due to be completed in 2007 and may ease things considerably. Many of the central streets, north of the river, have in any case been pedestrianized, so it's best to park as soon as you can – there are plenty of central underground car parks, especially near the cathedral and the place du Vieux-Marché – and explore the city on foot.

The main gare SNCF, Gare Rive Droite, stands at the north end of rue Jeanne-d'Arc. It's connected to the centre by a métro system, which follows the line of the rue Jeanne-d'Arc, making two stops before it resurfaces to cross the river by bridge. Individual journeys cost €1.30 and a book is €10.40. All buses from the gare SNCF except #2A run down rue Jeanne-d'Arc to the centre, which takes five minutes. From the fifth stop, the "Théâtre des Arts" by the river, the gare routière is one block west in rue des Charettes, tucked away behind the riverfront buildings (☎02.35.52.92.00).

Information

Rouen's tourist office stands opposite the cathedral at 25 place de la Cathédrale (May–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎02.32.08.32.40, 🌐www.rouentourisme.com). It serves as the starting point for daily two-hour, French-language walking tours of the city, departing at 2pm, while a tour in English leaves on Fridays at 5pm. Both cost €6.50. For more sedate visitors, a motorized petit train makes a forty-minute-loop tour from the tourist office at regular intervals (April–Oct daily 10am, 11am and hourly 2–5pm; €6).

You can rent bicycles from Rouen Cycles, 45 rue St-Éloi (Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–7pm; ☎02.35.71.34.30). The post office is at 45 rue Jeanne-d'Arc, in the centre of town (Mon–Fri 8am–7pm, Sat 8am–noon). For Internet access, head to the café-style Cyber Net, 47 place du Vieux-Marché (daily 10am–11pm).

Accommodation

With over three thousand hotel rooms in town, there should be no difficulty in finding appropriate accommodation in Rouen, even at the busiest times. Few of the hotels have restaurants, chiefly because there's such a wide choice of places to eat all over town.

Hotels

Andersen 4 rue Pouchet ☎02.35.71.88.51, 🌐www.hotelandersen.com. Very friendly place with plenty of character, a short walk to the right as you come out from the Gare Rive Droite, set behind a small gravel yard. Rooms are large, light and colourful – the cheaper ones share showers. ③
Beauséjour 9 rue Pouchet ☎02.35.71.93.47, 🌐www.hotel-beausejour.com. Good-value place near the station (turn right as you come out), though, beyond the orange facade and nice garden courtyard, the rooms are on the plain side. Almost all have TV, phone and en-suite facilities; there's one cheaper single without its own shower. Closed second half of July. ②
Bristol 45 rue aux Juifs ☎02.35.71.54.21. Clean, pretty nine-room hotel, above its own little brasserie (☎02.35.71.66.35) in a half-timbered house overlooking the Palais de Justice. All rooms are en suite, and have TV. Closed Sun, plus 3 weeks in Aug. ②

Cardinal 1 place de la Cathédrale ☎02.35.70.24.42, 🌐www.cardinal-hotel.fr. Very well-priced hotel in a stunning location facing the cathedral; the rooms have excellent en-suite facilities (the higher ones have cathedral-view balconies), and ample buffet breakfasts are served for €7. ④

Des Carmes 33 place des Carmes ☎02.35.71.92.31, 🌐www.hoteldescarmes.fr.st. Twelve-room hotel in a beautiful nineteenth-century house on a quiet central square, a short walk north from the cathedral. The rooms are on the small side, but have benefited from recent renovation. "Normandy" breakfasts are €6.90. ③

De la Cathédrale 12 rue St-Romain
 ☎ 02.35.71.57.95, 🌐 www.hotel-de-la-cathedrale.
 fr. Attractive, conveniently located hotel, alongside the cathedral and archbishop's palace, though the plain rooms themselves don't live up to the appealing facade and quaint old flower-filled courtyard. Set in a quiet pedestrianized street – it costs €5 to use the public car park nearby – lined with fourteenth-century timber-framed houses. Buffet breakfasts €7.50. 4

Du Palais 12 rue du Tambour ☎ 02.35.71.41.40.
 Very inexpensive central hotel, tucked away just north of the Gros Horloge, offering stylish though not fancy rooms at unbeatable prices. All rooms have showers, while an in-room toilet costs just €2 extra. 2

Vieux Carré 34 rue Ganterie ☎ 02.35.71.67.70, 🌐 www.vieux-carre.fr. Small, pleasant rooms in a half-timbered house in a pedestrianized central street. The nice little tea shop below doubles as the breakfast room. 4

Du Vieux Marché 15 rue de la Pie
 ☎ 02.35.71.00.88, 🌐 www.hotelduvieuxmarche.com. Very modern place, set around a venerable old courtyard, just a few steps from the place du Vieux-Marché. A high standard of comfort has quickly made this the most popular upmarket hotel in town. 7

Campsites

Camping de l'Aubette 23 Vert Buisson in St-Léger du Bourg-Denis ☎ 02.35.08.47.69. Basic site in a more rural, but much less accessible setting than the Camping municipal, 4km east of town on bus route #8.

Camping municipal rue Jules-Ferry in Déville-lès-Rouen ☎ 02.35.74.07.59. Surprisingly small site, 4km northwest of town, that's geared towards caravans rather than tents; bus #2.

The Town

Rouen has traditionally spent a bigger slice of its civic budget on monuments than any other provincial town, which maddens many a Rouennais. As a tourist, however, your one complaint may be the lack of time to visit them all.

The place du Vieux-Marché to the cathedral

The obvious place to start sightseeing is the place du Vieux-Marché, where a small plaque and a huge cross (nearly 20m high) mark the spot on which Joan of Arc (see box opposite) was burnt to death on May 30, 1431. A modern memorial church to the saint was dedicated in the square in 1979 (Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm): it's a wacky, spiky-looking thing and an architectural triumph, incorporating some sixteenth-century stained glass and said to represent either an upturned boat or the flames that consumed Joan. It forms part of an ensemble that manages to incorporate a covered food market in similar style. The theme of the church's fish-shaped windows is continued in the scaly tiles that adorn its roof, which is elongated to form a walkway across the square. The outline of its vanished predecessor's foundations is visible on the adjacent lawns, which also mark the precise spot of Joan's martyrdom. The square itself is surrounded by fine old brown-and-white half-timbered houses, many of those on the south side now serving as restaurants. The private Musée Jeanne d'Arc, tucked in among them in an ancient cellar in the back of a gift shop, draws large crowds to its collection of tawdry waxworks and facsimile manuscripts (daily: mid-April to mid-Sept 9.30am–7pm; mid-Sept to mid-April 10am–noon & 2–6.30pm; €5).

From place du Vieux-Marché, rue du Gros-Horloge leads east towards the cathedral. Just across the intersection with rue Jeanne-d'Arc you come to the Gros Horloge itself, due – after ten years of renovation – to be unveiled in 2007. A colourful one-handed clock, it used to be on the adjacent Gothic belfry until it was moved down by popular demand in 1529, so that people could see it better.

Despite the addition of all sorts of different towers, spires and vertical extensions, the Cathédrale de Notre-Dame (Mon 2–7pm, Tues–Sat 7.30am–7pm, Sun 8am–6pm) remains at heart the Gothic masterpiece that was built in the

When the 17-year-old peasant girl known to history as Joan of Arc (Jeanne d'Arc in French) arrived at the French court early in 1429, the Hundred Years War had already dragged on for over ninety years. Most of northern France was in the grip of an Anglo-Burgundian alliance, but Joan, who had been hearing voices since 1425, was certain she could save the country, and came to present her case to the as-yet-uncrowned Dauphin. Partly through recognizing him despite a simple disguise he wore to fool her at their first meeting, she convinced him of her divine guidance; and after a remarkable three-week examination by a tribunal of the French parlement, she went on to secure command of the armies of France. In a whirlwind campaign, which culminated in the raising of the siege of Orléans on May 8, 1429, she broke the English hold on the Loire Valley. She then escorted the Dauphin deep into enemy territory so that, in accordance with ancient tradition, he could be crowned King Charles VII of France in the cathedral at Reims, on July 17.

Within a year of her greatest triumph, Joan was captured by the Burgundian army at Compiègne in May 1430, and held to ransom. Chivalry dictated that any offer of payment from the vacillating Charles must be accepted, but in the absence of such an offer Joan was handed over to the English for 10,000 ducats. On Christmas Day 1430, she was imprisoned in the château of Philippe-Auguste at Rouen.

Charged with heresy, on account of her “false and diabolical” visions and refusal not to wear men’s clothing, Joan was put on trial for her life on February 21, 1431. For three months, a changing panel of 131 assessors – only eight of whom were English-born – heard the evidence against her. Condemned, inevitably, to death, Joan recanted on the scaffold in St-Ouen cemetery on May 24, and her sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. The presiding judge, Bishop Pierre Cauchon of Beauvais, reassured disappointed English representatives that “we will get her yet”. The next Sunday, Joan was tricked into breaking her vow and putting on male clothing, and taken to the archbishop’s chapel in rue St-Romain to be condemned to death for the second time. On May 30, 1431, she was burned at the stake in the place du Vieux-Marché; her ashes, together with her unburned heart, were thrown into the Seine.

Joan passed into legend, until the discovery and publication of the full transcript of her trial in the 1840s. The forbearance and devout humility she displayed throughout her ordeal added to her status as France’s greatest religious heroine. She was canonized as recently as 1920, and soon afterwards became the country’s patron saint.

twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The west facade of the cathedral, intricately sculpted like the rest of the exterior, was Monet’s subject for over thirty studies of changing light, which now hang in the Musée d’Orsay in Paris. Monet might not recognize it now, however – in the last few years, it’s been scrubbed a gleaming white, free from the centuries of accreted dirt he so carefully recorded. In recent summers, the town has laid on a thirty-minute light show, La Cathédrale de Monet aux Pixels (daily: late June to mid-Sept 10.45pm; free), whereby colours inspired by Monet’s cathedral paintings are projected onto the church’s facade, transforming it quite magnificently into a series of giant Monet-esque canvases.

Inside the cathedral, the carvings of the misericords in the choir provide a study of fifteenth-century life – in secular scenes of work and habits along with the usual mythical beasts. The ambulatory and crypt – closed on Sundays and during services – hold the assorted tombs of various recumbent royalty, stretching back as far as Duke Rollo, who died “enfeebled by toil” in 933 AD, and the actual heart of Richard the Lionheart.

△ Rouen Cathedral

St-Ouen and around

The church of St-Ouen, next to the Hôtel de Ville (which itself occupies buildings that were once part of the abbey), is larger than the cathedral and has far less decoration, so from the outside there's nothing to diminish the instant impact of its vast Gothic proportions and the purity of its lines. Inside (mid-Jan to mid-March and Nov to mid-Dec Tues, Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; mid-March to Oct Tues–Sat 10am–12.15pm & 2–6pm, Sun 9am–12.15pm & 2–6pm), it holds some stunning fourteenth-century stained glass, though much was destroyed during the Revolution. The world that produced it – and, nearer the end of the era, the light and grace of the church of St-Maclou not far to the south – was one of mass death from the plague: thus the Aître St-Maclou immediately to the east, a cemetery for the victims, was an integral part of the St-Maclou complex (daily: mid-March to Oct 8am–8pm; Nov to mid-March 8am–7pm; entrance between 184 & 186 rue Martainville; free). It's now the tranquil garden courtyard of the Fine Arts school, but if you examine the one open lower storey of the surrounding buildings you'll discover the original deathly decorations and a mummified cat. In the square outside are several good antique bookshops, and a few art shops.

The rue Eau de Robec, which runs east from rue Damiette just south of St-Ouen, was described by one of Flaubert's characters in an earlier age as a "degraded little Venice". It's now a textbook example of how Rouen has been restored. Where once a shallow stream flowed beneath the raised doorsteps of venerable half-timbered houses, a thin trickle now makes its way along a stylized cement bed crossed by concrete walkways. In a fine old mansion at no. 185, the Musée National de l'Éducation (Mon & Wed–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, Sat & Sun 2–6pm; €3) tells the story of the last five centuries of schooling in France, with photos, paintings, ancient textbooks and a mocked-up schoolroom. Unless you read French well, however, it's unlikely to hold your interest, and you're better off heading north past the Hôtel de Ville to the Musée des Antiquités, which occupies a seventeenth-century convent on rue Beauvoisine (Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–12.15pm & 1.30–5.30pm, Sun 2–6pm; €3): its tapestries and medieval collection are particularly good.

The Musée des Beaux-Arts and around

Rouen's imposing Musée des Beaux-Arts commands the square Verdrel from just east of the central rue Jeanne-d'Arc (daily except Tues 10am–6pm; €3).

Even this grand edifice is not quite large enough to display some of its medieval tapestries, which trail inelegantly along the floor, but the collection as a whole is consistently absorbing. Unexpected highlights include dazzling Russian icons from the sixteenth century onwards, and an entertaining three-dimensional eighteenth-century Nativity from Naples. Many of the biggest names among the painters – Caravaggio (the centrepiece Flagellation of Christ), Velázquez, Rubens – tend to be represented by a single minor work, but there are several Modiglianis and a couple of Monets: Rouen Cathedral (1894), and the Vue Générale de Rouen. The central sculpture court, roofed over but very light, is dominated by a wonderful three-part mural of the course of the Seine from Paris to Le Havre, prepared by Raoul Dufy in 1937 for the Palais de Chaillot in Paris.

Rouen's history as a centre for faïencerie, or earthenware pottery, is recorded in the Musée de la Céramique, facing the Beaux-Arts from the north (daily except Tues 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; €2.30). A series of beautiful rooms, some of which incorporate sixteenth-century wood panelling rescued from a demolished nunnery of St-Amand, display specimens from the 1600s onwards. Assorted tiles and plates reflect the eighteenth-century craze for chinoiserie, although the genuine Chinese and Japanese pieces nearby possess a sophistication contemporary French craftsmen could only dream of emulating. The mood changes abruptly in the Revolutionary era, as witnessed by plates bearing slogans from both sides of the political fence.

Behind the Beaux-Arts, housed in the old, barely altered church of St-Laurent on rue Jacques-Villon, the Musée Le Secq des Tournelles (daily except Tues 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; €2.30) consists of a gloriously eccentric and uncategorizable collection of wrought-iron objects of all dates and descriptions, among them nutcrackers and door knockers, spiral staircases that lead nowhere and hideous implements of torture.

The Tour Jeanne d'Arc

The pencil-thin Tour Jeanne d'Arc (April–Sept Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6.30pm; Oct–March Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm, Sun 2–5.30pm; €1.50), a short way southeast of the gare SNCF, is all that remains of the castle of Philippe-Auguste, built in 1205 and scene of the imprisonment and trial of Joan of Arc. It served as the castle's keep and entrance-way, and was itself fully surrounded by a moat. It was not, however, Joan's actual prison – that was the Tour de la Pucelle, demolished in 1809 – while the trial took place first of all in the castle's St-Romain chapel, and then later in its great central hall, both of which were destroyed in 1590. The tall, sharp-pointed tower was bought by public subscription in 1860, and restored to its present state. After seeing a small collection of Joan-related memorabilia, you can climb a steep spiral staircase to the very top, but you can't see out over the city, let alone step outside into the open air.

Eating, drinking and nightlife

Unlike the hotels, which sometimes have cheaper weekend rates, Rouen's upmarket restaurants tend to charge more over weekends, when families eat out. The greatest concentration of restaurants is in place du Vieux-Marché, where there's a daily food market, while the area just north is full of Tunisian takeaways, crêperies and so forth. Some of Rouen's most agreeable bars are in the maze of streets between rue Thiers and place du Vieux-Marché. Incoming sailors used to head straight for this area of the city, and the small bars are still there even if the sailors aren't.

Restaurants

Des Beaux Arts 34 rue Damiette ☎02.35.70.17.15. Very good-value Algerian cuisine, on a pretty pedestrianized street north of St-Maclou church: couscous from €8 or tajine from €10, with all kinds of sausages and assorted meats. Closed Mon & Tues eve.

Brasserie Paul 1 place de la Cathédrale ☎02.35.71.86.07. The definitive address for Rouen's definitive bistro, an attractive belle-époque place with seating both indoors and on a terrace in full view of the cathedral. Daily lunch specials, such as the goats' cheese and smoked duck salad that was Simone de Beauvoir's favourite in the 1930s, cost around €11.

La Couronne 31 place du Vieux-Marché ☎02.35.71.40.90. Claiming to be the oldest auberge in France, serving food since 1345, this is definitely the eatery of choice on the place du Vieux-Marché. If you find the interior a little too stuffy and formal, there are a few tables on the square itself. Menus range from €23 for lunch and €29 or €45 for dinner.

Crêperie la Regalière 12 rue Massacre ☎02.35.15.33.33. This inexpensive but quality crêperie, with some outdoor seating just off the place du Vieux-Marché, is one of central Rouen's best bargains, with menus at €8 and €12. Closed Sun.

Funch 60 rue des Carmes ☎02.35.71.81.81. Efficient, popular self-service on a street running north from the cathedral, with many fresh dishes, starters and desserts, and a €5.60 daily formule. Unlimited vegetables with any hot dish, or an all-you-can-eat salad for €4.40.

Gill 9 quai de la Bourse ☎02.35.71.16.14. Absolutely definitive French restaurant with specialities such as lobster grilled with asparagus and pigeon baked in puff pastry. Weekday lunch menus start at €40 (not bad value considering the quality), while the most expensive dinner menu will set you back €85. Closed Sun & Mon, plus three weeks in Aug.

Le Marmite 3 rue de Florence ☎02.35.71.75.55. Romantic little place just west of the place du Vieux-Marché, offering beautiful, elegantly presented gourmet dishes as part of well-priced menus at €25, €35 (featuring hot foie gras) and €50. Closed Sun eve, Mon, & Tues lunch.

Les P'tits Parapluies 46 rue Bourg l'Abbé, place de la Rougemare ☎02.35.88.55.26. Elegant, secluded half-timbered restaurant not far north of the Hôtel de Ville. Counting your calories is not really an option here; the trio of menus, some of which change weekly, start at €25 and include such delights as foie gras and oysters, and come with two glasses of wine. Closed Sat lunch, Sun eve & Mon.

Au Temps des Cerises 4-6 rue des Basnages ☎02.35.89.98.00. If you've come to Normandy for the cheeses, this trendy, if slightly overstyled restaurant is the place to get it all out of your system, with turkey breast in Camembert, goats' cheese crêpes and, above all, fondues of every description. Lunch menus from €13, dinners from €16. Closed Mon & Sat lunches & all Sun.

Bars and clubs

Le Bateau Ivre 17 rue des Sapins ☎02.35.70.09.05. This low-key but atmospheric hangout a long way northeast of the centre puts on a rock-oriented programme of music and performance, with an open-mic night on Thursdays. Tues & Wed 10pm-2am, Thurs-Sat 10pm-4am. Closed Sun, Mon & all Aug.

Big Ben Pub 95 rue du Gros-Horloge ☎02.35.88.44.50. Right under the big clock, this busy pub in a splendid half-timbered house has the air of a medieval tavern, even if it does feature karaoke on Thurs, Fri and Sat evenings (except during summer). There are two floors inside and some tables on the busy street outside. Mon 6pm-2am, Tues-Sat noon-2am.

Le Chakra 4 bd Ferdinand-de-Lesseps ☎02.32.10.12.02. Busy, sweaty club beside the Seine, a couple of kilometres west of the centre, where big-name DJs play house and techno to a predominantly young crowd. Fri 11pm-4am, Sat 5-9pm & 11pm-4am, Sun 5-9pm.

Emporium Gallorum 151 rue Beauvoisine ☎02.35.71.76.95. Busy half-timbered bar, a short walk north of the centre, that's especially popular with students, which often puts on small-scale gigs and theatrical productions. Tues & Wed 8pm-2am, Thurs-Sat 6pm-4am. Closed Aug.

Exo 7 13 place des Chartreux ☎02.35.03.32.30, www.exo7.net. Traditionally the centre of Rouen's heavy-rock scene, a long way south of the centre, the Exo 7 (pronounced "Exocet") is nowadays a bit more eclectic, with varied gigs and dance nights as well. Fri & Sat 11pm-5am. Closed first 3 weeks of Aug.

Le Nash 97 rue Écuyère ☎02.35.98.25.24. Relaxed bar popular with locals. With its moody lighting and zebra-striped upholstery, the interior has a lounge-like feel, while the outdoor terrace is much more akin to a classic French café and serves light snacks. Music ranges from ambient to Latin. Mon-Fri 11.30am-2pm & 6pm-2am, Sat 6pm-2am.

XXL 25-27 rue de la Savonnerie ☎02.35.88.84.00. Well-known gay (male) bar near the river, just south of the cathedral, which has regular theme nights and a small dance floor in the basement. Although unambiguously geared to men looking for men, women will not be turned away. Tues & Wed 9pm-2am, Thurs-Sat 9pm-4am, Sun 10pm-2am.

Entertainment

As you would expect in a conurbation of 400,000, there's always plenty going on in Rouen, from classical concerts in churches to alternative events in community and commercial centres. The city has several theatres, which mainly work to winter seasons. The most highbrow venue for big spectacles is the Théâtre des Arts, 7 rue de Dr-Rambert (Tues–Sat 1–8pm; ☎08.10.81.11.16, 🌐www.operaderouen.com), which puts on opera, ballet and concerts. The more adventurous repertory company of the Théâtre des Deux Rives (☎02.35.70.22.82), based opposite the Antiquités museum at the junction of rue Louis-Ricard and rue de Joyeuse, presents work by playwrights such as Beaumarchais, Shakespeare, Beckett and Gorky.

Major concerts often take place in the Théâtre Duchamp-Villon in the St-Sever complex (☎02.32.18.28.10, 🌐www.theatreduchampvillon.com), accessible by métro (stop “St-Sever”). Also south of the river and on the métro (direction “Georges Braque”), albeit a long way further out, is the Théâtre Charles Dullin, allée des Arcades, Grand Quévilly (☎02.35.69.51.18, 🌐www.theatre-charles-dullin.com). There are two multi-screen cinemas just north of the river (at 28 rue de la République and 75 rue du Général-Leclerc, and another to the south in the St-Sever complex.

Upstream from Rouen

Upstream from Rouen towards Paris, high cliffs on the north bank of the Seine imitate the coast, looking down on waves of green and scattered river islands. By the time you reach Les Andelys, 25km southeast of Rouen, you're within 100km of the capital, meaning that accommodation and eating prices tend to be geared towards affluent weekend and day-trippers. Large country estates abound in this agreeable countryside, and public transport is minimal. However, infrequent buses run from Rouen to Les Andelys, and trains from Rouen call at Vernon, just across the river from one of Normandy's most visited tourist attractions, the village of Giverny.

Les Andelys

The most dramatic sight anywhere along the Seine has to be Richard the Lionheart's Château Gaillard, perched high above LES ANDELYS. Constructed in a position of impregnable power, it looked down over any movement on the river at the frontier of the English king's domains. Built in less than a year (1196–97), the castle might have survived intact had Henri IV not ordered its destruction in 1603 in the aftermath of the War of Religion between Catholics and Protestants. As it is, the dominant outline remains. Visits to the château are permitted between mid-March and mid-November only (daily except Tues 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; €3). On foot, you can make the steep climb up via a path that leads off rue Richard-Coeur-de-Lion in Petit Andely. The only route for motorists is extraordinarily convoluted, following a long-winded one-way system that starts opposite the church in Grand Andely.

The tourist office for Les Andelys is in Petit Andely, at 24 rue Philippe-Auguste (Oct–May Mon–Fri 2–6pm, Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; June–Sept Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2–7pm; ☎02.32.54.41.93, 🌐www.ville-andelys.fr). One of the nicest hotels is the eighteenth-century 🏰 Chaîne d'Or, on the banks of the Seine opposite the thirteenth-century church of St-Sauveur at 27 rue Grande (☎02.32.54.00.31, 🌐www.hotel-lachainedor.com; 📍; restaurant closed in winter all Mon & Tues lunch). Some of the gorgeous large modernized rooms overlook the river and are undeniably well priced; the one drawback is that though the food in its restaurant is utterly wonderful, the very cheapest dinner menu costs €44, and even breakfast costs €14. There's also a lovely riverside campsite, far below the château, the Île des Trois Rois (☎02.32.54.23.79, 🌐www.camping-troisrois.fr; closed mid-Nov to mid-March).

4

Giverny

Roughly 15km south of the ancient fortifications of Les Andelys, on the north bank of the river, you come to Monet's house and gardens – complete with water-lily pond – at GIVERNY (gardens and house April–Oct Tues–Sun 9.30am–6pm; last entrance 5.30pm, no advance sales; ☎02.32.51.28.21, 🌐www.fondation-monet.com; €5.50 house and gardens, €4 gardens only). Monet lived here from 1883 till his death in 1926, and the gardens that he laid out were considered by many of his friends to be his masterpiece. In fact art lovers who make the pilgrimage here tend to be outnumbered by garden enthusiasts. None of Monet's original paintings is on display – most are in the Orangerie and Musée d'Orsay in Paris – whereas the gardens are still lovingly tended in all their glory.

You enter the house through the huge studio, built in 1915, where Monet painted the last and largest of his canvases depicting water lilies (in French, nymphéas). It now serves as a well-stocked book and gift shop. A gravel footpath leads to the actual house, a long two-storey structure facing down to the river. Monet's bedroom is bedecked with family photos and paintings by friends and family, while his salon holds further washed-out reproductions. All other main rooms are crammed floor-to-ceiling with his collection of Japanese prints, especially works by Hokusai and Hiroshige. Most of the original furnishings are gone, but you do get a real sense of how the dining room used to be, with all its walls and fittings painted a glorious bright yellow; Monet designed his own yellow crockery to harmonize with the surroundings. By contrast, the stairs and upstairs rooms are a pale blue.

Colourful flower gardens, with trellised walkways and shady bowers, stretch down from the house. At the bottom, a dank underpass beneath the road leads to the jardin d'eau, focused around the narrow water-lily pond. Footpaths around the perimeter and arching Japanese footbridges offer differing views of the water lilies themselves, nurtured by gardeners in rowing boats. May and June, when the rhododendrons flower around the pond and the wisteria that winds over the Japanese bridge is in bloom, are the best times to visit. Whenever you come, however, you'll have to contend with camera-happy crowds jostling to capture their own impressions of the water lilies.

A few minutes' walk up Giverny's village street, the Musée d'Art Américain is an unattractive edifice that hides a spacious and well-lit gallery devoted to American artists resident in France between 1865 and 1915 (April–Oct Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; 🌐www.maag.org; €5.50, free first Sun of each month). Some took their admiration of Monet to a point that now seems embarrassing, painting many of the same scenes, but there are some interesting works by John Singer Sargent, Winslow Homer and, especially, Mary Cassatt.

Giverny's one hotel, the Musardière, stands not far beyond Monet's house at 123 rue Claude-Monet (☎02.32.21.03.18, 📧iraymonde@aol.com; 📍); dinner menus in its restaurant start at €26. The nearest inexpensive accommodation is the Hôtel d'Évreux, 11 place d'Évreux (☎02.32.21.16.12; 🌐www.hoteldevreux.fr; 📍), across the river in the heart of the town of VERNON. Connecting buses from Vernon's gare SNCF run to the gardens in Giverny.

Basse Normandie

As you head west along the coast of Basse Normandie from Le Havre, a succession of somewhat exclusive resorts – of which only Honfleur is especially memorable – is followed first by the beaches where the Allied armies landed in 1944, and then by the wilder, and in places deserted, shore around the Cotentin Peninsula. There are two absolutely unmissable sights along this stretch – the glorious island abbey of Mont St-Michel and the Bayeux Tapestry.

The Norman Riviera

The only section of the Norman coast to have serious delusions of grandeur is the stretch that lies immediately west of the mouth of the Seine. The Pont de Normandie across the river estuary from Le Havre has made such places as Trouville and Deauville too hectic for comfort, though only Honfleur could be said to have had all that much to lose.

Honfleur

HONFLEUR, the best preserved of the old ports of Normandy and the most easterly on the Calvados coast, is a near-perfect seaside town that lacks only a beach. It used to have one, but with the accumulation of silt from the Seine the sea has steadily withdrawn, leaving the eighteenth-century waterfront houses of boulevard Charles-V stranded and a little surreal. The ancient port, however, still functions – the channel to the beautiful Vieux Bassin is kept open by regular dredging – and though only pleasure craft now use the moorings in the harbour basin, fishing boats tie up alongside the pier nearby, and you can usually buy fish either directly from the boats or from stands on the pier, still by right run by fishermen's wives.

Honfleur is highly picturesque, and has moved significantly upmarket since the opening of the Pont de Normandie. Despite now being just a few minutes' drive from Le Havre, the old port has strong echoes of the fishing village that appealed so greatly to artists in the second half of the nineteenth century.

Arrival and information

Honfleur's gare routière, just to the east of the Vieux Bassin, is served by over a dozen direct daily buses from Caen (#20), and up to eight express services from Le Havre (Bus Verts; ☎08.01.21.42.14, 🌐www.busverts.fr). The nearest gare SNCF is at Pont l'Évêque, connected to Honfleur by the Lisieux bus (#50) – a twenty-minute ride.

The tourist office adjoins the glass-fronted Mediathèque on quai Le Paulmier, between the Vieux Bassin and the gare routière (Easter–June & Sept Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–5pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 10am–7pm, Sun 10am–5pm; Oct–Easter Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm ; ☎ 02.31.89.23.30, 🌐 www.ot-honfleur.fr). Ask about their summer programme of guided tours of the town, which range from two-hour walkabouts to full-day excursions including meals.

4 Accommodation

If finding budget accommodation is one of your main priorities, it probably makes sense for you not to stay in Honfleur at all, and simply to visit for the day. On summer weekends especially, so many visitors turn up that even the most ordinary hotel can get away with charging rates well above the average for Normandy. No hotels overlook the harbour itself, while the two-star Camping du Phare (☎ 02.31.89.10.26; closed Oct–March) is on place Jean-de-Vienne at the western end of boulevard Charles-V.

Belvédère 36 rte Emile-Renouf ☎ 02.31.89.08.13, 🌐 www.hotel-belvedere-honfleur.com. Peaceful, traditional Logis de France, with garden and terrace, roughly ten minutes' walk east of (and up from) the harbour. All nine rooms are en suite; some are in a cottage in the grounds that has views of the Pont de Normandie, and there's a good restaurant, with menus from €16.90. Closed Jan. 4

Cascades 17 place Thiers ☎ 02.31.89.05.83. Seventeen-room hotel-restaurant opening onto both place Thiers and the cobbled rue de la Ville behind. Slightly noisy rooms upstairs, and a good-value if not particularly exciting restaurant with outdoor seating on both sides; menus start at €13; more expensive options featuring dishes such as fruits de mer are from €30. Closed Mon & Tues in low season (restaurant), plus mid-Nov to early Feb (hotel and restaurant). 2

Des Loges 18 rue Brûlée ☎ 02.31.89.38.26, 🌐 www.hoteldesloges.com. Brightly refurbished hotel with chic, elegant decor on a quiet cobbled street just 100m inland from Ste-Catherine church. It's decked out with flowers, is run by helpful staff, and offers a high standard of expensive accommodation. Baby-sitting available. 7

Monet Charrière du Puits ☎ 02.31.89.00.90, 🌐 www.motelmonet.fr. This old ivy-covered house is in a very quiet location ten minutes' walk up a moderately steep hill from the centre and offers modern, en-suite rooms and plenty of courtyard parking. 4

Tilbury 30 place Hamelin ☎ 02.31.98.83.33, 🌐 www.hotel-tilbury.com. Very central, a stone's throw from the Lieutenant, with well-equipped and comfortable rooms, all with baths, above a crêperie. There are three suites suitable for families. 4

The Town

Visitors to Honfleur inevitably gravitate towards the old centre, around the Vieux Bassin. At the bassin, slate-fronted houses, each of them one or two storeys higher than seems possible, harmonize – despite their tottering and ill-matched forms – into a backdrop that is only excelled by the Lieutenant at the harbour entrance. The latter was the dwelling of the King's Lieutenant, and has been the gateway to the inner town since at least 1608, when Samuel Champlain sailed from Honfleur to found Québec. The church of St-Étienne nearby is now the Musée de la Marine, which combines a collection of model ships with several rooms of antique Norman furnishings (mid-Feb to March & Oct to mid-Nov Tues–Fri 2.30–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 10am–noon; April–Sept Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6.30pm; €3.10, or €4.30 with Musée de Vieux Honfleur). Just behind it, two seventeenth-century salt stores that used to contain the precious commodity during the days of the much-hated gabelle, or salt tax, now serve as the Musée du Vieux Honfleur (same hours and entrance fee), filled with everyday artefacts from old Honfleur.

The town's artistic past – and its present concentration of galleries and painters – owes most to Eugène Boudin, forerunner of Impressionism. He was born and worked in the town, trained the 18-year-old Monet and was joined for various periods by Pissarro, Renoir and Cézanne. Boudin was among the founders of what's now the Musée Eugène Boudin (mid-March to Sept daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct to mid-March Mon & Wed–Fri 2.30–5pm, Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2.30–5pm; €5.20), west of the port on place Erik-Satie, and left 53 works to it after his death in 1898. His pastel seascapes and sunsets in particular are quite appealing here in context, and they're accompanied by changing temporary exhibitions and a few ethnographic displays.

Admission to the museum also gives you access to the detached belfry of the church of Ste-Catherine (daily 9am–6pm). Both church and belfry are built almost entirely of wood – supposedly owing to economic restraints after the Hundred Years War. The church itself makes a change from the usual Norman stone constructions, and has the added peculiarity of being divided into twin naves, with one balcony running around both. From rue de l'Homme-de-Bois behind you can see yacht masts through the houses overlooking the bassin and, in the distance, the huge industrial panorama of Le Havre's docks.

Just down the hill from the Musée Boudin, at 67 bd Charles-V, is Les Maisons Satie (daily except Tues: May–Sept 10am–7pm; mid-Feb to April & Oct–Dec 11am–6pm; last entrance 60min before closing time; €5.10), the red-timbered house of Erik Satie. From the outside it looks unchanged since the composer was born there in 1866. Step inside, however, and you'll find yourself in Normandy's most unusual and enjoyable museum. As befits a close associate of the Surrealists, Satie is commemorated by all sorts of weird and wonderful interactive surprises. It would be a shame to give too many of them away here; suffice it to say that you're immediately confronted by a giant pear, bouncing into the air on huge wings to the strains of his best-known piano piece, Gymnopédies. You also get to see a filmed reconstruction of Parade, a ballet on which Satie collaborated with Picasso, Stravinsky and Cocteau, which created a furore in Paris in 1917.

Eating

With its abundance of day-trippers and hotel guests, Honfleur supports an astonishing number of restaurants, most specializing in seafood. Few face onto the harbour itself; the narrow buildings around the edge seem to be better suited to being snack bars, crêperies, cafés and ice-cream parlours.

L'Absinthe 10 quai de la Quarantaine
 ☎02.31.89.39.00. This eighteenth-century mansion houses the most imaginative and gastronomic of the row of five restaurants that stand just around the corner from the bassin, with dishes such as smoked salmon carpaccio or foie gras in ginger on menus ranging from €30 up to a seven-course €60 extravaganza. Closed mid-Nov to mid-Dec.

Le Bouillon Normand 7 rue de la Ville
 ☎02.31.89.02.41. Old-fashioned bistro, with indoor and outdoor seating, set just back from the basin behind St-Étienne church. Fish, cider and cheese are prominent on simple, good-value menus at €16 and €23. Closed Wed, Sun eve, & Jan.

Au P'tit Mareyeur 4 rue Haute ☎02.31.98.84.23. No distance from the centre, but all the seating is indoors and there are no views. Very good fish dishes such as red crab soup with garlic, plus plenty of creamy Pays d'Auge sauces and superb desserts. The "Menu Carte" is great value at €21, while bouillabaisse costs €19. Closed Mon, Tues & Jan.

La Tortue 36 rue de l'Homme de Bois
 ☎02.31.89.04.93. A welcoming place near the Musée Boudin, where €16 buys a great-value five-course meal. There's even a €12 vegetarian menu, consisting of apple soup, a couple of salads, vegetables and dessert. Closed Mon eve & Tues, Oct–March only.

Le Vieux Honfleur 13 quai St-Étienne
 ☎02.31.89.15.31. The best of the restaurants around the harbour itself, with spacious alfresco dining – in shade at lunchtime – on its pedestrianized eastern side. Simple menus, but the seafood is very good, as befits prices starting at €29. The only other set menu, at €49.50, offers lobster or turbot, with no meat options other than foie gras.

Trouville and Deauville

Heading west along the corniche from Honfleur, green fields and fruit trees lull the land's edge, and cliffs rise from sandy beaches all the way to Trouville, 15km away. The resorts aren't exactly cheap but they're relatively undeveloped, and if you want to stop along the coast this is the place to do it. The next stretch, from Trouville to Cabourg, is what you might call the Riviera of Normandy: with Trouville as "Nice" and Deauville as "Cannes" within a stone's throw of each other.

TROUVILLE retains some semblance of a real town, with a constant population and industries other than tourism. But it is still a resort, with a tangle of busy pedestrian streets just back from the beach that are alive with restaurants and hotels. It's been a chic destination ever since Napoléon III started bringing his court here every summer in the 1860s. One of his dukes, looking across the river, saw, instead of marshlands, money – and lots of it, in the form of a racetrack. His vision materialized, and villas appeared between the racetrack and the sea to become DEAUVILLE, which likes to style itself the "21st arrondissement" of Paris. Now you can lose money on the horses, cross five streets and lose more in the casino, then lose yourself across 200m of sports and "cure" facilities and private swimming huts before reaching the planches, 500m of boardwalk, beyond which rows of primary-coloured parasols obscure the view of the sea.

Deauville's American Film Festival (📧 www.festival-deauville.com), held in the first week of September, is the antithesis of Cannes, with public admission to a wide selection of previews.

Practicalities

Trouville and Deauville share their gare SNCF and gare routière, located in between the two just south of the marina. Each day, thirteen of the hourly buses from Caen continue along the coast to Honfleur. The usual lavish brochures can be found at the tourist office on place de la Mairie in Deauville (May & June Mon–Fri 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sat 9am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2–5pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; Sept–April Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2–5pm; ☎02.31.14.40.00, 📧 www.deauville.org), or the one at 32 quai F. Moureaux in Trouville (April–June, Sept & Oct Mon–Sat 9.30am–noon & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–4pm; Nov–March Mon–Sat 9.30am–noon & 1.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎02.31.14.60.70, 📧 www.trouvillesurmer.org).

As you might imagine, hotels here tend to be luxurious, overpriced or both. If you fancy staying right on the seafront, it's hard to beat the Flaubert, rue Gustave-Flaubert (☎02.31.88.37.23, 📧 www.flaubert.fr; 📍), a grand, faux-timbered mansion at the start of Trouville's boardwalk that's home to the excellent Le Vivier restaurant. Cheaper options include the Hôtel des Sports, behind Deauville's fish market at 27 rue Gambetta (☎02.31.88.22.67; 📍; closed Feb & Nov, plus Sun in winter), is among the least expensive, and Trouville's closest equivalent, Le Trouville, 50m from the beach at 1 rue Thiers (☎02.31.98.45.48, 📧 www.hotel.letrouville.com; 📍; closed Jan). Deauville, meanwhile, has a campsite, La Vallée de Deauville, 3km from the centre on route de Beaumont-en-Auge in St-Arnoult (☎02.31.88.58.17; 📧 www.camping-deauville.com; closed Nov–March).

A good place to eat in Deauville is Chez Mique at 81 rue Eugène-Colas (☎02.31.88.09.52; closed Tues in winter, plus all Jan), a top-quality Parisian-style bistro where a full meal costs around €40. Trouville also has its fair share of good fish restaurants, including Les Vapeurs at 160 bd F-Moureaux (☎02.31.88.15.24) – one of several lively brasseries opposite the attractive old half-timbered fish market – and La Petite Auberge, 7 rue Carnot (☎02.31.88.11.07; closed Tues all year, plus Wed except in Aug), though both get very crowded at weekends.

Houlgate

A hundred years ago, HOULGATE, 15km west of Deauville, was every bit as glamorous and sophisticated a destination as its immediate neighbours. What makes it different today is that it has barely changed since then. Its long straight beach remains lined with a stately procession of nineteenth-century villas, while the town's handful of commercial enterprises are confined to the narrow parallel street, the rue des Bains, fifty metres inland. As a result, Houlgate is the most relaxed of the local resorts, ideal if you're looking for a peaceful family break where the only stress is deciding whether to paddle or play mini-golf.

The tourist office is well back from the sea on boulevard des Belges (April–June Sept & Oct Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10.30am–1pm & 2–4pm; July & Aug daily 10am–1pm & 2–6.30pm; Nov–March Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.31.24.34.79, 🌐www.ville-houlgate.fr). The Hostellerie Normande, just off the rue des Bains at 11 rue E.-Deschanel (☎02.31.24.85.50; 🍷), is a pretty but rather impersonal little hotel covered with ivy and creeping flowers, with a €14 lunch menu on which you can follow fish soup with a plate of moules-frites or tripe. Above the Vaches Noires (“Black Cows”) cliffs on the corniche road east of town, 🏠 La Ferme Auberge des Aulnettes (☎02.31.28.00.28; 🍷; closed Dec & Jan), is a lovely half-timbered country house in pleasant gardens, where the cheapest rooms have a shower but share a WC. A good restaurant with outdoor seating serves menus from €17. The best campsite in the area, the four-star Les Falaises (☎02.31.24.81.09, 🌐www.lesfalaises.com; closed mid-Oct to March), is not far away.

Dives and Cabourg

DIVES, the port from which William the Conqueror sailed for Hastings, is another 3km west from Houlgate, though like Honfleur it's now pushed well back from the sea. A lively Saturday market focuses around the ancient oak halles, whose steep tiled roof stretches far above its walls; on market days, it's crammed with mouthwatering delicacies and Norman specialities. Dives is home to a large, inexpensive Etap hotel, on voie nouvelle de Port-Guillaume (☎08.92.68.08.54; 🍷).

At the much newer town of CABOURG, across the mouth of the Dives River, the fin-de-siècle streets of the town centre fan out in perfect symmetry from what is almost certainly the straightest promenade in France, with semicircular avenues linking them together. The resort, contemporary with Deauville, seems to be stuck in the nineteenth century – immobilized by memories of Proust, perhaps, who wrote for a while in the Grand Hôtel, one of an outrageously ostentatious ensemble of buildings around the Jardins du Casino. The tourist office in the Jardins du Casino has full details on hotels (April–June & Sept–Oct Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; July & Aug daily 9.30am–7pm; Sun 10am–noon & 2–4pm; Nov–March Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–4pm; ☎02.31.91.20.00, www.cabourg.net). A pleasant place to stay and eat is the Oie qui Fume, 18 av de la Brèche-Buhot (☎02.31.91.27.79, www.cabourg-hotel.fr; 🍴), 100m back from the sea on a quiet road half a dozen streets west of the centre; its €24 menu features goose (oie) as either starter or main course.

Caen

CAEN, capital and largest city of Basse Normandie, may well not be a place where you'll want to spend much time: in the months of fighting in 1944, it was devastated. Nonetheless, the city that nine hundred years ago was the favoured residence of William the Conqueror remains impressive in parts.

Its central feature is a ring of ramparts that no longer have a castle to protect, and, though there are the scattered spires and buttresses of two abbeys and eight old churches, roads and roundabouts fill the wide spaces where prewar houses stood. Approaches are along thunderous dual carriageways through industrial suburbs, now prospering once more following an influx of high-tech newcomers.

Arrival and information

Caen's small, modern airport, 7km west just outside Carpiquet (☎02.31.71.20.10), is served by buses (€1.20) connecting with all services, taking 25 minutes to run to and from the Tour-le-Roi stop in place

Courtonne. Avis (☎02.31.34.88.89), Budget (☎02.31.83.70.47) and Rent A Car (☎02.31.84.10.10) provide car hire both in the terminal and in town.

The gare SNCF (☎08.36.35.35.35) is a rather dull kilometre's walk south of the town centre across the river, with the gare routière alongside. An extensive network of local buses and trams is run by TWISTO (☎02.31.15.55.55, 🌐www.twisto.fr), which has ticket and information centres at 15 rue de Geôle (just north of the tourist office), and on boulevard Maréchal-Leclerc. The main tram route connects the southern and northern suburbs, running through the heart of the city from the gare SNCF up avenue de 6-Juin to the university and beyond.

Caen's tourist office is on place St-Pierre across from the church of St-Pierre (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–1pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2–5pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9.30am–1pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎02.31.27.14.14, 🌐www.caen.fr/tourisme). You can go online at Espace Micro, on place Courtonne at 1 rue Basse (Mon–Thurs 10am–11pm, Fri & Sat 10am–1am, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–9pm; ☎02.31.53.68.68), or the main post office on place Gambetta (Mon–Fri 8am–7pm, Sat 8am–noon).

Accommodation

Caen has a great number of hotels, though, as ever in the rebuilt bomb-damaged cities of Normandy, few could be called attractive. They're not particularly concentrated in any one area either, though you'll find clusters just west of the castle and tourist office – a convenient location for motorists heading to or from the ferry – as well as around the pleasure port, and a handful facing the gare SNCF. With plenty of dedicated restaurants in town, few hotels bother to provide food.

Hotels

Bernières 50 rue de Bernières ☎02.31.86.01.26, 🌐www.hotelbernieres.com. This bright, central hotel offers appealing en-suite rooms above a brasserie halfway between the churches of St-Pierre and St-Jean. ③

Cordeliers 4 rue des Cordeliers ☎02.31.86.37.15. Friendly hotel, centred on a fine eighteenth-century house in a small side street near the castle. The very cheapest rooms have showers but no toilet, but fully en-suite ones are not much more expensive. ②

Courtonne 5 rue des Prairies St-Gilles ☎02.31.93.47.83, 🌐www.hotel-courtonne.com. This very welcoming modernized hotel overlooks place Courtonne and the pleasure port, though the building is so narrow it's easy to miss. All rooms have bath or shower, phone and TV. ④

Dauphin 29 rue Gémare ☎02.31.86.22.26, 🌐www.le-dauphin-normandie.com. Upmarket hotel, tucked away behind the tourist office. Part of it was a priory during the eighteenth century, not that you'd guess. The public areas are impressive, while the rooms are comfortable without being exciting in any way, and there's a sauna and fitness centre. Grand restaurant, with an €19 weekday dinner menu; weekend menus €30 and €52 (restaurant closed Sat lunch & Sun all year, and open for dinner only June–Sept). ⑤

Quatrans 17 rue Gémare ☎02.31.86.25.57, 🌐www.hotel-des-quatrans.com. Fully renovated hotel in an anonymous modern setting, a very short walk from the tourist office and château. The pastel theme of the facade continues inside; some might find it cloying, but the service is friendly, and everything works well. All rooms en suite. ④

Rouen 8 place de la Gare ☎02.31.34.06.03. Reasonably smart budget option, furthest to the west (right) in the parade that faces you as you exit the gare SNCF, and offering rooms with and without en-suite facilities. Worth considering if there is no room at the more central hotels. ③

St-Étienne 2 rue de l'Académie ☎02.31.86.35.82, 🌐www.hotel-saint-etienne.com. Friendly budget hotel in an old stone house in the characterful St-Martin district, not far from the Abbaye des Hommes. The cheaper rooms have no showers, but en-suite ones cost little more. ②

Hostel

HI hostel Foyer Robert-Remé, 68bis rue E.-Restout, Grâce-de-Dieu ☎02.31.52.19.96. Lively and welcoming hostel, situated in an otherwise sleepy area about 500m southwest of the gare SNCF. Beds in both four-bed dorms or two-bed private rooms cost €11 per person. Take tram

#B from the town centre or gare SNCF, direction "Grace de Dieu". Reception open 5–9pm. Closed Oct–May.

The Town

A virtue was made of the postwar necessity of clearing away the rubble of Caen's medieval houses, which formerly pressed up against its ancient château ramparts. The resulting open green space means that those walls are now fully visible for the first time in centuries. In turn, walking the circuit of the ramparts gives a good overview of the city, with a particularly fine prospect of the reconstructed fourteenth-century facade of the nearby church of St-Pierre. Some magnificent Renaissance stonework has survived intact at the church's east end.

Most of the centre of Caen is taken up with busy new shopping developments and pedestrian precincts, where the cafés are distinguished by names such as Fast Food Glamour Vault. Outlets of the big Parisian stores – and of the aristocrats' grocers, Hédiard, in the cours des Halles – are here, along with good local rivals. The main city market takes place on Friday, spreading along both sides of Fosse St-Julien, and there's also a Sunday market in place Courtonne. The Bassin St-Pierre, the pleasure port at the end of the canal that links Caen to the sea, is where most life goes on, at least in summer.

Castle grounds

Within the castle walls, it's possible to visit the former Exchequer – which dates from shortly after the Norman conquest of England, and was the scene of a banquet thrown by Richard the Lionheart en route to the Crusades – and inspect a garden that has been replanted with the herbs and medicinal plants that were cultivated here during the Middle Ages. Also inside the precinct, though not in original structures, are two museums. Most visitors will prefer the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues 9.30am–6pm; permanent collection free, special exhibitions €3 or €5), which traces a potted history of European art from Renaissance Italy through such Dutch masters as Brueghel the Younger up to grand portraits from eighteenth-century France in the upstairs galleries. Downstairs brings things up to date with some powerful twentieth-century art, though there are few big-name works. The other museum, the Musée de Normandie (June–Sept daily 9.30am–6pm, Oct–March daily except Tues 9.30am–6pm; permanent collection free, special exhibitions €3), provides a cursory overview of Norman history, ranging from archeological finds like stone tools from the region's megalithic period and glass jewellery from Gallo-Roman Rouen up to the impact of the Industrial Revolution. It also hosts two or three temporary exhibitions per year, covering particular themes in much greater detail.

Abbaye aux Hommes

The Abbaye aux Hommes, at the west end of rue St-Pierre, was founded by William the Conqueror and designed to hold his tomb within the huge, austere Romanesque church of St-Étienne (Mon–Sat 8.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sun 8.30am–12.30pm & 2.30–7pm; free; 1hr 15min guided tours leave adjacent Hôtel de Ville daily 9.30am, 11am, 2.30pm & 4pm; tours in English mid-July to Aug only, daily 11am, 1.30pm & 4pm; €2, free on Sun). However, his burial here, in 1087, was hopelessly undignified. The funeral procession first caught fire and was then held to ransom, as various factions squabbled over his rotting corpse for any spoils they could grab. A further interruption came when a man halted the service to object that the grave had been constructed without compensation on the site of his family house, and the assembled nobles had to pay him off before William could be laid to rest. During the Revolution the tomb was again ransacked, and it now holds a solitary thighbone rescued from the river. Still, the building itself is a wonderful Romanesque monument. Adjoining the church are the abbey buildings, designed during the eighteenth century and now housing the Hôtel de Ville.

Abbaye aux Dames

At the other end of the town centre, at the end of rue des Chanoines, is the Abbaye aux Dames, commissioned by William's wife Matilda in the hope of saving her soul after committing the godless sin of marrying her cousin. Her monument – the church of La Trinité – is even more starkly impressive than her husband's, with a gloomy pillared crypt, wonderful stained glass behind the altar and odd sculptural details like the fish curled up in the holy-water stoup. The convent buildings today house the regional council but are open to the public (daily 2–5.30pm; guided tours 2.30pm & 4pm; free).

The Caen Memorial

Just north of Caen, at the end of avenue Marshal-Montgomery in the Folie Couvrechef area, the Caen Memorial (late Jan to mid-Feb, and early Nov to early Jan daily except Mon 9.30am–6pm; mid-Feb to mid-July & late Aug to early Nov daily 9am–7pm; mid-July to late Aug daily 9am–8pm; closed three weeks in Jan; last entry 1hr 15min before closing; ☎02.31.06.06.44, @www.memorial-caen.fr; March–Sept €17.50; Oct–Feb €16.50), which describes itself as a “museum for peace”, stands on a plateau named after General Eisenhower on a cliff-top beneath which the Germans had their HQ in June and July 1944. Funds and material for it came from the US, Britain, Canada, Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, the USSR and France.

The museum is a typically French high-tech, novel-architecture conception, with excellent displays divided into several distinct sections; allow two hours at the very least for a visit. The first section deals with the rise of fascism in Germany, another with resistance and collaboration in France, while a third charts all the major battles of World War II. Most of the captions, though not always the written exhibits themselves, are translated into English. Further areas examine the course of the Cold War and the prospects for global peace, with the former German bunkers below housing the Nobel Peace Prize Winners' Gallery. Portraits and short essays commemorate each recipient in turn, placing their achievements in context. There's also a good-value self-service restaurant upstairs. The memorial is served by bus #2 from the “Tour le Roi” stop in the centre of town.

Eating

Caen's town centre offers two major areas for eating: with cosmopolitan restaurants in the pedestrianized quartier Vaugueux and more traditional French restaurants on the streets off rue de Geôle, near the western ramparts, particularly rue des Croisiers and rue Gémare.

L'Alcide 1 place Courtonne ☎02.31.44.18.06.

Large, rather anonymous-looking bistro-style place, which serves classic rich French dishes cooked with great attention to detail. Menus from €15.20 up to €23.50. Closed Sat.

L'Archi Dona 8 rue des Croisiers

☎02.31.85.30.30. This atmospheric restaurant belies its stately setting by serving delightfully fresh and zestful Mediterranean-influenced cuisine, ranging from simple entrée-plus-dessert meals at €12 up to the €32 "seduction" menu. Closed Sun, Mon & three weeks in Aug.

Le Bouchon du Vagueux 12 rue du Graindorge
 ☎02.31.44.26.26. Intimate little brasserie in the Vagueux quarter, offering two menus: one at €17 featuring steak tartare and another at €22 where you can choose from veal, duck or roast pork. Closed Mon, Wed & Sun, plus first three weeks of Aug.

Le Carlotta 16 quai Vendeuvre ☎02.31.86.68.99 www.lecarlotta.fr. Busy and fashionable Paris-style brasserie beside the pleasure port, which serves good Norman cooking both à la carte and on menus from €22. Closed Sun.

L'Embroche 17 rue Porte au Berger
 ☎02.31.93.71.31. Cosy little place in a busy restaurant district, where the open kitchen whips up simple regional specialities in full view of appreciative diners, with lunch from €18 and dinner from €22. Closed Sat lunch, Sun & Mon lunch.

Maitre Corbeau 8 rue Buquet ☎02.31.93.93.00. Fondue is the speciality in this eccentric little place, and they won't let you forget it, festooning the whole place with cheesy iconography. A typical fondue costs around €14, while non-fondue menus start from €16. Closed Sat lunch, Sun, Mon lunch & three weeks in Aug.

La Petite Auberge 17 rue des Équipes-d'Urgence
 ☎02.31.86.43.30. Plain and simple restaurant, with a nice view of the St-Jean church. Very well-priced Norman specialities served on a €12 menu (daily except Sat eve) that doesn't force you to eat tripe, or a wide-ranging €19 one. Closed Sun, Mon & first three weeks of Aug.

The D-Day beaches

Despite the best efforts of Steven Spielberg, it's all but impossible now to picture the scene at dawn on D-Day, June 6, 1944, when Allied troops landed along the Norman coast between the mouth of the Orne and Les Dunes de Varneville on the Cotentin Peninsula. For the most part, these are innocuous beaches backed by gentle dunes, and yet this foothold in Europe was won at the cost of 100,000 soldiers' lives. That the invasion happened here and not nearer to Germany was partly a result of the disastrous Canadian raid on Dieppe in 1942, which showed the perils of attacking fortified positions without strong air and artillery support. The ensuing Battle of Normandy killed thousands of civilians and reduced nearly six hundred towns and villages to rubble but, within a week of its eventual conclusion, Paris was liberated.

The war cemeteries

The World War II cemeteries that dot the Norman countryside are filled with foreigners – most of the French dead are buried in the churchyards of their home towns. After the war, some felt that the soldiers should remain buried in the original makeshift graves that were dug where they fell. Instead, commissions gathered the remains into purpose-built cemeteries devoted to the separate warring nations.

△ US Military Cemetery, Colleville-sur-Mer

The British and Commonwealth cemeteries are magnificently maintained. They tend not to be screened off with hedges or walls, or to be forbidding expanses of manicured lawn, but are instead intimate, punctuated with bright flowers. The family of each soldier was invited to suggest an inscription for his tomb, making each grave very personal, and yet part of a common attempt to bring meaning to the carnage. Some epitaphs are questioning – “One day we will understand”; some are accepting – “Our lad at rest”; some matter-of-fact, simply giving the home address; some patriotic, quoting the “corner of a foreign field that is forever England”. And interspersed among them all is the chilling refrain of the anonymous “A soldier ... known unto God”. Thus the cemetery at Ryes, where so many of the graves bear the date of D-Day, and so many of the victims are under 20, remains immediate and accessible – each grave clearly contains a unique individual. Even the monumental sculpture is subdued, a very British sort of fumbling for the decent thing to say. The understatement of the memorial at Bayeux, with its painfully contrived Latin epigram commemorating the return as liberators of “those whom William conquered”, conveys an entirely appropriate humility and deep sadness.

An even more eloquent testimony to the futility of war is afforded by the German cemeteries, filled with soldiers who served a cause so despicable as to render any talk of “nobility” or “sacrifice” obscene. What such cemeteries might have been like had the Nazis won doesn't bear contemplation. As it is, they are sombre places, inconspicuous to minimize the bitterness they still arouse. At Orglandes ten thousand are buried, three to each of the plain headstones set in the long flat lawn, almost hidden behind an anonymous wall. There are no noble slogans and the plain entrance is without a dedicatory monument. At the superb site of Mont d'Huisnes near Mont St-Michel, the circular mausoleum holds another ten thousand, filed away in cold concrete tiers. Though no attempt is made to defend the indefensible, there's still an overpowering sense of sorrow – that there is nothing to be said in such a place bitterly underlines the sheer waste and stupidity.

The largest American cemetery, at Colleville-sur-mer near the Pointe du Hoc, may already be familiar from the opening sequences of Saving Private Ryan. Here, by contrast, neat rows of crosses cover the tranquil clifftop lawns, with no individual epitaphs, just gold lettering for a few exceptional warriors. At one end, a muscular giant dominates a huge array of battlefield plans and diagrams, covered with surging arrows and pincer movements.

The beaches are still often referred to by their wartime code names: from east to west, Sword, Juno, Gold, Omaha and Utah. Substantial traces of the fighting are rare, the most remarkable being the remains of the astounding Mulberry Harbour at Arromanches, 10km northeast of Bayeux. Further west, at Pointe du Hoc on Omaha Beach, the cliff heights are deeply pitted with German bunkers and shell holes, while the church at Ste-Mère-Église, from whose steeple the US paratrooper dangled during heavy fighting throughout The Longest Day, still stands, and now has a model parachute permanently fastened to the roof. Note that Utah Beach, the westernmost of the Invasion Beaches, is on the Cotentin Peninsula, and covered on p.386 onwards.

Just about every coastal town has its war museum. These tend as a rule to shy away from the unbearable reality of war in favour of Boy's Own-style heroics, but the wealth of incidental human detail can nonetheless be overpowering. Veterans and their descendants apart, visitors these days come to this stretch of coast for its seaside: sand and seafood (the best oysters are at Courseulles), plenty of campsites and no Deauville chic.

Bus Verts (☎08.10.21.42.14, 🌐www.busverts.fr) run all along this coast. From Bayeux, bus #75 goes to Arromanches, Courseulles, and Ouistreham, and bus #70 to the Pointe du Hoc, the US cemetery at Colleville-sur-mer, and Port-en-Bessin. From Caen, bus #30 runs inland to Isigny via Bayeux, express bus #1 to Ouistreham, and express bus #3 to Courseulles. In July and August, Bus Verts' special D-Day Line departs daily from Caen's gare routière (9.20pm) and place Courtonne (9.35am), calling at Courseulles, Arromanches, the German gun emplacements at Longues-sur-mer, the US cemetery and the Pointe du Hoc, before returning to Caen at around 6pm (€14 flat fare).

In addition, the Caen Memorial (see p.373) organizes expensive, informative bilingual guided tours of the beaches in groups of around eight people, with four or five hours on the road and a visit to the Memorial at your own pace (mid-Jan to March & Oct–Dec daily 1pm; April–Sept daily 9am & 2pm; ☎02.31.06.06.45, 🌐www.memorial-caen.fr; €67.50).

Ouistreham and around

The small community of OUISTREHAM, on the coast 15km north of Caen and connected to it by a fast dual carriageway, gives the impression that it can barely believe its luck at having become a major ferry port. Brittany Ferries started their service here in 1986, and the easternmost of the D-Day resorts has developed an extensive array of reasonable hotels and restaurants.

If, instead of setting off for Caen, you head directly west along the coast from the ferry terminal, after a few hundred metres you come to the long straight main drag of beach – the Riva Bella itself. This is progressively shedding its run-down image; the large casino has been remodelled as a 1930s passenger liner, housing an expensive restaurant and cocktail bar, and even the old-fashioned bathing huts have had a fresh lick of paint.

Nearby, the Musée du Mur de l'Atlantique (daily: Feb, March & Oct to mid-Nov 10am–6pm; April–Sept 9am–7pm; €6.50) is housed in a lofty bunker – hence its alternative name, the Grand Bunker. This was the headquarters of the several German batteries that defended the mouth of the River Orne; after brief resistance, it fell to Allied forces on June 9, 1944. Inside the heavily restored bunker, displays re-create living conditions, with newspapers, cutlery and packets of cigarettes adding a welcome human touch to the moderately interesting explanations of the workings of the generators, gas filters and radio room.

The tourist office, alongside the casino on the beach (April–June & Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; July & Aug daily 10am–1pm & 2–7pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm; ☎02.31.97.18.63, 🌐www.ville-ouistreham.fr), provides Internet access at €0.10 per min. Several cafés and brasseries in the place Courbonne, immediately outside the gare maritime, are eager to liberate passengers from their spare change, while Le Channel, just around the corner at 79 av Michel-Cabieu (☎02.31.96.51.69; 🍷), is the best value for both eating and sleeping: menus start with the €10.50 menu pêcheur, while the many higher priced options increase in splendour; guest rooms are in a separate building across the street. The smart Le Normandie, a few doors down at 71 av Michel-Cabieu (☎02.31.97.19.57, 🌐www.lenormandie.com; 🍷; 📞; closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan, plus Sun eve & Mon Nov–March), has pleasant, quiet rooms. Its “Régional” menu at €21 features boudin noir, while the €37 “Gourmand” option makes an excellent last-night blowout.

Pegasus Bridge

Roughly 5km south of Ouistreham, the main road towards Caen passes close by the site now known as Pegasus Bridge. On the night before D-Day, the twin bridges here that cross the Caen canal and the River Orne were a crucial Allied objective, and were the target of a daring but successful glider assault just after midnight. The original bridge was replaced in 1994, but is now the focus of the Mémorial Pegasus immediately to the east (daily: Feb–March & Oct–Nov 10am–1pm & 2–5pm; April–Sept 9.30am–6.30pm; 🌐www.normandy1944.com; €5.50). This vaguely glider-shaped museum holds the expected array of helmets, goggles, medals and other memorabilia, most captioned in English, as well as various model bridges used in planning the attack.

Arromanches

At ARROMANCHES, 10km northeast of Bayeux, an artificial Mulberry harbour, “Port Winston”, protected the landings of 2,500,000 men and 500,000 vehicles during the invasion. Two of these prefab concrete constructions were built in Britain, while “doodlebugs” blitzed overhead; they were then submerged in rivers away from the prying eyes of German aircraft, and finally towed across the Channel at 6kph as the invasion began. The seafront Musée du Débarquement, in Arromanches’ main square (Feb–April & Oct–Dec daily 9/10am–12.30pm, 1.30–5/6pm; May–Sept daily 9/10am–6/7pm; €6.50; 🌐www.normandy1944.com), recounts the whole story by means of models, machinery and movies. A huge picture window runs the length of the museum, enabling you to look straight out to where the bulky remains of the harbour, whose sheer scale is impossible to appreciate at this distance, make a strange intrusion on the beach and shallow sea bed (the other one, slightly further west on Omaha Beach, was destroyed by a ferocious storm within a few weeks). There are war memorials throughout Arromanches, and statues of Jesus and Mary high up on the cliffs above the invasion site.

Nonetheless, Arromanches somehow manages to be quite a cheerful place to stay, with a lively pedestrian street of bars and brasseries, and a long expanse of sand where you can rent windsurfing boards. La Marine at 2 quai Canada (☎02.31.22.34.19, 🌐www.hotel-de-la-marine.fr; closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb; 🍷), is a slightly expensive hotel, with an excellent sea-view restaurant serving fishy menus from €22. Across the main square stands the Arromanches, 2 rue du Colonel-René-Michel (☎02.31.22.36.26, 🌐www.hoteldarromanches.fr; restaurant closed Tues & Wed in low season; whole place closed Jan to mid-Feb; minibus trip with a local operator such as Normandy Sightseeing Tours (☎02.31.51.70.52, 🌐www.d-daybeaches.com) or Normandy Tours, 26 place de la Gare (☎02.31.92.10.70, 🌐www.normandy-landing-tour.com). Prices for half-day tours start from €40. Bayeux's tourist office stands in the centre of town, on the arched Pont St-Jean (Jan–March & Nov–Dec Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; April–May & Sept–Oct daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; June–Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 9am–1pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.31.51.28.28, 🌐www.bayeux-bessin-tourism.com).

Accommodation

As one of Normandy's most important tourist destinations, Bayeux is well equipped with accommodation. On the whole, however, the hotels are more expensive than usual. There's a large three-star campsite on boulevard d'Eindhoven (☎02.31.92.08.43; closed Oct–April), on the northern ring road (RN13) near the river.

D'Argouges 21 rue St-Patrice ☎02.31.92.88.86, 🌐www.hotel-dargouges.com. Quiet, central and very stylish eighteenth-century building, with an imposing courtyard entered via an archway on the west side of place St-Patrice and a well-kept garden around the back. Several rooms are very grand, with magnificent exposed wooden beams; all have bath plus shower, and the rates are very reasonable for what you get. No restaurant. 4

Churchill 14–16 rue St-Jean ☎02.31.21.31.80, 🌐www.hotel-churchill.fr. Relatively large, completely renovated 32-room hotel, which often has rooms when elsewhere is full, and whose size does not preclude personal and friendly service. Perfectly situated in the heart of the town centre, with free parking directly behind the hotel. Closed mid–Nov to mid-Feb. 5

Family Home 39 rue du Général-de-Dias ☎02.31.92.15.22. This hostel is conveniently central, in a seventeenth-century house, but travellers remain divided as to its merits: some are put off by the staff's often minimal English, while others say you couldn't hope to find a friendlier atmosphere. Its prices are a little high – dorm beds cost €18 for members, €20 for non-members, while private doubles are €30 – but rates include breakfast. Communal dinners, served at 7.30pm nightly at a long table, cost €12 per person. They also offer bike hire and can find you a bed in their other property, about 1km from the centre, if the Family Home is full – which it often is during summer. 1

De la Gare 26 place de la Gare ☎02.31.92.10.70. Old but perfectly adequate basic hotel, with a simple brasserie, beside the station, on the ring road fifteen minutes' walk from the cathedral. 1

Lion d'Or 71 rue St-Jean ☎02.31.92.06.90, 🌐www.liondor-bayeux.fr. Grand old coaching inn, dating from 1734 and affiliated to the quiet "Relais du Silence" organization, that's set back behind a courtyard just beyond the pedestrianized section of rue St-Jean, opposite the Halles des Grains (now the assembly rooms). The rooms themselves are brighter and newer than the exterior suggests. Closed mid–Dec to late Jan. Menus from €26. 6

Mogodor 20 rue Chartier ☎02.31.92.24.58, 🌐hotel.mogador@orange.fr. Friendly little hotel facing Bayeux's main square; the rooms are simple but very presentable, with the quieter ones overlooking the inner courtyard. 3

Reine Mathilde 23 rue Larcher ☎02.31.92.08.13, 🌐www.hotel-reinemathilde.com. Simple but well-equipped rooms – all have showers and TV – backing onto the canal, between the tapestry and the cathedral. The nice open-air, lunch-only brasserie downstairs, Le Guillaume (closed Tues), has menus from €10. Closed mid–Nov to mid-Feb. 3

The Town

Housed in an impressive eighteenth-century seminary on rue de Nesmond, the Bayeux Tapestry (daily: mid-March to April & Sept–Oct 9am–6.30pm; May–Aug 9am–7pm; Nov to mid-March 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; last admission 45min before closing; €7.60) – also known to the French as the Tapisserie de la Reine Mathilde – is a seventy-metre strip of embroidered linen that recounts the story of the Norman conquest of England. Although created over nine centuries ago, the brilliance of its coloured wools has barely faded, and the tale is enlivened throughout with parallel scenes of medieval life, popular fables and mythical beasts; the skill of its draughtsmanship, and the sheer vigour and detail, are stunning. The work is thought to have been carried out by monks or nuns in England, commissioned by Bishop Odo, William's half-brother, in time for the inauguration of Bayeux cathedral in 1077.

Visits are well planned and highly atmospheric, if somewhat exhausting. First comes a slide show, projected onto billowing sheets of canvas; you then pass along a photographic replica of the tapestry, with enlargements and detailed commentaries. After an optional film show, you finally approach the real thing, to find that it has a strong three-dimensional presence you might not expect from all the flat reproductions. The tapestry looks – and reads – like a modern comic strip. Harold is every inch the villain, with his dastardly little moustache and shifty eyes. He looks extremely self-satisfied as he breaks his oath to accept William as king of England and seizes the throne for himself, but his come-uppance swiftly follows, as William, the noble hero, crosses the Channel and defeats the English armies at Hastings.

The Cathédrale Notre-Dame (daily: Jan–March 9am–5pm; April–June 8am–6pm; July–Sept 8.30am–7pm; Oct–Dec 8.30am–6pm) was the first home of the tapestry and is just a short walk away from its latest resting-place. Despite such eighteenth-century vandalism as the monstrous fungoid baldachin (canopy) that flanks the pulpit, the original Romanesque plan of the building is still intact, although only the crypt and towers date from the original work of 1077. The crypt is a beauty, its columns graced with frescoes of angels playing trumpets and bagpipes, looking exhausted by their performance for eternity. On the southern side of the cathedral, the Musée Baron Gerard on rue Lambert-Forestier displays a large collection of beautifully decorated porcelain and intricate lacework, donated by local families over the centuries to the archbishops of Bayeux (daily: July & Aug 10am–12.30pm & 2–7pm; Sept–June 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €2.60, free with ticket for the tapestry).

Although the Musée-Mémorial Général de Gaulle, at 10 rue de Bourbesneur near place de Gaulle (March–May & Sept–Nov 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, June–Aug daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; €3.50), is aimed squarely at French devotees of the great man, it does make an interesting detour for foreign visitors. The sheer obsessiveness of the displays, which focus on the three separate day-trips De Gaulle made to Bayeux during the course of his long life, somehow illuminates the extent to which he came to epitomize the very essence of a certain kind of Frenchness, which seems scarcely removed from self-parody.

Set behind massive guns next to the ring road on the southwest side of town, Bayeux's Musée de la Bataille de Normandie (daily: May to mid-Sept 9.30am–6.30pm; mid-Sept to April 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €6.50) is one of the old school of war museums, with its emphasis firmly on hardware rather than humans. By way of contrast, the understated and touching British War Cemetery stands immediately across the road (see box, p.375).

Eating

Some of Bayeux's hotels have good dining rooms, while most restaurants are in the rue St-Jean leading east from the river; on Sundays most places are shut.

La Fringale 43 rue St-Jean ☎02.31.21.34.40.

The nicest of the many pavement restaurants along rue St-Jean, offering lunch menus from €14.50, generous salads and snacks and more formal fish dinners. Closed Wed, plus mid-Dec to mid-Feb.

Le Petit Bistrot 2 rue Bienvenue

☎02.31.51.85.40. Tiny old place opposite the cathedral, where the menus from €25 upwards boast a fine assortment of terrines and foie gras. Closed Sun & Mon.

Le Petit Normand 35 rue Larcher

☎02.31.22.88.66. Below the cathedral, offering good traditional cooking, with seafood specialities and local cider. Lunch menus from €11, dinner from €19. Closed mid-Dec to Jan.

Le Pommier 38–40 rue des Cuisiniers

☎02.31.21.52.10. Popular traditional restaurant near the cathedral, with a tiny terrace. Meat- and dairy-rich Norman cuisine on menus from €12.50 (lunch only) up to €28.50, including an €18.50 vegetarian option. Closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan, plus Tues & Wed in low season.

La Table du Terroir 42 rue St-Jean

☎02.31.92.05.53. A rendezvous for closet meat freaks, tucked away behind a butcher's shop and serving the freshest, bloodiest flesh on a well-judged triplet of menus, at €16, €21 and €26. Seating is at communal tables. Closed Sun eve in low season.

Cerisy and Balleroy

Heading southwest from Bayeux towards St-Lô, you pass close to the remarkable Romanesque Abbaye de Cerisy-la-Forêt (access to church Easter–Oct daily 9am–6.30pm; €2; guided tours Easter–Sept daily 10.30am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm; Oct Sat & Sun 10.30am–noon & 2.30–6pm; €4), halfway along the D572 and 5km to the north of it. Its triple tiers of windows and arches and the delicate workmanship of its nave and choir are testimony to the breathtaking skills of medieval Norman masons.

No less notable is the Château de Balleroy (château and museum mid-March to mid-Oct daily 10am–6pm; mid-Oct to mid-March daily 10am–noon & 2–5pm; @www.chateau-balleroy.com; château €5.35, museum €4.27, both €6.86), 3km southeast of the same junction, where you switch to an era when architects ruled over craftsmen. The main street of the village leads straight to the brick-and-stone château, a masterpiece of François Mansart, the celebrated seventeenth-century architect, which stands like a faultlessly reasoned and dogmatic argument for the power of its owners and their class. It belongs to the family of the late American press magnate Malcolm Forbes, owner of Forbes magazine, keen balloonist and pal of Nixon, Ford and Nancy Reagan. His is the enlarged colour photograph sharing the stairwell with Dutch still lifes, and he left his mark on most other aspects of the house, too – only the salon remains in its original state of glory, with brilliant portraits of the (then) royal family by Mignard. Admission also includes a hot-air balloon museum.

The Cotentin Peninsula

Hard against the frontier with Brittany, and cut off from the rest of Normandy by difficult marshy terrain, the Cotentin Peninsula has traditionally been seen as something of a backwater, far removed from the French mainstream. It nonetheless makes a surprisingly rewarding goal for travellers, and one that by sea at least is very easily accessible. Regular ferries from both England and Ireland dock at the peninsula's major port, Cherbourg, a city turned resolutely seaward. Nearby are a plethora of attractive little villages, such as Barfleur and St-Vaast, nestled amid the hills to the east, and the handsome landscapes of heather-clad cliffs and stone-wall-divided patchwork fields to be found in La Hague to the west.

what had been a rather poor, but perfectly situated, natural harbour into a major transatlantic port, by means of massive artificial breakwaters. An equestrian statue commemorates his boast that in Cherbourg he would “recreate the wonders of Egypt”; although there are as yet no pyramids nearer than the Louvre, he succeeded in providing the city with one of the biggest fortified harbours in the world.

Arrival and information

The days of the great transatlantic liners may be over, but cross-Channel ferries still sail into Cherbourg’s gare maritime (daily 5.30am–11.30pm; ☎02.33.44.20.13), not far east of the town centre. Brittany Ferries ☎08.03.82.88.28, 🌐www.brittany-ferries.com) operate services from both Portsmouth (1–2 daily; May–Oct high-speed 3hr, otherwise 5–7hr) and Poole (1–3 daily; some high-speed in summer, 2hr 15min, otherwise 4hr 15min–5hr 30min). Irish Ferries also sail to Cherbourg, from Rosslare (3–4 weekly; ☎02.33.23.44.44, 🌐www.irishferries.com). Regular €1 shuttle buses connect the terminal with the tourist office and gare SNCF.

Cherbourg’s tourist office is at 2 quai Alexandre III (June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm; Sept–May Mon–Fri 9am–noon & 2–6pm Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.33.93.52.02, 🌐www.ot-cherbourg-cotentin.fr). The gare SNCF, on avenue François-Miller/place Jean-Jaurès, is served by regular trains to Paris, Bayeux and Caen. Tourisme Verney (☎02.33.44.32.22) run buses to Barfleur, Valognes, Coutances, St-Lô, Granville and other destinations from the gare routière opposite.

Accommodation

By usual Norman standards, room rates in Cherbourg are very reasonable and there’s no reason for ferry passengers to avoid spending a night here, though traffic and the lack of parking space can be problematic. Few hotels maintain their own restaurants, but there are plenty of independent eateries to choose from.

Hotels

Croix de Malte 5 rue des Halles

☎02.33.43.19.16, 📧hotel.croix.malte@orange.fr. Simple hotel on three upstairs floors, one block back from the harbour and around the corner from the theatre. Clean renovated rooms – all have TV and at least a shower – with the cheapest rates being for the perfectly acceptable, windowless ones in the attic. ②

De la Gare 10 place Jean-Jaurès

☎02.33.43.06.81, 📧luc-fleury@orange.fr. Very convenient for the gares SNCF and routière, if not exactly stunning in itself. The cheapest rooms have a shower but no toilet. ②

Moderna 28 rue de la Marine ☎02.33.43.05.30,

🌐www.moderna-hotel.com. Reasonable, very well-priced rooms, slightly back from the harbour; the cheapest have only sinks, while the pricier ones have phones, good showers and cable TV. ①

Régence 42–44 quai de Caligny

☎02.33.43.05.16, 🌐www.laregence.com. Small, neat rooms overlooking the harbour, in a Logis de France just around the corner from the tourist office. The restaurant downstairs starts with a reasonable €17 menu, and ranges up to €31, but it’s not the best along the quai. ③

Renaissance 4 rue de l’Église ☎02.33.43.23.90,

🌐www.hotel-renaissance-cherbourg.com. Nicely refurbished rooms, all en suite and some with sea views, in a friendly hotel facing the port in the most appealing quarter of town. The “Église” of the address is the attractive Trinity. ③

Hostel and campsite

Camping de Collignon Tourlaville

☎02.33.20.16.88, 🌐www.mairie-tourlaville.fr.

Three-star campsite, 3km east towards Barfleur, that’s the closest to the ferry terminal. Closed Oct–April.

Youth Hostel 55 rue de l’Abbaye

☎02.33.78.15.15, 📧cherbourg@fuaj.org. Well-equipped red-brick hostel, 15min walk west of the centre, offering dorm beds for €16.40 (members) or €19.50 (non-members), including breakfast and bicycle hire. Two bedrooms are designed for visitors with limited mobility. Check-in 9am–1pm or 6–11pm, closed Jan.

The Town

Cherbourg's best, and newest, attraction is La Cité de la Mer (daily: May, June & Sept 9.30am–6pm; July & Aug 9.30am–7pm; Oct–Dec & Feb–April 10am–6pm, with irregular closures on certain Mondays; closed Jan; last entry 1hr before closing; April–Sept €14, Oct–March €12.50; @ www.citedelamer.com). The museum combines often quite technical displays, explained in both French and English, on every aspect of the sea – myths and legends, environmental issues including climatic change, economic activities and, above all, exploration of the seabed – with aquariums and a visitable nuclear submarine. You enter through the grand former Transatlantic ferry terminal, a fabulously restored Art Deco treasure, housing the ticket offices, a cafeteria, an excellent restaurant unsurprisingly specializing in seafood, a médiathèque and temporary exhibits. Frequently interactive displays in a new building behind tell the story of underwater exploration in history and fiction, moving swiftly via Jules Verne and H.P. Lovecraft to Jacques Cousteau, pictured with a diving saucer shaped, as the museum claims, “like a giant lentil” in 1959. Separate fish tanks hold giant crabs, sharks, eels, jellyfish, seahorses, and large (though sadly not giant) squid, while at different levels you can peer into a vast cylindrical aquarium where shoals of vivid fish offer a colourful spectacle – all with an educational emphasis on aspects such as how marine creatures move and survive.

The overarching idea is to show how human submarine technology was inspired by the wonders of nature, preparing the visitor for the main attraction: in a dry dock alongside stands the dark cigar-shaped hulk of Le Redoutable, France's first ballistic missile submarine. Armed with an audio-commentary you can scramble through its labyrinth of tube-like corridors and control rooms, though as the miniature nuclear power station that once powered it has been removed, there's a cavernous empty space at its heart. The cramped crew quarters will feel very familiar if you've just shared a cabin on an overnight ferry crossing, while the plush carpeting and moulded chairs in the living room are remarkably reminiscent of Elvis's Graceland.

Otherwise, if you're waiting for a boat, the best way to kill time is to settle into a café or restaurant or do some last-minute shopping. Try the excellent Thursday market, held on and off rue des Halles, near the majestic theatre with its belle-époque facade, or the tempting array of small shops and boutiques clustered round the place Centrale – including a place to buy the city's most famous product, the genuine Cherbourg umbrella, at 30 rue des Portes.

As for walking off lunch, the only area in the centre that really encourages a ramble is over by the Basilique de la Trinité, worth a quick look inside for its English alabaster decorations dating from the Hundred Years War, and the former town beach, now grassed over to form the “Plage Verte”. Over to the south, you could alternatively climb up to Roule Fort for an impressive view of the whole port. The fort itself contains a Musée de la Libération (June–Sept Mon & Sun 2–6pm, Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct–May Wed–Sun 2–6pm; €3), with the usual dry maps and diagrams but plenty of contemporary newsreel – much of it, for once, in English – commemorating the period in 1944 when Cherbourg was briefly the busiest port in the world.

Eating

Restaurants in Cherbourg divide readily into the glass-fronted seafood places along the quai de Caligny, each with its “copious” assiette de fruits de mer, and the more varied, more adventurous and less expensive little places tucked away in the pedestrianized streets and alleyways of the old town. This is also where you’ll find some animated bars, especially along rue de l’Union.

Brasserie de Commerce 42 rue François-la-Vieille ☎02.33.53.18.20. If you’re tired of white tablecloths and over-attentive service, this in-town brasserie, much larger than it looks from the outside, serves huge portions of good food from 11am until late, with cheap menus from €13 and plenty of à la carte options. The home-made pâté is particularly good. Closed Sun.

Le Faitout 25 rue Tour-Carrée ☎02.33.04.25.04. Shopping-district restaurant that offers traditional French cuisine, including bowls of mussels, prepared with celery, apples and the like, generally for under €10. Most dishes are à la carte with meat and fish dishes priced around €10–13. Closed Sun & Mon.

Le Grandgousier 21 rue de l’Abbaye ☎02.33.53.19.43. Formal, definitive French fish restaurant, well worth the walk to its unprepossessing location at the west end of town. Menus start at €16, but this is a place to expect to spend a lot and dine well, with lobster, for example, featuring on the €38 option. Closed Sun eve & Mon.

Café de Paris 40 quai de Caligny ☎02.33.43.12.36. Work your way up through the ranks of assiettes de fruits de mer, from the €18.50 Matelot to the Amiral at €110 for two; there’s also a selection of menus from €21, featuring a few meat dishes along with the predominantly fishy selection. Closed Sun eve, plus Mon lunch in low season.

Café du Théâtre 8 place de Gaulle ☎02.33.43.01.49. Attractive setup adjoining the theatre, with a café behind plate-glass windows on the ground floor and a full-scale brasserie upstairs, arranged on three sides of the central opening. It’s a place used by the community as a whole rather than a typical tourist restaurant. The varied menus, from €13.50, offer more than just seafood; the €24 one features snails. Closed Sun.

Around the Cotentin

Once you get away from the industrial harbour city of Cherbourg, the largely rural Cotentin Peninsula is geographically an area of transition. Little ports such as Barfleur on the indented northern headland presage the rocky Breton coast, while inland the meadows resemble the farmlands of the Bocage and the Bessin. La Hague is a little-explored gem – many people are put off by its associations with a nuclear reprocessing plant – where all manner of activities, from sailing and diving to riding and rambling, can be practised. In any case, the temptation to race south towards Mont St-Michel is likely to be thwarted by slow traffic on the peninsula’s narrow roads, though the Cherbourg–St-Lô route is now mostly four-lane, so you might as well stop off in your pick of the towns and resorts that line its western shore, such as Coutances, Granville and Avranches.

Barfleur

The pleasant little harbour village of BARFLEUR, 25km east of Cherbourg, was the biggest port in Normandy seven centuries ago. The population has since dwindled from nine thousand to six hundred, and fortunes have diminished – most recently through the invasion of a strain of plankton that poisoned all the mussels. It’s now a surprisingly low-key place, where the sweeping crescent of the grey-granite quayside sees little tourist activity. Near the town, about a thirty-minute walk away, the Gatteville lighthouse is the second tallest in France (daily: March, May–Aug & Oct 10am–noon & 2–7pm; April & Sept 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Feb, first two weeks in Nov & last two weeks in Dec 10am–noon & 2–4pm; closed mid-Nov to mid-Dec & all Jan; €2). It guards the rocks on which William, son and heir of Henry I of England, was drowned in 1120, together with three hundred of his nobles.

Barfleur has two fine hotels. 🍷 Le Conquérant stands a short distance back from the sea at 16–18 rue St-Thomas-à-Becket (☎02.33.54.00.82; closed mid-Nov to mid-March; 🕒); behind its stern stone facade lies a gorgeous, rambling and very welcoming old town house, where the nicest rooms face onto a lovely garden, and there's a summer-only crêperie. Le Moderne is tucked away south of the main road at 1 place de Gaulle (☎02.33.23.12.44; closed Tues eve & Wed mid-Sept to mid-July, plus all Jan to mid-Feb; 🕒); some of the rooms are very inexpensive, while the restaurant is superb, with the €25 menu featuring a fish-shaped feuilletton (pastry) of seafood. The house speciality is oysters, stuffed or raw. A nice, albeit basic campsite stands a couple of kilometres north of town in Le Crabec. La Ferme du Bord du Mer (☎02.33.54.01.77), true to its name, is a farm beside the sea, where grassy meadows hold donkeys as well as tents and caravans, and there's a scruffy flat beach.

Surprisingly, no hotels, and barely any bars or other businesses, face the harbour itself, but there is another excellent restaurant on the waterfront, the friendly and very charming 🍷 Comptoir de la Presqu'île, 30 quai Henri-Chardon (☎02.33.20.37.51), which as well as its outdoor tables has an upstairs dining room with good views of the port. The cuisine is all à la carte, and is dominated by fish, with a deliciously simple whole grilled bream costing the amazing price of €9.20.

St-Vaast

Pretty ST-VAAST-LA-HOUGUE, 11km south of Barfleur, is more of a resort, with lots of tiny Channel-crossing yachts moored in the bay where Edward III landed on his way to Crécy and a string of fortifications from Vauban's time. The Hôtel de France et des Fuchsias, just back from the sea at 18 rue du Maréchal-Foch (☎02.33.54.42.26, 🌐www.france-fuchsias.com; closed Jan–Feb, plus Mon in winter; 🕒–🕒) has splendid gardens and an excellent restaurant and is an ideal stopover for ferry passengers – in fact both it and the annexe at the end of the garden are packed throughout the season with British visitors.

Utah Beach

The westernmost of the main Invasion Beaches, Utah Beach stretches for approximately thirty kilometres south from St-Vaast. From 6.30am onwards on D-Day, 23,000 men and 1700 vehicles landed here. A minor coast road, the D241, traces the edge of the dunes and enables visitors to follow the course of the fighting, though in truth there's precious little to see these days. Ships deliberately sunk to create artificial breakwaters are still visible at low tide, while markers along the seafront commemorate individual fallen heroes.

Two museums now tell the story: the Mémorial de la Liberté in QUINÉVILLE (April to mid-Nov daily 10am–7pm; 🌐www.memorial-quineville.com; €6), which focuses on everyday life for the people of Normandy under Nazi occupation, and the much more comprehensive Musée du Débarquement d'Utah-Beach in STE-MARIE-DU-MONT (Feb, March & first two weeks of Nov daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; April, May & Oct daily 10am–6pm; June–Sept daily 9.30am–7pm; mid-Nov–Dec Sat, Sun & hols 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; closed Jan; 🌐www.utah-beach.com; €5), which explains the operations in exhaustive detail, with huge sea-view windows to lend immediacy to the copious models, maps, films and diagrams.

La Hague

If you go west from Cherbourg to La Hague, the northern tip of the peninsula, you'll find wild and isolated countryside where you can lean into the wind, watch waves smashing against rocks in secluded inlets or sunbathe amid a spring profusion of wild flowers, while a whole range of activities are on offer. The area's main tourist office, at 45 rue Jallot in the village of Beaumont-Hague, 14km out of Cherbourg on the D901, can supply the details (June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; July–Aug Mon–Sat 9am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm; Sept–May Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.33.52.74.94, 🌐www.lahague.org).

Attractions on the cape include some of the highest cliffs in Europe at the Nez de Jobourg, reachable by the Sentier des Douaniers, a well-marked ramblers' path that hugs the coast for 43km between Urville-Nacqueville, on the north coast, to the dunes at Biville, in the far south of the region. Crêperies, bars and little restaurants dot the headland, as do gîtes-rurales (information also from the tourist office), many in the area's handsome, immaculately kept stone cottages, with their slate roofs and pretty gardens.

Art and poetry fans might like to visit the houses where Jean-François Millet and Jacques Prévert were born and died respectively. The painter of poster-favourite Les Glaneuses was born at Hameau Gruchy (daily April & May 2–6pm, June & Sept 11am–6pm, July & Aug 11am–7pm; €4), at GRÉVILLE-HAGUE, where temporary exhibitions are held, while the great twentieth-century writer's workshop and garden at the home he retired to in the 1970s can be visited at Le Val, OMONVILLE-LA-PETITE (same opening hours and fee as the Millet house). Two other interests, star-gazing and botany, are catered for at the Ludiver planetarium at the village of TONNEVILLE, in the east of the promontory (July & Aug daily 10am–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm, Sun & public holidays 2–6pm, closed Sat; see website for schedules of planetarium shows; tour €3.50, tour and show €7; 🌐www.ludiver.com), and at the tropical-looking garden at the Château de Vauville, in the especially picturesque village of VAUVILLE to the west (May, June & Sept Tues & Fri–Sun 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 2–6pm; access free, tours €6; 🌐www.jardin-vauville.fr); it is famed for its huge palm-grove, a sign of the area's mild microclimate.

South of La Hague a great curve of sand – some of it military training ground – takes the land's edge to Flamanville and another nuclear installation. But the next two sweeps of beach down to Carteret, with sand dunes like mini-mountain ranges, are probably the best beaches in Normandy: there are no resorts, no hotels and just two campsites – at Le Rozel (Le Ranch; ☎02.33.10.07.10, 🌐www.camping-leranch.com; closed Oct–March) and Surtainville (Les Mielles; ☎02.33.04.31.04, 🌐www.surtainville.new.fr).

Coutances

The old hill town of COUTANCES, 65km south of Cherbourg, confined by its site to just one main street, has on its summit a landmark for all the surrounding countryside, the Cathédrale de Notre-Dame. Essentially Gothic, it is still very Norman in its unconventional blending of architectural traditions, and the octagonal lantern crowning the crossing in the nave is nothing short of divinely inspired. The son et lumière on Sunday evenings and throughout the summer is for once a true complement to the light stone building. Also illuminated on summer nights (and left open) are the formal fountained public gardens.

Coutances' gare SNCF, about 1.5km southeast of the town centre (at the bottom of the hill), also serves as the stop for buses heading north and south. The local tourist office is housed behind the Hôtel de Ville in place Georges-Léclerc (July & Aug Mon–Fri 9.30am–6pm, Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Sept–June Mon–Wed & Fri 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Thurs 9.30am–6pm, Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; ☎02.33.19.08.10, 🌐www.ville-coutances.fr). Central Coutances is very short of hotels. In the cathedral square, the Hôtel du Parvis (☎02.33.45.13.55; 🍷; restaurant closed Sun), has unexciting but adequate rooms, above a reasonable brasserie. A more comfortable alternative is the large Cositel (☎02.33.19.15.00; 🌐www.hotelcositel.com; 🍷), halfway up the hill west of town that's climbed by the D44 towards Agon. That stands next to an excellent year-round municipal campsite, Les Vignettes (☎02.33.45.43.13).

Granville

From Coutances, the D971 runs down to the coast at GRANVILLE, the Norman equivalent of Brittany's St-Malo, with a history of piracy and the severe citadel of the haute ville guarding the approaches to the bay of Mont St-Michel. Thanks in part to the long beach that stretches away north of town, and disappears almost completely at low tide, it's the most lively town and most popular resort in the area. However, with its nightmarish traffic and hordes of tourists milling around in summer in the vain hope of finding some way of amusing themselves, it simply doesn't match the appeal of its Breton rival.

The great difference between Granville and St-Malo is that in Granville the fortified citadel contains little of interest, just three or four long, narrow, parallel streets of forbidding grey-granite eighteenth-century houses, although the views up and down the coast, across to Mont St-Michel and out to the Îles Chausey, whose granite was quarried for the Mont St-Michel buildings, are dramatic. In pride of place at the inland end of the haute ville is the Musée d'Art Moderne Richard Anacréon (April–Sept daily except Mon 11am–6pm, Oct–March Wed–Sun 2–6pm; €2.60), housing art accumulated by a Parisian bookseller from 1940 onwards. Filled with sketches and autographs from the likes of Jean Cocteau and André Derain, it's not all that compelling, but the gallery itself is impressive, and hosts interesting temporary exhibitions.

The tourist office is below the citadel at 4 cours Jonville (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎02.33.91.30.03, 🌐www.ville-granville.fr). Trains between Paris and Cherbourg arrive well to the east at the gare SNCF on avenue Maréchal-Leclerc, which also serves as the gare routière. Ferries run from Granville to the Channel Islands and the Îles Chausey.

With so many visitors in summer, it's well worth booking accommodation in advance, most of it concentrated in the new town that sprawls below the citadel, either beneath the walls on the seaward side, or near the station. The Michelet, 5 rue Jules-Michelet (☎02.33.50.06.55; 🍷), is well equipped but characterless; the Des Bains, closer to the tourist office at 19 rue G-Clemenceau (☎02.33.50.17.31; 🍷), has a reasonable restaurant. An option nearer the station is the Terminus at 5 place de la Gare (☎02.33.50.02.05, 🌐www.hotel-granville-france.com; 🍷). The modern, oceanfront Centre Régional de Nautisme (☎02.33.91.22.62, 🌐www.crng.asso.fr; closed Sat & Sun Nov–Feb; €12.50 per dorm bed), a kilometre south of the station in the town centre, serves as Granville's hostel.

Where Granville really does excel is in its waterfront restaurants, hard below the citadel walls, though be warned that the views here are of a gritty commercial port rather than a delightful harbour. The best are the 🍷 Restaurant du Port, 19 rue du Port (☎02.33.50.00.55; closed Sun eve, plus Mon in low season), with its mouthwatering assortment of very fishy menus, and the Phare, nearby at no. 11

(☎02.33.50.12.94; closed Tues & Wed), which has the standard mussels and panaché de poissons on its €18.50 menu, and a superb assiette des fruits de mer on the €29.50 equivalent. Up in the old town, L'Échauguette, 24 rue St-Jean (☎02.33.50.51.87), serves good crêpes and simple meals, cooked over an open fire.

St-Jean-le-Thomas and Gênets

South of Granville the crowded towns and small resorts compete for views and proximity to Mont St-Michel. ST-JEAN-LE-THOMAS is the first point from which you can walk at low tide across the bay to the abbey, although it's not a walk to take on a drunken impulse. The tide, as they like to tell you, comes up faster than galloping horses. You can join a guided walk from the beach at GÊNETS with Chemins de la Baie (most days mid-April to Oct, depending on tides; ☎02.33.89.80.88, 🌐www.cheminsdelabaie.com; €5.50–20).

Avranches

AVRANCHES is the nearest large town to Mont St-Michel, and it has always had close connections with the abbey. The Mont's original church was founded by a bishop of Avranches, spurred on by the Archangel Michael, who supposedly became so impatient with the lack of progress that he prodded a hole in the bishop's skull – still to be seen in Avranches' St-Gervais basilica. Robert of Torigny, a subsequent abbot of St-Michel, played host in the town on several occasions to Henry II of England, the most memorable being when Henry was obliged, barefoot and bareheaded, to do public penance for the murder of Thomas Becket, on May 22, 1172. The arena for this act of contrition was Avranches cathedral, designed, most inexpertly, by de Torigny himself: the cathedral swiftly “crumbled and fell for want of proper support”, and all that marks the site today is a fenced-off platform – the plate-forme.

A more vivid evocation of the area's medieval splendours comes from the illuminated manuscripts, mostly created on the Mont, on display in a state-of-the-art new museum in the place d'Estouteville, the Scriptorial d'Avranches (Feb–April & Oct–Dec Tues–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm, Sat & Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; May, June & Sept daily except Mon 10am–6pm; July & Aug daily 10–7pm; closed Jan; €7). Additional exhibits trace the history of Avranches, and bring the story up to date by covering modern book-production techniques.

The gare SNCF is about a mile downhill from the town centre. In high summer, one bus per day runs to Mont St-Michel from the tourist office on place Général-de-Gaulle (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–7pm, Sun 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.33.58.00.22, 🌐www.ot-avranches.com). The nicest hotel has to be the gloriously old-fashioned Croix d'Or, near the Patton monument at 83 rue de la Constitution (☎02.33.58.04.88, 🌐www.hoteldelacroixdor.fr; closed Jan, plus Sun eve in winter; 🍷), which boasts beautiful hydrangea-filled gardens and absolutely the best restaurant in town. Reasonable alternatives include Le Jardin des Plantes, across town at 10 place Carnot (☎02.33.58.03.68; 🌐www.le-jardin-des-plantes.fr; 🍷), where the restaurant is more basic but still good value.

Mont St-Michel

The island of MONT ST-MICHEL was once known as the “Mount in Peril from the Sea”, as many pilgrims in medieval times drowned or were sucked

Visiting Mont St-Michel

Access to the island of Mont St-Michel is free and unrestricted, although there's a €4 fee to park on either the causeway or the sands below it (which are submerged by the tides). If you're visiting by car in summer, you might prefer to park on the mainland well short of the Mont, both to enjoy the walk across the causeway and to avoid the dense traffic jams.

Between May and August, the abbey is open daily from 9am to 7pm, with last admission at 6pm; from September to April, it's open daily from 9.30am until 6pm, last admission at 5pm. It's closed on Jan 1, May 1 and Dec 25. The same admission fee (adults €8, ages 18–25 €4.50, under-18s free) is charged whether you choose to wander the generally accessible areas on your own, or to join an expert-led guided tour. The tours last 45 minutes between mid-June and mid-Sept, and a full hour the rest of the year, and are available in French and English year round, as well as other languages in summer; the daily schedule for each language is displayed at the entrance to the abbey and at the tourist office. There are also a number of more detailed two-hour tours, in French only, which take you both higher and deeper (July & Aug daily 10.30am, 11.30am, 2pm & 4pm; Sept–June Sat & Sun 10.30am & 2pm; €4 extra).

In some recent years, the Mont has stayed open after hours during July and August, both in the early evening when visitors can stroll freely in the gardens, and at night when the abbey itself has reopened for musical and video installations. Whether it does so in any particular year seems to be unpredictable, however; contact the tourist office or access www.monum.fr for the latest information.

under by quicksand while trying to cross the bay to the eighty-metre-high rocky outcrop. The Archangel Michael was its vigorous protector, the most militant spirit of the Church Militant, with a marked tendency to leap from rock to rock in titanic struggles against Paganism and Evil. The abbey dates back to the eighth century, when the archangel supposedly appeared to a bishop of Avranches, Aubert, who duly founded a monastery on the island poking out of the Baie du Mont St-Michel. Since the eleventh century – when work on the sturdy church at the peak commenced – new buildings have been grafted onto the island to produce a fortified hotchpotch of Romanesque and Gothic buildings clambering to the pinnacle of the graceful church, forming probably the most recognizable silhouette in France after the Eiffel Tower.

Although it was such a prominent religious community, there were never more than forty monks resident on the Mont up to the time of the Revolution, when it was converted into a prison. In 1966, exactly a thousand years after Duke Richard the First originally brought the order to the Mont, the Benedictines were invited to return, but they departed again in 2001, having found that the present-day island does not exactly lend itself to a life of quiet contemplation. In their place, a dozen nuns and monks from the Monastic Fraternity of Jerusalem now maintain a presence.

For many years, the Mont has not, strictly speaking, been an island – the causeway (digue) that leads to it is never submerged, and is continuing to silt up to either side. Current plans envisage that the causeway will soon be cut away and replaced by a bridge, with a tram service to spare visitors the two-kilometre walk from the mainland. Currently scheduled for completion in 2010, this should not only make tourist numbers easier to control but also enable the sea to wash away much of the accumulated silt. For the latest news on the project, contact www.projetmontsaintmichel.org.

The abbey

The abbey, an architectural ensemble incorporating the high-spired, archangel-topped church and the magnificent Gothic buildings known since 1228 as the Merveille (“The Marvel”) – which in turn includes the entire north face, with the cloister, Knights’ Hall, Refectory, Guest Hall and cellars – is visible from all around the bay, but it becomes if anything more awe-inspiring the closer you approach. In Maupassant’s words:

I reached the huge pile of rocks which bears the little city dominated by the great church. Climbing the steep narrow street, I entered the most wonderful Gothic dwelling ever made for God on this earth, a building as vast as a town, full of low rooms under oppressive ceilings and lofty galleries supported by frail pillars. I entered that gigantic granite jewel, which is as delicate as a piece of lacework, thronged with towers and slender belfries which thrust into the blue sky of day and the black sky of night their strange heads bristling with chimeras, devils, fantastic beasts and monstrous flowers, and which are linked together by carved arches of intricate design.

The Mont’s rock comes to a sharp point just below what is now the transept of the church, a building where the transition from Romanesque to Gothic is only too evident in the vaulting of the nave. In order to lay out the church’s ground plan in the traditional shape of the cross, supporting crypts had to be built up from the surrounding hillside, and in all construction work the Chausey granite has had to be sculpted to match the exact contours of the hill. Space was always limited, and yet the building has grown through the centuries, with an architectural ingenuity that constantly surprises in its geometry – witness the shock of emerging into the light of the cloisters from the sombre Great Hall.

Not surprisingly, the building of the monastery was no smooth progression: the original church, choir, nave and tower all had to be replaced after collapsing. The style of decoration has varied, too, along with the architecture. That you now walk through halls of plain grey stone is a reflection of modern taste. In the Middle Ages, the walls of public areas such as the refectory would have been festooned with tapestries and frescoes, while the original coloured tiles of the cloisters have long since been stripped away to reveal bare walls.

To get a clearer sense of the abbey’s historical development, be sure to take a look at the intriguing scale models in the reception area, which depict it during four different epochs.

The rest of the island

The base of Mont St-Michel rests on a primeval slime of sand and mud. Just above that, you pass through the heavily fortified Porte du Roi onto the narrow Grande Rue, climbing steadily around the base of the rock and lined with medieval gabled houses and a jumble of overpriced postcard and souvenir shops, maintaining the ancient tradition of prising pilgrims from their money. A plaque near the main staircase records that Jacques Cartier was presented to King François I here on May 8, 1532, and charged with exploring the shores of Canada.

The rather dry Musée Maritime offers an insight into the island’s ties with the sea, while the Archangel Michael manages in just fifteen minutes to lead visitors on a voyage through space and time in the Archéoscope, with the full majestic panoply of multimedia mumbo jumbo. Further along the Grande Rue and up the steps towards the abbey church, next door to the eleventh-century church of St-Pierre, the absurd Musée Grévin contains such edifying specimens as a wax model of a woman drowning in a sea of mud (open Feb to mid-Nov daily 9am–6pm; €15 for all, or €7 each one).

Large crowds gather each day at the North Tower, to watch the tide sweep in across the bay. Seagulls wheel away in alarm, and those foolish enough to be wandering too late on the sands have to sprint to safety.

4

Practicalities

Mont St-Michel has its own tourist office, in the lowest gateway (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 9am–noon & 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 9am–7pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎02.33.60.14.30, 🌐www.ot-montsaintmichel.com). Regular buses connect it with the SNCF stations at Pontorson (see below), Rennes and St-Malo.

The island holds a surprising number of hotels and restaurants, albeit nothing like enough to cope with the sheer number of visitors. Most are predictably expensive, though virtually all seem to keep a few cheaper rooms. The most famous hotel, La Mère Poulard (☎02.33.89.68.68, 🌐www.merepoulard.com; 7–9), uses the time-honoured legend of its fluffy omelettes, as enjoyed by Leon Trotsky and Margaret Thatcher (not simultaneously), to justify extortionate charges. Higher up the Mont, room prices fall to more realistic levels. The cheapest option is the Du Guesclin (☎02.33.60.14.10, 📧hotel.duguesclin@orange.fr; closed Nov–March; 4), a Logis de France where all the rooms have been reasonably spruced up, and five have sea views; the nicest is the Hôtel La Croix Blanche (☎02.33.60.14.04; closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb; 6), with its small but exquisite rooms; and the Mouton Blanc (☎02.33.60.14.08, 🌐www.lemoutonblanc.com; 5) falls somewhere in between.

Sadly, restaurants on the Mont are consistently worse than almost anywhere in France; it's impossible to make any confident recommendations other than to eat elsewhere. In addition, the main approach road to the island, the D976, is lined shortly before the causeway by around a dozen large and virtually indistinguishable hotels and motels, each with its own brasserie or restaurant. Typical among these are the Motel Vert (☎02.33.60.09.33, 🌐www.le-mont-saint-michel.com; closed mid-Nov to early Feb; 3), the Hôtel Formule Verte (☎02.33.60.14.13, 🌐www.le-mont-saint-michel.com; closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb; 3), and the Hôtel de la Digue (☎02.33.60.14.02, 🌐www.ladigue.fr; closed Dec–Feb; 4). The three-star, 350-pitch Camping du Mont-St-Michel (☎02.33.60.22.10; closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb) is also on the mainland just short of the causeway.

Many visitors to Mont St-Michel choose instead to stay at PONTORSON, 6km inland, which has the nearest gare SNCF, connected to the Mont by a bus service (€5 return). The hotels here are not especially interesting, but both the Montgomery, in a fine old ivy-covered mansion at 13 rue du Couesnon (☎02.33.60.00.09, 🌐www.hotel-montgomery.fr; closed two weeks in Feb & Nov; 4), and the Tour Brette, 8 rue du Couesnon (☎02.33.60.10.69, 🌐www.latourbrette.fr.st; 2; restaurant closed Wed in low season), have good restaurants.

Inland Normandy

Seeking out specific highlights is not really the point when you're exploring inland Normandy. The pleasure of a visit lies not so much in show-stopping sights or individual towns as in the feel of the landscape – the lush meadows, orchards and forests of the Norman countryside. Gastronomy is, of course, a major motivation for coming here. The cheeses, creams, apple and pear brandies and ciders for which the region is famous are at their best in the Pays d'Auge, south of Lisieux, and the Vire Valley to the west. The Suisse Normande is canoeing and rock-climbing country, and there are endless good walks in the stretch along the southern border of the province designated as the Parc Naturel Régional de Normandie-Maine. Of the towns, Conches is the most charming, Falaise has William the Conqueror as a constant fall-back attraction, and Lisieux has its religious significance.

South of the Seine

Heading south from the Seine you can follow the River Risle from the estuary just east of Honfleur, or the Eure and its tributaries from upstream of Rouen. Between the two stretches the long featureless Neubourg Plain. The lowest major crossing point over the Risle is at PONT-AUDEMER, where medieval houses lean out at alarming angles over the crisscrossing roads, rivers and canals. From here, perfect cycling roads lined with timbered farmhouses follow the river south.

Le Bec-Hellouin

The size and tranquillity of the Abbaye de Bec-Hellouin, upstream from Pont-Audemer just before Brionne, give a monastic feel to the whole Risle valley. Bells echo across the water and white-robed monks go soberly about their business. From the eleventh century onwards, the abbey was one of the most important centres of intellectual learning in the Christian world; the philosopher Anselm was abbot here before becoming Archbishop of Canterbury in 1093. Owing to the Revolution, most of the monastery buildings are recent – the monks only returned in 1948 – but there are some survivors and appealing clusters of stone ruins, including the fifteenth-century bell tower of St-Nicholas and the cloister. Recent archbishops of Canterbury have maintained tradition by coming here on retreat. Visitors are welcome to wander through the grounds for no charge, though you can also join regular guided tours (June–Sept Mon & Wed–Sat 10.30am, 3pm, 4pm & 5pm, Sun & hols noon, 3pm & 4pm; Oct–May Mon & Wed–Sat 10.30am, 3pm & 4pm, Sun & hols noon, 3pm & 4pm; €4.60; @www.abbayedubec.com).

The tiny and rather twee adjacent village of Bec-Hellouin is home to riding stables, the Centre Equestre du Bec-Hellouin, where horses can be booked by the hour or the day (☎02.32.44.86.31). There are also a couple of restaurants; the ivy-covered Canterbury (☎02.32.44.14.59; closed Sun & Tues eves, Wed & all Feb), which serves regional specialities on menus from €18 up to €38, and the rather cheaper Restaurant de la Tour on place Guillaume-le-Conquérant (☎02.32.44.86.15; closed Wed eve & Thurs, plus two weeks in Nov), which has some outdoor tables.

Brionne and Beaumont-le-Roger BRIONNE, on the Rouen–Lisieux rail line, is a small town with large regional markets on Thursday and Sunday. The fish hall is on the left bank, the rest by the church on the right bank. Above them both, with panoramic views, is an excellent example of a Norman donjon (keep). If you decide to stay, try the lovely old half-timbered Auberge du Vieux Donjon, 19 rue Soie (☎02.32.44.80.62, 🌐www.auberge-vieux-donjon.com; 🕒; closed Mon, plus Sun eve & Thurs eve Oct–May), which has a good restaurant.

The River Charentonne joins the Risle near Serquigny. The town is also the meeting point of rail lines and main roads and the banks are clogged with fuming industrial conglomerations. But 7km upstream, at BEAUMONT-LE-ROGER, you are back in pastoral tranquillity. The ruins of a thirteenth-century priory church slowly crumble to the ground, the slow restoration of one or two arches unable to keep pace. In the village, little happens beyond the hammering of the church bell next door to the abbey by a nodding musketeer. The next riverside village, LA FERRIÈRE-SUR-RISLE, has an especially beautiful church, with some interesting sculpture, and a fourteenth-century covered market hall. Paddocks and meadows lead down to the river and a small and inviting hotel, the Vieux-Marché (☎02.32.30.25.93; 🕒).

Conches-en-Ouche

Fourteen kilometres east of La Ferrière across the wild and open woodland of the Forêt de Conches, standing above the River Rouloir on an abrupt and narrow spur, is CONCHES-EN-OUCHÉ, many a Norman's favourite heartland town. At the highest point, in the middle of a row of medieval houses, is the church of Ste-Foy, its windows a stunning sequence of Renaissance stained glass. Behind are the gardens of the Hôtel de Ville, where a robust, if anatomically odd stone boar gazes proudly out over a spectacular view. Next to that, you can scramble up the slippery steps of the ruined twelfth-century castle. Conches is given a certain edge over other towns with historic relics by the pieces of modern sculpture that seem to lie around every other corner.

The town's tourist office is close to the castle, 200m south of the church in place Aristide-Briand (July & Aug Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–noon; Sept–June Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.32.30.76.42, 🌐www.conches-en-ouche.fr) and hire out mountain bikes. The best accommodation option is Le Cygne, a Logis de France at 2 rue Paul-Guilbaud at the north end of town (☎02.32.30.20.60, 🌐www.lecygne.fr; 🕒; closed Sun eve & Mon), which has a good restaurant where menus start at €17. There's also a two-star municipal campsite, La Forêt (☎02.32.30.22.49; closed Oct–March), while on Thursday the whole town is taken up by a market.

Évreux

If you're heading south to Conches from Rouen, you follow first the River Eure, and then its tributary the Iton, passing through ÉVREUX, capital of the Eure département. It's hardly an exciting place, but an afternoon's wander in the vicinity of the cathedral – a minor classic with flamboyant exterior decoration and original fourteenth-century windows – and the ramparts alongside the Iton river bank is pleasant. Évreux's tourist office is right in the heart of town, 300 metres north of the cathedral at 1 place de Gaulle (June–Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.15pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm; Oct–May Mon–Sat same hours, closed Sun; ☎02.32.24.04.43, 🌐www.ot-pays-evreux.fr). The Hôtel de France, 200m northwest at 29 rue St-Thomas (☎02.32.39.09.25, 🌐www.hoteldefrance-evreux.com; 🍴; restaurant closed Sat lunch, Sun eve & Mon), offers large, smart rooms and a top-notch dining room.

Lisieux and the Pays d'Auge

The rolling hills and green twisting valleys of the Pays d'Auge stretch south of the cathedral town of Lisieux and are scattered with magnificent manor houses. The pastures here are the lushest in the province, their produce the world-famous cheeses of Camembert, Livarot and Pont L'Évêque. They are intermingled with hectares of orchards, which yield the best of Norman ciders, both apple and pear (poiré), as well as Calvados apple brandy.

Lisieux

LISIEUX, 35 minutes by train from Caen, is the main town of the Pays d'Auge, and the large street market on Wednesday and Saturday is a good place to get to know its cheeses and ciders. Most people, however, come to Lisieux in pilgrimage. St Thérèse, the most popular French spiritual figure of the last hundred years, was born in 1873 and lived just 24 years. Passivity, self-effacement and a self-denial that verged on masochism were her trademarks, and she is honoured by the gaudy and gigantic Basilique de Ste-Thérèse, completed in 1954 on a slope to the southwest of the town centre. The huge modern mosaics that decorate the nave are undeniably impressive, but the overall impression is of a quasi-medieval hagiography. The faithful can ride on a white, flag-bedecked fairground train around the holiest sites, which include the infinitely restrained and sober Cathédrale St-Pierre.

Lisieux's tourist office, 11 rue d'Alençon, is the best place to gather information on the rural areas further inland (June–Sept Mon–Sat 8.30am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; Oct–May Mon–Sat 8.30am–noon & 1.30–6pm; ☎02.31.48.18.10, 🌐www.lisieux-tourisme.com). The quantity of pilgrims means the town is full of good-value hotels, such as the Terrasse, near the basilica at 25 av Ste-Thérèse (☎02.31.62.17.65; 🍴; closed mid-Jan to mid-Feb, plus Mon in winter), and the smart, central Azur Hôtel, just north of the Église St-Jacques at 15 rue au Char (☎02.31.62.09.14, 🌐www.azur-hotel.com; 🍴; closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan). There's also a large two-star campsite, de la Vallée (☎02.31.62.00.40; closed early Oct to early April), but campers would probably be better off somewhere more rural, such as Livarot or Orbec.

Into the Pays d'Auge

Though the tourist authorities responsible for the Pays d'Auge have laid out a Route du Fromage and a Route du Cidre, you won't be missing out if you don't follow these itineraries. For really good solid Norman cooking this is the perfect area to look out for fermes auberges, working farms which welcome paying visitors to share their meals. Local tourist offices can provide copious lists of these and of local producers from whom you can buy your cheese and booze.

Crèvecœur-en-Auge

While it's always fun to stumble across dilapidated old half-timbered farms in the Pays d'Auge, here and there it's possible to visit prime specimens that have been beautifully restored and preserved. An especially fine assortment has been gathered just west of CRÈVECOEUR-EN-AUGE, 17km west of Lisieux on the N14, in the grounds of a small twelfth-century château (April–June & Sept daily 11am–6pm; July & Aug daily 11am–7pm; Oct Sun 2–6pm; guided tours July & Aug Sun 2.30–4.30pm; @ www.chateau-de-crevecoeur.com; €5). Around the pristine lawns of a re-created village green, circled by a shallow moat, this photogenic group of golden adobe structures includes a manor house, a barn and a tall thin dovecote that date from the fifteenth century. The little twelfth-century chapel that adjoins the château holds a fascinating exhibition on the music and instruments of the Middle Ages, although almost all the explanatory captions are in French.

Beuvron-en-Auge

By far the prettiest of the Pays d'Auge villages is BEUVRON-EN-AUGE, 7km north of the N13 halfway between Lisieux and Caen. It consists of an oval central square, ringed by a glorious ensemble of multicoloured half-timbered houses, including the yellow-and-brown sixteenth-century Vieux Manoir. The very centre of the square is taken up by the Pavé d'Auge restaurant (☎02.31.79.26.71; closed Mon, plus Tues Sept–June), where regularly changing menus start at €29.50.

Orbec and Livarot

The town of ORBEC, 19km southeast of Lisieux, epitomizes the simple pleasures of the Pays d’Auge. Along the rue Grande, you’ll see several houses in which the gaps between the timbers are filled with intricate patterns of coloured tiles and bricks. Debussy composed Jardin sous la Pluie in one of these, and the oldest and prettiest of the lot – a tanner’s house dating back to 1568, known as the Vieux Manoir – holds a museum of local history. On the whole, though, it’s more fun just to walk down behind the church to the river, and its watermill and paddocks.

The centre of the cheese country is the old town of LIVAROT, with the appealing hotel and restaurant Du Vivier in its heart (☎02.31.32.04.10, 🌐www.hotel-du-vivier.com; 📍; Oct–May, restaurant closed Fri eve, Sun eve & Mon lunch). The Fromagerie Graindorge on the route de Vimoutiers (Mon–Fri 9.30am–noon & 1.30–5pm, Sat 9.30am–noon; free), gives you a closer look at how Livarot’s eponymous cheese is made, with free samples doled out at the end of each visit. For the best views of the valley, climb up to the thirteenth-century church of St-Michel de Livet, just above the town.

Vimoutiers and Camembert

VIMOUTIERS, due south of Livarot, contains yet another cheese museum, at 10 av Général-de-Gaulle (April–Sept Mon 2.30–6pm, Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Nov–March Mon 2–5.30pm, Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; €3). This one specializes in labels – the cheeses underneath are mostly polystyrene.

A statue in the town’s main square honours Marie Harel, who, at the nearby village of Camembert, developed the original cheese early in the nineteenth century, promoting it with a skilful campaign that included sending free samples to Napoleon. Marie is confronted across the main street by what might be called the statue of the Unknown Cow.

Vimoutiers is the venue of a market on Monday afternoons. Its tourist office, in the cheese museum (same hours; ☎02.33.39.30.29, 🌐www.mairie-vimoutiers.fr), has piles of information on local cheese-related attractions. Of its hotels, the central Soleil d’Or, 3 rue de Chatelet (☎02.33.39.07.15; 📍; hotel closed two weeks in Feb & two weeks in Oct; restaurant closed Fri eve & Sun eve), has a reasonable €17 menu and a better €23 one.

A short way south of Vimoutiers, en route to Camembert, the beautifully sited lake known as the Escale du Vitou offers everything you need for windsurfing, swimming and horse-riding, as well as its own comfortable, rural hotel, L’Escale du Vitou (☎02.33.39.12.04, 🌐gite-normandie.iffrance.com/hotel.htm; 📍). There’s also a clean and very cheap campsite nearby on boulevard Docteur-Dentu, the two-star La Campière (☎02.33.39.18.86; closed Nov–Feb).

CAMEMBERT itself, 3km southeast of Vimoutiers, is tiny, hilly and very rural, home to far more cows than humans. On one side of its little central square, the largest local cheese producers, La Ferme Président, run their own eleven-room cheese museum (March–May, Sept & Oct Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; June–Aug Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; 🌐www.fermepresident.com; €5), where the forty-minute tour, threading through assorted farm buildings, adds little to anything you may have learned in Vimoutiers. On the other side, the rival Le Maison du Camembert is a British-run cheese and souvenir stall with an equally ramshackle free museum (Feb–April & Sept Wed–Sun 10am–6pm, May–Aug daily 10am–6pm; 📞 www.maisonducamembert.com).

La Ferté-Fresnel

For some truly wonderful rural lodging, it's well worth heading thirty kilometres east of Vimoutiers on the D12 to the little hamlet of LA FERTÉ-FRESNEL. The massive nineteenth-century 🏰 Château de la Ferté-Fresnel here has been converted into an opulent B&B (📞 02.33.24.23.23, 📧 chateau.fertefresnel.free.fr; 📍). Standing at the end of a majestic avenue of trees, the château is set in superb formal grounds, while its huge, high-ceilinged guest rooms are reached via a graceful curving double staircase.

Falaise

William the Conqueror, or William the Bastard as he is more commonly known here, was born in FALAISE, 40km southwest of Lisieux. His mother, Arlette, a laundrywoman, was spotted by his father, Duke Robert of Normandy, at the washing place below the château. She was a shrewd woman, scorning secrecy in her eventual assignation by riding publicly through the main entrance to meet him. During her pregnancy, she is said to have dreamed of bearing a mighty tree that cast its shade over Normandy and England.

Falaise's castle keep, firmly planted on the massive rocks of the cliff (falaise) that gave the town its name, and towering over the Fontaine d'Arlette down by the river, is one of the most evocative historic sights imaginable. Nonetheless, it was so heavily damaged during the war that it took over fifty years to reopen for regular visits (Feb–June & Sept–Dec daily 10am–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–7pm; English-language tours daily 11.30am, with another at 3.30pm in July & Aug; 📞 www.chateau-guillaume-leconquerant.fr; €6). Huge resources have been lavished on restoring the central donjon, reminiscent of the Tower of London with its cream-coloured Caen stone. A guiding principle was to avoid any possible confusion as to what is original and authentic and what is new. Rest assured you'll be in no doubt whatever. Steel slabs, concrete blocks, glass floors and tent-like canvas awnings have been slapped down atop the bare ruins, and metal staircases squeezed into the wall cavities. The raw structure of the keep, down to its very foundations, lies exposed to view, while the newly created rooms are used for changing exhibitions that focus on the castle's fascinating past.

The whole of Falaise was devastated in the struggle to close the “Falaise Gap” in August 1944 – the climax of the Battle of Normandy, as the Allied armies sought to encircle the Germans and cut off their retreat. By the time the Canadians entered the town on August 17, they could no longer tell where the roads had been and had to bulldoze a new four-metre strip straight through the middle. The full bloody story is told in horrific detail at the Musée Août 44, beyond the château in a former cheese factory that resembles nothing so much as a giant cheesebox, on the chemin des Rochers (early April to mid-Nov 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €5.50).

Practicalities

The tourist office can be found on the boulevard de la Libération (May to mid-June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm; mid-June to Sept same hours plus Sun 10am–noon & 3–5pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–5.30pm; 📞 02.31.90.17.26, 📧 www.otsifalaise.com). Most of Falaise's few hotels stand along the main Caen–Argentan road, which can make them rather noisy. The Poste, not far from the tourist office at 38 rue Georges-Clemenceau (☎02.31.90.13.14, ✉hotel.delaposte@orange.fr; 📍; hotel closed Jan, restaurant closed Jan, Sun eve & Mon) serves good food on menus from €15, while rooms and meals at the Hôtel de la Place, next to the church at 1 place St-Gervais (☎02.31.40.19.00; 📍; closed Sun eve & Wed), are significantly cheaper. The three-star campsite, Camping du Château (☎02.31.90.16.55; closed Oct–April), next to Arlette’s fountain and the municipal swimming pool, is in a much better location.

The Suisse Normande

The area known as the Suisse Normande lies roughly 25km south of Caen, along the gorge of the River Orne, between Thury-Harcourt and Putanges. While the name is a little far-fetched – there are certainly no mountains – it is quite distinctive, with cliffs and crags and wooded hills at every turn. There are plenty of opportunities for outdoor pursuits: you can race along the Orne in canoes and kayaks, cruise more sedately on pedaloes or a bizarre species of inflatable rubber tractor, or dangle on ropes from the sheer rock-faces high above. For mere walkers the Orne can be frustrating: footpaths along the river are few and far between, and often entirely overgrown.

The Suisse Normande is usually approached from Caen or Falaise and contrasts dramatically with the prairie-like expanse of wheat fields en route. On wheels, the best access is via the D235 from Caen (signed to Falaise then right through Ifs). Bus Verts #34 will take you to Thury-Harcourt or Clécy on its way to Flers, and there are occasional special summer train excursions from Caen.

Thury-Harcourt and Clécy

At THURY-HARCOURT, the tourist office on place St-Sauveur (Jan–April & Oct–Dec Mon 2.30–5pm, Tues–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–5pm, Sat 10am–12.30pm; May, June–Sept Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm; July & Aug also open Mon 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm; ☎02.31.79.70.45, 🌐www.suisse-normande.com) can suggest walks, rides and gîtes d'étape throughout the Suisse Normande. Hotels are for the most part overpriced, but there is an attractive four-star campsite, the Vallée du Triaspy (☎02.31.79.61.80; closed Oct–March), beside the river on the rue du Pont-Benoit.

CLÉCY, 10km to the south, is a slightly better bet for finding a room, although visitors outnumber residents in peak season. The hotel facing the church in the village centre, Au Site Normand, 1 rue des Châtelets (☎02.31.69.71.05, 🌐www.ausitenormand-clécy.com; 📍; closed mid-Dec to mid-Feb), consists of an old-fashioned and good-value dining room in the main timber-framed building and a cluster of newer units around the back. The river is a kilometre away, down the hill. En route, in the Parc des Loisirs, is a Musée du Chemin de Fer Miniature (March to mid-April Sun 2–5.30pm; mid-April to mid-June daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; second half of June & all Sept daily except Mon 10am–noon & 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–noon & 2–6.30pm; Oct to early Nov Sun 2–5pm; €5), featuring a gigantic model railway certain to appeal to children. Set in spacious grounds on the far bank of the river, the 🏰 Moulin du Vey (☎02.31.69.71.08, 🌐www.moulinduvey.com; 📍; hotel closed Dec, restaurant closed Sun in winter) is a beautifully positioned, luxuriously appointed hotel that takes its name from the restored watermill right by the bridge, which is itself, confusingly, now a restaurant. The western riverbank continues in a brief splurge of restaurants, takeaways and snack bars as far as the two-star municipal campsite (☎02.31.69.70.36, 🌐www.campings.com/campingclecy; closed mid-Oct to March).

Pont d'Ouilly

If you're planning on walking or cycling, a good central spot in which to base yourself is PONT D'OUILLY, at the point where the main road from Vire to Falaise crosses the river. It's a small town, with a few basic shops, an old covered market hall and a promenade (with bar) slightly upstream alongside the weir. Continuing upstream, a pleasant walk leads for 3.5km alongside the river to the pretty little village of Le Mesnil Villement.

As well as a campsite overlooking the river (☎02.31.69.46.12; closed Oct–Easter), Pont d'Ouilly offers an attractive hotel, the Du Commerce (☎02.31.69.80.16; 🍷; closed Sun eve & Mon), the quintessential French village hotel, with a friendly welcome and attentive service. Its restaurant is very popular with local families, serving superb, definitive Norman cooking, with plenty of creamy Pays d'Auge sauces, on menus that start at €16. About a kilometre north, the more upmarket Auberge St-Christophe (☎02.31.69.81.23; 🍷; closed Sun eve, Mon & three weeks in Feb) stands, covered with ivy and geraniums, in a beautiful setting on the right bank of the Orne.

A short distance south of Pont-d'Ouilly is the Roche d'Oëtre, a high rock with a tremendous view into the deep and totally wooded gorge of the Rouvre, a tributary of the Orne. The river widens soon afterwards into the Lac du Rabodanges, formed by the many-arched Rabodanges Dam.

Southern Normandy

As an alternative to following the more northerly routes across Normandy, motorists heading west from Paris towards Brittany may prefer to cut directly across the province by following the line of the N12 through Alençon and then heading northwest on the N176. Much of the terrain along Normandy's southern border is taken up by the dense woodlands of the Forêt d'Écouves and the Forêt des Andaines, so there's plenty of good walking to be had, while the hill towns of Carrouges and Domfront make great stopovers.

Alençon and around

ALENÇON, a fair-sized and busy town, is known for its traditional – and now pretty much defunct – lacemaking industry. The Musée des Beaux-Arts et de la Dentelle (July & Aug daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Sept–June daily except Mon 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3) is housed in a former Jesuit school and has all the best trappings of a modern museum. The highly informative history of lacemaking upstairs, with examples of numerous different techniques, can, however, be tedious for anyone not already riveted by the subject. It also contains an unexpected collection of gruesome Cambodian artefacts like spears and lances, tiger skulls and elephants' feet, gathered by a militant socialist French governor at the end of the nineteenth century. The paintings in the adjoining Beaux-Arts section are nondescript, except for a few works by Courbet and Géricault. The Château des Ducs, the old town castle close by the museum, looks impressive but doesn't encourage visitors: it's now a prison, and people in Alençon have nightmarish memories of its use by the Gestapo during the war. Wandering around the town might also take you to St Thérèse's birthplace on rue St-Blaise, just in front of the gare routière.

The Forêt d'Écouves, north of Alençon and inaccessible by public transport, is a dense mixture of spruce, pine, oak and beech, unfortunately a favoured spot of the military – and, in autumn, deer hunters, too. You can usually ramble along the cool paths, happening on wild mushrooms and even the odd wild boar.

Practicalities

The tourist office is housed in the fifteenth-century Maison d'Ozé on place La Magdelaine (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎02.33.80.66.33, 🌐www.paysdalencontourisme.com). The gare routière and the gare SNCF are both northeast of the centre, in an area that holds Alençon's prime concentration of hotels. The Hôtel de Paris here, above a bar at 26 rue de Denis-Papin (☎02.33.29.01.64; 📍), offers simple rooms at very good rates. A Logis de France, Le Grand Cerf, occupies a Neoclassical town house a few hundred yards closer to the centre at 21 rue St-Blaise (☎02.33.26.00.51, 🌐www.hotelgrandcerf-61.com; 📍; hotel closed Sun) and has large comfortable rooms and a top-quality restaurant, with garden seating in summer. Alençon has good shops and cafés in a few pedestrianized streets at the heart of its abysmal one-way traffic system. A good place to sample the thriving local bar scene is the half-timbered Café des Sept Colonnes at 2 rue du Château.

Carrouges

An alternative base to Alençon, at the western end of the Forêt d'Écouves, is the hill town of CARROUGES, with its fine old-style château set in spacious grounds at the foot of the hill (daily: April to mid-June & Sept 10am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-June to Aug 9.30am–noon & 2–6.30pm; Oct–March 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €6.10). Its two highlights are a superb restored brick staircase and a room containing portraits of fourteen successive generations of the Le Veneur family, an extraordinary illustration of the processes of heredity. On the narrow rue Ste-Marguerite that runs through the heart of Carrouges – a noisier location than it might look – the Hôtel du Nord (☎02.33.27.20.14; 📍; closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan, plus Fri eve & Sun eve Sept–June) offers a handful of reasonably large en-suite rooms at low rates, and delicious local cuisine on menus that start at €10.10.

Bagnoles-de-l'Orne

West of Carrouges, the spa town of BAGNOLES-DE-L'ORNE is quite unlike anywhere else in this part of the world, attracting the moneyed sick and convalescent from all over France to its thermal baths. The layout is formal and spacious, centring on a lake with gardens, from where horse-drawn calèches take the clients to an enormous casino. With so many visitors to keep entertained, and spending money, there are also innumerable cultural events of a restrained and stressless nature, such as tea dances and stage shows.

Whether you'd actually want to spend time in Bagnoles depends on your disposable income as well as your health. Furthermore, the town as a whole operates to a season that lasts roughly from early April to the end of October; arrive in winter, and you may find everything shut. The numerous hotels are expensive and sedate places, in which it's possible to be too late for dinner at seven o'clock and locked out altogether at nine, and the three-star campsite, De la Vée (☎02.33.37.87.45; closed Nov to mid-March), south of town, is rather forlorn.

The tourist office on place du Marché (April–Oct Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm; Nov–March Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.33.37.85.66, 🌐www.bagnolesdelorne.com) will give details on accommodation in Bagnoles and its less exclusive sister town of TESSE-MADELEINE. Among the cheaper options in Bagnoles proper is the Bagnôles Hotel, on the central roundabout at 6 place de la République (☎02.33.37.86.79; 📍; closed Nov–March), while the Celtic, in Tesse at 14 rue du Dr P-Noal (☎02.33.37.92.91; 📍; closed mid-Jan to early March), has excellent menus from €18. Despite its ugly would-be-Deco exterior, the Hôtel du Béryl, on rue des Casinos (☎02.33.38.44.44, 🌐www.groupe-emmaude.com; 📍), is the biggest and probably the best of the crop, bedecked with balconies and terraces overlooking the lake.

Domfront

The road through the forest from Bagnoles, the D335 and then the D908, climbs above the lush woodlands and progressively narrows to a hog's back before entering DOMFRONT. Less happens here than at Bagnoles, but the countryside is prettier.

A public park, near the long-abandoned former train station, leads up to some redoubtable castle ruins perched on an isolated rock. Eleanor of Aquitaine was born in this castle in October 1162, and Thomas à Becket came to stay for Christmas 1166, saying Mass in the Notre-Dame-sur-l'Eau church down by the river, which has sadly been ruined by vandals. The views from the flower-filled gardens that surround the mangled keep are spectacular, including a very graphic panorama of the ascent you've made to get up. A slender footbridge connects the castle with the narrow little village itself, which boasts an abundance of half-timbered houses. Near its sweet central square, the modern St Julien church, constructed out of concrete segments during the 1920s, is bursting with exciting mosaics.

On summer afternoons (July & Aug Tues & Thurs 4.30pm), free guided tours (in French) of old Domfront leave from the tourist office, facing the castle entrance at 12 place de la Roirie (Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm; ☎02.33.38.53.97, 🌐www.domfront.com). Domfront's hotels, clustered together at the foot of the hill below the old town, make useful and very pleasant stopovers. Two Logis de France stand side by side: the Relais St-Michel, 5 rue du Mont-St-Michel (☎02.33.38.64.99, 🌐www.hotellerelaistmichel.com; 📍–📍; closed Fri & Sun eve), has rooms with and without en-suite facilities, plus menus from €15, while the similarly priced Hôtel de France, 7 rue du Mont-St-Michel (☎02.33.38.51.44, 🌐www.hoteldefrance-fr.com; 📍), has a nice bar and garden. Campers should note that the two-star local campsite, du Champs Passais (☎02.33.37.37.66; closed Oct–March), is exceptionally small.

The Bocage

The region that centres on St-Lô, just south of the Cotentin, is known as the Bocage, from a word that refers to a type of cultivated countryside common in the west of France, where fields are cut by tight hedgerows rooted into walls of earth well over a metre high. An effective form of smallhold farming in pre-industrial days, it also proved to be a perfect system of anti-tank barricades. When the Allied troops tried to advance through the region in 1944, it was almost impenetrable – certainly bearing no resemblance to the East Anglian plains where they had trained. The war here was hand-to-hand slaughter, and the destruction of villages was often wholesale.

St-Lô

The city of ST-LÔ, 60km south of Cherbourg and 36km southwest of Bayeux, is still known as the “Capital of the Ruins”. Memorial sites are everywhere and what is new speaks as tellingly of the destruction as the ruins that have been preserved. In the main square, the gate of the old prison commemorates Resistance members executed by the Nazis, people deported east to the concentration camps and soldiers killed in action. When the bombardment of St-Lô was at its fiercest, the Germans refused to take any measures to protect the prisoners and the gate was all that survived. Samuel Beckett was here during and after the battle, working for the Irish Red Cross as interpreter, driver and provision-seeker – for such things as rat poison for the maternity hospitals. He said he took away with him a “time-honoured conception of humanity in ruins”.

All the trees in the city are the same height, all planted to replace the battle’s mutilated stumps. But the most visible – and brilliant – reconstruction is the Cathédrale de Notre-Dame. Its main body, with a strange southward-veering nave, has been conventionally repaired and rebuilt. But the shattered west front and the base of the collapsed north tower have been joined by a startling sheer wall of icy green stone that makes no attempt to mask the destruction.

By way of contrast, a lighthouse-like 1950s folly spirals to nowhere on the main square. Should you feel the urge, you can climb its staircase and make your way into the new and even more pointless labyrinth of glass at its feet for a €1.50 admission fee. More compelling, around behind the Mairie, is the Musée des Beaux-Arts (Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €2), which is full of treasures: a Boudin sunset; a Lurçat tapestry of his dog, Nadir and the Pirates; works by Corot, van Loo, Moreau; a Léger watercolour; a fine series of unfaded sixteenth-century Flemish tapestries on the lives of two peasants; and sad bombardment relics of the town.

St-Lô’s tourist office adjoins the “lighthouse” on the main square (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–6pm; Sept–June Mon 2–6pm, Tues–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sat 10am–1pm; ☎02.33.77.60.35, 🌐www.mairie-saint-lo.fr). Most of the hotels, restaurants and bars are across the river, near the gare SNCF. Overlooking the river from the brow of a ridge beside the station, the upmarket Logis Hôtel des Voyageurs, 5–7 av Briovère (☎02.33.05.08.63; 📍) is home to the Toqueville restaurant, which has menus from €19. If you’d rather be up in town, La Crémillère, at 8 rue de la Chancellerie (☎02.33.57.14.68; 📍; closed Fri eve & Sat in low season), has a good restaurant where all the menus, which start at €9.50 for lunch and €12.50 for dinner, include a buffet of hors d’oeuvres.

The Vire Valley

Once St-Lô was taken in the Battle of Normandy, the armies speedily moved on southwestwards for their next confrontation. The Vire Valley, trailing south from St-Lô, saw little action – and its towns and villages seem to have been rarely touched by any historic or cultural mainstream. The motivation in coming to this landscape of rolling hills and occasional gorges is essentially to consume the region's cider, Calvados apple brandy (much of it bootleg), fruit pastries and sausages made from pigs' intestines.

From St-Lô to Tessy-sur-Vire

The best section of the valley is south of St-Lô through the Roches de Ham to Tessy-sur-Vire. The Roches de Ham are a pair of sheer rocky promontories high above the river. Though these are promoted as “viewing tables”, the pleasure lies as much in the walk up, through lanes lined with blackberries, hazelnuts and rich orchards. Downstream from the Roches at LA CHAPELLE-SUR-VIRE, the church that towers majestically above the river has been an object of pilgrimage since the twelfth century. According to legend, in the Middle Ages a shepherd tending his flock noticed a lamb rooted to the spot; after digging he unearthed a statue of the Virgin Mary, since revered as a miraculous relic.

Five kilometres northeast of La Chapelle, TORIGNI-SUR-VIRE was the base of the Grimaldi family before they achieved quasi-royal status upon moving on to the principality of Monaco. A spacious country town, it boasts a few grand buildings and an attractive campsite, Camping du Lac (☎02.33.56.91.74). The Auberge de l'Orangerie, 3 rue Victor-Hugo (☎02.33.56.70.64, 🌐www.auberge-orangerie.abcsalles.com; hotel closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb; restaurant closed Sun eve & Mon; 🍴), is a good restaurant, with menus starting at €15, and also offers five rooms.

At the eastern end of the sinuous Vire gorge, 10km north of Vire, the former railway viaduct of Le Viaduc de la Souleuvre was designed by Gustave Eiffel. A wooden boardwalk has been laid across half the span of the bridge, on which visitors can cross to the deepest part of the gorge. Once there, 61m up, they are expected to jump off – this is A.J. Hackett's bungy-jumping centre (hours vary, but open daily mid-June to mid-Sept; late March to late June and mid-Sept to mid-Nov Sat, Sun & hols only; reservations essential ☎02.31.66.31.66, 🌐www.ajhackett.fr). Jumpers have to be aged at least 13, and for one to three people to make a single jump each costs €79 per person; you also have to pay €3 for the privilege of parking in the adjacent field.

Vire

VIRE itself is worth visiting specifically for the food; the one problem is what to do when you're not eating. The town is best known for its dreaded, offal-based andouille sausages, but you can gorge yourself on salmon or trout fresh from the river instead, accompanied by local poiré. It makes sense to choose a hotel with a good dining room. At the central Hôtel de France, 4 rue d'Aignaux (☎02.31.68.00.35, 🌐www.hoteldefrancevire.com; 🍴), the €28 menu Virois is packed with local specialities, including andouillettes. The Hôtel des Voyageurs, at the bottom of avenue de la Gare (☎02.31.68.01.16; 🍴), serves sumptuous buffets of hors d'oeuvres and desserts; you can sample both for €15.

Villedieu-les-Poêles

VILLEDIEU-LES-POÊLES – literally “City of God the Frying Pans” – is a lively though touristy place, 28km west of Vire. Copper souvenirs and kitchen utensils gleam from its rows of shops, and the tourist office has lists of dozens of local ateliers for more direct purchases, plus details of the copperwork museum.

All of this can seem a bit obsessive, though there is more authentic interest at the Fonderie de Cloches at 13 rue du Pont-Chignon, one of the twelve remaining bell foundries in Europe. Work here is only part time as demand is limited, but you may find the forge lit (mid-Feb to early July & Sept to mid-Nov Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; early July to Aug daily 9am–12.30pm

& 2–6pm; 🌐 www.cornille-havard.com; €4.30) for visits. Expert craftsmen will show you the moulds, composed of an unpleasant-looking combination of clay, goat's hair and horse manure.

The local tourist office is on place des Costils (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; July & Aug daily 9am–6.30pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎ 02.33.61.05.69, 🌐 www.ot-villedieu.fr). If you're charmed into staying, the welcoming Logis Hôtel St-Pierre et St-Michel, 12 place de la République (☎ 02.33.61.00.11, 🌐 www.st-pierre-hotel.com; 📍; closed mid-Jan to mid-Feb), houses the stylish Le Sourdin restaurant, where the €34 menu is seriously gastronomic. There's also a three-star campsite by the river, Jean-Louis Bougord (☎ 02.33.61.02.44; closed late Sept to Easter).

Travel details

Trains

Through services to Paris connect with ferries at Dieppe, Le Havre and Cherbourg: if you're doing this journey, it's easiest to buy a combined rail–ferry–rail ticket at your point of departure.

Alençon to: Caen (6 daily; 1hr 20min), via Sées (13min) and Argentan (30min); Tours (1 daily; 2hr 10min); Le Mans (10 daily; 50min).

Caen to: Cherbourg (10 daily; 1hr 15min), via Bayeux (20min) and Valognes (1hr); Lisieux (hourly; 30min); Le Mans (5 daily; 2hr), via Argentan (45min) and Alençon (1hr 15min); Paris–St-Lazare (at least hourly; 2hr 10min); Rennes (4 daily; 3hr), via Bayeux (20min), St-Lô (50min), Coutances (1hr 15min) and Pontorson (2hr); Rouen (6 daily; 2hr); Tours (1 daily; 3hr).

Cherbourg to: Paris (8 daily; 3hr), via Valognes (15min) and Caen (1hr 15min).

Dieppe to: Paris–St-Lazare (19 daily; 2hr 10min), via Rouen (50min).

Granville to: Coutances (7 daily; 30min).

Le Havre to: Paris (11 daily; 2hr 15min); Rouen (15 daily; 1hr).

Rouen to: Caen (6 daily; 2hr); Paris–St-Lazare (19 daily; 1hr 15min); Vernon (12 daily; 30min).

St-Lô to: Caen (4 daily; 50min), via Bayeux (30min); Rennes (4 daily; 2hr 10min), via Coutances (20min) and Pontorson (1hr 15min).

Trouville-Deauville to: Lisieux (6 daily in winter, much more frequently in summer; 20min); Paris (6 daily in winter, much more frequently in summer; 2hr).

Buses

Alençon to: Bagnoles (3 daily; 1hr); Bellême (1–2 daily; 1hr); Évreux (1 daily; 2hr), via L'Aigle (1hr 40min); Mortagne (1–3 daily; 1hr); Vimoutiers (1–3 daily; 1hr 30min), via Sées (30min).

Bayeux to: Arromanches (4 daily; 30min); Ouistreham (3 daily; 1hr 15min).

Caen to: Arromanches (1 daily; 1hr 10min); Bayeux (3 daily; 50min); Clécy (4 daily; 50min); Falaise (7 daily; 1hr); Honfleur (13 daily; 2hr), via Cabourg (50min), Houlgate (55min) and Deauville (1hr 5min), of which 5 continue to Le Havre (2hr 30min); Le Havre (2 daily bus #80 express services; 1hr 25min), via Honfleur (1hr); Ouistreham (20 daily; 30min); Pont L'Évêque (3 daily; 1hr 10min); Thury-Harcourt (5 daily; 40min).

Cherbourg to: St-Lô (3 daily; 1hr 45min); St-Vaast (3 daily; 50min) via Barfleur (30min).

Dieppe to: Fécamp (4 daily; 2hr 20min); Le Tréport (4 daily; 30min); St-Valéry (5 daily; 1hr).

Le Havre to: Caen (2 daily express services; 1hr 25min); Étretat (9 daily; 50min); Fécamp (8 daily; 1hr 30min); Honfleur (7 daily; 30min).

Mont St-Michel to: Rennes (5 daily; 1hr 20min); St-Malo (4 daily; 1hr 30min).

Rouen to: Clères (6 daily; 45min); Évreux (hourly; 1hr); Le Havre (hourly; 2hr 45min), via Jumièges and Caudebec; Lisieux (2 daily; 2hr 30min).

St-Lô to: Bayeux (8 daily; 30min); Cherbourg (3 daily; 1hr 45min); Coutances (5 daily; 30min).

5

Brittany

5

BRITTANY

- * Cancale If you love oysters, the stalls and restaurants in Cancale's little harbour will have you in raptures. See p.425
- * Dinan Gorgeously preserved walled town, with its own riverfront port, that feels barely changed since the Middle Ages. See p.425
- * The Côte de Granit Rose With its bizarre pink rock formations and gem-like beaches, this memorable stretch of coastline is perfect for kids. See p.433
- * Hôtel de la Baie des Trés-passés Brittany holds no more romantic destination than this land's-end hotel, facing its own colossal beach in splendid isolation. See p.451
- * Île de Sein Misty and mysterious island, barely rising from the Atlantic, that makes a great day-trip from western Finistère. See p.453
- * Faïence de Quimper For centuries the craft-workers of Quimper have been producing hand-painted ceramics, which make perfect souvenirs. See p.456
- * The Inter-Celtic Festival Celebrate the music and culture of the Celtic nations at Brittany's best-loved summer festival. See p.468
- * Carnac France's most extraordinary megalithic monuments, predating even the Egyptian pyramids. See p.474

△ Le Gouffre, near Plougrescant, Côte de Granit Rose

Brittany

No one area – and certainly no one city or town – in Brittany encapsulates the character of the province; that lies in its people and in its geographical unity. For generations Bretons risked their lives fishing and trading on the violent seas and struggled with the arid soil of the interior. This toughness and resilience is tinged with Celtic culture: mystical, musical, sometimes morbid and defeatist, sometimes vital and inspired.

Though archeologically Brittany is one of the richest regions in the world – the alignments at Carnac rival Stonehenge – its first appearance in recorded history is as the quasi-mythical “Little Britain” of Arthurian legend. In the days when to travel by sea was safer and easier than by land, it was intimately connected with “Great Britain” across the water. Settlements such as St-Malo, St-Pol and Quimper were founded by Welsh and Irish missionary “saints” whose names are not to be found in any official breviary. Brittany remained independent until the sixteenth century, its last ruler, Duchess Anne, only managing to protect the province’s autonomy through marriage to two consecutive French monarchs. After her death, in 1532, François I took her daughter and lands, and sealed the union with France with an act supposedly enshrining certain privileges. These included a veto over taxes by the local parlement and the people’s right to be tried, or conscripted to fight, only in their province. The successive violations of this treaty by Paris, and subsequent revolts, form the core of Breton history since the Middle Ages.

As their language has been steadily eradicated, and the interior of the province severely depopulated, many Bretons continue to treat France as a separate country. Few, however, actively support Breton nationalism (which it’s a criminal offence to advocate) much beyond putting Breizh (Breton for “Brittany”) stickers on their cars. But there have been many successes in reviving the language, and the economic resurgence of the last three decades, helped partly by summer tourism, has largely been due to local initiatives, like Brittany Ferries re-establishing an old trading link, carrying produce and passengers across to Britain and Ireland. At the same time a Celtic artistic identity has consciously been revived, and local festivals – above all August’s Inter-Celtic Festival at Lorient – celebrate traditional Breton music, poetry and dance, with fellow Celts treated as comrades.

If you’re looking for traditional Breton fun, and you can’t make the Lorient festival (or the smaller Quinzaine Celtique at Nantes in June/July), look out for gatherings organized by Celtic folklore groups – Circles or Bagadou. You may also be interested by the pardons, pilgrimage festivals commemorating local saints, which guidebooks (and tourist offices) tend to promote as exciting spectacles. In truth, unlike most French festivals, these are not phoney affairs kept alive for tourists, but deeply serious and rather gloomy religious occasions.

BRITTANY

BRITTANY

5

Cork Plymouth Caen Portsmouth, Plymouth & Weymouth

0 50 km

La Rochele

Paris

Atlantic Ocean

Brittany's proudest addition to the great cuisines of the world has to be the crêpe and its savoury equivalent the galette; crêperies throughout the region attempt to pass them off as satisfying meals, serving them with every imaginable filling. However, few people plan their holidays specifically around eating pancakes, and gourmets are more likely to be enticed to Brittany by its magnificent array of seafood. Restaurants in resorts such as St-Malo and Quiberon jostle to attract fish connoisseurs, while some smaller towns – like Cancale, which specializes in oysters (huîtres), and Erquy, with its scallops (coquilles St-Jacques) – depend wholly on one specific mollusc for their livelihood.

Although they can't claim to be uniquely Breton, two appetizers feature on every self-respecting menu. These are moules marinières, giant bowls of succulent orange mussels steamed in a combination of white wine, shallots and parsley (and perhaps enriched with cream or crème fraîche to become moules à la crème), and soupe de poissons (fish soup), traditionally served with a pot of the garlicky mayonnaise known as rouille (coloured with pulverized sweet red pepper), a mound of grated gruyère, and a bowl of croutons. Jars of fresh soupe de poissons – or even crab or lobster – are always on sale in seaside poissonneries, and make an ideal way to take a taste of France home with you. Paying a bit more in a restaurant – typically on menus costing €25 or more – brings you into the realm of the assiette de fruits de mer, a mountainous heap of langoustines, crabs, oysters, mussels, clams, whelks and cockles, most raw and all delicious. Main courses tend to be plainer than in Normandy, with fresh local fish being prepared with relatively simple sauces. Skate served with capers, or salmon baked with a mustard or cheese sauce, are typical dishes, while even the cotriade, a stew containing sole, turbot or bass, as well as shellfish, is distinctly less rich than its Mediterranean equivalent, the bouillabaisse. Brittany is also better than much of France in maintaining its respect for fresh vegetables, thanks to the extensive local production of peas, cauliflowers, artichokes and the like. Only with the desserts can things get a little heavy; far Breton, considered a great delicacy, is a baked concoction of sponge and custard dotted with chopped plums, while îles flottantes are soft meringue icebergs adrift in a sea of crème anglaise, a light egg custard.

Strictly speaking, no wine is produced in Brittany. However, along the lower Loire valley, the département of Loire-Atlantique, centred on Nantes, is still generally regarded as “belonging” to Brittany – and is treated as such in this chapter. Vineyards here are responsible for the dry white Muscadet – normally used in moules marinières – and the even drier Gros-Plant.

For most visitors, however, the Breton coast is the dominant feature. Apart from the Côte d'Azur, this is the most popular resort area in France, for both French and foreign tourists. Its attractions are obvious: warm white-sand beaches, towering cliffs, rock formations and offshore islands and islets, and everywhere the stone dolmens and menhirs of a prehistoric past. The most frequented areas are the Côte d'Émeraude around St-Malo; the Côte de Granit Rose in the north; the Crozon peninsula in far western Finistère; the family resorts such as Bénodet just to the south; and the Morbihan coast below Vannes. Accommodation and campsites here are plentiful, if pushed to their limits from mid-June to the end of August. Be aware, though, that out of season, many of the coastal resorts close down completely.

Whenever you come, don't leave Brittany without visiting one of its scores of islands – such as the Île de Bréhat, the Île de Sein, or Belle-Île – or taking in cities like Quimper or Morlaix, testimony to the riches of the medieval duchy. Allow time, too, to leave the coast and explore the interior, even if the price you pay for the solitude is sketchy transport and a shortage of hotels and campsites.

5

BRITTANY

Eastern Brittany and the north coast

Eastern Brittany and the north coast

All roads in Brittany curl eventually inland to Rennes, the capital, which lies a short way northeast of the legendary Forêt de Paimpont. East of Rennes, the fortified citadels of Fougères and Vitré protected the eastern approaches to medieval Brittany, which vigorously defended its independence against incursors. Along the north coast, west of Normandy's Mont St-Michel, stand some of Brittany's finest old towns. A spectacular introduction to the province greets ferry passengers from Portsmouth: the River Rance,

A Breton glossary

Estimates of the number of Breton-speakers range from 400,000 to 800,000. You may well encounter it spoken as a first, day-to-day language by the very old and the young in parts of Finistère and the Morbihan. Learning Breton is not really a viable prospect for visitors without a grounding in Welsh, Gaelic or some other Celtic language. However, as you travel through the province, it's interesting to note the roots of Breton place names, many of which have a simple meaning in the language. Below are some of the most common:

aber	estuary	lann	heath
argoad	land	lech	flat stone
armor	sea	mario	dead
avel	wind	men	stone
bihan	little	menez	(rounded) mountain
bran	hill	menhir	long stone
braz	big	meur	big
coat	forest	nevez	new
cromlech	stone circle	parc	field
dol	table	penn	end, head
dolmen	stone table	plou	parish
du	black	pors	port, farmyard
enez	island	roc'h	ridge
goaz	stream	ster	river
gwenn	white	stivel	fountain, spring
hir	long	traez henn	beach
ker	village or house	trou	valley
kozh	old	ty	house
lan	holy place	wrach	witch guarded by magnificently preserved St-Malo on its estuary, and beautiful medieval Dinan 20km upstream. Further west stretches a varied coastline that culminates in the seductive Île de Bréhat, and the colourful chaos of the Côte de Granit Rose.

Rennes

For a city that has been the capital and power centre of Brittany since the 1532 union with France, Rennes is – outwardly at least – uncharacteristic of the province, with its Neoclassical layout and pompous major buildings. What potential it had to be a picturesque tourist spot was destroyed in 1720, when a drunken carpenter managed to set light to virtually the whole city. Only the area known as Les Lices, at the junction of the canalized Ille and the River Vilaine, was undamaged. The remodelling of the rest of the city was handed over to Parisian architects, not in deference to the capital but in an attempt to rival it. The result, on the north side of the river at any rate, is something of a patchwork quilt, consisting of grand eighteenth-century public squares interspersed with intimate little alleys of half-timbered houses. It's quite a pleasant city to stroll around for half a day, but it lacks a cohesive personality.

Arrival and information

Rennes' gare SNCF (☎08.36.35.35.35) is south of the Vilaine, twenty minutes' walk from the tourist office and a little more from the medieval quarter. A fast, efficient and ultra-clean métro system (Mon–Sat 5am–12.45am, Sun 7.15am–12.45am); connects the gare SNCF, the place de la République and the place Ste-Anne, as well as other destinations of less interest to visitors. Any one-way journey costs €1.10, or you can ride all day for €3.20.

Although the gare routière stands alongside the gare SNCF on boulevard Solferino, most local buses start and finish by the canal in the heart of town, on or near place de la République. Rennes is a busy junction, with direct services to St-Malo (TIV; ☎02.99.30.87.80), and Dinan and Dinard (Armor Express or TAE; ☎02.99.26.16.00, 🌐www.illenoo.fr). Les Courriers Bretons (☎02.99.19.70.80, 🌐www.lescourriersbretons.com) run regular services to Mont St-Michel (departing Rennes' gare routière up to five times daily; €25-return), timed to connect with arriving TGVs from Paris.

The tourist office stands in a disused medieval church, the Chapelle St-Yves, just north of the river at 11 rue St-Yves (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 11am–1pm & 2–6pm; Oct–March Mon 1–6pm, Tues–Sat 10am–6pm, Sun 11am–1pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.99.67.11.11, 🌐www.tourisme-rennes.com). Internet access is available at Cybernet Online, 22 rue St-Georges (Mon 2–8pm, Tues–Fri 10.30am–8pm).

Accommodation

There are surprisingly few hotels in old Rennes. If you arrive by train or bus, it's easier to settle for staying south of the river. Contact the tourist office if you plan to spend the weekend here; under the Bon Week-end scheme (🌐www.bon-weekend-en-villes.com), you can get two nights' accommodation for the price of one.

Hotels

D'Angleterre 19 rue du Maréchal-Joffre
☎02.99.79.38.61. Unexceptional but cheap and scrupulously maintained hotel just south of the river towards the gare SNCF; all doubles have shower and TV, a full en-suite room costs €6 extra. ②

 Garden 3 rue Duhamel ☎02.99.65.45.06, 🌐www.hotgarden.fr. Comfortable, nicely decorated and very personal Logis de France, north of the gare SNCF not far from the river, with a pleasant garden café. The very cheapest rooms aren't en suite. ④

 Des Lices 7 place des Lices
☎02.99.79.14.81, 🌐www.hotel-des-lices.com. Forty-five rooms, all with TV and balcony, in a very comfortable and friendly modern hotel on the edge of the prettiest part of old Rennes, very convenient for the place des Lices car park. ④

Rocher de Cancale 10 rue St-Michel
☎02.99.79.20.83. Four-room hotel on a lively pedestrian street, between place Ste-Anne and place St-Michel, in the heart of medieval Rennes and ideally positioned for the city's nightlife. Beautifully restored frontage and ground floor, but with modern facilities upstairs. There is also a good restaurant. ③

Tour d'Auvergne 20 bd de la Tour-d'Auvergne
☎02.99.30.84.16. A very simple but welcoming option between the gare SNCF and the river. Some low-priced rooms have en-suite shower facilities, but the cheapest come only with a sink. ①

Venezia 27 rue Dupont-les-Loges
☎02.99.30.36.56, 📧hotel.venezia@orange.fr. Meticulously well-kept budget hotel, overlooking the canalized Vilaine River close to the heart of town, where the lowest-priced rooms only have a toilet, but it costs just €6 extra to get one with a shower as well. ②

Hostel and campsite

Centre International de Séjour 10–12 Canal St-Martin ☎02.99.33.22.33, ✉rennes@fuaj.org. Welcoming, attractively positioned HI hostel, 3km north of the centre beside the Canal d'Ille et Rance. Charging €16 per person per night for a dorm bed, it has a cafeteria and a laundry, and operates a 1am curfew; membership of a hostelling association is compulsory. Bus #18 runs there from the place Ste-Anne métro station, direction “St-Gregoire”. Open all year.

Camping Municipal des Gayeulles, rue de Professeur-Maurice-Audin ☎02.99.36.91.22. An appealingly verdant site 1km east of central Rennes; take bus #3. Closed Nov–March.

The City

Rennes’ surviving medieval quarter, bordered by the canal to the west and the river to the south, radiates from Porte Mordelaise, the old ceremonial entrance to the city. Just to the northeast of the porte, the place des Lices is dominated by two usually empty market halls but comes alive every Saturday for one of France’s largest street markets. The place was originally the venue for jousting tournaments, and it was on this spot in 1337 that the hitherto unknown Bertrand du Guesclin, then aged 17, fought and defeated several older opponents. This set him on his career as a soldier, during which he was to save Rennes when it was under siege by the English. However, after the Bretons were defeated at Auray in 1364, he fought for the French, and twice invaded Brittany.

The one central building to escape the 1720 fire was the Palais du Parlement on rue Hoche downtown. Ironically, however, the Palais was all but ruined by a mysterious conflagration in 1994, thought to have been sparked by a flare during a demonstration by Breton fishermen. Since then, the entire structure has been rebuilt and restored, and is once more topped by an impressive array of gleaming gilded statues. Inside, its lobby stages temporary exhibitions.

If you head south from the Palais, you’ll soon reach the River Vilaine, which flows through the centre of Rennes, narrowly confined into a steep-sided channel. The south bank is every bit as busy as, if not busier than, the north, with the Musée des Beaux-Arts at 20 quai Émile-Zola (daily except Mon 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €5.30). Unfortunately many of its finest artworks – which include drawings by Leonardo da Vinci, Botticelli, Fra Lippo Lippi and Dürer – are not usually on public display. Instead you’ll find indifferent Impressionist views of Normandy by the likes of Boudin and Sisley, interspersed with the occasional treasure.

The showpiece Musée de Bretagne, housed in the new edifice Champs Libres, 500 metres south on the cours des Alliés, provides a high-tech overview of Breton history and culture (Tues noon–9pm, Wed–Fri noon–7pm, Sat & Sun 2–7pm; €4, or €7 for museum and Espace des Sciences; 🌐www.musee-bretagne.fr). It starts at the very beginning, with a hearth used by humans in a Finistère seacave half a million years ago that ranks among the oldest signs of fire in the world. From there on, a quick, entertaining skate through regional history covers the dolmens and menhirs of the megalith builders, some magnificent jadeite axes and Bronze Age swords, and the arrival of first the Celts, next the Romans, and later still the spread of Christianity from the fifth century onwards. With labels in English as well as French and Breton, it makes a good introduction to the region, but unless some compelling temporary exhibition is on it’s not really unmissable. Under the same roof, and sharing the same hours and entrance fees, the Espace des Sciences is a peculiar sort of scaly volcano that contains two floors of rather dry scientific displays, this time with no English captions.

Eating and drinking

Most of Rennes' more interesting bars and restaurants are in the streets just south of the place Ste-Anne, towards the place des Lices, with rues St-Michel and Penhoët, each with a fine assemblage of ancient wooden buildings, as the epicentre. Ethnic alternatives are concentrated along rue St-Malo just to the north, and also on rue St-Georges near the place du Palais. Rue Vasselot is the nearest equivalent south of the river.

One of the city's favourite bars is the Barantic at 4 rue St-Michel, which puts on occasional live music for a mixed crowd of Breton nationalists and boisterous students; if you don't like the look of it, or it's too full, there are half a dozen similar alternatives within spitting distance. Live jazz and other gigs take place at Déjazey Jazz Club, 54 rue St-Malo (☎02.99.38.70.72; closed Sun).

Crêperie Ste-Anne 5 place Ste-Anne
☎02.99.79.22.72. Appealing crêperie on the place Ste-Anne opposite the church, with plenty of outdoor seating and a good selection of galettes for around €5. Closed Sun.

Le Khalifa 20 haut de la place des Lices ☎02.99.30.87.30. Assorted Moroccan dishes, served outside or in an atmospheric dining room. Couscous and brochettes from €9.95, tagine €11.50, as well as various set formules. Closed all Mon, & Tues lunch.

Leon le Cochon 1 rue Maréchal-Joffre
☎02.99.79.37.54. Tasteful, contemporary but classically French restaurant, where the simple lunch menu costs just €11.50, but it's best to reserve to enjoy dinner menus that range up to €37. Closed Sun in July & Aug.

Le Maquis 13 rue St-Malo ☎02.99.63.83.06. Very lively, friendly African restaurant, serving lots of Senegalese marinated chicken and fish dishes for around €9, plus a €16.50 vegetarian set menu. Dinner only. Closed Mon.

Le Navira 39 rue St-Georges ☎02.99.38.88.90. Simple, welcoming French restaurant with outdoor seating on a busy semi-pedestrian alley east of the Palais du Parlement, offering good-value lunch (€14.60) and dinner (€19.10) menus. Closed Sun & Mon.

L'Ouvrée 18 place des Lices
☎02.99.30.16.38. Formal but very friendly gourmet restaurant, spread through two dining rooms decorated in warm reds and yellows. Menus range from €14.50 to €32, and feature small but tasty portions with an emphasis on fish, as for example with the fian de langoustines, plus wonderful desserts. Closed Sat lunch, Sun eve & Mon.

Les Tontons Voyageurs 4 av Janvier
☎02.99.30.09.20. Lively, eclectic place that incorporates a piano bar and a cigar room, and puts on live music, while also serving inexpensive, high-quality brasserie lunches, and dinner menus up to €29.50. Closed Sat lunch, all Sun, & Mon eve.

Festivals and theatre

Rennes is at its best in the first ten days of July, when the Festival des Tombées de la Nuit celebrates Breton culture with music, theatre, film, mime and poetry (☎02.99.32.56.56, 🌐www.lestdnuit.com). In the first week of December, the Transmusicales rock festival attracts big-name acts from all over France and the world at large, while retaining a Breton emphasis (☎02.99.31.12.10, 🌐www.lestrans.com). The Théâtre National de Bretagne, 1 rue St-Helier (☎02.99.31.12.31, 🌐www.t-n-b.fr), puts on varied events throughout the year, except in August. All year round, in a different auditorium on the same premises, Club Ubu (☎02.99.31.12.00, 🌐www.ubu-rennes.com) puts on large-scale gigs.

The Forêt de Paimpont

Thirty kilometres west of Rennes, the Forêt de Paimpont, known also by its ancient name of Brocéliande, is – according to song and legend – the forest of the wizard Merlin. Medieval Breton minstrels, like their Welsh counterparts, set the tales of King Arthur and the Holy Grail both in Grande Bretagne and here in Petite Bretagne. For all the magic of these shared legends, however, and a succession of likely sites, few people come out here.

Roaming around for a day is easy, with MAURON, reachable by bus from Rennes, making a good place to start. From the hamlet of Folle Pensée, just south, a circuitous but enjoyable twenty-minute walk leads to La Fontaine de Barenton – Merlin's spring. The path leads off from the end of the road at Folle Pensée, turning to the right, running through pines and gorse to a junction of forest tracks: here, take the track straight ahead for about 100m, where an unobvious path to the left goes into the woods and turns back north to the spring – walled, and filled by the most delicious water imaginable. After drinking, stroke the great stone slab beside the spring to call up a storm, roaring lions and a horseman in black armour. Here Merlin first set eyes on Vivianne, who bound him willingly in a prison of air.

The Fountain of Eternal Youth is hidden nearby and accessible only to the pure in heart. Another forest walk, more scenic but without a goal, is the Val sans Retour (the Valley of No Return), off the GR37 from Tréhorenteuc to La Guette. The path to follow leads out from the D141 just south of Tréhorenteuc to a steep valley from which exits are barred by thickets of gorse and giant furze on the rocks above; at one point it skirts an overgrown table of rock, the Rocher des Faux Amants (Rock of the False Lovers), from which the seductress Morgane le Fay supposedly enticed unwary boys.

Practicalities

The bus from Rennes to Guer runs twice a day past the southern edge of the forest, stopping at Forges-les-Paimpont, while another bus runs around the north corner to Mauron – again twice a day. Information on the forest can be picked up from the tourist office next to the lakeside abbey in the little market village of PAIMPONT (Feb–June & Sept–Dec Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm; July & Aug daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎02.99.07.84.23). Paimpont makes the most obvious base for explorations: it's right at the centre of the woods, and has some excellent accommodation. At the 🐾 Relais de Brocéliande in town, 7 rue des Forges (☎02.99.07.84.94, 🌐www.le-relais-de-broceliande.fr; 🍷), a flower-bedecked delight, you can fill up for €26.50, or much more, in the restaurant under the gaze of stuffed animal heads. There's also a two-star municipal campsite on the edge of the village (☎02.97.07.89.16; closed Oct–April). Other accommodation in the forest includes a gîte d'étape-cum-chambre d'hôte in tiny Trudeau on the D40 (☎02.99.07.81.40; dorm beds €9.70, B&B 🍷) and a lovely hostel, at Le Choucan-en-Brocéliande, 5km out on the Concoret road (☎02.97.22.76.75; dorm beds €9.70; closed mid-Sept to May).

The frontier towns

If you're entering Brittany by road from Normandy, Maine or Le Mans, you're likely to pass through or close to Fougères, Vitré and Dol-de-Bretagne, all of which were, at one time or another, heavily fortified strategic sites.

Fougères and its forest

The topography of FOUGÈRES, which lies on the main Caen–Rennes road, is impossible to grasp from a map; streets that look a few metres long turn out to be precipitous plunges down the escarpments of its split-levelled site, and lanes collapse into flights of steps. The dominant feature is the town's robust château, built well below the level of the main part of town, on a low spit of land that separates, and is towered over by, two mighty rock faces. Its massive and seemingly impregnable bulk is protected by great curtain walls growing out of the rock, and encircled by a hacked-out moat full of weirs and waterfalls – none of which prevented its repeated capture by such medieval adventurers as du Guesclin.

The best approach to the castle is from place des Arbres beside St-Léonard's church off the main street of the old fortified town. Footpaths, ramps and stairways drop down through formal gardens, offering magnificent views of the ramparts along the way, to reach the meadows beside the River Nançon, which you cross beside a little cluster of medieval houses. Sadly, however, the interior of the château fails to live up to its compelling exterior; instead the hourly château tours place a rather deadening emphasis on the local shoe industry (daily: April to mid-June & last two weeks of Sept 9.30am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-June to mid-Sept 9am–7pm; Oct–Dec, Feb & March 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €3.60).

Fougères' tourist office, at 1 place Aristide-Briand, provides copious information on all aspects of the town and local countryside (Easter–June, Sept & Oct Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 1.30–5.30pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–4pm; Nov–Easter Mon 2–6pm, Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.99.94.12.20, 🌐www.ot-fougeres.fr). The 🏠 Hôtel des Voyageurs, nearby at 10 place Gambetta (☎02.99.99.08.20, 🌐www.hotel-voyageurs-fougeres.com; 📍; closed second fortnight in Aug), is a rambling old town house with some good, comfortable rooms, and has a separate but excellent restaurant downstairs (closed Sat lunch & Sun dinner). There are no hotels in the immediate vicinity of the château, but the squares on all sides are crammed with an abundance of appealing bars and crêperies. At Le Medieval (☎02.99.94.92.59), which has lots of outdoor seating beside the moat, you can snack on moules-frites or crêpes, or get a full dinner from €17.

Vitré

VITRÉ, just north of the Le Mans–Rennes motorway, 30km east of Rennes, rivals Dinan as the best-preserved medieval town in Brittany. While its walls are not quite complete, the thickets of medieval stone cottages that lie outside them have hardly changed. The towers of the castle, which dominates the western end of the ramparts, have pointed slate-grey roofs in best fairy-tale fashion, looking like freshly sharpened pencils, but sadly the municipal offices and museum of shells, birds, bugs and local history inside are not exactly thrilling (May–Sept daily 10am–12.45pm & 2–6pm; Oct–April Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–12.15pm & 2–5.30pm, Sun 2–5.30pm; €4).

Vitré is a market town rather than an industrial centre, with its principal market held on Mondays in the square in front of Notre-Dame church. The old city is full of twisting streets of half-timbered houses, a good proportion of which are bars – rue Beaudrairie in particular has a fine selection.

The local gare SNCF is on the southern edge of the centre, where the ramparts have disappeared and the town blends into its newer sectors. Just across the square from the station you'll find the tourist office (July & Aug daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–7pm; Sept–June Mon 2.30–6pm, Tues–Fri 9.30am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm, Sat 10am–12.30pm & 3–5pm; ☎02.99.75.04.46, 🌐www.ot-vitre.fr). Most of the hotels are nearby. The Petit Billot, 5bis place du Général-Leclerc (☎02.99.75.02.10, 🌐www.petit-billot.com; 📍), is good value, while rooms on the higher floors of the Hôtel du Château, 5 rue Rallon (☎02.99.74.58.59; 📍; closed Sun in low season), on a quiet road just below the castle, have views of the ramparts. Of the restaurants, Le St-Yves, immediately below the castle at 1 place St-Yves (☎02.99.74.68.76; closed all Mon eve, plus Tues, Thurs & Sun eves), serves menus from €17 to €28, while La Soupe aux Choux, a little higher up at 32 rue Notre-Dame (☎02.99.75.10.86; closed Sat lunch, plus Sun in low season), prepares simple but classic French food, with a duo of frogs' legs and pork for example costing €12.

Dol-de-Bretagne and around

During the Middle Ages, DOL-DE-BRETAGNE, 30km west of Mont St-Michel, was an important bishopric. It no longer has a bishop, though its huge granite cathedral endures, with its strange, squat, tiled towers. The ambitious CathédralOscope (April–Oct daily 10am–7pm; rest of the year consult tourist office; €7.50), in the cathedral square, sets out to explain the construction and significance of medieval cathedrals in general, but for all its high-tech presentation and flair, non-French-speakers may well find it rather heavy going.

Dol still has a few streets packed with venerable buildings, most notably its central axis, the pretty Grande-Rue, where one Romanesque edifice dates back as far as the eleventh century, alongside an assortment of 500-year-old half-timbered houses that look down on the bustle of shoppers below.

All approaches to Dol from the bay are guarded by the former island of Mont Dol, now eight rather marshy kilometres in from the sea. This abrupt granite outcrop was the legendary site of a battle between the Archangel Michael and the Devil. Fancifully named indentations in the rock, such as the “Devil’s Claw”, testify to the savagery of their encounter, which as usual the Devil lost. The site has been occupied since prehistoric times – flint implements have been unearthed alongside the bones of mammoths, sabre-toothed tigers and even rhinoceroses. Later on, it appears to have been used for worship by the druids, before becoming, like Mont St-Michel, an island monastery, all traces of which have long vanished. You can drive to the top from the attractive little village at the foot of the hill, or it makes a pleasant climb on foot. Just below the summit, the lawns of a crêperie-cum-bar hold crowds of summer day-trippers. A little further up, there’s a tiny chapel, while the peak itself is crowned by a granite tower topped by a white statue of the Madonna and child. Ascending the 55 tight little spiral steps within brings you to a platform commanding immense views across the surrounding pancake-flat plains.

There’s not a great deal to keep casual visitors in Dol. However, the tourist office, at 3 Grande-Rue (June & Sept Mon 2–6pm, Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Fri 9.30am–7pm, Sat & Sun 9.30am–1pm & 2–7pm; Oct–May Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.99.48.15.37, 🌐www.pays-de-dol.com), can direct you eastwards to a reasonable hotel, the Bretagne, next to the market at 17 place Chateaubriand (☎02.99.48.02.03; 📍; closed Oct), where rooms at the back look out across a vestige of ramparts towards Mont Dol; menus vary from €11.50 to €28. The best campsite in the area is the luxurious Castel-Camping des Ormes (☎02.99.73.53.00, 🌐www.lesormes.com; closed mid-Sept to mid-May), set around a lake 6km south towards Combourg on the N795, which offers horse-riding, golf and even cricket.

A couple of nice fish restaurants stand opposite each other in the ancient houses on rue Ceinte, as it winds its way from Grande-Rue to the Cathedral: Le Porche au Pain at no. 1 (☎02.99.48.37.57; closed Wed in low season), and La Grabotais at no. 4 (☎02.99.48.19.89; closed Mon, plus Sun eve in low season).

old citadelle than to the ferry terminal that's tucked into the harbour behind. From outside the walls, the dignified ensemble of the old city might seem stern and forbidding, but passing through into the intra-muros ("within the walls") streets brings you into a busy, lively and very characterful town, packed with hotels, restaurants, bars and shops. Yes, the summer crowds can be oppressive, but even then a stroll atop the ramparts should restore your equilibrium, while the presence of vast, clean beaches right on the city's doorstep is a very big bonus if you're travelling with kids in tow. Having to spend a night here before or after a ferry crossing is a positive pleasure – so long as you take the trouble to reserve accommodation in advance.

Arrival and information

St-Malo is always busy with boats. From the Terminal Ferry du Naye, Brittany Ferries (☎02.99.40.64.41, 🌐www.brittanyferries.com) sails to Portsmouth, while Condor Ferries (☎02.99.20.03.00, 🌐www.condorferries.co.uk) connects with both Weymouth (via Jersey or Guernsey) and Poole during spring and summer; for details, see p.31. Between April and early November, regular passenger ferries to Dinard operate from the quai Dinan, just outside the westernmost point of the ramparts (Compagnie Corsaire; ☎08.25.13.80.35, 🌐www.compagniecorsaire.com; €4 single, €6 return, bikes €4.50 or €7.50 return); the trip across the estuary takes an all-too-short ten minutes.

Though almost all St-Malo buses, whether local or long-distance, coincide also with trains at the gare SNCF – 2km out from the citadelle, set back from square Jean-Coquelin, and convenient neither for the old town nor the ferry – the gare routière is officially an expanse of concrete right in front of the city walls, beside the Bassin Duguay-Trouin in the Port des Yachts. The two main regional bus companies both have ticket offices here. Tourisme Verney act as agents for the Compagnie de Transport d'Ille et Vilaine (TIV; ☎02.99.82.26.26), which run services to Dinard, Dinan, Cancale, Combourg (not in July and August) and Rennes. Les Courriers Bretons (☎02.99.19.70.80, 🌐www.lescourriersbretons.com), go to Cancale, Mont St-Michel, Dol and Fougères. In summer, they also operate a complicated schedule of day-trips and half-day trips to destinations including Mont St-Michel, Dinan, Cap Fréhel and the Île de Bréhat.

St-Malo's helpful tourist office is alongside the gare routière (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7.30pm, Sun 10am–6pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; ☎08.25.13.52.00, 🌐www.saint-malo-tourisme.com). For Internet access, head to Cop' Inprim, just west of the gare SNCF at 29bis bd des Talards (Mon–Fri 9am–7pm, Sat 9am–noon; ☎02.99.56.05.83; 🌐www.cybermalo.com).

Bicycles can be rented from Les Velos Bleus, 19 rue Alphonse-Thébault (☎02.99.40.31.63, 🌐www.velos-bleus.fr), or Espace Nicole, 11–13 rue Robert-Schuman, Paramé (☎02.99.56.11.06, 🌐www.cyclesnicole.com).

Accommodation

St-Malo boasts over a hundred hotels, including the seaside boarding houses just off the beach, along with several campsites and a hostel – in high season it needs every one of them. If you plan to stay the night before catching a summer ferry, it's best to make a reservation well in advance.

You pay a premium to stay within the city walls, since that's where any night-life takes place, and it's a fair walk in through the docks from the surrounding suburbs. Unfortunately, the intra-muros hotels tend to take advantage of high summer demand by insisting that you eat in their own restaurants. Cheaper rates can be found by the gare SNCF, or in suburban Paramé (bus #2 or #5), but it's hardly worth being away from the citadelle for the sake of saving a few euros. The hostel is notoriously busy, while the four municipal campsites also tend to be full in July and August.

Hotels in the citadelle

Bristol Union 4 place de la Poissonnerie
☎ 02.99.40.83.36, 🌐 www.hotel-bristol-union.com. Tall hotel, equipped with a lift, in a quiet little square facing the former fish market, just off the Grande Rue, which offers unexciting but acceptable modernized rooms, some very small. 4

De France et de Chateaubriand place Chateaubriand ☎ 02.99.56.66.52, 🌐 www.hotel-fr-chateaubriand.com. Elegant rooms at surprisingly reasonable prices in the imposing birthplace of the writer Chateaubriand, approached via a courtyard from the main square. Higher rooms have sea views; breakfast is €10 and parking €12. 6

Le Nautilus 9 rue de la Corne de Cerf
☎ 02.99.40.42.27, 🌐 www.lenautilus.com. Colourfully refitted, totally non-smoking hotel (with a lift) not far in from the Porte St-Vincent, offering small but good-value and bright rooms, all with shower and TV. 4

Port-Malo 15 rue Ste-Barbe ☎ 02.99.20.52.99. Eleven small but clean and en-suite rooms – above a nice old-fashioned bar, so go for the higher floors – with friendly and helpful management. No restaurant. 6

Porte St-Pierre 2 place du Guet
☎ 02.99.40.91.27. Comfortable Logis de France, peeping out to sea over the walls of the citadelle, near the small Porte St-Pierre. There's one cheaper single room, with no shower. Predominantly fish-based dinner menus, in the separate restaurant across the alley (closed Thurs lunch & all Tues), run from €26 upwards. Closed mid-Nov to Jan. 4

 San Pedro 1 rue Ste-Anne
☎ 02.99.40.88.57, 🌐 www.sanpedro-hotel.com. Twelve compact but stylishly refurbished rooms in a nice quiet setting, just inside the walls in the north of the citadelle. Rooms on the higher floors (reached via a minuscule lift) enjoy sea views, and cost around €10 extra. No smoking. Closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb. 4

Aux Vieilles Pierres 9 rue Thévenard
☎ 02.99.56.46.80. Six-room hotel, near place aux Herbes, which remains one of the better bargains within the walls, even if a room with a shower costs €16 extra. Menus at the restaurant cost €24 or €32. Open all year. 2–6

Hotels outside the walls

Le Beaufort 25 chaussée du Sillon, Coutouville
☎ 02.99.40.99.99, 🌐 www.hotel-beaufort.com. Grand sea-view hotel, 30min walk from the citadelle, with beautifully restored rooms – some with lovely balconies – and a good restaurant. 5–8

De l'Europe 44 bd de la République
☎ 02.99.56.13.42, 🌐 www.hotels-st-malo.com/europe. Year-round cheap but clean rooms (the cheaper ones don't have en-suite facilities) in a genuinely friendly (if noisy) hotel near the gare SNCF, with a cosy café serving breakfast for €5.50. 1–3

La Rance 15 quai Sébastopol, St-Servan
☎ 02.99.81.78.63, 🌐 www.larancehotel.com. Small, tasteful option in sight of the Tour Solidor, with eleven spacious rooms and a much more tranquil atmosphere than St-Malo itself. 4

Hostel and campsites

Centre Patrick Varangot 37 av du Père-Umbricht, Paramé ☎ 02.99.40.29.80, 🌐 www.centrevarangot.com. Dominated as a rule by lively young travellers, this is one of France's busiest hostels, 2km northeast of the gare SNCF in the suburb of Paramé, not far from the beach. Dorm beds from €16.20 including breakfast April–Sept, €15.25 Oct–March; hostelling association membership required. Rates include breakfast, and there's also a cut-price cafeteria, as well as kitchen facilities and tennis courts. No curfew, open all year.

La Cité d'Aleth allée Gaston Buy, St-Servan
☎ 02.99.81.60.91. By far the nearest campsite to the citadelle, in a dramatic location on the headland southwest of St-Malo, overlooking the city from within the wartime German fortified stronghold. Closed Nov–April.

Les Ilôts av de la Guimorais, Rothéneuf
☎ 02.99.56.98.72. Green little site, located five minutes' walk inland from either of two crescent beaches, roughly 5km east of the citadelle. Closed Sept–June.

Le Nicet av de la Varde, Rothéneuf
☎ 02.99.40.26.32. Right on the coast, by the Pointe de Nicet, just beyond the headland that marks the eastern limit of Paramé. Closed Oct–May.

Les Nielles av John-Kennedy, Paramé
☎ 02.99.40.26.35. On the beach at the smaller of Paramé's strands, the plage du Minich, just a short walk from the town's facilities. Closed Sept–June.

The Town

The citadelle of St-Malo, very much the prime destination for visitors, was for many years joined to the mainland only by a long causeway, before the original line of the coast was hidden for ever by the construction of the harbour basin. Although its streets of restored seventeenth- and eighteenth-century houses can be crowded to the point of absurdity in summer, away from the more popular thoroughfares random exploration is fun.

Owing to the limitations of space, buildings within the walls tend to be higher-rise than you might expect. Ancient as they look, they are almost entirely reconstructed; following the two-week bombardment that forced the German surrender in 1944, eighty percent of the city had to be lovingly and precisely rebuilt, stone by stone. Beneath grey skies, the narrow lanes can appear sombre, even grim, but in high summer or at sunset they become light and almost unreal. In any case, you can always surface on the ramparts – first erected in the fourteenth century – to enjoy wonderful all-round views.

Besides the prominent Grande Porte, the main gate of the citadelle is the Porte St-Vincent. To the right is the town's castle, which houses the Musée de la Ville (April–Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–March Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €5). The museum is something of a hymn of praise to the “prodigious prosperity” enjoyed by St-Malo during its days of piracy, colonialism and slave trading. Climbing the 169 steps of the castle keep, you pass a fascinating mixture of maps, diagrams and exhibits – chilling handbills from the Nazi occupation, accounts of the “infernal machine” used by the English to blow up the port in 1693, and savage four-pronged chasse-trappes (a kind of early version of barbed wire), thrown by pirates onto the decks of ships being boarded to immobilize their crews.

You can pass under the ramparts at several points to reach the open shore, where a huge beach stretches away east beyond the rather featureless resort-suburb of Paramé. When the tide is low, it's safe to walk out to the small island of Grand-Bé – the walk is so popular that sometimes you even need to queue to get onto the short causeway. Solemn warnings are posted of the dangers of attempting to return from the island when the tide has risen too far – if you're caught there, there you have to stay. The island's “sight” is the tomb of the nineteenth-century writer-politician Chateaubriand (1768–1848).

The St-Servan district, within walking distance along the cornice south of the citadelle, was the city's original settlement, converted to Christianity by St Malou (or Maclou) in the sixth century; later, in the twelfth century, the townspeople moved to the impregnable island now called St-Malo. St-Servan curves round several small inlets and beaches to face the river. It's dominated by the distinctive Tour Solidor, which consists of three linked towers built in 1382, and in cross-section looks just like an ace of clubs. Originally known in Breton as the Steir Dor, or “gate of the river”, it now holds a museum of Cape Horn clipper ships, open for ninety-minute guided visits (April–Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–March Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €5). Most of the great European explorers of the Pacific are covered, from Magellan onwards, but naturally the emphasis is on French heroes like Bougainville. Tours culminate with a superb view from the topmost ramparts.

If you follow the main road due south from St-Servan, ignoring signs for the Barrage de la Rance – or take bus #5 from the gare SNCF – you'll come to the Grand Aquarium, on a roundabout high above town (daily: April–June & Sept 10am–7pm; first two weeks in July & second two weeks in Aug 9.30am–8pm; mid-July to mid-Aug 9.30am–10pm; Oct–March 10am–6pm as a rule, but wide variations day by day, with some closures Nov–Jan; last admission one hour before closing; €13.90, under-18s €9.90; ☎ 02.99.21.19.00, 🌐 www.aquarium-st-malo.com). The postmodern aquarium itself can be bewildering at first, but it's an entertaining place where you can either learn interesting facts about slimy monsters of the deep or simply pull faces back at them. Its eight distinct fish tanks include one shaped so that visitors stand in the hole in the middle as myriad fish whirl around them. St-Malo's other aquarium, the logically named Petit Aquarium, set into the walls of the old city, is much less interesting.

For last-minute shopping, St-Malo's citadelle contains a few specialists, and there's a Carrefour hypermarket near the aquarium on the southern outskirts of town. Markets are held in the Halle au Blé within the walls of St-Malo on Tuesdays and Fridays, in St-Servan on Mondays and Fridays, and in Paramé on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Eating

Intra-muros St-Malo boasts even more restaurants than hotels, with a long crescent lining the inside of the ramparts between the Porte St-Vincent and the Grande Porte. Prices are probably higher than anywhere else in Brittany, however, especially on the open café terraces – the demand is inflated by day-trippers and ferry passengers having last-night blowouts. Bear in mind that most of the crêperies also serve moules and similar quasi-snacks. All the restaurants listed below are in the citadelle.

Borgnefesse 10 rue du Puits aux Braies
☎ 02.99.40.05.05. This pirate-themed place offers good solid French cooking, even though it feels more like the tavern it used to be than a restaurant. A two-course meal costs €18, a three-course one €22. Closed Sun all day & Mon lunch.

Le Brick 5 rue Jacques-Cartier ☎ 02.99.40.18.88. Perhaps the best of the many seafood restaurants set into the walls near the Grande Porte, with a €14.50 menu that offers fish soup or "big size winkles" followed by skate, and more lavish options up to €33. Closed Mon.

Le Chasse Marée 4 rue Grout de St-Georges
☎ 02.99.40.85.10. Nautical decor and haute cuisine, just round the corner from the post office, with a few tables out on the quiet street and more upstairs. For €16 you get a simple lunch, for €22 a rich fish soup followed by a choice of entrees, and for €35 an opulent fish menu featuring scallops with langoustines. Closed Sat lunch, all Sun, & Mon lunch.

Le Corps de Garde 3 montée Notre-Dame
☎ 02.99.40.91.46. The only restaurant that's right up on St-Malo's ramparts is unfortunately an ordinary crêperie, serving standard €3.50–8.50 crêpes. However, the views from its large open-air terrace are sensational, looking out over the beach to the myriad little islets.

Duchesse Anne 5–7 place Guy-la-Chambre
☎ 02.99.40.85.33. Situated right next to the Porte St-Vincent, the best known of St-Malo's upmarket restaurants continues to work hard to keep up its reputation – and its prices. The only set menu is a €70 lobster option; you might manage to get a lunch for under €20, but dinner will cost well over twice that. Whole baked fish is the main speciality, with an entire turbotin costing €131 for four diners. Closed Wed & Mon lunch, Sun eve in low season, plus all Dec & Jan.

Restaurant Gilles 2 rue de la Pie-qui-Boit
☎ 02.99.40.97.25. Bright, modern, good-value restaurant, just off the central pedestrian axis. The basic €19.20 menu is fine; alternatively, €22.50 brings you oysters or mussel soup and a rabbit cuissot with cider. Closed Wed.

Hôtel-Restaurant de l'Univers 10 place Chateaubriand ☎ 02.99.40.89.52. At this hotel restaurant, which offers the option of eating at tables out on the square opposite the château, you can have mussels followed by a cheese and ham crêpe for just €9, or get a full vegetarian menu for €16.50.

The Pointe du Grouin and Cancale

Along the coast east of St-Malo is the Pointe du Grouin, a perilous and windy height which offers spectacular views of the pinnacle of Mont St-Michel and the bird sanctuary of the Îles des Landes to the east. Just south of the pointe, and less than 15km from St-Malo across the peninsula, CANCALE is renowned for its oysters. In the old church of St-Méen at the top of the hill, the town's obsession is documented with meticulous precision by the small Musée des Arts et Traditions Populaires (June & Sept Mon & Fri–Sun 2.30–6.30pm; July & Aug Mon 2.30–6.30pm, Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2.30–6.30pm; €4). Cancale oysters were found in the camps of Julius Caesar, taken daily to Versailles for Louis XIV and even accompanied Napoleon on the march to Moscow.

△ Oysters, Cancale

From the rue des Parcs next to the jetty of the port, you can see at low tide the parcs where the oysters are grown. The rocks of the cliff behind are streaked and shiny like mother-of-pearl; underfoot the beach is littered with countless generations of empty shells. The port area is very pretty and very smart, with a long line of upmarket glass-fronted hotels and restaurants. Cancale's hotels mostly insist that you eat in if you want to stay; among the best value are 🌟 La Houle, with its highly desirable balconies overlooking the middle of the port at 18 quai Gambetta (☎02.99.89.62.38; 📍), and Le Phare, above its own restaurant at 6 quai Thomas (☎02.99.89.60.24; 📍; closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb, restaurant closed Wed, plus Thurs in low season). Budget travellers can head instead for the hostel 2km north of town at Port Picain (☎02.99.89.62.62, 📧cancale@fuaj.org; closed Jan), where a dorm bed costs €12.50. 🌟 Au Pied de Cheval, 10 quai Gambetta (☎02.99.89.76.95), is a ramshackle, gloriously atmospheric little place to sample a few oysters, with great baskets of them spread across its wooden quayside tables. A dozen raw oysters on a bed of seaweed can cost just €5.

Dinan

The wonderful citadel of DINAN has preserved almost intact its three-kilometre encirclement of protective masonry, with street upon colourful street of late medieval houses within. Like St-Malo, just 25km to the north, it's best seen when arriving by boat up the River Rance, which allows you to appreciate its castle and fortifications to their best advantage. Behind the houses on the left bank quay where the boats tie up, a steep and cobbled street with fields and bramble thickets on either side climbs up to the thirteenth-century ramparts, partly hidden by trees.

Arrival, information and accommodation

Both the Art Deco gare SNCF and the gare routière (☎02.96.39.21.05) are in the rather gloomy modern quarter, on place du 11-Novembre, ten minutes' walk west of the walled town. The tourist office can be found at the southwest corner of the place du Guesclin, at 9 rue du Château (mid-June to mid-Sept Mon-Sat 9am-7pm, Sun 10am-12.30pm & 2.30-6pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Mon-Sat 9am-12.30pm & 2-6pm; ☎02.96.87.69.76, 🌐www.dinan-tourisme.com). Internet access is available at Zonzon.com, just outside the walled town at 9 rue des Rouairies (☎02.96.87.95.86, 🌐www.zonzon.com.fr).

Between mid-April and late September, boats along the Rance sail between the port downstream and Dinard and St-Malo. The trip takes two hours 45 minutes, with the exact schedule varying according to the tides (adults €20, under-13s €12). It's only possible to do a day return by boat (adults €26, under-13s €15.50) if you start from St-Malo or Dinard; starting from Dinan, you'd have to come back by bus or train. For details, contact Compagnie Corsaire on the quai de la Rance (☎08.25.13.81.20, 🌐www.compagniecorsaire.com).

Dinan has a surprising shortage of the kind of welcoming mid-range hotel-restaurant accommodation that characterizes so many Breton towns, so if that's what you're looking for you might do best to visit only as a day-trip. There are, however, plenty of budget options including a hostel, and a couple of boutique hotels if you're after something a little classier.

Hotels and B&Bs

D'Avaugour 1 place du Champ ☎02.96.39.07.49, 🌐www.avaugourhotel.com. Smart, elegant hotel, entered from the main square but backing onto the ramparts, with very tasteful renovated rooms and lovely gardens. ⑦

Le Challenge 29 place du Guesclin ☎02.96.87.16.30, 🌐www.lechallenge.fr.st. Modernized rooms, many with balconies, above a good brasserie (see p.428) and overlooking Dinan's main square. ④

Harlequin 8 rue du quai Talard ☎02.96.39.68.68. Distinguished old building in a lovely setting just across the Rance, offering pleasant rooms with and without en-suite facilities, including some very well-priced family suites. They also serve reasonable French cooking on a terrace overlooking the river, for €14.50 and up. ②–⑤

 Logis de Jerzual 25–27 rue du Petit Fort ☎02.96.85.46.54, 🌐www.logis-du-gerzual.com. Chambres d'hôtes halfway up the exquisite little lane that leads from the port. The five rooms have wonderful character, with four-poster beds, modern bathrooms and romantic views over the rooftops. The house is surrounded by a lovely garden terrace and the friendly owner serves tasty breakfasts. ⑤

De la Porte St-Malo 35 rue St-Malo ☎02.96.39.19.76, 🌐www.hotelportemalo.com. Very comfortable rooms in a tasteful small hotel just outside the walls, beyond the Porte St-Malo. ③

Du Théâtre 2 rue Ste-Claire ☎02.96.39.06.91. Nine basic rooms above a bar, right by the Théâtre des Jacobins; the cheapest come only with a sink, but even those with en-suite bathrooms still cost under €30. Run by the same efficient management as the nearby Restaurant Cantorbery (see below). ①

Hostel and campsite

HI hostel Moulin de Méen, Vallée de la Fontaine-des-Eaux ☎02.96.39.10.83, 🌐dinan@fuaj.org. Attractive, rural hostel, set in green fields below the town centre. Unfortunately it's not on any bus route: to walk there, follow the quay downstream from the port on the town side. Dorm bed €11.50, and camping is permitted in the grounds. Closed Jan.

Camping Municipal 103 rue Châteauaubriand ☎02.96.39.11.96. Just outside the western ramparts. Closed late Sept to late May.

The Town

For all its slightly unreal perfection, Dinan is not excessively overrun with tourists. There are no great museums; the monument is the town itself, and time is best spent wandering from crêperie to café, admiring overhanging houses along the way. Unfortunately, you can only walk along one small stretch of the ramparts, from the Jardin Anglais behind St-Sauveur church to a point just short of Tour Sillon overlooking the river. You can get a good general overview from the Tour de l'Horloge, dating from the end of the fifteenth century (daily: April–June & Sept 2–6pm; July & Aug 10am–6.30pm; €2.75).

St-Sauveur church, very much the town's focus, is a real mixture of ages, with a Romanesque porch and an eighteenth-century steeple. Even its nine Gothic chapels feature five different patterns of vaulting in no symmetrical order, and the most complex pair, in the centre, would make any spider proud. A cenotaph contains the heart of Bertrand du Guesclin, the fourteenth-century Breton warrior (and later Constable of France), who fought and won a single combat with the English knight Thomas of Canterbury, in what is now place du Guesclin, to settle the outcome of the siege of Dinan in 1364.

North of the church, rue du Jerzual leads down to the gate of the same name and on down (as rue du Petit-Fort) to the lovely port du Dinan. Here the river is sufficiently narrow to be spanned by a small but majestic old stone bridge, and artisans' shops and restaurants line the quay.

As you might guess from its blending of two separate towers, the fourteenth-century keep that once protected the town's southern approach was built by Estienne Le Tour, architect of St-Malo's Tour Solidor (see p.423). Now known as the Château de Duchesse Anne, it offers visitors access to both towers (daily: June–Sept 10am–6.30pm; Oct–Dec & Feb–May 1.30–5.30pm; €4.20). The keep itself, or donjon, consists of four storeys, each of which holds an unexpected hotch-potch of items, including two big old looms and assorted Greek and Etruscan perfume jars; at ground level, well below the walls, there's a slender, closed drawbridge. Nearby, the ancient Tour Coëtquen is all but empty, though if you descend the spiral staircase to its waterlogged bottom floor, you'll find a group of stone fifteenth-century notables resembling some medieval time capsule, about to depetrify at any moment.

On the third weekend of July, every other (even-numbered) year, the Fête des Remparts is celebrated with medieval-style jousting, banquets, fairs and processions, culminating in an immense fireworks display. There's a market every Thursday in the places du Champ and du Guesclin (the original medieval fairground).

Eating and drinking

All sorts of specialist restaurants, including several ethnic alternatives, are tucked away in the old streets of Dinan. Stroll of an evening through the town and down to the port, and you'll pass at least twenty places. For bars, explore the series of tiny parallel alleyways between place des Merciers and rue de Marchix. Along rue de la Cordonnerie, the busiest of the lot, the various hang-outs define themselves by their taste in music: À la Truye qui File at no. 14 is a contemporary folk Breton dive, while Lulu Berlu, next door at no. 12 (closed Sun & Mon), and Chez Maryvonne at no. 7, are considerably more raucous.

Brasserie Longueville 29 place du Guesclin ☎02.96.87.16.39. Sizeable brasserie adjoining the Challonge hotel (see p.426) with lots of open-air tables facing the main square. A good two-course lunch costs just €9.20, while full menus go up to €32.

Le Cantorbery 6 rue Ste-Claire ☎02.96.39.02.52. Reasonable food served in an old stone house with rafters, a spiral staircase and a real wood fire. Lunch from €12, while traditional dinner menus start with a good €24 option that includes fish soup and roast lamb. Closed Sun eve & Wed in low season.

Le Chablis 7 rue du Quai, port du Dinan ☎02.96.39.40.17. Large but attractive waterfront restaurant down by the port, which serves a wide range of traditional French cuisine; menus start with an €15.50 option that offers oysters followed by mussels or bream. They also have great seafood platters, and their own wine bar. Closed Sun eve & Mon.

Chez La Mère Pourcel 3 place des Merciers ☎02.96.39.03.80. Beautiful half-timbered fifteenth-century house in the central square. Good à la carte options are served all day, while the dinner menus (€18–33) are gourmet class. Closed Sun eve & Mon in low season.

Crêperie Connetable 1 rue de l'Apport. Magnificent old house, opposite the Mère Pourcel beside the place des Merciers, with crêpes for around €5 and snacks. The perfect spot for people-watching.

Le Myrian 3 rue du Port ☎02.96.87.93.36. Attractive and inexpensive pizzeria in a waterfront cottage down by the port, serving €7–12 pizzas, plus assorted salads and wine by the carafe, on its shady terrace.

The north coast from Dinard to Lannion

The coast that stretches from the resort town of Dinard to Finistère at the far western end of Brittany is divided into two distinct regions, either side of the bay of St-Brieuc. Between Dinard and St-Brieuc are the exposed green headlands of the Côte d'Émeraude, while beyond St-Brieuc, along the Côte de Goëlo, the shore becomes more extravagantly indented, with a succession of secluded little bays and an increasing proliferation of huge pink-granite boulders, seen at their best on the Côte de Granit Rose near Perros-Guirec.

Dinard

The former fishing village of DINARD sprawls around the western approaches to the Rance estuary, just across from St-Malo but a good twenty minutes away by road. While it might not feel out of place on the Côte d'Azur, with its casino, spacious villas and social calendar of regattas and ballet, here in Brittany it's a little incongruous. Its nineteenth-century metamorphosis was largely thanks to the tastes of the affluent English and Americans. Although Dinard is a hilly town, undulating over a succession of pretty little coastal inlets, it attracts great numbers of older visitors; as a result, prices tend to be high, and pleasures sedate.

Central Dinard faces north to the open sea, across the curving bay that holds the attractive plage de l'Écluse. As so often, the buildings that line the waterfront are – with the exception of the casino in the middle – venerable Victorian villas rather than hotels or shops, and so the beach itself has a low-key atmosphere, despite the summer crowds. An unexpected statue of Alfred Hitchcock dominates its main access point. Standing on a giant egg, with a ferocious-looking bird perched on each shoulder, he was placed here to commemorate the town's annual festival of English-language films.

Enjoyable coastal footpaths lead off in either direction from the principal beach, enlivened by notice boards holding reproductions of paintings produced at points along the way. It may well come as a surprise to see that Pablo Picasso's Deux Femmes Courants sur la Plage and Baigneuses sur la Plage, both of which look quintessentially Mediterranean with their blue skies and golden sands, were in fact painted here in Dinard during his annual summer visits throughout the 1920s. The path that heads east leads up to the Pointe du Moulinet for views over to St-Malo, and then as the Promenade du Clair de Lune continues past the tiny and now-exclusive port, and down to the estuary beach, the plage du Prieuré.

Practicalities

Dinard's small airport, 4km southeast of the town centre, off the D168 near Pleurtuit, is served by Ryanair flights from London Stansted. The connecting TIV bus #990 runs via Dinard's tourist office to St-Malo for a €4 flat fare. Many visitors simply come over for the day on one of the regular Émeraude Lines boats from St-Malo; tickets can be bought in Dinard at 27 av George-V, above the pleasure port. A couple of hundred metres west is the tourist office, in the centre at 2 bd Féart (Easter–June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.15pm & 2–7pm; July & Aug daily 9.30am–7.30pm; Oct–Easter Mon–Sat 9am–12.15pm & 2–6pm; ☎ 02.99.46.94.12, 🌐 www.ot-dinard.com).

Dinard tends to be an expensive place to stay, but it does have a wide selection of hotels to choose from, many of which can be found at 🌐 www.dinard-hotel-plus.com. Options include two nice places near the pleasure port: the Hôtel-Restaurant Printania, 5 av George-V (☎ 02.99.46.13.07, 🌐 www.printaniahotel.com; 📍; closed mid-Nov to mid-March), on a quiet street as it drops down to the port with a magnificent terrace restaurant looking towards St-Malo; and the Hôtel-Restaurant de la Vallée, 6 av George-V (☎ 02.99.46.94.00, 🌐 www.hoteldelavallee.com; 📍), though unfortunately it faces the wrong way for views of St-Malo, its most basic rooms looking straight onto a bare cliff. The best local campsite is the municipal Port Blanc, also near the plage du Port-Blanc, on rue du Sergent-Boulanger (☎02.99.46.10.74; closed Oct–March).

The Côte d'Émeraude

To the west of the Rance, beyond Dinard, begins the green of the Côte d'Émeraude. Though composed mainly of developed family resorts, it also offers wonderful camping, at its best around the heather-backed beaches near Cap Fréhel, a high, warm expanse of heath and cliffs with views extending on good days as far as Jersey and the Île de Bréhat – camping is, however, forbidden within 5km of the headland itself. The Fort la Latte, to the east, is used regularly as a film set. Its tower, containing a cannonball factory, is accessible only over two drawbridges, and can only be visited on guided tours (early July to late Aug daily 10am–7pm; April to early July, and late Aug to Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–March Sat, Sun & hols 2–6pm; €4.30; ☎02.99.30.38.84, 🌐www.castlelalatte.com).

The nearest places to stay are the ideal, isolated campsite at Pléherel, the Camping des Grèves d'En Bas (☎02.96.41.43.34, 📧mairie.cap.frehel@orange.fr; closed Oct–May), and a basic hostel on the D16 just outside Plévenon en route towards the cape at Kériver-en-Fréhel, La Ville Hardrieux (☎02.96.41.48.98, 📧capfrehel@fuaj.org; dorm beds €8; closed Oct–March) – which also offers horse-riding and rents out bicycles.

Erquy

Further round the headland, the perfect crescent of beach at ERQUY curves through more than 180 degrees. At low tide, the sea disappears way beyond the harbour entrance, leaving gentle ripples of paddling sand. Equipped with suitable boots, you can walk right across its mouth, from the grassy wooded headland on the left side over to the picturesque little lighthouse at the end of the jetty on the right.

Erquy's tourist office on the boulevard de la Mer (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 4–6pm; May–June & Sept 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; ☎02.96.72.30.12, 🌐www.erquy-tourisme.com) co-ordinates information for the surrounding area. The stately 🏰 Hôtel Beausejour, perching at 21 rue de la Corniche (☎02.96.72.30.39, 🌐www.beausejour-erquy.com; 📍; closed Sun eve, plus Mon & Thurs eve in low season), has a good view of the bay, and excellent fish dinners from €18.50, while the more upmarket restaurant l'Escorial (☎02.96.72.31.56; closed Sun evening & Mon) by the seafront serves a five-course menu that consists entirely of scallops, the town's speciality. There are several campsites on the promontory (dotted with tiny coves) that leads to the Cap d'Erquy north of town, including the three-star St-Pabu (☎02.96.72.24.65, 🌐www.saintpabu.com; closed mid-Oct to March) right beside the sea.

St-Brieuc

The major city on the Côte d'Émeraude, ST-BRIEUC is far too busy being the industrial centre of northern Brittany to concern itself with entertaining tourists. It's an odd-looking city, with two very deep wooded valleys spanned by viaducts at its core, and it's almost impossible to bypass. The streets are hectic, with the town centre cut in two by a virtual motorway and unrelieved by any public parks. Motorists and cyclists, unfortunately, have little choice but to plough straight through rather than attempting to negotiate the backroads and steep hills around. Apart from the sturdy-looking cathedral of St Stephen, the fine views of the valley from Tertre Aubé and a handful of half-timbered houses in the streets around place au Lin, there's nothing to keep you here.

Trains between Paris and Brest stop at the gare SNCF, around 1km south of the centre, and regular buses run to the nearby resorts. If you decide to use the city as a base, the best place to stay is the central Champ-de-Mars, 13 rue du Général-Leclerc (☎02.96.33.60.99, 📧hoteldemars@orange.fr; 📍), above an old-fashioned, green-painted brasserie. St-Brieuc also has a hostel, two kilometres out, in the magnificent fifteenth-century Manoir de la Ville-Guyomard (☎02.96.78.70.70, 📧saint-brieuc@fuaj.org; €13.75), on bus route #3. Some of the nicest eating options in town are in the old quarter, behind the cathedral. 🍷 La Cuisine du Marché, 4–6 rue des Trois-Frères-Merlin (☎02.96.61.70.94), is a friendly bistro serving impeccable classic French dishes, with a €9 lunchtime plat and dinner menus for €18 and €23.

The Côte de Goëlo

Moving northwest towards Paimpol along the Côte de Goëlo, the shoreline becomes wilder and harsher and the seaside towns tend to be crammed into narrow rocky inlets or set well back in river estuaries. BINIC is a narrow port surrounded by meadows, with a huge beach – at low tide, anyway – and the newly renovated Hôtel Benhuyc, 1 quai Jean-Bart (☎02.96.73.39.00, 🌐www.benhuyc.com; 📍). A little further on at the sedate family resort of ST-QUAY-PORTRIEUX, the Gerbot d'Avoine beside the beach is the best place to stay (☎02.96.70.40.09, 🌐www.gerbotdavoine.com; 📍; closed Jan & mid-Nov to mid-Dec).

After St-Quay, the coastal road shifts inland, through PLOUHA, the traditional boundary between French-speaking and Breton-speaking Brittany. A worthwhile diversion is the village of KERMARIA-AN-ISQUIT, signposted off the D21 from Plouha, with the extraordinary medieval frescoes of a Danse Macabre in its thirteenth-century chapel (Easter–Sept Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 3–6pm; donation). They show Ankou, who is death or death's assistant, leading representatives of every social class in a Dance of Death. An encounter between three living nobles out hunting and three philosophical corpses is also depicted, and there's a statue of the infant Jesus refusing milk from Mary's proffered breast.

Paimpol and around

Back on the coast, PAIMPOL is an attractive town with a tangle of cobbled alleyways and fine grey-granite houses, even if it has lost something in its transition from working fishing port to pleasure harbour. It was once the centre of a cod and whaling fleet, which sailed to Iceland each February after being sent off with a ceremony marked by a famous pardon. From then until September the town would be empty of its young men.

Thanks to naval shipyards and the like, the open sea is not visible from Paimpol; a maze of waterways leads to its two separate harbours. Both are usually filled with the high masts of yachts, but are still also used by the fishing vessels that keep a fish market and a plethora of poissonneries busy. This is doubtless a very pleasant place to arrive by boat, threading through the rocks, but from close quarters the tiny port area is a little disappointing, very much rebuilt and quite plain. Nonetheless, it's always lively in summer.

A couple of kilometres short of town, in a superbly romantic setting, the D786 passes the substantial ruins of the Abbaye de Beauport (daily: mid-June to mid-Sept 10am–7pm, with regular 1hr 30min guided tours; mid-Sept to mid-June 10am–noon & 2–5pm; @www.abbaye-beauport.com; €4.50), established in 1202 by Count Alain de Goëlo. Its stone walls are covered with wild flowers and ivy, the central cloisters are engulfed by a huge tree, and birds fly everywhere. The Norman Gothic chapterhouse is the most noteworthy building to survive, but its roofless halls hold relics from all periods of its history. Footpaths lead down through the salt meadows, where the monks raised their sheep, to the sea. In summer, the abbey reopens for late-night visits, with imaginative lighting effects (July & Aug Wed & Sun 10pm–1am; €8), and also hosts weekly Breton music concerts (mid-July to mid-Aug Thurs 9pm; €12).

Places to stay in Paimpol include the grand old 🏠 Repaire de Kerroc'h, overlooking the small-boat harbour from 29 quai Morand (📞02.96.20.50.13, @repaire2kerroch@orange.fr; 📍), which though not quite as luxurious as it looks, offers comfortable en-suite rooms, great views, and a really good restaurant; the very hospitable Hôtel Berthelot at 1 rue du Port (📞02.96.20.88.66; 📍–📍); and the plainer Hôtel Origano, just back from the front at 7bis rue du Quai (📞02.96.22.05.49; 📍; closed mid-Nov to March). As for restaurants, La Cotriade, on the far side of the harbour on the quai Armand-Dayot (📞02.96.20.81.08; closed all day Mon, Fri eve & Sat lunch), is the best bet for authentic fish dishes, with menus from €21.

The Île de Bréhat

Two kilometres off the coast at Pointe de l'Arcouest, 6km northwest of Paimpol, the ÎLE DE BRÉHAT – in reality two islands joined by a tiny bridge – gives the appearance of spanning great latitudes. On its north side are windswept meadows of hemlock and yarrow, sloping down to chaotic erosions of rock; on the south, you're in the midst of palm trees, mimosa and eucalyptus. All around is a multitude of little islets – some accessible at low tide, others propriété privée, most just pink-orange rocks. All in all, it is one of the most beautiful places in Brittany, renowned as a sanctuary not only for rare species of wild flowers, but also for birds of all kinds. Individual private gardens are also meticulously tended, so you can always anticipate a magnificent display of colour, in summer, for example, from the erupting blue acanthus.

All boats to Bréhat (see below) arrive at the small harbour of PORT-CLOS, though depending on the tide passengers may have to walk several hundred metres before setting foot on terra firma. No cars are permitted on the island, so many visitors rent bikes at the port, for €15 per day. However, it's easy enough to explore the whole place on foot; walking from one end to the other takes less than an hour.

Each batch of new arrivals heads first to Bréhat's village, LE BOURG, five hundred metres up from the port. As well as a handful of hotels, restaurants and bars, it also holds a limited array of shops, a post office, a bank and an ATM, and hosts a small market most days. In high season, the attractive central square tends to be packed fit to burst, with exasperated holiday-home owners pushing their little hand-wagons through the throngs of day-trippers.

Continue a short distance north of Le Bourg, however, and you'll soon cross over the slender Pont ar Prat bridge to the northern island, where the crowds thin out, and countless little coves offer opportunities to sprawl on the tough grass or clamber across the rugged boulders. Though the coastal footpath around this northern half offers the most attractive walking on the island, the best beaches line the southern shores, with the Grève du Guerzido at its southeastern corner, being the pick of the crop.

Practicalities

Bréhat is connected regularly by ferry from the Pointe de l'Arcouest, 6km northwest of Paimpol, and served by summer buses from the gare SNCF there. Roughly speaking, sailings, with Les Vedettes de Bréhat (☎02.96.55.79.50, 🌐www.vedettesdebrehat.com), are half-hourly in July & Aug, hourly between April and June and in September, and every 1hr 30min otherwise, with the first boat out to Bréhat at 8.30am in summer, and the last boat back at 7.45pm. The return trip costs €8 (bikes, €15 extra, are only allowed outside peak crossing times). The same company also operates boats in summer from Erquy, Dahouët, Binic and St-Quay-Portrieux.

Bréhat's tourist office is in the main square in Le Bourg (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–4.30pm; rest of the year open three days a week, call for current hours; ☎02.96.20.04.15. All three of its hotels tend to be booked through the summer, and close for at least part of the winter. Both the Bellevue in Port-Clos (☎02.96.20.00.05, 🌐www.hotel-bellevue-brehat.com; 📍; closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb), and the Vieille Auberge, on your left as you enter Le Bourg (☎02.96.20.00.24; 📍; closed Dec–Easter), insist on demi-pension in high season. The smaller Aux Pêcheurs (☎02.96.20.00.14; 📍; closed Jan), on the main square in Le Bourg, has a nice little garden terrace. There's also a wonderful campsite in the woods high above the sea west of the port (☎02.96.20.00.36; closed mid-Sept to mid-June).

The Côte de Granit Rose

The entire northernmost stretch of the Breton coast, from Bréhat to Trégastel, has loosely come to be known as the Côte de Granit Rose. There are indeed great granite boulders scattered in the sea around the island of Bréhat, and at the various headlands to the west, but the most memorable stretch of coast lies around Perros-Guirec, where the pink-granite rocks are eroded into fantastic shapes.

Tréguier

The D786 turns west from Paimpol, passing over a green ria on the bridge outside Lézardrieux before arriving at TRÉGUIER, one of the very few hill-towns in Brittany. Its central feature is the Cathédrale de St-Tugdual, which contains the tomb of St Yves, a native of the town who died in 1303 and – for his incorruptibility – became the patron saint of lawyers. Attempts to bribe him continue to this day; his tomb is surrounded by marble plaques and an inferno of candles invoking his aid.

It's best to stay down by the port, at either the fancy new Hôtel Aigue-Marine, close to the bridge (☎02.96.92.97.00, 🌐www.aiguemarine.fr; 📍), or the much more basic Hôtel-Restaurant d'Estuaire (☎02.96.92.30.25; 📍), which has great views from its upstairs dining room and serves a reasonable €13 menu. At the Poissonnerie Moulinet, above a fish shop just below the cathedral at 2 rue Ernest-Renan (☎02.96.92.30.27), you can buy superb seafood platters at low prices, to take away and eat in the square. During the market each Wednesday, clothes are spread out in the square by the cathedral, with food and fresh fish down by the port.

Plougrescant

Perhaps the best-known photographic image of Brittany is of a small seafront cottage somehow squeezed between two mighty pink-granite boulders. Surprisingly few visitors, however, manage to see the house in real life. It stands 10km north of Tréguier, 2km out from the village of PLOUGRESCANT. The precise spot tends to be marked on regional maps as either Le Gouffre or Le Gouffre du Castel-Meur, and is signposted off the coastal road a short way west of the Pointe du Château. Although you can't visit the cottage itself, which actually faces inland across a small sheltered bay, the shoreline nearby offers superb short walks, and there's a little summer-only café selling snacks and ice creams.

Château de la Roche-Jagu

About 10km inland from Tréguier, on a heavily wooded slope above the Trieux River, stands the fifteenth-century Château de la Roche-Jagu (daily: mid-June to mid-Sept 10am–7pm; mid-Sept to Nov & Feb to mid-June 10.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; park access free, château €3, or more during special exhibitions). It's a gorgeous building – a harmonious combination of fortress and home – and plays host to lavish annual exhibitions, usually on some sort of Celtic theme. The rooms within are bare, but if you climb to the top, you can admire the beautiful woodwork of the restored eaves, and walk the two long indoor galleries, offering tremendous views over the river.

Perros-Guirec and Ploumanac'h

PERROS-GUIREC is the most popular resort along this coast, though not perhaps the most exciting, consisting largely of a network of tree-lined avenues of suburban villas. It does stand, however, at one end of the long Sentier des Douaniers pathway, which winds round the clifftops to the tiny resort of PLOUMANAC'H past an astonishing succession of deformed and water-sculpted rocks. Birds wheel overhead towards the offshore bird sanctuary of Sept-Îles, and battered boats shelter in the narrow inlets or bob uncontrollably out on the waves. There are patches and brief causeways of grass, clumps of purple heather and yellow gorse.

Perros-Guirec's extremely efficient tourist office is at 21 place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7.30pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 4–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; ☎02.96.23.21.15; 🌐www.perros-guirec.com). Hotels in Perros-Guirec itself include the old-fashioned Les Violettes, 19 rue du Calvaire (☎02.96.23.21.33; 🍷), which has a seriously cheap restaurant, and two places with sea views: the Gulf Stream, high on the hillside at 26 rue des Sept-Îles (☎02.96.23.21.86, 🌐www.gulf-stream-hotel-bretagne.com; 🍷; closed mid-Jan to mid-Feb), and the Bon Accueil, 11 rue de Landerval (☎02.96.23.25.77, 🌐www.au-bon-accueil.com; 🍷), home to a gourmet restaurant. Ploumanac’h offers the St-Guirec et de la Plage (☎02.96.91.40.89, 🌐www.hotelsaint-guirec.com; 🍷–🍷; closed Nov–March), which has some lovely sea-view rooms at bargain rates; eat either at the adjoining 🍷 Coste-Mor (☎02.96.91.65.55) – where good menus starting at €14, with a lovely seafood pot au feu on the €26 one, and the terrace is right above the beach – or the simpler, cheaper dining room reserved for pensionnaire guests. Immediately across the road, with an equally superb prospect of the beach, the Castel Beau Site, plage du St-Guirec (☎02.96.91.40.87, 🌐www.castelbeausite.com; 🍷), is a much more lavish alternative, with a more expensive restaurant into the bargain. The nicest place to camp is the four-star 🍷 Le Ranolien (☎02.96.91.65.65, 🌐www.leranolien.com; closed mid-Nov to March), in a superb position backing onto the Sentier des Douaniers near a little beach about halfway round, but directly accessible on the other side by road, and boasting a great array of swimming pools and waterslides.

Trégastel and Trébeurden

Of the smaller villages further round the coast to the west, TRÉGASTEL, with a couple of campsites, including the Tourony by the beach (☎02.96.23.86.61, 🌐www.camping-tourony.com; closed Oct–Easter), and TRÉBEURDEN, with the lovely seafront hostel, Le Tôëno, 2km north of town at 60 rte de la Corniche (☎02.96.23.52.22, 📧trebeurden@fuaj.org; dorm beds €11; closed Nov–Feb), make reasonable stopovers. Trégastel has managed to squeeze in an aquarium under a massive pile of boulders, and has a couple of huge lumps of pink granite slap in the middle of its fine beach.

The strangest sight along this coast, however, outdoing anything the erosions can manage, is just south of Trégastel on the route de Calvaire, where an old stone saint halfway up a high calvary raises his arm to bless or harangue the gleaming white discs and puffball dome of the Pleumier-Bodou Telecommunications Centre. When it opened in 1962, this was the first receiving station to pick up signals from the US Telstar satellite. No longer operational, the centre has been re-modelled as a Musée de Télécommunications also known as Cosmopolis (Feb Mon–Fri & Sun 2–6pm; April & Sept Mon–Fri 11am–6pm, Sat & Sun 2–6pm; May & June daily 11am–6pm; July & Aug daily 11am–7pm; March & Oct–Dec by appointment only; €7; 🌐www.leradome.com). Inside the Radôme, the golf-ball itself, frequent spectacular son et lumière shows explain the history of the whole ensemble, and there’s also a smaller planetarium alongside.

The Bay of Lannion

Despite being set significantly back from the sea on the estuary of the River Léguer, Lannion gives its name to the next bay west along the Breton coast – and it’s the bay rather than the town that is most likely to impress visitors. One enormous beach stretches from St-Michel-en-Grève, which is little more than a bend in the road, as far as Locquirec; at low tide you can walk hundreds of metres out on the sands.

Lannion

LANNION, set amid plummeting hills and stairways, is a historic city with streets of medieval housing and a couple of interesting old churches – but it's also a centre for a burgeoning and extremely high-tech telecommunications industry, and one of modern Brittany's real success stories. Hence its rather self-satisfied nickname, ville heureuse or “happy town”. In addition to admiring the half-timbered houses around the place de Général-Leclerc and along rue des Chapeliers, it's well worth climbing from the town up the 142 granite steps which lead to the twelfth-century Templar Église de Brélévenez. The views from its terrace are quite stupendous.

Lannion's tourist office is at 2 quai d'Aiguillon (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.96.46.41.00, 🌐www.ot-lannion.fr). The only accommodation in the centre is the Ibis, opposite the station at 30 av de Général-de-Gaulle (☎02.96.37.03.67; 📍), which has modern rooms, but no restaurant; you can eat good cheap seafood cuisine at La Flambée, 67 rue Georges-Pompidou (☎02.96.48.04.85; closed Mon). There's also a year-round hostel, Les Korrigans, near the town centre at 6 rue du 73e-Territorial (☎02.96.37.91.28, 📧lannion@fuaj.org; dorm beds €14 including breakfast). Its friendly management do not operate a curfew, and they arrange birdwatching and similar expeditions and rent out bikes.

The Cairn du Barnenez

In a glorious position at the mouth of the Morlaix estuary, 13km north of Morlaix itself, the prehistoric stone Cairn du Barnenez surveys the waters from the summit of a hill (May–Aug daily 10am–6.30pm; Sept–April Tues–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; €5). As on the island of Gavrinis in the Morbihan, its ancient masonry has been laid bare by recent excavations, and provides a stunning sense of the architectural prowess of the megalith builders. Radiocarbon testing has shown the work here to date back to around 4500 BC, which makes this one of the oldest large-scale monuments in the world.

The ensemble consists of two distinct stepped pyramids. Each rises in successive tiers, built of large flat stones chinked with pebbles; the second was added onto the side of the first, and the two are encircled by a series of terraces and ramps. The whole thing measures roughly 70m long by 15–25m wide and 6m high. Both pyramids were long buried under the same eighty-metre-long earthen mound. While the actual cairns are completely exposed to view, most of the passages and chambers that lie within them are sealed off. The two minor corridors that are open simply cut through the edifice from one side to the other, and were exposed by quarrying activities around thirty years ago; visitors are not permitted to pass through. Local tradition has it that one tunnel runs right through this “home of the fairies”, and continues out deep under the sea.

Finistère

It's hard to resist the appeal of the Finistère coast, with its ocean-fronting cliffs and headlands. Summer crowds may detract from the best parts of the Crozon peninsula and the Pointe de Raz, but there are many kilometres of coast where you can enjoy near solitude. If you have transport, explore the semi-wilderness of the northern stretches beyond Brest and the little fishing village of Le Conquet, or take a ferry trip to the misty offshore islands of Ouessant, Molène and Sein. From the top of Ménez-Hom you can admire the anarchic limits of western France, while the cities of Morlaix and Quimper display modern Breton life as well as ancient splendours, and the parish closes south of Morlaix reveal much about the beliefs of the past.

Léon

Memories of the days when Brittany was “Petite Bretagne”, as opposed to “Grande Bretagne” across the water, linger in the names of Finistère’s two main areas, Léon (once Lyonesse), the northern peninsula, and its southern neighbour Cornouaille (Cornwall). Both feature prominently in Arthurian legend. In the north of Léon, the ragged coastline is the prime attraction, indented with a succession of estuaries or abers, each of which shelters its own tiny harbour: heading west from either the thriving historic town of Morlaix or the appealing little Channel port of Roscoff, there are possible stopping places all the way to Le Conquet. From Le Conquet, you can reach the islands of Ouessant and Molène across a treacherous stretch of ocean. Inland, by contrast, the ornate medieval village churches known as parish closes hold some of Brittany’s finest religious architecture.

Morlaix

MORLAIX, one of the great old Breton ports, thrived on trade with England in between wars during the “Golden Period” of the late Middle Ages. Built up the slopes of a steep valley with sober stone houses, the town was originally protected by an eleventh-century castle and a circuit of walls. Little is left of either, but the old centre remains in part medieval with its cobbled streets and half-timbered houses. The present grandeur comes from the pink-granite viaduct carrying trains from Paris to Brest way above the town centre. Coming by road from the north, the opening view is of shiny yacht masts paralleling the pillars of the viaduct.

On her way from Roscoff to Paris, Mary Queen of Scots passed through Morlaix in 1548 and stayed at the Jacobin convent that fronts place des Jacobins. She was at the time just 5 years old, and a contemporary account records that the crush to catch a glimpse of the infant was so great that the inner town’s “gates were thrown off their hinges and the chains from all the bridges were broken down”. The convent now houses the Musée de Morlaix, a reasonably entertaining assortment of Roman wine jars, bits that have fallen off medieval churches, cannons and kitchen utensils, and a few modern paintings (April, May & Sept Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; Oct–March & June Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €4.10). The same ticket entitles you to a guided tour of the fabulously restored, sixteenth-century Maison à Pondalez, at 9 Grand-Rue (same hours).

Anne, Duchess of Brittany and Queen of France, visited Morlaix in 1506. She is reputed to have stayed at the Maison de la Reine Anne (May & June Mon–Sat 11am–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 11am–6.30pm; Sept Mon–Sat 11am–5pm; €1.60), 33 rue du Mur, which, although much restored, does indeed date from the sixteenth century. Look out for the intricate external carvings, and the lantern roof and splendid Renaissance staircase inside; each of the house's storeys overhangs the square below by a few more centimetres.

Practicalities

The tourist office in Morlaix is in a solitary but central one-storey building, almost under the viaduct in place des Otages (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sun 10.30am–12.30pm; Sept–June Mon 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Tues–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.98.62.14.94, 🌐www.morlaixtoursime.fr). All buses conveniently depart from place Cornic, right under the viaduct, but the gare SNCF is on rue Armand-Rousseau, high above the town at the western end of the viaduct. To reach it on foot, you have to climb the steep steps of Venelle de la Roche.

On the whole, Morlaix's hotels are fairly uninspiring, but the eccentric old De l'Europe, above a simple but good brasserie at 1 rue d'Aiguillon (☎02.98.62.11.99, 🌐www.hotel-europe-com.fr; 🍷), holds well-equipped modern rooms. Less expensive options include the Hôtel de la Gare, 25 place St-Martin close to the gare SNCF (☎02.98.88.03.29; 🍷).

The best hunting ground for restaurants is to be found between St-Melaine church and place des Jacobins. Choices include La Marée Bleue, 3 rampe Ste-Mélaine (☎02.98.63.24.21; closed Oct, plus Sun eve & Mon), a well-respected seafood restaurant a minute's walk up from the tourist office – the €14 menu is a bit limited, but €27 ensures you a superb assiette de fruits de mer, and €36.50 buys a five-course feast – and the Brocéliande, 5 rue des Bouchers (☎02.98.88.73.78; closed Mon & Tues), in the southeast of town, which offers elegant evening-only dining in a fin-de-siècle atmosphere.

The parish closes

Morlaix makes an excellent base for visiting the countryside towards Brest, where parish closes, or enclos paroissiaux (walled churchyards incorporating cemetery, calvary and ossuary), celebrate the distinctive character of Breton Catholicism – closer to the Celtic past than to Rome – in elaborately sculpted scenes. Stone calvaries are covered in detailed scenes of the Crucifixion above a crowd of saints, Gospel stories and legends; in richer parishes, a high stone arch leads into the churchyard, adjoining an equally majestic ossuary, where bones would be taken when the tiny cemeteries filled up. Most of the parish closes date from the two centuries either side of the union with France in 1532, Brittany's wealthiest period.

The most famous enclos are in three neighbouring parishes off the N12 between Morlaix and Landivisiau, on a clearly signposted route that's served by an SNCF bus. At ST-THÉGONNEC, the church pulpit, carved by two brothers in 1683, is the acknowledged masterpiece, albeit so swamped with detail – symbolic saints, sibyls and arcane figures – that it is almost too intricate to take in. At the pretty flower-filled village of GUIMILIAU, 6km southwest, the calvary is an incredible ensemble of over two hundred granite figures, depicting scenes from the life of Christ and rendered all the more dramatic by being covered with what has been called “secular lichen”. A uniquely Breton illustration, just above the Last Supper, depicts the unfortunate Katell Gollet – Katherine the Damned, a figure from local myth who stole consecrated wafers to give to her lover, who naturally turned out to be the Devil – being torn to shreds by demons. At LAMPAUL-GUIMILIAU, the painted wooden baptistry, the dragons on the beams and the suitably wicked faces of the robbers on the calvary are the key components.

Katell Gollet is said to have lived in the ruined castle above the Elhorn estuary at LA ROCHE-MAURICE, 15km on towards Brest. In legend, she danced all her suitors to death until the reaper-figure Ankou stepped in to whirl her to eternal damnation; Ankou is depicted on the ossuary of the nearby church with the inscription "I kill you all". Another five-kilometre detour southeast brings further variations at LA MARTYRE (where Ankou clutches his disembodied head) and its adjoining parish PLOUDIRY, the sculpting of its ossuary affirming the equality of social classes – in the eyes of Ankou.

In St-Thégonnec the 🍷 Auberge de St-Thégonnec, 6 place de la Mairie (📞02.98.79.61.18, 🌐www.aubergesaintthegonnec.com; 🕒; closed Sat lunch, Sun eve & Mon lunch in July & Aug; Sun, Mon lunch & Sat lunch Sept–June, plus all Jan), is a surprisingly smart hotel for such a small village, and has a superb restaurant.

Roscoff

The opening of the deep-water port at ROSCOFF in 1973 was part of a general attempt to revitalize the Breton economy. The ferry services to Plymouth and to Cork aim not just to bring tourists, but also to revive the traditional trading links between the Celtic nations of Brittany, Ireland and southwest England. In fact, Roscoff had already long been a significant port. Mary Queen of Scots landed here in 1548 on her way to Paris to be engaged to François, the son of Henri II of France, as did Bonnie Prince Charlie, the Young Pretender, in 1746, after his defeat at Culloden.

Arrival and information

Boats from Plymouth, Cork and Rosslare dock at the Port de Blosson, a couple of kilometres to the east (and just out of sight) of Roscoff. In summer, a direct bus service to Morlaix and Quimper leaves from the ferry terminal (Tues, Wed, Fri & Sat 7.30am, Mon, Thurs & Sun 3.30pm; CAT; 📞02.98.44.46.73). From the gare SNCF, a few hundred metres south of the town proper, a restricted rail service (often replaced by buses) runs to Morlaix. Most local buses also go from here, including a direct service to Brest run by Bihan Voyages (📞02.98.83.45.80, 🌐www.bihan.com).

The tourist office is at 46 rue Gambetta in town (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; 📞02.98.61.12.13, 🌐www.roscoff-tourisme.com).

Accommodation

For a small town, Roscoff is well equipped with hotels, which are accustomed to late-night arrivals from the ferries. Most, however, are relatively expensive and close for some or all of the winter. There's also a hostel on the Île de Batz (see below), and a two-star campsite, the beachfront Aux Quatres Saisons, 2km west in Perharidy, just off the route de Santec (📞02.98.69.70.86; 📧camping-perharidy@orange.fr; closed mid-Oct to March).

Armen Le Triton rue du Docteur Bagot
📞02.98.61.24.44, 🌐www.hotel-letriton.com.
Peaceful hotel, with a pleasant garden, in a residential neighbourhood a short walk from the centre, with bright rooms on three floors. Closed Jan–Feb. 4

Du Centre 5 rue Gambetta 📞02.98.61.24.25, 🌐www.chezjanie.com. Family hotel above the café-bar Chez Janie, entered via the main street but looking out on the port. The rooms are modern and tastefully furnished; those with sea views cost €19 extra. Closed mid-Dec to mid-Feb. 5

Les Chardons Bleus 4 rue Amiral-Réveil-lère ☎ 02.98.69.72.03, 🌐 www

.chardonsbleus.fr.st. Very friendly and helpful hotel in the heart of the old town, with a good restaurant (closed Thurs & Sun eve Sept–June) where dinner menus start at €19. Closed mid-Feb to mid-March. 4

Grand Hôtel Talabardon 27 place Lacaze-Duthiers ☎ 02.98.61.24.95, 🌐 www.talabardon.fr. Imposing old stone building in the main square, facing the church on the inland side but with big sea-view balconies attached to several rooms. Seafood menus range from €27 to €49. Closed mid–Nov to Feb. 5

Le Temps de Vivre 19 place Lacaze-Duthiers ☎ 02.98.19.33.19, 🌐 www

.letempsdevivre.net. This gorgeously decorated newcomer to Roscoff's hotel scene, near the Notre-Dame church in the heart of town, offers luxuriously spacious rooms with designer bathrooms, and wonderful sea views. Off-season rates are significantly lower. 6

5

The Town

Roscoff itself, nonetheless, remains a small resort, where almost all activity is confined to rue Gambetta and to the old port – the rest of the roads are residential backstreets full of retirement homes and institutions. The town's sixteenth-century church, Notre-Dame-de-Croas-Batz, at the far end of rue Gambetta, is embellished with an ornate Renaissance belfry, complete with sculpted ships and a protruding stone cannon. From the side, rows of bells can be seen hanging in galleries, one above the other like a wedding cake created by Walt Disney. Some way beyond is the grand Thalassotherapy Institute of Rock Roum, while a kilometre further on is Roscoff's best beach, at Laber, surrounded by expensive hotels and apartments.

The old harbour is livelier, mixing an economy based on fishing with relatively low-key pleasure trips to the Île de Batz. The island looks almost walkable; a narrow pier stretches over 300m towards it before abruptly plunging into deep rocky waters. The Pointe de Blosson and the fishermen's white chapel, the Chapelle Ste-Barbe, make a good vantage point, particularly when the tide is in.

In 1828, Henri Ollivier took onions to England from Roscoff, thereby founding a trade that flourished until the 1930s. The story of the "Johnnies" – that classic French image of men in black berets with strings of onions hanging over the handlebars of their bicycles – is told at La Maison des Johnnies et de l'Oignon Rosé de Roscoff, 48 rue Brizeux, near the gare SNCF (mid-June to mid-Sept Mon–Fri 11am, 2pm, 3.30pm & 5pm, Sun 2pm, 3.30pm & 5pm; mid-Feb to mid-June & mid-Sept to Dec Mon, Tues, Thurs, Fri & Sun 2.30pm; €4).

Eating

The obvious places to eat in Roscoff are the dining rooms of the hotels themselves – Le Temps de Vivre is especially recommended – but the town does hold a few specialist restaurants as well, plus a bunch of appealing crêperies around the old harbour. If you're arriving on an evening ferry out of season, be aware that it can be difficult to find a restaurant still serving any later than 9.15pm.

Crêperie de la Poste 12 rue Gambetta

☎ 02.98.69.72.81. Central crêperie, open from 11.30am until late, where an à la carte meal of sweet and savoury pancakes should work out inexpensive; more exotic seafood options cost up to €8.50. They also serve fish soup, mussels and other simple meals. Closed Wed Sept–June, or Tues July & Aug.

L'Écume des Jours quai d'Auxerre

☎ 02.98.61.22.83. Cosy restaurant in a grand old house facing the port, offering good-value set lunches for €12.50 on weekdays, plus dinner menus from €20, featuring such delights as braised oysters or scallops with local pink onions. Closed Dec & Jan, and Tues & Wed in low season.

The île de Batz

The long, narrow ÎLE DE BATZ (pronounced “Ba”) mirrors Roscoff across the water, separated from it by a sea channel that’s barely 200m wide at low tide but perhaps five times that when the tide is high. Appearances from the mainland are somewhat deceptive: the island’s old town, home to a thousand or so farmers and fishermen, fills much of its southern shoreline, but those parts of Batz not visible from Roscoff are much wilder and more windswept. With no cars permitted, and some great expanses of sandy beach, it makes a wonderfully quiet retreat for families in particular, whether you’re camping or staying in one of its two old-fashioned little hotels.

Ferries from Roscoff arrive at the quayside of the old town. There’s a nice small beach along the edge of the harbour, though the sea withdraws so far at low tide that the port turns into a morass of slimy seaweed. You may well spot the island’s best beach from the boat – it’s the white-sand Grève Blanche towards its eastern end. Walking in that direction also brings you to the hostel (see below), and the 44-metre lighthouse that stands on the island’s peak, all of 23m above sea level (second half of June daily except Wed 2–5pm; July to mid-Sept daily 1–5.30pm; €1.70).

Three different companies operate fifteen-minute ferry services to the Île de Batz from Roscoff’s long pier. Between late June and mid-September, the service is pretty much nonstop between 8am and 8pm daily, while at other times of year there are eight to ten trips daily between 8.30am and 7pm. The return fare is €7, with a €5 charge for bikes.

The island’s nicest hotel, at the centre of the harbour, is the 🏡 Grand Hôtel Morvan (☎02.98.61.78.06, 🌐www.grand-hotel-morvan.com; 🕒; closed Dec to mid-March), which serves good meals on its large seafront terraces. There’s a hostel in a beautiful setting by the beach at the evocatively named Creach ar Bolloc’h (☎02.98.61.77.69, 🌐www.aj-iledebatz.org; closed Nov–March; €11.90).

St-Pol-de-Léon

The main road south from Roscoff passes by fields of the famous Breton artichokes before arriving after 6km at ST-POL-DE-LÉON. It’s not an exciting place but – assuming you’ve got your own transport – its two churches at least merit a pause. The cathédrale, in the main town square, was rebuilt towards the end of the thirteenth century along the lines of Coutances – a quiet classic of unified Norman architecture. The remains of St Pol are inside, alongside a large bell, rung over the heads of pilgrims during his pardon on March 12 in the unlikely hope of curing headaches and ear diseases. Just downhill is the original Kreisker Chapel, with access to the top of its sharp-pointed soaring granite belfry (now coated in yellow moss).

The abers

The coast west of Roscoff is among the most dramatic in Brittany, a jagged series of abers – deep, narrow estuaries – that hold a succession of small, isolated resorts. It’s a little on the bracing side, especially if you’re making use of the numerous campsites, but that just has to be counted as part of the appeal. In summer, at least, the temperatures are mild enough, and things get progressively more sheltered as you move around towards Le Conquet and Brest.

Around the abers

If you’re dependent on public transport, bear in mind that the only stop on the Roscoff–Brest bus before it turns inland is PLOUESCAT. It’s not quite on the sea itself, but there are campsites nearby on each of three adjacent beaches; of the hotels, best value is the Roc'h-Ar-Mor, right on the beach at Porsmeur (☎02.98.69.63.01, ✉roch.ar.mor@orange.fr; 📍; closed Oct–Easter).

BRIGNOGAN-PLAGE, on the next aber, has a small natural harbour, once the lair of wreckers, with beaches and weather-beaten rocks to either side, as well as its own menhir. The two high-season campsites are the central municipal site at Kéravezan, the Côte des Legendes (☎02.98.83.41.65, 🌐www.camping-cote-des-legendes.com; closed Nov–Easter) and the Du Phare, east of town (☎02.98.83.45.06 🌐www.camping-du-phare.com; closed Oct–March), while the Castel Regis hotel (☎02.98.83.40.22, 🌐www.castelregis.com; 📍; closed Oct–April), is expensive but beautifully sited among the rocks, right at the headland. There are also schools of sailing and riding.

The aber between Plouguerneau and L'ABER-WRAC'H has a stepping-stone crossing just upstream from the bridge at Llanellis, built in Gallo-Roman times, and its long cut stones still cross the three channels of water (access off the D28 signposted “Rascoll”). L'Aber-Wrac'h itself is a promising place to spend a little time. It's an attractive, modest-sized resort within easy reach of a whole range of sandy beaches and a couple of worthwhile excursions. Beyond the town's little strip of bars and restaurants, the Baie des Anges stretches away towards the Atlantic, with the only sound the cry of seagulls feasting on the oyster beds. At the start of the bay, commanding stunning views out to sea, the elegant and irresistible 🏠 Hôtel la Baie des Anges, 350 route des Anges (☎02.98.04.90.04, 🌐www.baie-des-anges.com; 📍; closed Jan), makes a peaceful and exceptionally comfortable place to stay. It has no dining room, but there's a classy bar with a small waterfront terrace, reserved for guests only. The best local restaurant, Le Brennig (☎02.98.04.81.12; closed Tues & Nov–Feb), is back at the other end of town.

At the small harbour of PORTSALL, 5km along the coast from the far side of the next aber, l'Aber-Benoît, a defining moment in local history is commemorated by the Espace Amoco Cadiz (July & Aug Tues–Sun 2.30–6.30pm; Sept–June Sat & Sun 2.30–6.30pm; free). On March 17, 1978, the sinking of the Amoco Cadiz supertanker resulted in an oil spill that devastated 350km of the Breton coastline, and threatened to ruin the local economy. Displays and films document not only the immense task of cleaning up the mess, but also the long legal battle to obtain compensation from the “multinational monster” responsible.

Five kilometres west of Portsall is TRÉMAZAN, whose ruined castle was the point of arrival in Brittany for Tristan and Iseult. From here a beautiful corniche road leads further along the coast. Odd little chapels dot the route, and the views of sea and rocks are unhindered before turning inland just before Le Conquet.

Le Conquet

LE CONQUET, at the far western tip of Brittany 24km beyond Brest, is a wonderful place, scarcely developed, with a long beach of clean white sand, protected from the winds by the narrow spit of the Kermorvan peninsula. It's very much a working fishing village, with grey-stone houses leading down to the stone jetties of a cramped harbour. It occasionally floods, causing great amusement to locals who watch the waves wash over cars left there by tourists taking the ferry out to Ouessant and Molène. A good walk 5km south brings you to the lighthouse at Pointe St-Mathieu, looking out to the islands from its site among the ruins of a Benedictine abbey. A small exhibition explains the abbey's history, including the legend that it holds the skull of St Matthew, brought here from Ethiopia by local seafarers (April & May Wed, Sat & Sun 2.30–6.30pm; June & Sept Wed–Mon 2.30–6.30pm; July & Aug Wed–Sat & Mon 10am–12.30pm & 2–7pm, Sun 2–7pm; Oct–March Wed & Sat 2.30–6.30pm; €1.50).

The Relais du Vieux Port, 1 quai Drellac’h (☎02.98.89.15.91; 📍; closed Jan), offers inexpensive but attractive rooms right by the jetty in Le Conquet, and has a simple crêperie downstairs. Above, overlooking the harbour, the larger Pointe Ste-Barbe (☎02.98.89.00.26, 🌐www.hotelpointesaintebarbe.com; 📍–📍; hotel closed mid–Nov to mid–Dec, restaurant closed Mon in low season) may look like a concrete monstrosity, but once you’re inside the location is truly superb. Guests in the more expensive rooms enjoy amazing sea views, and there’s a great restaurant downstairs, where menus start with a good €19 option. There’s also a well-equipped two-star campsite over on the Kermorvan peninsula, Les Blancs Sablon, (☎02.98.89.06.90, 🌐www.lescledelles.com; closed mid–Nov to mid–March).

The Îles d’Ouessant and de Molène

The Île d’Ouessant (“Ushant” to the English) lies 30km northwest of Le Conquet, and its lighthouse at Creac’h (said to be the strongest in the world) is regarded as the entrance to the English Channel. The island is the last in a chain of smaller islands and half-submerged granite rocks. Most are uninhabited, or like Beniguet the preserve only of rabbits, but the Île de Molène, midway, has a village and can be visited. Both Molène and Ouessant are served by at least one ferry each day from Le Conquet and Brest; however, it’s not practicable to visit more than one in a single day.

Getting to Ouessant and Molène

Penn Ar Bed (☎02.98.80.80.80, 🌐www.pennarbed.fr) sail to Ouessant and Molène all year, with one to six daily departures from Le Conquet (first sailing at 8am daily early July to late Aug, 9am May to early July and late Aug to mid–Sept, 9.45am otherwise; Ouessant return €26.60, to Molène €23.40), and one to three daily from Brest, always including one at 8.30am, which is the only one that stops at Molène (Ouessant return €30.70; Molène return €27.50). They also depart from Camaret to Ouessant at 8.40am on Wednesday from early April until mid–Sept, and daily at 8.40am from early July until the end of Aug (return €27.50). Only on Fridays between early July and late Aug is it possible to sail from Camaret to Molène, at 8.40am (return €23.40).

Finist’Mer (☎08.25.13.52.35, 🌐www.finist-mer.fr) operate high-speed ferries to Ouessant in summer only. From Le Conquet, they offer two to four departures daily between April and September, with the first one being at 9am from early July until late August, and 9.30am otherwise (€26 return). Between early July and late August, they also sail to Ouessant from Brest, at 8.45am daily (€30.50 return), and from Lanildut, 25km northwest of Brest, with the first departure from Le Conquet calling there at 9.30am (€27.50 return). From Camaret, they sail on Thursdays only for the first three weeks of June, at 8.45pm; then offer a daily departure from late June until early July, and again from late August until mid–September, at 8.45am; between early July and late August, the boat leaves daily at 9.25am (€27 return).

In addition, you can fly to Ouessant with Finist’Air (☎02.98.84.64.87, 🌐www.finistair.fr). The fifteen-minute flights leave Brest’s Guipavas airport daily at 8.30am and 4.45pm, with an adult one-way fare of €64 and groups of three or more adults costing €53 each.

Île d'Ouessant

You arrive on the Île d'Ouessant at the modern harbour in the ominously-sounding Baie du Stiff. There's a scattering of houses here and dotted around the island, but the single town – with the only hotels and restaurants – is 4km away at LAMPAUL. Everybody from the boat heads there, either by the bus that meets each ferry or on bicycles rented from one of the many waiting entrepreneurs – a good idea, as the island is a bit too big to explore on foot.

There's not a lot to Lampaul. The best beaches are sprawled around its bay, and, in case you should forget the perils of the sea, the town cemetery's war memorial lists all the ships in which townsfolk were lost, alongside graves of unknown sailors washed ashore and a chapel of wax “proëlla crosses” symbolizing the many islanders who never returned.

At NIOU, 1km northwest, the Maison du Niou is actually two houses and a few outbuildings, which jointly form the Éco-Musée d'Ouessant (Easter–Sept Tues–Sun 10.30am–6.30pm; Oct–Easter Tues–Sun 1.30–5.30pm; €3.30, or €6.50 for combined admission with the Musée des Phares et Balises). One house contains a museum of island history, detailing how boys from the age of 11 used to embark on sea voyages of up to three years' duration, while the women were responsible for growing crops back home. The other is a reconstruction of a traditional island house, almost entirely filled by massive “box-beds”.

Another kilometre west, the Creac'h lighthouse was in 1939 the most powerful in the world, with a 500-million-candlepower beam capable of being seen from England's Cape Lizard. You can't visit the lighthouse tower itself, but the complex at its base holds the Musée des Phares et Balises (same hours as the Éco-Musée; €4.10 or €6.50 for both museums), a large museum about lighthouses and buoys. As well as providing a history of lighthouses from the Pharos of Alexandria and Roman examples, it's crammed with assorted lenses and mirrors, and has detailed displays on shipwrecks in the vicinity. None of the information is in English, however, and photography is not permitted.

The Creac'h lighthouse makes a good starting point from which to set out along the barren and exposed rocks of the north coast. Particularly in September and other times of migration, it's a remarkable spot for birdwatching, frequented by puffins, storm petrels and cormorants.

General information is available from Lampaul's central tourist office (Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 1.30–6pm, Sun 10am–noon; ☎02.98.48.85.83, 🌐www.ot-ouessant.fr). The town boasts a small hostel, La Croix Rouge, north towards Niou (☎02.98.48.84.53, ✉ajouessant@club-internet.fr; closed Jan), where a dorm bed plus breakfast costs €15. Lampaul also holds two hotels. Only one, the more attractive Roch Ar Mor, offers sea views, though not from all rooms (☎02.98.48.80.19, 🌐perso.orange.fr/rocharmor; 📍; closed Jan to mid-Feb & late Nov to mid-Dec). Its restaurant too enjoys a fine prospect of the beach, but the food there is more expensive and less good than at the rival Fromveur, just up the street near the church (☎02.98.48.81.30; 📍; closed mid-Nov to Jan), where the rooms have been reasonably renovated, and the traditional island cooking is pretty good. Expect to pay around €20 for a set lunch. There's also a small official campsite, the Penn ar Bed, just outside town (☎02.98.48.84.65; closed Oct–March).

Île de Molène

The Île de Molène is quite well populated for a sparse strip of sand. Its inhabitants make their money from seaweed collecting and drying – and to an extent from crabbing and from crayfish, which they gather on foot, canoe or even tractor at low tide. The tides here are more than usually dramatic, halving or doubling the island's territory at a stroke – it's not called "the bald isle" for nothing. Few people do more than look at Molène as an afternoon's excursion from Le Conquet, but it's possible to stay too. There are rooms – very chilly in winter – at Kastell An Doal (☎02.98.07.39.11; 📍; closed mid-Jan to mid-Feb), one of the old buildings by the port.

Brest

Set in a magnificent natural harbour, known as the Rade de Brest, the city of BREST is doubly sheltered from ocean storms by the bulk of Léon to the north and by the Crozon peninsula to the south. It has always played an important role in war, and in trade whenever peace allowed. Today it is the base of the French Atlantic Fleet with a dry dock that can accommodate ships of up to 500,000 tonnes; as a ship repair centre, Brest ranks sixth in the world.

During World War II, Brest was continually bombed to prevent the Germans from using it as a submarine base. When the Americans liberated it on September 18, 1944 after a six-week siege, they found the town devastated beyond recognition. The architecture of the postwar town is raw and bleak and though there have been attempts to green the city, it has proved too windswept to respond.

Arrival and information

The gare SNCF and gare routière (☎02.98.44.46.73) stand shoulder-to-shoulder in place du 19ème RI at the bottom of avenue Clemenceau. Though right at the end of the railway system, Brest is just four hours away from Paris by TGV. Bus services include those to Plouescat and Roscoff, the Crozon peninsula via Le Faou, and to Le Conquet.

Brest's airport (☎02.98.32.01.00), 9km northeast of the centre at Guipavas, is served by flights from London Luton on Ryanair (🌐www.ryanair.com), and from Birmingham, Edinburgh, Exeter and Southampton on British European (🌐www.flybe.com), and also offers local connections to Ouessant (see p.443). An airport shuttle bus runs from the gare SNCF and the tourist office (6–11 daily; 25min; ☎02.98.32.01.00). All the major international car rental chains are represented at the airport.

As well as the sailings to Ouessant, detailed on p.443, in summer boats make the 25-minute crossing from Brest's Port de Commerce to Le Fret on the Crozon peninsula (Société Azenor; July–Sept 2–4 daily; €15 return; ☎02.98.41.46.23, 🌐www.azenor.com). The same company also sails to Camaret (July & Aug daily except Sat 2 daily; €15 return), as well as offering excursions, along with other operators, around the harbour and the Rade de Brest (1hr 30min; usually around €15).

Brest's tourist office on avenue Clemenceau faces place de la Liberté (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–noon; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.98.44.24.96, 🌐www.brest-metropole-tourisme.fr).

Accommodation

The vast majority of Brest's hotels remain open throughout the year; only a few, however, bother to maintain their own restaurants. Several lie within easy walking distance of the stations, near the central place de la Liberté. The year-round hostel, at 5 rue de Kerbriant, Port de Plaisance du Moulin-Blanc, also serves inexpensive meals (☎02.98.41.90.41, 🌐www.aj-brest.org; €12.90 including breakfast). It's 3km east of the gare SNCF – take bus #7.

Hotels

Astoria 9 rue Traverse ☎02.98.80.19.10, 🌐www.hotel-astoria-brest.com. Peaceful central hotel with a cheerful ambience and decor, not far up from the port. Some rooms have sea views, while the four cheapest only have a sink. Closed 3 weeks Dec–Jan. ①–③

Citôtel de la Gare 4 bd Gambetta ☎02.98.44.47.01, 🌐www.hotelgare.com. En-suite rooms opposite the stations; you can pay a little extra for an uninterrupted view of the Rade de Brest from the upper storeys. Internet access for guests. ③

Continental place de la Tour d'Auvergne ☎02.98.80.50.40, 🌐www.hotel-sofibra.com.

Grand luxury hotel, not far from the tourist office, with helpful staff and spotlessly clean rooms, several of them with fine Art Deco features; rooms on the fourth floor have large balconies. ⑦

Océania Brest Centre 82 rue de Siam ☎02.98.80.66.66, 🌐www.hotel-sofibra.com. Good-quality upmarket hotel, offering large, attractively fitted rooms on the town's principal thoroughfare, plus a classy restaurant. ⑤

Pasteur 29 rue Louis-Pasteur ☎02.98.46.08.73. Clean, good-value budget hotel, offering plain if potentially noisy en-suite rooms above a bar near the St-Louis church. ②

The Town

For the casual tourist, Brest has little to offer, and few relics of the past remain. The fifteenth-century castle looks impressive on its headland and offers a superb panorama of the city, but inside it's not especially interesting. Three of its towers house part of the collection of the Musée National de la Marine (daily: April to mid-Sept 10am–6.30pm; mid-Sept to March 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €5; 🌐www.musee-marine.fr). The fourteenth-century Tour Tanguy on the opposite bank of the River Penfeld, with its conical slate roof, serves as a history museum of Brest before 1939 (June–Sept daily 10am–noon & 2–7pm; Oct–May Wed & Thurs 2–5pm, Sat & Sun 2–6pm; free).

Brest's most up-to-the-minute attraction is Océanopolis, a couple of kilometres east of the city centre beside the Port de Plaisance du Moulin-Blanc (daily: April to early Sept 9am–6pm; early Sept to March Tues–Sat 10am–5pm, Sun 10am–6pm; €15.40; 🌐www.oceanopolis.com). This futuristic complex currently consists of three distinct aquariums and a 3-D cinema. The aquarium in the main white dome, known as the Temperate Pavilion, focuses on the Breton littoral and Finistère's fishing industry, holding all kinds of fish, seals, molluscs, seaweed and sea anemones. The emphasis is very much on the edible, with the displays on the life-cycle of a scallop, for example, culminating in a detailed recipe. That's complemented by a Tropical Pavilion, with a tankful of ferocious-looking sharks plus a myriad of rainbow-hued smaller fish that populate a highly convincing coral reef, and a Polar Pavilion, complete with polar bears and penguins. Everything's very high-tech, and at times a little earnest, but it's possible to spend an entertaining day here – especially if you take the assorted restaurants, snack bars and gift stores into consideration.

Eating

As well as several low-priced places near the stations, Brest offers a wide assortment of restaurants. Rue Jean-Jaurès, climbing east from the place de la Liberté, holds plenty of bistros and bars, while place Guérin to the north is the centre of the student-dominated quartier St-Martin.

Le Bistro de Gaëtan 3 place Maurice-Gillet ☎02.98.43.44.10. Much-loved local restaurant in the St-Martin district, which serves a great-value €7.50 lunch menu but is most renowned for its many variations on the classic kig ha farz Breton stew, starting at €12.90. Closed Sun eve & Mon.

La Maison de l'Océan 2 quai de la Douane ☎02.98.80.44.84. Blue-hued fish restaurant down by the port, open daily for lunch and dinner, and serving top-quality seafood menus from €14.50.

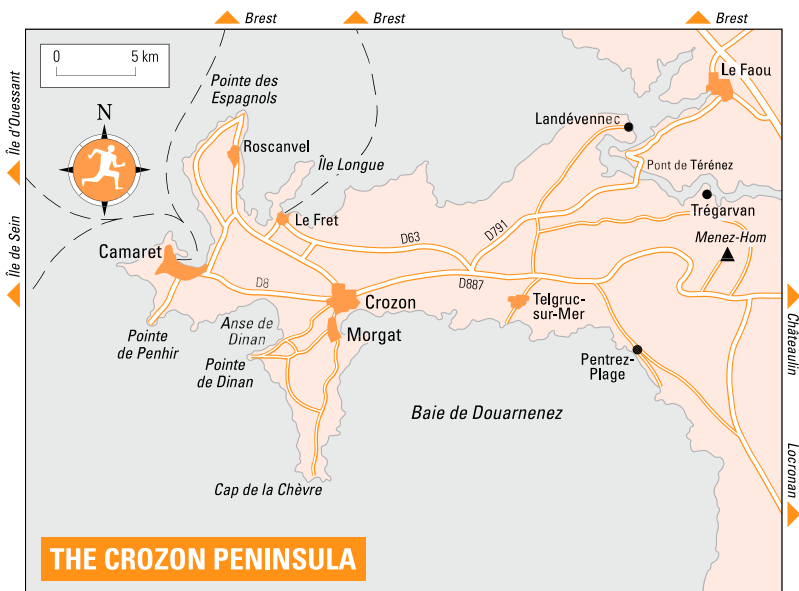

Ma Petite Folie plage du Moulin-Blanc ☎02.98.42.44.42. Converted fishing boat, moored in the pleasure port, which serves a wonderfully fishy €20 set menu and also offers a wide range of à la carte dishes and daily specials.

Le Ruffé 1 rue Yves-Collet ☎02.98.46.07.70. An attractive place between the gare SNCF and the tourist office, open late, that prides itself on good, traditional French seafood dishes, served on menus costing €17.50 and upwards. Closed Sun eve & Mon.

The Crozon peninsula

The Crozon peninsula, a craggy outcrop of land shaped like a long-robed giant, arms outstretched to defend bay and roadstead, is the central feature of Finistère's torn chaos of estuaries and promontories. Much the easiest way for cyclists and travellers relying on public transport to reach the peninsula from Brest is via the ferries to Le Fret (see p.445).

As you approach the Crozon peninsula, it's well worth making a slight detour to climb the hill of Ménez-Hom, "at the giant's feet", for a fabulous view of the land and water alternating out to the ocean. Getting down to the coastal headlands themselves can be a bit of a disappointment after this vision: those extremities that don't house military installations tend to be too crowded. But it is the cliffs that tourists head for here, and some of the beaches, like La Palue on the southern arm, are almost deserted.

Daoulas and Le Faou

Ten kilometres beyond Plougastel-Daoulas, the abbey at DAOULAS holds Brittany's only Romanesque cloister. It now stands beautiful and isolated at the edge of cool monastery gardens, since its surrounding buildings were destroyed during the Revolution. Since 1984 it has been used as a cultural centre for Finistère, which stages ambitious historical exhibitions lasting for around six months at a time (daily 10.30am–6.30pm; ☎02.98.25.84.39, 🌐www.abbaye-daoulas.com; €6 for the abbey, gardens and exhibition).

From Daoulas the motorway and railway cut down to Châteaulin and Quimper. For Crozon, you'll need to veer west at LE FAOU, a tiny medieval port, still boasting a few sixteenth-century gabled houses and set on its own individual estuary. From beside the pretty little village church, a sheltered corniche follows the river to the sea, where there are sailing and windsurfing facilities.

Le Faou holds two good and very similar hotels, both Logis de France with top-class restaurants – the Relais de la Place, 7 place aux Foires (☎02.98.81.91.19; 🍷; closed Sat & all of Jan), which serves a particularly good €25 Menu du Terroir, and the Hôtel de Beauvoir (☎02.98.81.90.31, 🌐www.hotel-beauvoir.com; 🍷; closed Mon & Tues lunch mid-June to mid-Oct, Mon lunch & Sun eve mid-Oct to mid-June), where the cheapest menu is €27.50. The one snag is that they're not in the most attractive part of town, near the river, but a few hundred metres south.

Landévennec

Nine kilometres west of Le Faou, by way of a beautiful shoreline road, the Pont de Térénez spans the Aulne – outlet for the Nantes–Brest canal – to the Crozon peninsula. Doubling back to the right as soon as you cross the bridge brings you after a further 5km to LANDÉVENNEC, where archeologists are uncovering the outline of what may be Brittany's oldest abbey (May, June daily except Sat 2–6pm; July to mid-Sept daily 10am–7pm; last 2 weeks of Sept Mon–Fri 10am–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; Oct–April Sun 2–6pm; €4). Nothing survives above ground of the original thatched hut, constructed in a forest clearing by St Gwenolé around 485 AD. After the abbey had been pillaged by raiding Normans in 913 AD, however, it was rebuilt in stone. Those foundations can now be seen, together with displays on monastic history and facsimile manuscripts. There's a small but attractive hotel in the heart of Landévennec, Le St-Patrick (☎02.98.27.70.83, 🌐lesaintpatrick@orange.fr; 🍷; closed Oct–March).

Crozon and Morgat

The first town on the peninsula proper, CROZON is not much more than a one-way traffic system to distribute tourists among the various resorts – though it does keep a market running most of the week. MORGAT, just down the hill, is a more realistic and enticing base. It has a long crescent beach that ends in a pine slope, and a well-sheltered harbour full of pleasure boats raced down from England and Ireland. The main attractions are boat trips around the various headlands, such as the Cap de la Chèvre (which is a good clifftop walk if you'd rather make your own way). The most popular is the 45-minute tour of the Grottes with Vedettes Rosmeur (daily April to late Sept; ☎02.98.27.10.71; €9). From these multicoloured caves in the cliffs, accessible only by sea but with steep “chimneys” up to the clifftops, saints would allegedly emerge in bygone days to rescue the shipwrecked.

The tourist office for the whole peninsula is in the gare routière at Crozon (June & Sept Mon–Fri 9.15am–noon & 2–5.30pm, Sat 9.15am–noon & 2–5pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.15am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9.15am–noon & 2–5.30pm; ☎ 02.98.27.07.92, 🌐 www.crozon.com).

Appealing hotels in Morgat include the imposing 1930s Grand Hôtel de la Mer, at the eastern end of the beach (☎ 02.98.27.02.09, @thierry.vignier@vfv-vacances.fr; 📍; closed mid-Oct to March), and the quieter Julia, 400m from the beach at 43 rue de Tréfleze (☎ 02.98.27.05.89, 🌐 www.hoteljulia.fr; 📍; closed Nov–Feb except Christmas). With around nine hundred pitches available, campers are spoilt for choice: the best options are the three-star sites at Plage de Goulien (☎ 02.98.26.23.16, @camping.delaplage.degoulien@presquile-crozon.com; closed mid-Sept to mid-June) and Les Pins, towards the pointe de Dinan (☎ 02.98.26.23.16, @camping.lespins@presquile-crozon.com; closed Nov–Easter).

A flowery stone cottage near the port at 24 quai du Kador holds 🍷 Au Pied du Port (☎ 02.98.26.12.63; closed Oct–Easter), Morgat's best restaurant, which serves refined menus from €24; what's on offer very much depends on the day's catch, but the E36 Menu Tentation is consistently wonderful.

Camaret

At CAMARET – another sheltered port, at the very tip of the peninsula – the most prominent building is the pink-orange château de Vauban, standing foursquare at the end of the long jetty that runs back parallel to the main town waterfront. Walled, moated, and accessible via a little gatehouse reached by means of a drawbridge, it was built in 1689 to guard the approaches to Brest; these days it guards no more than a motley assortment of decaying half-submerged fishing boats, abandoned to rot beside the jetty. There are two beaches nearby – a small one to the north and another, larger and more attractive, in the low-lying (and rather marshy) Anse de Dinan. In summer, ferries run from Camaret to the islands of Ouessant (see p.443) and Sein (see p.443).

Camaret has its own little tourist office at 15 quai Kleber (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎ 02.98.27.93.60, 🌐 www.camaret-sur-mer.com). A little walk away from the centre, around the port towards the protective jetty, the quai du Styvel contains a row of excellent hotels. Both the Vauban (☎ 02.98.27.91.36; 📍; closed Dec & Jan) and Du Styvel (☎ 02.98.27.92.74; 📍; closed Jan) are exceptionally hospitable, with rooms that look right out across the bay, but only the Styvel has a restaurant. There are also several campsites nearby, such as the four-star Grand Large (☎ 02.98.27.91.41, 🌐 www.campinglegrandlarge.com; closed Oct–March) and the two-star municipal Lannic (☎ 02.98.27.91.31; closed Oct–March).

Back along the quayside in the centre of town, the quai Toudouze, you'll find a succession of excellent fish restaurants, including Les Frères de la Côte at no. 11 (☎ 02.98.27.95.42; closed late Sept to April), and the Côté Mer at no. 12 (☎ 02.98.27.93.79; closed Wed & Thurs in low season).

South towards Quimper

Moving south of the Crozon peninsula, you soon enter the ancient kingdom of Cornouaille. The most direct route to the region's principal city, Quimper, leaves the sea behind and heads due south, passing close to the unchanged medieval village of Locronan. However, if you can spare the time, it's worth following the supremely isolated coastline instead around the Baie de Douarnenez to the Pointe du Raz, the western tip of Finistère. With a few exceptions – most notably its “land’s end” capes – this stretch of coast has kept out of the tourist mainstream, and nowhere does that hold more true than on the remarkable, remote Île de Sein.

Locronan

LOCRONAN, a short way from the sea on the minor road that leads down from the Crozon peninsula, is a prime example of a Breton town that has remained frozen in its ancient form by more recent economic decline. From 1469 through to the seventeenth century, it was a successful centre for woven linen, supplying sails to the French, English and Spanish navies. It was first rivalled by Vitré and Rennes, before suffering the “agony and ruin” so graphically described in its small museum (Feb–June & Sept Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 2–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 2–7pm; €2). As a result, the rich medieval houses of the town centre have never been superseded or surrounded by modern development. Film directors love its authenticity, even if Roman Polanski, filming Tess, deemed it necessary to change all the porches, put new windows on the Renaissance houses, and bury the main square in mud to make it all look a bit more English.

Today Locronan, thanks to tourism, is once more prosperous, but this commercialization shouldn’t put you off making at least a passing visit, for the town itself is genuinely remarkable, centred around the focal Église St-Ronan. Be sure to take the time to walk down the hill of the rue Moal, to the lovely little stone chapel of Nôtre-Dame de Bonne Nouvelle.

The tourist office is next to the museum (same hours; ☎02.98.91.70.14, 🌐www.locronan.org). The one hotel, du Prieuré, at 11 rue du Prieuré on the main approach street (☎02.98.91.70.89, 🌐www.hotel-le-prieure.com; 📍; closed Feb, plus Fri eve & Sat lunch in low season) is not particularly attractive, but offers well-equipped rooms and possesses a good restaurant.

Douarnenez

Sufficient quantities of tuna, sardines and assorted crustaceans are still landed at the port of DOUARNENEZ, in the superbly sheltered Baie de Douarnenez, south of the Crozon peninsula, to keep the largest fish canneries in Europe busy. However, the catch has been declining ever since 1923, when eight hundred fishing boats brought in 100 million sardines during the six-month season. Over the last twenty years or so, Douarnenez has therefore set out – at phenomenal expense, the subject of considerable local controversy – to redefine itself as a living museum of all matters maritime.

Since 1993, Port-Rhû, on the west side of town, has been designated as the Port-Musée, with its entire waterfront taken up with fishing and other vessels gathered from throughout northern Europe. Its centrepiece, the Musée du Bateau (Boat Museum) in place de l’Enfer (April to mid-June & mid-Sept to early Nov daily except Mon 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; mid-June to mid-Sept daily 10am–7pm; €6.20) houses slightly smaller vessels than those found in the port, including a moliceiro from Portugal and coracles from Wales and Ireland, with exhaustive explanations on boat construction techniques and a strong emphasis on fishing. The most appealing part of the museum visit, however, is back at the waterfront, where you can roam in and out of five boats, peering into their oily metallic-smelling engine rooms and cramped sleeping quarters.

Of the three separate harbour areas still in operation, by far the most appealing is the rough-and-ready port du Rosmeur, on the east side, which is nominally the fishing port used by the smaller local craft. Its quayside – which is far from totally commercialized, but holds a reasonable number of cafés and restaurants – curves between a pristine wooded promontory to the right and the fish canneries to the left, which continue around the north of the headland.

Although the various beaches around town look pretty enough, the sea here is dangerous for swimming. They have, however, become very popular with surfers in recent years.

The tourist office in Douarnenez is at 2 rue du Dr-Mével (July & Aug Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; ☎02.98.92.13.35, 🌐www.douarnenez-tourisme.com), a short walk up from the Port-Musée. Among good-value hotels are Le Bretagne, nearby at 23 rue Duguay-Trouin (☎02.98.92.30.44, 🌐www.le-bretagne.fr; 📍), above a restaurant serving reasonable Tex-Mex dishes for around €12, and the more upmarket De France, also nearby, on the main street at 4 rue Jean-Jaurès (☎02.98.92.00.02, 📧hotel.de.france.dz@orange.fr; 📍; closed Mon, Sat lunch & Sun eve), which has a good restaurant. Close by on the bay, at Tréboul/Les Sables Blancs, there's a two-star campsite, Croas Men (☎02.98.74.00.18, 🌐www.croas-men.com; closed Oct–March). In addition to the hotel restaurants, Les Bigorneaux Amoureux, 2 bd Richepin (☎02.98.92.35.55; closed Mon), is a good seafood place which has a terrace overlooking the place des Dames.

The Baie des Trépassés and the Pointe du Raz

The Baie des Trépassés (Bay of the Dead), 30km west of Douarnenez, gets its grim name from the shipwrecked bodies that used to be washed up there, and is a possible site of the lost city of Ys (see p.454). However, it's actually a very attractive spot; green meadows, too exposed to support trees, end abruptly on the low cliffs to either side; there's a huge expanse of flat sand (in fact little else at low tide); and out in the crashing waves surfers and windsurfers get thrashed to within an inch of their lives. Beyond them, you can usually make out the white-painted houses along the harbour on the Île de Sein, while the various uninhabited rocks in between hold a veritable forest of lighthouses.

In total, less than half a dozen scattered buildings intrude upon the emptiness, including two hotels, both with tremendous views. Right in the middle is the pink 🏨 Hôtel de la Baie des Trépassés (☎02.98.70.61.34, 🌐www.baiedestrepases.com; 📍–📍; closed mid–Nov to mid–Feb), which has a handful of cheaper rooms without en-suite facilities, and serves menus of wonderfully fresh seafood from €21. The larger Relais de la Pointe du Van, run by the same management, is slightly higher up, to the right (☎02.98.70.62.79, same website; 📍; closed Oct–March).

The Pointe du Raz

The Pointe du Raz – the Land's End of both Finistère and France – is designated as a “Grand Site National”, and makes a magnificent spectacle. Don't expect to have the place to yourself; with a million visitors every year, they've had to build a huge car park 1km short of the actual headland (€5 cars, €3 motorcycles), alongside a new information complex (April–June & Sept daily 10.30am–6pm; July & Aug daily 9.30am–7pm; ☎ 02.98.70.67.18, 🌐 www.pointeduraz.com).

△ Pointe du Raz

To reach the pointe, catch one of the frequent free shuttle buses (and check the time of the last one back); walk the most direct route, along an undulating, arrow-straight, track; or take a longer stroll along the footpath that skirts the top of the cliffs. You'll be glad of strong-gripping shoes as you teeter above the plummeting fissures of the pointe, filling and draining with a deafening surf-roar. The winds are often as fierce as the waves, buffeting the thousands of seabirds that make this their home.

Audierne

Though on the whole the exposed southwestern extremities of Brittany are not areas you'd immediately associate with a classic summer sun-and-sand holiday, AUDIERNE, 25km west of Douarnenez on the Baie d'Audierne, is an exception. An active fishing port, specializing in prawns and crayfish, it spreads along the northern shore of the Goyen estuary a short way back from the sea. From the town centre, the road continues just over 1km to the long, curving and surprisingly sheltered beach of Ste-Evette.

At the inland end of town, an aquarium called L'Aquashow (April–Sept daily 10am–7pm; Oct Sun–Thurs 2–5pm; Nov–March school holidays only 2–5pm; €11.50) holds tankfuls of mostly local fish, captioned as ever with the stress on gastronomy – “the flesh is firm and much enjoyed” – and captive cormorants and gulls put on regular aerobic displays.

Audierne's tourist office is on the main square in the heart of town, at 8 rue Victor-Hugo (July & Aug Mon–Sat 10am–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9am–noon & 2–5pm, Sat 9am–1pm; ☎02.98.70.12.20, 🌐www.audierne-tourisme.com). On the seaward side of the road, in a superb position right at Ste-Evette beach, stands the hotel Au Roi Gradlon, 3 bd Manu-Brusq (☎02.98.70.04.51, 🌐www.auroigradlon.com; 📍). Its unusual design means that its high-quality street-level dining room is in fact on the top storey, with several further floors, concealed from the road, dropping down below it to the beach.

The île de Sein

Of all the Breton islands, the tiny île de Sein, just 8km off the end of the Pointe du Raz, has to be the most extraordinary. Its very grip on existence seems so tenuous that it's hard to believe anyone could truly survive here; nowhere does it rise more than six metres above the surrounding ocean, and for much of its 2.5-kilometre length it's barely broader than the breakwater wall of bricks that serves as its central spine.

In fact, the island has been inhabited since prehistoric times, and it was reputed to have been the very last refuge of the druids in Brittany. It also became famous during World War II, when its entire male population answered General de Gaulle's call to join him in exile in England. Today, over three hundred islanders continue to make their living from the sea, gathering rainwater and seaweed, and fishing for scallops, lobster and crayfish.

Setting off to reach the island on a misty morning feels as though you're sailing off the edge of the world. There are no cars here, and even bicycles are not permitted. Depending on the tide, boats pull in at one or other of the two adjoining harbours that constitute Sein's one tight-knit village, in front of which a little beach appears at low tide. The village also holds a museum of local history (June & Sept daily 10am–noon & 2–4pm, July & Aug daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €2.50), packed with black-and-white photos and press clippings, and displaying a long list of shipwrecks from 1476 onwards. The basic activity for visitors, however, is to take a bracing walk.

The principal departure point for boats to Sein is Ste-Evette beach, just outside Audierne (see above); the crossing takes around an hour. Services are operated by Vedette-Biniou (early July to late Aug, daily 10am, 1.30pm & 5pm; ☎02.98.70.21.15, 🌐www.vedette-biniou.fr.st; €25 return), and Penn Ar Bed (daily: early July to late Aug 9am, 11.30am & 4.50pm; late Aug to early July 9.30am; ☎02.98.70.70.70, 🌐www.pennarbed.fr; €23.40 return). On Sundays from late June to early September, Penn Ar Bed also run trips to Sein from Brest (departs 8am; 1hr 30min; €30.70 return) via Camaret (8.40am; 1hr; €27.50 return).

Sein is hardly bursting with facilities, but it does hold two hotels: the Trois Dauphins, looking out over the beach from the middle of the port (☎02.98.70.92.09; 📍, sea view 📍), and the Hôtel-Restaurant d'Armen (☎02.98.70.90.77, 🌐www.hotel-armen.net; 📍), the very last building you come to as you walk west out of town – all its rooms face the sea as there's ocean on both sides, and it serves good food.

5

BRITANNY

Quimper

Quimper

QUIMPER, capital of the ancient diocese, kingdom and later duchy of Cornouaille, is the oldest Breton city. According to legend, the first bishop of Quimper, St Corentin, came with the first Bretons across the Channel to the place they named Little Britain. He lived by eating a regenerating and immortal fish, and was made bishop by one King Gradlon, whose life he later saved when the sea-bed city of Ys was destroyed. Gradlon had built Ys in the Baie de Douarnenez, protected from the water by gates and locks to which only he and his daughter had keys. However, St Corentin suspected her of evil doings, and was proven right: at the urging of the Devil, the princess unlocked the gates, the city flooded and Gradlon escaped only by obeying Corentin and throwing his daughter into the sea. Back on dry land and in need of a new capital, Gradlon founded Quimper. Ys remains on the sea floor; it will rise again when Paris (“Par-Ys”, “equal to Ys”) sinks. According to tradition, on feast days sailors can still hear church bells and hymns under the water.

A relaxed kind of place, modern Quimper is still active enough to have the bars – and the atmosphere – to make it worth going out café-crawling. “The charming little place” known to Flaubert takes at most half an hour to cross on foot. The town's name comes from “kemper”, denoting the junction of the two rivers, the Steir and the Odet, around which cram the cobbled streets (now mainly pedestrianized) of the medieval quarter, dominated by the cathedral nearby. As the Odet curves from east to southwest it's crossed by numerous low, flat bridges, bedecked with geraniums and chrysanthemums in autumn. You can stroll along the boulevards on both banks of the river, where several ultramodern edifices blend in a surprisingly harmonious way with their ancient – and attractive – surroundings. Overlooking all are the wooded slopes of Mont Frugy. There's no great pressure in Quimper to rush around monuments or museums, and the most enjoyable option may be to take a boat and drift down “the prettiest river in France” to the open sea at Bénodet.

Arrival and information

The gare SNCF and gare routière (☎02.98.90.88.89) are next to each other on avenue de la Gare, 1km east of the town centre. Both are connected to the centre by bus #6, and all city buses pass the tourist office, via either place de la Résistance or along rue du Parc on the other side of the river, depending on which direction you are going. If you want to use public transport to get to the coast anywhere in the immediate vicinity, the bus is your only option. The most useful local operator is the Compagnie Américaine de Transport, or CAT, 10 rue Jules-Verne (☎02.98.90.88.89), who run services to Bénodet, leaving from the gare routière or place de la Résistance; to Audierne and Pointe du Raz, from the gare routière or place de Locronan; and to Concarneau and Quimperlé, also from the gare routière or place de la Résistance.

Between June and September you can cruise from Quimper down the Odet to Bénodet, which takes about 1hr 15min each way, on Vedettes de l'Odet (Bénodet ☎02.98.57.00.58, Quimper ☎02.98.52.98.41, 🌐www.vedettes-odet.com; €23 return). Both the schedules and the precise departure point vary according to the tide; the river in the town centre is too shallow, so the boats always moor at least a short distance downstream. Between one and four boats sail every day (except Sun in July & Aug); check with the tourist office (who also sell tickets).

Quimper's tourist office is housed in a small single-storey building on the south bank of the Odet at 7 rue de la Déesse, place de la Résistance (mid-March to May & last 2 weeks in Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm; June & first two weeks of Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–12.45pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5.45pm; Oct to mid-March Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; ☎02.98.53.04.05, 🌐www.quimper-tourisme.com). For Internet access, call in at Cybercopy, 3 bd de Kerguélen (Mon 1–7pm, Tues–Fri 9am–7pm, Sat 9am–3pm, closed mid-July to mid-Aug; ☎02.98.64.33.99).

Accommodation

There are remarkably few hotels in the old streets in the centre of Quimper, though several can be found near the station. There's a four-star camp-site, Orangerie de Lannion, 4km out of the centre on the route de Bénodet (☎02.98.90.62.02; 🌐www.lanniron.com; closed mid-Sept to mid-May).

Hotels

Le Derby 13 av de la Gare ☎02.98.52.06.91.

Inexpensive, surprisingly quiet option above a corner bar facing the station. 2

Le Dupleix 34 bd Dupleix ☎02.98.90.53.35,

🌐www.hotel-dupleix.com. Modern concrete hotel, not very attractive from the outside but airy and bright within, in a good central location overlooking the Odet, with fine views across the river to the cathedral. The private garage is a major advantage. 5

De la Gare 17 av de la Gare ☎02.98.90.00.81,

🌐www.hoteldelagarequimper.com. Simple rooms, all with TV, shower and phone, arranged around a quiet patio and above a simple snack bar across from the station. Parking. 6

Gradlon 30 rue du Brest ☎02.98.95.04.39,

🌐www.hotel-gradlon.com. Central but quiet (with a pleasant garden), and exceptionally friendly. The rooms may not be cheap, but they're tastefully decorated in clean, fresh pastels. 5

TGV 4 rue de Concarneau ☎02.98.90.54.00,

🌐www.hoteltgv.com. Yet another cheap option near the station, this time offering plain but clean rooms with shower and TV at bargain rates. 2

The Town

The enormous Cathédrale St-Corentin, the focal point of Quimper, is said to be the most complete Gothic cathedral in Brittany, though its neo-Gothic spires date from 1856. When the nave was being added to the old chancel in the fifteenth century, the extension would either have hit existing buildings or the swampy edge of the then-unchannelled river. The masons eventually found a solution and placed the nave at a slight angle – a peculiarity which, once noticed, makes it hard to concentrate on the other Gothic splendours within. The exterior, however, gives no hint of the deviation, with King Gradlon now mounted in perfect symmetry between the spires.

The Musée des Beaux-Arts faces the cathedral on its north side, at 4 place St-Corentin (April–June, Sept & Oct Mon & Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–7pm; Nov–March Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; €4.50). Refurbished to very classy effect, with new floors and suspended walkways, it focuses especially on an amazing assemblage of drawings by Max Jacob – who was born in Quimper – and his contemporaries. Jean-Julien Lemordant’s vibrant murals of Breton scenes, commissioned in 1907 for Quimper’s Hôtel de l’Epée (which closed in 1974) get a room to themselves, and there’s also quite a selection of nineteenth- and twentieth-century paintings from the Pont-Aven school, though you’d hardly notice the only Gauguin, a goose he painted on the door of Marie Henry’s inn in Pont-Aven itself.

The heart of old Quimper lies in and to the west of place St-Corentin, in front of the cathedral. This is where you’ll find the liveliest shops and cafés, housed in old half-timbered buildings, such as the Breton Keltia-Musique record shop at 1 place au Beurre, and the Celtic shop, Ar Bed Keltiek, between the cathedral and the river at 2 rue du Roi-Gradlon. The light and spacious marketplace, the Halles St-Francis, on rue Astor, is quite a delight, not just for the food, but for the view past the upturned boat rafters through the roof to the cathedral’s twin spires. It’s open from Monday to Saturday, with an extra-large market spreading into the surrounding streets on Saturdays.

South of the covered market, on the opposite bank of the Odet at 14 rue Jean-Baptiste-Bosquet, is the excellent Musée de la Faïence Jules Verlinque (mid-April to mid-Oct Mon–Sat 10am–6pm; €4; www.quimper-faïences.com). The museum tells the story of Quimper’s long association with faïence – tin-glazed earthenware – which has been made in and around the town since 1690, and demonstrates that little has changed in the Breton pottery business since some unknown artisan hit on the idea of painting ceramic ware with naive “folk” designs. That was in around 1875, when the coming of the railways brought the first influx of tourists, and a consequent demand for souvenirs.

As you walk through the town, it’s impossible to ignore faïence – you’re invited to look and to buy on every corner. On weekdays, it’s also possible to visit the major atelier H.-B. Henriot, in the allées de Locmaria just behind the museum (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.15–11.15am & 1.30–4.15pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9.15–11.15am & 2–4.15pm; ☎02.98.90.09.36, www.hb-henriot.com; €3.50). H.-B. Henriot maintain two bright, modern gift shops alongside; the prices, even for the seconds, are similar to those on offer everywhere else, but the selection is superb.

Eating and drinking

Although the pedestrian streets west of the cathedral are unexpectedly short on places to eat, there are quite a few restaurants further east on the north side of the river, en route towards the gare SNCF. Rue Aristide-Briand here also contains a lively Celtic bar, the Ceili at no 4. For crêperies, the place au Beurre, a short walk northwest of the cathedral, is a good bet.

L’Ambroisie 49 rue Élie-Fréron ☎02.98.95.00.02. Upmarket French restaurant a short climb north from the cathedral, featuring lots of fine seafood (including tuna) and meat dishes on menus from €22. Closed Mon, plus Sun eve in winter.

La Brasserie de l’Epée 14 rue du Parc ☎02.98.95.28.97. Lovely Art Nouveau brasserie, facing the river not far from the cathedral, which serves good-value menus in all price ranges, and stays open late – you can still get a meal at 11pm, which is rare indeed for Brittany. Closed Sun & Mon.

La Couscousserie 1 bd de Kerguélen ☎02.98.95.46.50. Plush, enjoyable Middle Eastern restaurant by the river, serving couscous platters at €11–22, and tagines for around €15, in two Arabian Nights-themed rooms decked out with hookahs and the like. Closed Aug.

La Fleur de Sel 1 quai Neuf ☎02.98.55.04.71. Gourmet French cooking not far west of the town centre opposite the Musée de la Faïence on the north bank of the river, with menus ranging from €19.50 to €26.50 that are strong on fish and seafood, but do also have some meat. Closed Sat lunch & all Sun.

La Krampouzerie 9 rue du Sallé

☎02.98.95.13.08. One of the best of Quimper's many crêperies, with some outdoor seating on the place au Beurre. Most crêpes, such as the one with Roscoff onions and seaweed, cost around €3.50, though a wholewheat galette with smoked salmon and cream cheese is €5.80. Closed Sun, plus Mon in winter.

Entertainment

Quimper's Festival de Cornouaille started in 1923 and has gone from strength to strength since. This great jamboree of Breton music, costumes, theatre and dance is held in the week before the fourth Sunday in July, attracting guest performers from the other Celtic countries and a scattering of other, sometimes highly unusual, ethnic-cultural ensembles. The whole thing culminates in an incredible Sunday parade through the town. The official programme does not appear until July, but you can get provisional details in advance from the tourist office or at www.festival-cornouaille.com. Accommodation is at a premium in Quimper while the festival is on.

Not so widely known are the Semaines Musicales (www.semaines-musicales-quimper.org), which breathe life into the rather stuffy nineteenth-century theatre on boulevard Dupleix during the first three weeks of August. The music is predominantly classical and tends to favour French composers such as Berlioz, Debussy, Bizet and Poulenc.

South from Quimper

More tourists flock to Finistère's southern coast than to any other part of the region, with the busiest segment of all in summer centring on the family-friendly resort of Bénodet. The beaches between here and La Forêt-Fouesnant to the east rank among the finest in Brittany. A little further along the coast, the walled, sea-circled town of Concarneau makes a perfect day-trip destination, though a prettier place to spend a night or two would be the flowery village of Pont-Aven, immortalized by Paul Gauguin, slightly further to the east still.

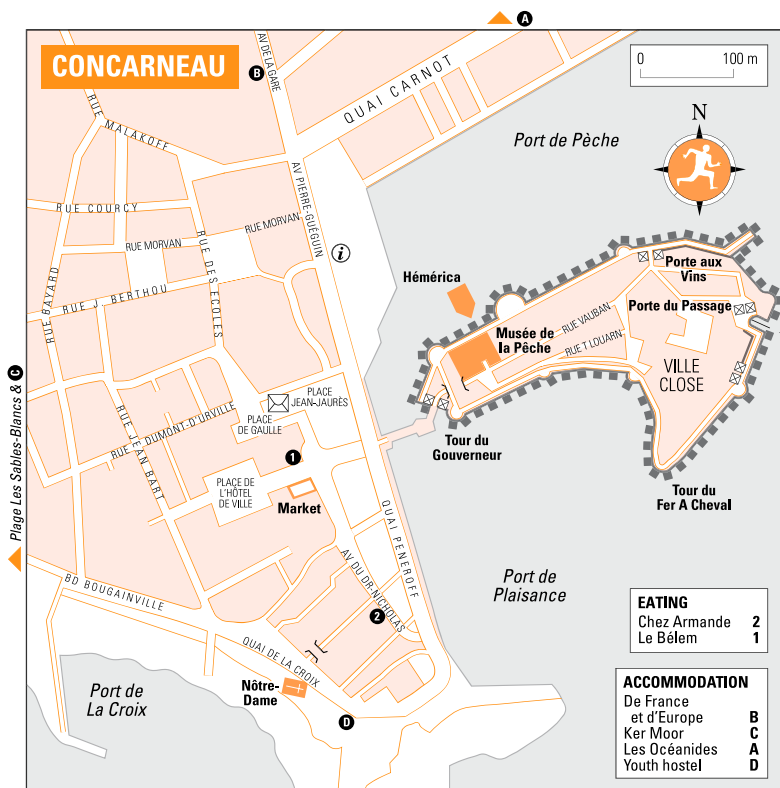

Bénodet and around

Once out of its city channel, the Odet takes on the shape of most Breton inlets, spreading out to lake proportions then turning narrow corners between gorges. The family resort of BÉNODET at the mouth of the river (reachable by boat from Quimper) has a long, sheltered beach on the ocean side, with amusements for children and beachside nurseries. One of the nicest hotels in Bénodet is Les Bains de Mer, 11 rue du Kerguélen (☎02.98.57.03.41, www.lesbainsdemer.com; Ⓟ; closed Jan), which has comfortable rooms, is close to the port and beach and has the added attraction of an outdoor heated swimming pool. Nearby Ker Vennaik, 45 av de la Plage (☎02.98.57.15.40; Ⓞ; closed Nov–Easter), is a reasonable lower-priced alternative, where some rooms have balconies. Bénodet also has several large campsites – if anything, rather too many of them – such as the enormous four-star Du Letty, southeast of the village by plage du Letty on rue du Canvez (☎02.98.57.04.69, www.campingduletty.com; closed early Sept to mid-June). Recommended restaurants include Le Spi, at 3 av de la Plage (☎02.98.57.19.50), which serves a fantastic €25 menu. You'll also find a sprinkling of decent crêperies across town.

The coast that continues east of Bénodet is rocky and repeatedly cut by deep valleys. Not so much a town as a loose conglomeration of villages, FOUESNANT, 9km along, is coming to rival its neighbour as a prime destination for family holidays. While Fouesnant itself is renowned for its cider-makers, and holds a pretty little Romanesque church, most local tourist amenities are gathered in its sister community of LA FORÊT-FOUESNANT, 3km further east. Clustered along the waterfront at the foot of a hill so steep that caravans are banned from even approaching, it holds an assortment of attractive hotels such as the Hôtel de l'Espérance, place de l'Église (☎02.98.56.96.58, 🌐www.hotel-esperance.org; 📍; closed mid-Nov to March) and the pricier Aux Cerisiers, 3 rue des Cerisiers (☎02.98.56.97.24, 🌐www.auxcerisiers.com; 📍; closed all day Sat and Sun eve, plus mid-Dec to mid-Jan).

Concarneau

The first sizeable town you come to east of Bénodet is CONCARNEAU, where the third most important fishing port in France does a reasonable job of passing itself off as a holiday resort. Its greatest asset is its ville close, the small and very well-fortified old city located a few metres offshore on an irregular rocky island in the bay, connected to the mainland by a narrow bridge. This can get too crowded for comfort in high summer, but otherwise it's a real delight.

Like those of the citadelle at Le Palais on Belle-Île, its ramparts were completed by Vauban in the seventeenth century. The island itself, however, had been inhabited for at least a thousand years before that, and is first recorded as the site of a priory founded by King Gradlon of Quimper.

Concarneau boasts that it is a ville fleurie, and the flowers are most in evidence inside the walls, where climbing roses and clematis swarm all over the various gift shops, restaurants and crêperies. Walk the central pedestrianized street to the far end, and you can pass through a gateway to the shoreline to watch the fishing boats go by. The best views of all come from the (incomplete) promenade on top of the ramparts (daily 9am–7.30pm; mid-June to mid-Sept €1; mid-Sept to mid-June free). The absence of a railing means it's unsafe for children.

By exploring the history of fishing all over the world, the Musée de la Pêche, immediately inside the ville close (daily: July & Aug 9.30am–8pm; June & Sept 10am–6pm; Oct–May 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €6), provides an insight into the traditional life Concarneau shared with so many other Breton ports. Oddities on show include a three-thousand-year-old anchor from Crete; the swords of swordfish and the saws of sawfish; a Japanese giant crab; photos of bearded old lifeboatmen; cases full of sardine and tuna cans; and a live aquarium, where the lobsters little realize they are in no immediate danger of being eaten. Passing through the city walls at the rear of the museum, you can also tour a genuine trawler moored alongside. Back in the museum shop, you can buy diagrams and models of ships, and stock up on tinned sardines and mackerel.

Practicalities

There's no rail service to Concarneau, but SNCF buses connect the town with Quimper and Rosporden. The tourist office (May, June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.45–6.30pm, Sun 9.30am–12.30pm; July & Aug daily 9am–8pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6.30pm; ☎02.98.97.01.44, 🌐www.tourismeconcarneau.fr) is on the quai d'Aiguillon, close to the long-distance bus stop.

The ville close is almost completely devoid of hotels, so most of those that Concarneau has to offer skulk in the back streets of the mainland, and tend to be full most of the time. Decent options include the bright, modernized Hôtel de France et d'Europe, 9 av de la Gare (☎02.98.97.00.64, 🌐www.hotel-france-europe.com; 📍; closed Sat in winter), and the Hôtel-Restaurant les Océanides, 3 rue du Lin (☎02.98.97.08.61, 🌐lesoceanides.free.fr; 📍), a Logis de France a couple of streets up from the sea above the fishing port, with a highly recommended and far from expensive restaurant. Right on the plage les Sables-Blancs, 2km west round the headland, the 🏠 Hôtel Ker Moor (☎02.98.97.02.96, 🌐www.hotel-kermor.com; 📍), is a classic, beautifully restored seafront hotel.

The best bet of all for budget travellers is the hostel, which, for once, is very near the city centre and enjoys magnificent ocean views (☎02.98.97.03.47, 📧concarneau.aj.cis@orange.fr; €12.30; open all year; it's just around the tip of the headland on the quai de la Croix, with a good crêperie opposite and a windsurfing shop nearby. There are also some lovely campsites a little further on, close to the Sables-Blancs beach; the spacious 🏡 Prés Verts spreads through verdant fields at Kernous Plage at the far end (☎02.98.97.09.74, 🌐www.presverts.com; closed late Sept to April).

For an atmospheric meal in Concarneau, choose from any of the restaurants along the main street that runs through the ville close, or explore the lanes that lead off it. There are, however, plenty of cheaper places back in town. Worth a try on the mainland are Chez Armande, 15 av du Dr-Nicholas (☎02.98.97.00.76; closed Wed all year, plus Tues in winter), an excellent seafood restaurant not far south of the market, and Le Bélem, place Jean-Jaurès (☎02.98.97.02.78; closed Wed), a pretty little indoor restaurant, next to the market, serving mussels for €9 and good seafood menus from €17.

Pont-Aven

PONT-AVEN, 14km east of Concarneau and just inland from the tip of the Aven estuary, is a small port packed with art galleries – and tourists. This was where Gauguin came to paint in the 1880s before he left for Tahiti. Though Gauguin inspired the Pont-Aven School of fellow artists, including Émile Bernard, for all the local hype the town has no permanent collection of his work. The Musée Municipal (daily: Feb, March, Nov & Dec 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; April–June, Sept & Oct 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; July & Aug 10am–7pm; €4) in the mairie holds changing exhibitions of the school and other artists active during the same period, but you can't count on paintings by the man himself.

Gauguin aside, Pont-Aven is pleasant in its own right. Just upstream of the little granite bridge at the heart of town, the promenade Xavier-Grall crisscrosses the tiny river itself on landscaped walkways, offering glimpses of the backs of venerable mansions, dripping with ivy, and a little “chaos” of rocks in the stream itself. A longer walk – allow an hour – leads into the romantically named Bois d'Amour, wooded gardens which have long provided inspiration to painters, poets and musicians.

Pont-Aven's tourist office, 5 place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 3–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.98.06.04.70, 🌐www.pontaven.com), sells an excellent English-language booklet on the town that includes route maps of local walks. Much the best of the three relatively expensive hotels is the central Hôtel des Ajoncs d'Or, 1 place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville (☎02.98.06.02.06; 🍷; closed Jan, plus Mon & Sun eve in low season), where gourmet menus start at €23. The nicest of the local campsites is the four-star Domaine de Kerlann (☎02.98.06.01.77, 🌐www.camping-kerlann.fr; closed Oct–March), set in a large wooded park with a swimming pool, tennis courts and mini-golf.

Inland Brittany: the Nantes–Brest Canal

The Nantes–Brest canal is a meandering chain of waterways from Finistère to the Loire, interweaving rivers with stretches of canal built at Napoleon's instigation to bypass the belligerent English fleets off the coast. Finally completed in 1836, it came into its own at the end of the nineteenth century as a coal, slate and fertilizer route. The building of the dam at Lac Guerlédan in the 1920s chopped the canal in two, leaving a whole section unnavigable by barge. Road transport had by then already superseded water haulage, but modern tourism has breathed life back into the canal.

En route the canal passes through riverside towns, such as Josselin and Maestroit, that long predate its construction; commercial ports and junctions – Pontivy, most notably – that developed in the nineteenth century because of it; the old port of Redon, a patchwork of water, where the canal crosses the River Vilaine; and a sequence of scenic splendours, including the string of lakes around the Barrage de Guerlédan, near Mur-de-Bretagne. As a focus for exploring inland Brittany, whether by barge, bike, foot, or all three, the canal is ideal. Not every stretch is accessible, but there are detours to be made away from it, such as into the wild and desolate Monts d'Arrée to the north of the canal in Finistère.

The Finistère stretch

As late as the 1920s, steamers would make their way across the Rade de Brest and down the Aulne River to Châteaulin, the first real town on the canal route. If you're walking the canal seriously, Pont-Coblant and Pleyben are just 10km further away on the map, but be warned that the meanders make it a several-hour hike. Pick your side of the water, too: there are no bridges between Châteaulin and Pont-Coblant.

Châteaulin

CHÂTEAULIN is a quiet place, where the main reason to stay is the canal itself – or river, as it is here. Most bars sell permits for local salmon and trout fishing (as do fishing shops, some of which rent out tackle). You should have little difficulty finding a room at the hotel Le Christmas, 33 Grande-Rue (☎02.98.86.01.24, @le-christmas@orange.fr; 📍), which serves excellent food. Within a couple of minutes' walk upstream from the statue to Jean Moulin – the Resistance leader who was sous-préfet here from 1930 to 1933 – and the town centre, you'll find yourself on towpaths full of rabbits and squirrels and overhung by trees full of birds.

Carhaix

CARHAIX, a further 25km east of Châteaulin, is a road junction that dates back to the Romans. It has cafés and shops to replenish supplies, but other than for the third weekend of July, when it hosts the massive four-day rock festival des Vieilles Charrues (@www.vieillescharrues.asso.fr), there's little reason to visit. The most interesting building in town is the granite Renaissance Maison de Sénéchal on rue Brisieux, which houses the tourist office (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct–May Mon 2–6pm, Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5.30pm; ☎02.98.93.04.42, @www.pohér.com).

Huelgoat and its forest

HUELGOAT, next to its own small lake halfway between Morlaix and Carhaix on the minor road D769, makes a pleasant overnight stop. Spreading north and east from the village is the Forêt de Huelgoat, a landscape of trees, giant boulders and waterfalls tangled together in primeval chaos. Various paths lead into the depths of the woods, allowing for long walks amid spectacularly wild scenery.

The Hôtel du Lac, beside the lake at 9 rue du Général-de-Gaulle (☎02.98.99.71.14; 📍; closed Mon Sept–June, plus mid-Jan to mid-Feb), offers well-refurbished rooms and good food. Also beside the lake, on the road towards Brest, the two-star Camping du Lac (☎02.98.99.78.80; closed Sept–June) comes complete with swimming pool.

Le Faouët and Kernascléden

Thirty kilometres south of Carhaix on the D769, the secluded town of LE FAOUËT is served by neither buses nor trains but is distinguished mainly by its large old market hall. Above a floor of mud and straw, still used by local traders, rises an intricate latticework of ancient wood, propped on granite pillars and topped by a little clock tower.

The ornate and gargoyle-coated church at KERNASCLÉDEN, 15km southeast along the D782, holds some splendidly gruesome frescoes. On the damp-infested wall of a side chapel, horned devils stoke the fires beneath a vast cauldron filled with the souls of the damned, and there's also a Dance of Death, a faded cousin to that at Kermaria.

The central stretch

Although the canal is limited to canoeists between Carhaix and Pontivy, it's worth some effort to follow on land, particularly for the scenery around the long, narrow Lac de Guerlédan, created by the construction of a dam near Mur-de-Bretagne. Approaching by road, the canal path is most easily joined at Gouarec, served by five daily buses between Carhaix and Loudéac.

Quénécan Forest

For the 15km between Gouarec and Mur-de-Bretagne, the N164 skirts the edge of Quénécan Forest, within which is a series of artificial lakes created when the Barrage de Guerlédan was completed in 1928. It's a beautiful stretch of river, peaceful enough despite the summer influx of campers and caravans.

The best places to stay are just off the road, past the villages of ST-GELVEN and Caurel. At the former, the ravishing 🌿 Les Jardins de l'Abbaye (☎02.96.24.95.77; 📍; closed Tues evening & Wed in low season) is an absolutely irresistible inexpensive hotel-restaurant, nestling beside the water at the end of an impressive avenue of ancient trees, and housed in the intact outbuildings of a twelfth-century Cistercian abbey. Porthole-like windows pierce the thick slate walls of its six cosy guest rooms, to look out across extensive riverfront grounds to the dramatic wooded slopes beyond.

From just before CAUREL, the brief loop of the D111 leads to tiny sandy beaches. At the spot known, justifiably, as BEAU RIVAGE (beautiful bank), a lavish holiday complex features the Nautic International campsite (☎02.96.28.57.94, 🌐campingnautic.free.fr; closed Oct to mid-May), and the Hôtel Beau Rivage (☎02.96.28.52.15; 📍; closed Mon evening & Tues in low season), plus a restaurant, a snack bar and a 140-seat glass-topped cruise boat.

Pontivy

Today you can again take barges all the way to the Loire from PONTIVY, the central junction of the Nantes–Brest canal, where the course of the canal breaks off once more from the Blavet. When the waterway opened, the small medieval centre of the town was expanded, redesigned and given broad avenues to fit its new role. It was even briefly renamed Napoléonville, in honour of the man responsible for its new prosperity.

These days, Pontivy is a bright market town, its twisting old streets contrasting with the stately riverside promenades. At its northern end, on a commanding hillside site, is the Château de Rohan, built by the lord of Josselin in the fifteenth century (July & Aug daily 10.30am–6.30pm; April–June & Sept Wed–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct–Nov & Feb–March Wed–Sun 2–6pm; €4.60). Used in summer for low-key cultural events and temporary exhibitions, the castle still belongs to the Josselin family, who are slowly restoring it. At the moment, one impressive facade, complete with deep moat and two forbidding towers, looks out over the river – behind that, the structure rather peters out.

Pontivy's tourist office is just below the castle, on place de Gaulle (Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎02.97.25.04.10, 🌐www.pontivy.fr). Among local hotels are the Porhoët, nearby at 41 rue du Général-de-Gaulle (☎02.97.25.34.88, 📧duporhoet@orange.fr; 🍽️), and the grander De l'Europe, 12 rue François-Mitterrand (☎02.97.25.11.14, 🌐www.hotellerieurope.com; 🍽️), which has a good restaurant. In addition, the local hostel, 2km from the gare SNCF on the Ile des Récollets (☎02.97.25.58.27; €11.50), is in good condition and serves cheap meals, but may be closed at weekends out of season.

Josselin

About 30km further along the canal from Pontivy, you come to the three Rapunzel towers embedded in a vast sheet of stone of the château in JOSSÉLIN. The Rohan family used to own a third of Brittany, but the present duke contents himself with the position of local mayor. The pompous apartments of his residence are not very interesting, even if they do contain the table on which the Edict of Nantes was signed in 1598. But the duchess's collection of dolls, housed in the Musée des Poupées, behind the castle, is something special (château & doll museum open April, May & Oct Sat, Sun & hols 2–6pm; June to mid-July & Sept daily 2–6pm; mid-July to Aug daily 10am–6pm; each €7, combined ticket €12).

△ Château de Josselin

The town is full of medieval splendours, from the gargoyles of the basilica, Notre-Dame-du-Roncier, to the castle ramparts, and the half-timbered houses in between. Notre-Dame-du-Roncier is built on the spot where, in the ninth century, a peasant supposedly found a statue of the Virgin under a bramble bush. The statue was burnt during the Revolution, but an important pardon is held each year on September 8.

Josselin's tourist office is in a superb old house on the place de la Congrégation, up in town next to the castle entrance (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–6.30pm; Oct–March Mon–Thurs 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sat 10am–noon; ☎ 02.97.22.36.43, 🌐 www.josselin.com). The lovely 🏠 Hôtel du Château, a Logis de France facing the castle from across the river at 1 rue du Général-de-Gaulle (☎ 02.97.22.20.11, 🌐 www.hotel-chateau.com; 🕒; closed Feb), makes a perfect place to stay. Rooms with views of the château are slightly more expensive, but worth it, and the food, with dinner menus from €15, is first-rate. The nearest good campsite is the three-star Bas de la Lande (☎ 02.97.22.22.20, 📧 campingbassedelalande@orange.fr; closed Nov–March), half an hour's walk from the castle, south of the river and west of town.

Malestroit and around

Though not a lot happens in the thousand-year-old town of MALESTROIT, 25km southeast of Josselin, it's full of unexpected and enjoyable corners. As you come into the main square, the place du Bouffay in front of the church, the houses are covered with unlikely carvings – an anxious bagpipe-playing hare looking over its shoulder at a dragon's head on one beam, an oblivious sow in a blue buckled belt threading her distaff on another. The church itself is decorated with drunkards and acrobats outside, torturing demons and erupting towers within.

Two kilometres west of Malestroit (there is no bus connection), the village of ST-MARCEL hosts a Musée de la Résistance Bretonne (April to mid-June daily 10am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-June to mid-Sept daily 10am–7pm; mid-Sept to March daily except Tues 10am–noon & 2–6pm; 🌐 www.resistance-bretonne.com; €6.50). The museum stands on the site of a June 1944 battle in which the Breton maquis (guerrilla Resistance fighters), joined by Free French forces parachuted in from England, successfully diverted the local German troops from the main Normandy invasion movements.

If you arrive in Malestroit by barge (this is a good stretch to travel), you'll moor very near the town centre. The local tourist office stands at the edge of the main square at 17 place du Bouffay (mid-June to mid-Sept Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–4pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm; ☎ 02.97.75.14.57, 🌐 www.malestroit.com). Sadly, Malestroit no longer has a hotel, but there's a two-star campsite, La Daufresne (☎ 02.97.75.13.33; closed mid-Sept to April), down below the bridge in the Impasse d'Abattoir next to the swimming pool.

Rochefort-en-Terre

ROCHEFORT-EN-TERRE, commanding a high eminence 17km south of Malestroit, may be a prettified and polished version of its neighbour, but it ranks nonetheless among the most delightful villages in Brittany. Every available stone surface, from the window ledges to the picturesque wishing well, is festooned with colourful geraniums, a tradition that originated with the painter Alfred Klots, who was born in France to a wealthy American family in 1875, and bought Rochefort's ruined château in 1907. Perched on the town's highest point, the castle is now open for guided tours (April & May Sat & Sun 2–6.30pm; June & Sept daily 2–6.30pm; July & Aug daily 10am–6.30pm; €4), though not until you go through its dramatic gateway do you find out that in fact that gateway is all that survives of the original fifteenth-century structure.

Rochefort's tourist office, in the central place du Puits ((mid-June to mid-Sept Mon–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sat & Sun 2–6.30pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Mon–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.97.43.33.57, 🌐www.rochefort-en-terre.com), displays a list of chambres d'hôte in the neighbourhood, and operates the three-star municipal campsite, Le Moulin Neuf, in the chemin de Bogeais (☎02.97.43.37.52; closed mid-Sept to mid-May). The one hotel stands in the place des Halles: Le Pélican (☎02.97.43.38.48; 🍷; closed mid-Jan to mid-Feb) offers reasonable rooms and good food, with dinner menus starting at around €16.50.

Redon

Thirty-four kilometres east of Malestroit, at the junction not only of the rivers Oust and Vilaine and the canal, but also of the train lines to Rennes, Vannes and Nantes, and of six major roads, REDON is not easy to avoid. And you shouldn't try to, either. A wonderful grouping of water and locks, it's a town with history, charm and life.

Until World War I, Redon was the seaport for Rennes. Its industrial docks – or what remains of them – are therefore on the Vilaine, while the canal, even in the very centre of town, is almost totally rural, its towpaths shaded avenues. Shipowners' houses from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries can be seen along quai Jean-Bart by the bassin and quai Duguay-Truin next to the river. A rusted wrought-iron workbridge, equipped with a gantry, still crosses the river, but the main users of the port now are cruise ships heading down the Vilaine to La Roche-Bernard.

Redon was once also a religious centre, its first abbey founded in 832 by St Conwoion. The most prominent church today is St-Sauveur. Its unique four-storeyed Romanesque belfry is squat, almost obscured by later roofs and the high choir, and best seen from the adjacent cloisters; the Gothic tower was entirely separated from the main building by a fire. In the crypt, you'll find the tomb of the judge who tried the legendary Bluebeard – Joan of Arc's friend, Gilles de Rais.

Redon's gare SNCF is five minutes' walk west from the tourist office in the place de la République (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 4–6pm; Sept–June Mon & Wed–Fri 9.30am–noon & 2–6pm, Tues 2–6pm, Sat 10am–12.30pm & 3–5pm; ☎02.99.71.06.04, 🌐www.tourisme-pays-redon.com), north across the railway tracks from the town centre. Most of the hotels are concentrated in town and near the gare SNCF rather than in the port area. The off-white Hôtel le France looks down on the canal from 30 rue Duguesclin (☎02.99.71.06.11, 🌐http://lefrance.chez-alice.fr; 🍷); its renovated rooms, nearly all of which have en-suite bathrooms, offer a considerable degree of comfort for the price. Nearer the station, the Hôtel Chandouineau, 1 rue Thiers (☎02.99.71.02.04; 🍷; closed Sat & Sun eve), is an upmarket establishment with just seven bedrooms, where the restaurant serves gourmet menus from €23.

The southern coast

Brittany's southern coast is best known for the province's – and indeed mainland Europe's – most famous prehistoric site, the alignments of Carnac, with the associated megaliths of the beautiful, island-studded Golfe de Morbihan. The beaches are not as spectacular as in Finistère, but there are more safe places to swim and the water is warmer. Of the cities, Lorient has Brittany's most compelling festival and Vannes has one of the liveliest medieval town centres. Further east, La Baule does a good impression of a Breton St-Tropez, and you can escape to the islands of Belle-Île, Hoëdic and Houat. Inevitably it's popular, and in summer you can be hard-pressed to find a room, but if you're prepared to make reservations, or you're camping, there shouldn't be much problem.

Lorient and around

LORIENT, Brittany's fourth largest city, lies on an immense natural harbour protected from the ocean by the Île de Groix and strategically located at the junction of the rivers Scorff, Ter and Blavet. A functional, rather depressing port today, it was once a key base for French colonialism, and was founded in the mid-seventeenth century for trading operations by the Compagnie des Indes, an equivalent of the Dutch and English East India Companies. Apart from the name, little else remains to suggest the plundered wealth that once arrived here. During the last war, Lorient was a major target for the Allies, but the Germans held out until the very end, and by the time they surrendered in May 1945 the city was almost completely destroyed. The only substantial remains were the U-boat pens, which have subsequently been expanded by the French for their nuclear submarines.

A former fishing trawler moored in the pleasure port, La Thalassa, now serves as an interactive museum of the ocean-going experience (July & Aug daily 9am–7pm; Sept–June Mon & Sun 2–6pm, Tues–Fri 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €6.60). Different areas of its various decks aim to illustrate the lives of the ship's captain, those responsible for sailing it and fishing from it, and also of an scientific oceanographer.

Across the estuary in Port-Louis, the Musée de la Compagnie des Indes is a pretty dismal temple to imperialism (Feb–March daily except Tues 2–6pm; April to mid-May daily except Tues 10am–1pm & 2–6.30pm; mid-May to Aug daily 10am–6.30pm; Sept to mid-Dec daily except Tues 1.30–6pm; €5.50; ☎02.97.82.19.13; 🌐www.lorient.com/musee). Time would be more enjoyably spent on a boat trip, either up the estuary towards Hennebont or out to the Île de Groix. This eight-kilometre-long steep-sided rock is a somewhat smaller version of Belle-Île, and holds some gorgeous beaches to encourage day-trippers.

Lorient's tourist office, beside the pleasure port on the quai de Rohan (mid-May to mid-July and late Aug to late Sept, Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm; mid-July to late Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm, except during festival, when it's daily 9am–8pm; late Sept to mid-May Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 2–5pm, Sat 10am–1pm; ☎02.97.21.07.84,

The Inter-Celtic Festival

The overriding reason people come to Lorient is for the Inter-Celtic Festival, held for ten days from the first Friday to the second Sunday in August. This is the biggest Celtic event in Brittany, or anywhere else for that matter, with representation from all the Celtic nations of Europe – Brittany, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Cornwall, the Isle of Man, Asturias and Galicia. In a genuine celebration of cultural solidarity, well over a quarter of a million people come to more than a hundred different shows, five languages mingle, and Scotch and Guinness flow with French and Spanish wines and ciders. There is a certain competitive element, with championships in various categories, but the feeling of mutual enthusiasm and conviviality is paramount. Most of the activities – embracing music, dance and literature – take place around the central place Jules-Ferry, and this is where most people end up sleeping, too, as accommodation is stretched to the limit.

For schedules of the festival, and further details of temporary accommodation, contact the Festival Interceltique de Lorient, 2 rue Paul-Bert, 56100 Lorient (☎02.97.21.24.29, 🌐www.festival-interceltique.com), bearing in mind that the festival programme is not finalized until May each year. For certain events you need to reserve tickets well in advance.

🌐www.lorient-tourisme.fr), can provide full details on local boat trips and organizes some excursions itself. Unless you arrive during the festival (see box), there's a huge choice of hotels. Among reasonable, fairly central options are two on rue Lazare-Carnot as it curves away south of the tourist office: the Victor Hugo Hôtel at no. 36 (☎02.97.21.16.24; 📍), which offers an action-packed €18 menu; and the Hôtel d'Arvor at no. 104 (☎02.97.21.07.55; 📍), also with a good-value restaurant. There's also an appealing (if noisy) hostel (☎02.97.37.11.65, 📧lorient@fuaj.org; €11.50), next to the River Ter at 41 rue Victor-Schoelcher, 3km out on bus line C1 from the gare SNCF, which has space for camping as well in summer. Good central restaurants include Yesterday's, 1 cours de la Bôve (☎02.97.84.85.07), a brasserie near the town hall that serves an excellent €18 menu, and Le Café Leffe (☎02.97.21.21.30; closed Jan), in the same building as the tourist office, facing the port, which is particularly strong on seafood.

The Presqu'île de Quiberon

The Presqu'île de Quiberon, south of Carnac, is well worth visiting on its own merits; Quiberon is quite a lively port, and you can get boats out to the islands or walk the shores of this narrow peninsula. The ocean-facing shore, known as the Côte Sauvage, is a wild and highly unswimmable stretch, where the stormy seas look like flashing scenes of snowy mountain tops. The sheltered eastern side has safe and calm sandy beaches, and plenty of campsites.

Quiberon

Much of the peninsula has become built up over the years, but it still holds only one true town, QUIBERON, at its southern tip. Its most active area, Port-Maria, is home to the gare maritime for the islands of Belle-Île, Houat and Hoëdic, and also holds a fishing harbour that was once famous for its sardines. Stretching away to the east is a long curve of fine sandy beach, lined for several hundred yards with bars, cafés and restaurants. At its centre is a busy little park and miniature golf course, but few of the streets further back hold anything of great interest. The exception is the little hill that leads down to the port from the gare SNCF, where browsing around is rewarded with some surprisingly good clothes and antique shops.

Practicalities

In July and August, the special Tire Bouchon train links Quiberon's gare SNCF, which is a short way above the town proper, with Auray. Bus #1 (TIM; ☎02.97.24.26.20) runs right to the gare maritime from Vannes, via Auray and Carnac.

The tourist office at 14 rue de Verdun (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎08.25.13.56.00, 🌐www.quiberon.com), downhill from the gare SNCF, has a 24hr computer terminal outside showing which hotels are full, hour by hour.

Accommodation

For most of the year, it's hard to get a room in Quiberon. In July and August, the whole peninsula is packed, while in winter it's so quiet that virtually all its facilities close down. The nicest area to stay is along the seafront in Port-Maria, where several good hotel-restaurants face the Belle-Île ferry terminal. The local hostel, the spartan Filets Bleus, inland at 45 rue du Roc'h-Priol (☎02.97.50.15.54, 📧quiberon@fuaj.org; €9.70; closed Oct–March), 1.5km southeast of the gare SNCF, also provides space for camping.

Bellevue rue de Tiviec ☎02.97.50.16.28, 🌐www.bellevuequiberon.com. Relatively quiet Logis de France, set slightly back from the sea near the casino and 500m east of the port. Has its own pool and a restaurant where menus cost €20 and up. Closed Oct–March. 5

Au Bon Accueil 6 quai de Houat ☎02.97.50.07.92. Seafront hotel that's Port-Maria's best option for budget travellers. The rooms are basic but inexpensive, and there's a good restaurant downstairs. Closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb. 3

Le Neptune 4 quai de Houat ☎02.97.50.09.62. Very close to Au Bon Accueil, and significantly more luxurious; if you're happy to pay that bit extra, it's the best value around. All the rooms have either sea or garden views – some with private balconies – and there's a very good restaurant (see below). Closed Jan & Mon in low season. 4

L'Océan 7 quai de l'Océan ☎02.97.50.07.58, 🌐www.hotel-de-locean.com. Attractive little hotel in the port, with multicoloured pastel shutters; no restaurant, but reasonably priced rooms. Closed Oct–March. 2–4

Eating and drinking

The most appealing area to browse the menus is along the waterfront in Port-Maria, where a line of seafood restaurants compete to attract ferry passengers. For cafés, those by the long bathing beach are the most enjoyable, along with the old-fashioned Café du Marché next to the PTT.

La Chaumine 36 place de Manémeur ☎02.97.50.17.67. Manémeur is technically a separate village to Quiberon, though it's not too far to walk around the headland west of the port. Set close to the menhir in the main square, this lovely little fish restaurant serves menus from €14 to €45, with an €23.50 option featuring salmon braised in champagne. Closed Sun eve & Mon, plus mid-Nov to March.

De la Créée 11 quai de l'Océan ☎02.97.30.53.09. A truly superb local fish restaurant, serving changing fish specialities every day, fresh from the morning's catch; make your choice from the baskets arrayed along the front. For €16 you get either the one set menu, which may include ling and sea bass, for example, and fish smoked on the premises, or a great seafood cous-cous. Closed Sun eve & Mon in low season, plus Jan.

Le Neptune 4 quai de Houat

☎ 02.97.50.09.62. Hotel dining room that serves exceptionally good seafood menus at €18 and €27. The portions are small, but the food is exquisite. Closed Jan & Mon in low season.

Belle-Île

The island of BELLE-ÎLE, 45 minutes by ferry from Quiberon, has its own Côte Sauvage on its Atlantic coast, while the landward side is fertile, cultivated ground, interrupted by deep estuaries with tiny ports. To appreciate the island's contrasts, some form of transport is advisable – you can rent bikes at the port and main town of LE PALAIS, and if you're in a small car the ferry fare is relatively low.

The island once belonged to the monks of Redon, then to the ambitious Nicolas Fouquet, Louis XIV's minister, and later to the English, who in 1761 swapped it for Menorca in an unrepeatable bargain deal. Docking at Le Palais, the abrupt star-shaped fortifications of the citadelle are the first thing you see (daily: April–June, Sept & Oct 9.30am–6pm; July & Aug 9am–7pm; Nov–March 9.30am–noon & 2–5pm; €6.10). Built along stylish and ordered lines by the great fortress-builder, Vauban, it is startling in size – filled with doorways leading to mysterious cellars and underground passages, endless sequences of rooms, dungeons and deserted cells. It only ceased being a prison in 1961, having numbered a succession of state enemies and revolutionaries among its inmates, including Ben Bella of Algeria. Less involuntarily, painters such as Monet and Matisse, the writers Flaubert and Proust and the actress Sarah Bernhardt all spent time on the island. And presumably Alexandre Dumas, too, as Porthos's death, in The Three Musketeers, takes place here. A museum documents the island's history, in fiction as much as in fact.

As for exploring the island, it's far too large to walk round, but a coastal footpath does run on bare soil for the length of the Côte Sauvage. Near the west end you'll find the Grotte de l'Apothicaire, so called because it was once full of cormorants' nests, arranged like the jars on a pharmacist's shelves. Inland, on the D25 back towards Le Palais, you pass the two menhirs, Jean and Jeanne, said to be lovers petrified as punishment for wanting to meet before their marriage. Another larger menhir used to lie near these two; it was broken up to help construct the road that separates them.

Belle-Île's second town, SAUZON, is a beautiful little village arrayed along one side of a long estuary, 6km west of Le Palais. If you're staying any length of time, and you've got transport, it's a nicer place to base yourself.

Getting to Belle-Île

Throughout the year, the Société Morbihannaise et Nantaise de Navigation (☎ 08.20.05.60.00, or, if you're calling from outside France, ☎ 02.97.35.02.00, @ www.smn-navigation.fr) sends at least five ferries daily from Port-Maria, on the Quiberon peninsula, to Le Palais. The first departure each day is almost always at 8am, and the crossing normally takes 45 minutes, though between May and September the high-speed Locmaria 56 makes three daily crossings in just 20 minutes. The standard adult return fare is €24.62, rising to €27.24 for the high-speed trip; under-25s pay €14.86 or €16.49; and over-60s €16.83 or €17.59. Small cars can be taken on the slower crossings only, for €116.28 return, while bikes cost €14.46 return.

Between early July and the end of August, the same company also sends the Locmaria 56 on one daily return trip to Sauzon from Lorient, departing at 8.20am from Lorient's gare maritime and taking 1 hour to get there. Adults pay €28.52 return, under-25s €19.96; there are no reductions for over-60s, and no vehicles can be taken.

During the summer, for similar fares, Compagnie des Îles (☎02.97.46.18.19, 🌐www.compagniedesiles.com) sails direct to Le Palais from La Turballe, with connecting services from Le Croisic as well, while Navix (☎02.97.46.60.00, 🌐www.navix.fr) also operate day-trips to the island from Vannes, Port-Navalo and La Trinité.

Belle-Île practicalities

The island's tourist office is next to the gare maritime in Le Palais (July & Aug Mon–Sat 8.45am–7.30pm, Sun 8.45am–1pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.97.31.81.93, 🌐www.belle-ile.com).

Accommodation in Le Palais includes the simple Frégate, above a nice little bar on the quayside (☎02.97.31.54.16; 📍; closed mid-Nov to March), and a couple of more expensive options: the Hôtel-Restaurant de Bretagne (☎02.97.31.80.14, 🌐www.hotel-de-bretagne.fr; 📍), and the Atlantique (☎02.97.31.80.11, 🌐www.hotel-atlantique.com; 📍), both of which have excellent sea-view restaurants. There are also three campsites, including the three-star Camping de l'Océan (☎02.97.31.83.86, 🌐www.camping-ocean-belle-ile.com; closed mid-Nov to March), and a hostel (☎02.97.31.81.33, 📧belle-ile@fuaj.org; €11.50; closed Oct) which, despite holding almost a hundred beds, is always wildly oversubscribed; it's located a short way out of town along the clifftops from the citadelle at Haute-Boulogne.

Sauzon has one good hotel in a magnificent setting, the Du Phare (☎02.97.31.60.36; 📍; closed Oct–March), where guests must eat its delicious fish dinners, and two two-star campsites, Pen Prad (☎02.97.31.64.82, 📧mariedesauzon@orange.fr; closed Oct–March) and La Source (☎02.97.31.60.95, 🌐www.belleile-lasource.com; closed late Sept to March).

Houat and Hoëdic

The islands of Houat and Hoëdic can also be reached by ferry from Quiberon-Port-Maria with the Société Morbihannaise et Nantaise de Navigation (1–6 sailings daily depending on the season; ☎08.20.05.60.00, or, from outside France, ☎02.97.35.02.00, 🌐www.smn-navigation.fr; around €25 return). The crossing to Houat takes forty minutes, to Hoëdic another 25. Alternatively, Compagnie des Îles (☎08.25.13.41.00, 🌐www.compagniedesiles.com; €26.50 return) run similar trips from Vannes, Port-Navalo and Locmariaquer from April to September, and from Le Croisic and La Turballe in July and August; times vary. Finally, Navix (☎02.97.46.60.00, 🌐www.navix.fr; €26.50 return) run day-trips to Houat from La Trinité on most days between mid-July and late August.

You can't take your car to these two very much smaller versions of Belle-Île, and both have a feeling of being left behind by the passing centuries, although the younger fishermen of Houat have revived the island's fortunes by establishing a successful fishing co-operative. Houat in particular has excellent beaches – as ever on its sheltered (eastern) side – that fill up with campers in the summer even though camping is not strictly legal. Hoëdic on the other hand has a large municipal campsite, overlooking the port (☎02.97.52.48.88; closed Sept–June). There are a couple of small hotels on Houat – L'Ézenn (☎02.97.30.69.73; 📍; closed Feb) and the pricier Hôtel-Restaurant des Îles (☎02.97.30.68.02; 📍; closed Nov–Easter) – and one on Hoëdic, Les Cardinaux (☎02.97.52.37.27, 📧lescardinaux@aol.com; 📍; closed Sun pm & Mon in winter).

The alignments

The megaliths of Carnac make up three distinct major alignments, running roughly in the same northeast–southwest direction, but each with a slightly separate orientation. These are the Alignements de Menec, “the place of stones” or “place of remembrance”, with 1169 stones in eleven rows; the Alignements de Kermario, “the place of the dead”, with 1029 stones in ten rows; and the Alignements de Kerlescan, “the place of burning”, with 555 stones in thirteen lines. All three are sited parallel to the sea alongside the Route des Alignements, 1km or so to the north of Carnac-Ville.

Thanks to increasing numbers of visitors (and despite vehement local opposition), the principal alignments are currently fenced off. The long-term plan is to allow the area to revegetate at a natural pace, but there’s no predicting how long that process will take, and even when it’s complete the chances are that access will still be restricted. Currently you are allowed to walk freely around the best-preserved sites from October to March (daily 10am–5pm); between April and September access is on guided tours only (€4), some of which are in English. To pick up the schedule of tours, examine a model of the entire site, and buy books and maps, call in at the official visitor centre, known as the Maison des Mégalithes, across the road from the Alignements de Menec (daily: May–Aug 9am–7pm; Sept–April 10am–5.15pm; ☎02.97.52.29.81).

The stones themselves are clearly visible behind the fences, though thanks to their destruction and displacement by generations of meddling humans, and several millennia of Breton winters, many look like no more than stumps in the heather. It has become hard to see any real consistency in the size or the shape of individual stones, or enough regularity in the lines to pinpoint their direction.

There are several distinct types of megalithic monuments. Menhirs, or “standing stones”, range in size from mere stumps to five-metre-high blocks; some stand alone, others in circles known as cromlechs, or in approximate lines. In addition there are dolmens, groups of standing stones roofed with further stones laid across the top, which are generally assumed to be burial chambers.

Carnac’s Musée de Préhistoire, at 10 place de la Chapelle in town (July & Aug Mon, Tues & Thurs–Sun 10am–6pm, Wed 1.30–6pm; May, June & Sept Mon & Thurs–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Wed 2–6pm; Oct–April Mon & Thurs–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm, Wed 2–5pm; €5; 🌐www.museedecarnac.com), is a disappointingly dry museum of archeology that’s likely to leave anyone whose command of French is less than perfect almost completely in the dark as to what all the fuss is about. It traces the history of the area from earliest times, starting with 450,000-year-old chipping tools and leading by way of the Neanderthals to the megalith builders and beyond. As well as authentic physical relics, it holds reproductions and casts of the carvings at Locmariaquer, a scale model of the Alignements de Menec and diagrams of how the stones may have been moved into place.

The Town

Carnac itself, divided between the original Carnac-Ville and the seaside resort of Carnac-Plage, is extremely popular and swarms with holiday-makers in July and August. For most of these, the alignments are, if anything, only a sideshow. But, as a holiday centre, Carnac has a special charm, especially in late spring and early autumn when it is less crowded – and cheaper. The town and seafront remain well wooded, and the tree-lined avenues and gardens are a delight, the climate being mild enough for evergreen oak and Mediterranean mimosa to grow alongside native stone pine and cypress.

The megaliths of Brittany

Megalithic sites can be found all around the Mediterranean, notably in Malta and Sardinia, and along the Atlantic seaboard from Spain to Scandinavia. Among the most significant are Newgrange in Ireland, Stonehenge in England and the Ring of Brodgar in the Orkneys. However, the megalith-building culture did not necessarily originate in the Mediterranean and spread to the “barbarian” outposts of Europe. In fact, the tumuli, alignments and single standing stones of Brittany are of pre-eminent importance.

Archaeological evidence suggests that late Stone Age settlements existed along the Breton coast by around 6000 BC. Soon afterwards, the culture responsible either evolved to become the megalith builders, or was displaced by megalith-building newcomers. Dated at 5700 BC, the tumulus of Kercado at Carnac appears to be the earliest stone construction in Europe.

Each megalithic centre had its own distinct styles and traditions. Brittany has relatively few stone circles, and a greater proportion of free-standing stones; fewer burials, and more evidence of ritual fires; different styles of carving; and, uniquely, the sheer complexity of the Carnac alignments. Little is known of the people who erected the megaliths. Only rarely have skeletons been found in the graves, but what few there have been seem to indicate a short, dark, hairy race with a life expectancy of no more than the mid-thirties. What is certain is that the civilization was a long-lasting one; the earliest and the latest constructions at Carnac are over five thousand years apart.

As for the actual purpose of the megaliths, the most fashionable theory these days sees them as part of a vast system of astronomical measurement, record-keeping, and prediction. In Brittany, the argument goes, the now fallen Grand Menhir of Locmariaquer served as a “universal lunar foresight”, its alignments with eight other sites corresponding to the eight extreme points of the rising and setting of the moon during its 18.61-year cycle. The Golfe de Morbihan made an ideal location for such a marking stone, set on a lagoon surrounded by low peninsulas. Once the need for the Grand Menhir was decided upon, it would have taken hundreds of years of careful observation of the moon to fix the exact spot for it. It's thought that this was done by lighting fires on the top of high poles at trial points on the crucial nights every nine years. The alignments of Carnac are thus explained as the graph paper on which the lunar movements were plotted.

However, this has been hotly disputed. Controversy rages as to whether the Grand Menhir ever stood at all, or, even if it did, whether it fell or was broken up before the eight supposedly associated sites came into being; moreover, sceptics say, these measurements ignore the fact that the sea level in southern Brittany 6600 years ago was 10m lower than it is today.

In any case, the stones at Carnac have been so greatly eroded that perhaps it's little more than wishful thinking to imagine that their original size, shape and orientation can be accurately determined. They have been knocked down by farmers seeking to cultivate the land; quarried for use in making roads; removed by landowners angry at the trespass of tourists and scientists; and shifted and re-erected by nineteenth-century pseudo-scientists.

An alternative approach places greater emphasis on sociological factors. This argues that the stones date from the period of transition when humankind was changing from a predatory role to a productive one, and that they can only have been put in place by the co-ordinated efforts of a large and stable community. It's possible that the megaliths were erected by Neolithic settlers, who generation by generation advanced across Europe from the east bringing advances in agriculture. As they came into conflict with existing Stone Age groups, they may have set up menhirs as territorial markers.

It also makes sense to imagine setting up a menhir as serving a valuable social purpose, both as an achievement in its own right and as a celebration of some other event. The annual or occasional setting-up of a new stone is easier to envisage than the vast effort required to erect them all at once – in which case the fact that they were arranged in lines, mounds and circles might have been of peripheral importance.

The town's five beaches extend for nearly 3km in total. The two most attractive beaches, usually counted as one of the five, are plages Men Dû and Beaumer, which lie to the east towards La Trinité beyond Pointe Churchill. They're especially popular these days with kite surfers.

Practicalities

Buses to Auray, Quiberon and Vannes stop near the tourist office on avenue des Druides, and on rue St-Cornély in Carnac-Ville. In July and August, when the Tire Bouchon rail link runs between Auray and Quiberon, trains call at Plouharnel, 4km northwest of Carnac. Carnac's main tourist office is slightly back from the main beach at 74 av des Druides (July & Aug Mon & Sat 9am–7pm, Tues–Fri 9am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 3–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.97.52.13.52, 🌐www.carnac.fr). An annexe in the place de l'Église in town is open in summer (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm). Bicycles can be rented from several local campsites, or from Le Randonneur, 20 av des Druides, Carnac-Plage (☎02.97.52.02.55). The Grande Métairie site (see below) also arranges horseback tours. There's a market in Carnac-Ville on Wednesday and Sunday mornings.

Hotels in Carnac are at a premium in July and August, when you can expect higher prices and intense pressure to take half-board (demi-pension). In Carnac-Ville, the old stone, ivy-clad Hôtel le Râtelier, 4 chemin de Douët (☎02.97.52.05.04, 🌐www.le-ratelier.com; Ⓜ–Ⓞ; restaurant closed Tues & Wed Oct–March), has rooms of varying standards, not all en suite, and top-quality food on menus that start from €17; the fancier Hôtel Tumulus, east of town on the Chemin du Tumulus (☎02.97.52.08.21, 🌐www.hotel-tumulus.com; Ⓜ; closed Jan–March), has a heated pool and another fine restaurant. The Hôtel Celtique, at 82 av des Druides in Carnac-Plage (☎02.97.52.14.15, 🌐www.hotel-celtique.com; Ⓜ), is similarly luxurious, while several rooms at Les Rochers, 6 bd de la Base Nautique (☎02.97.52.10.09, 🌐www.les-rochers.com; Ⓜ; closed Nov–Easter), have sea-view balconies. As befits such a family-oriented place, Carnac features as many as twenty campsites. Among the best are the two-star Men Dû (☎02.97.52.04.23, 🌐www.camping-mendu.fr; closed Oct–March) near the sea, inland from the plage du Men Dû, and the more expensive four-star Grande Métairie (☎02.97.52.24.01, 🌐www.lagrandemetairie.com; closed early Sept to March), near the Kercado tumulus. Most of the restaurants worth recommending are in the hotels, as described above, but Chez Marie, facing St-Cornély church at 3 place de l'Église (☎02.97.52.07.93; closed Nov–Easter), and the Pressoir by the Méneac alignements (☎02.97.52.01.86; closed Sept–Easter) are worthwhile crêperies.

Locmariaquer

With its complex patterning, the stone of the roof on Gavrinis (see p.479) has been identified as part of the same piece as the dolmen known as the Table des Marchands at LOCMARIAQUER, 12km east of Carnac. Locmariaquer also has the Grand Menhir Brisé, supposedly the crucial central point of the megalithic observatory of Carnac. Thought to have been toppled deliberately around the time the Table des Marchands was erected, it was by far the largest known menhir – 22m high and weighing more than a full jumbo jet at 347 tonnes. It now lies on the ground in four pieces, with a possible fifth missing, and is visited in conjunction with the Table des Marchands (daily: May–Sept

Arrival, information and accommodation

Vannes' gare SNCF is 25 minutes' walk north of the town centre. Buses to Auray, Carnac, Quiberon and other destinations leave from the gare routière alongside. The tourist office is at 1 rue Thiers (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–6pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎08.25.13.56.10, 🌐www.tourisme-vannes.com), near place Gambetta. Internet access is available at Futur I-Media, 14 rue de la Boucherie (Mon–Fri noon–1am, Sat & Sun 2pm–1am; ☎02.97.01.84.09; €4 per hr).

In peak season, Vannes can get claustrophobic, but it offers a better choice of hotels than anywhere else around the gulf. The town also has a hostel, 4km southeast of the town centre in Séné (☎02.97.66.94.25, ✉cis.sene@orange.fr; dorm bed €10.50; closed July & Aug), on bus route #4 from place de la République. The nearest campsite is the three-star Camping Conleau at the far end of avenue du Maréchal-Juin, alongside the gulf beyond the aquarium (☎02.97.63.13.88, ✉camping@mairie-vannes.fr; closed Oct–March).

Hotels

Le Bretagne 36 rue du Méné ☎02.97.47.20.21, ✉hotel-lebretagne@free.fr. Reasonable hotel just outside the walls, around the corner from the Porte-Prison. The rooms aren't fancy, but all have showers or bath plus TV. 2

Escale Océane av Jean-Monnet ☎02.97.47.59.60, 🌐www.hotel-sofibra.com. Functional upscale hotel a short walk northwest of the walled town, formerly known as the Mascotte, and offering 6 soundproofed, en-suite and air-conditioned rooms, plus an adequate restaurant. 5

Manche Océan 31 rue du Col-Maury ☎02.97.47.26.46, 🌐www.manche-ocean.com. Ordinary but perfectly acceptable modern rooms between the station and the walled town, used mainly by tour groups. Small-scale buffet breakfasts for €8. 6

Le Marina 4 place Gambetta ☎02.97.47.00.10, ✉lemarinahotel@aol.com. Fifteen pleasantly refurbished rooms – and a downstairs bar – right by the port, with sea views and morning sun. En-suite facilities cost €5 extra. 3

The Town

Modern Vannes centres on place de la République; the focus was shifted outside the medieval city in the nineteenth-century craze for urbanization. The grandest of the public buildings here, guarded by a pair of sleek and dignified bronze lions, is the Hôtel de Ville at the top of rue Thiers. By day, however, the streets of the old city, with their overhanging, witch-hatted houses and busy commercial life, are the chief source of pleasure. Place Henri-IV in particular is stunning, as are the views from it down the narrow side streets.

La Cohue, a building that fills a block between rue des Halles and place St-Pierre, has served over the past 750 years as High Court and assembly room, prison, Revolutionary tribunal, theatre and marketplace, and was where the Breton États assembled in 1532 to ratify the Act of Union with France. It currently houses the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily: July–Sept 10am–6pm; Oct–June 1.30–6pm; €4, or €6 with history museum). Upstairs there's a dull collection of paintings and engravings, heavy on worthy Breton artists such as J.-F. Boucher and Jean Frélaud, while the main gallery downstairs is the venue for different temporary exhibitions.

Opposite La Cohue, the Cathédrale St-Pierre is a rather forbidding place, with a stern main altar almost imprisoned by four solemn grey pillars. The light – purple through new stained glass – illuminates the desiccated finger of the Blessed Pierre Rogue, who was guillotined on the main square in 1796. For a small fee, in summer you can examine the assorted treasures in the chapterhouse, which include a twelfth-century wedding chest, brightly decorated with enigmatic scenes of romantic chivalry.

A sombre fifteenth-century private mansion at 2 rue Noé holds Vannes' Musée d'Histoire et Archéologie (mid-May to mid-June daily 1.30–6pm, mid-June to Sept daily 10am–6pm; otherwise by appointment only, ☎02.97.01.63.00; €4, or €6 with Beaux-Arts museum). Until recently, it was solely an archeological museum, focused on what's said to be one of the world's finest collections of prehistoric artefacts. However, although it certainly holds some elegant stone axes, for example, they're simply arrayed in formal patterns in glass cases, and the upper floors of the museum, designed to illustrate daily life in the Middle Ages, are more entertaining.

Vannes' modern aquarium (daily: April–June & Sept 10am–noon & 2–6pm; July & Aug 9am–7pm; Oct–March 2–6pm, except school hols 10am–noon & 2–6pm; adults €8.90, under-12s €5.90; ☎08.10.40.69.01, @www.aquarium-du-golfe.com), in the Parc du Golfe, 500m south of place Gambetta, claims to have the best collection of tropical fish in Europe. Certainly it holds some pretty extraordinary specimens, including four-eyed fish from Venezuela that can see simultaneously above and below the water, and are also divided into four sexes for good measure; cave fish from Mexico that by contrast have no eyes at all; and arowana from Guyana, which jump two metres out of the water to catch birds. A Nile crocodile found in the Paris sewers in 1984 shares its tank with a group of piranhas. Alongside, the separate Jardin aux Papillons, or Butterfly Garden, consists of a huge glass dome containing hundreds of free-flying butterflies (same hours; adults €7.50, under-12s €5.50, or €13 and €9 respectively for combined ticket with aquarium).

Eating, drinking and entertainment

Dining out in old Vannes can be an expensive experience, whether you eat in the intimate little restaurants along the rue des Halles, or down by the port. If you're just looking for a snack, try the area outside the walls in the north-east, towards the gare SNCF. The leading venue for live music is the John R. O'Flaherty, at 22 rue Hoche (☎02.97.42.40.11; closed Sun), which has traditional Irish music on Fridays. At the end of July, the open-air concerts of the Vannes Jazz Festival take place in the Théâtre de Verdure.

Brasserie des Halles 9 rue des Halles
☎02.97.54.08.34. Inexpensive brasserie, open until midnight, which manages to squeeze a few tables out onto the pavement. For €9 you can get a bowl of mussels, for €17.50 a seafood choucroute, and there's a wide range of mainly fishy dishes at similar prices. Closed Sat lunch & Sun eve.

Crêperie La Cave St-Gwenaël 23 rue St-Gwenaël
☎02.97.47.47.94. Atmospheric, good-value crêperie in the cellar of a lovely old house, facing the cathedral. Closed Sun, plus Mon Sept–June, & all Jan.

 Le Gavroche 17 rue de la Fontaine Pasteur ☎02.97.54.03.54. A true godsend for meat-lovers, where you can feast on excellent meat-packed menus starting at a mere €13.75. The steaks are cooked to perfection, while starters such as pig's trotters will put hairs on your chest. Closed Sun, Mon & Wed eve.

 De Roscanvec 17 rue des Halles
☎02.97.47.15.96. Absolutely superb formal gourmet restaurant, in a lovely half-timbered house in the old town, with dining on two levels and also outdoors. Lunch at €17 is a bargain, while even the cheapest dinner menu, at €24, features unusual dishes such as carbonara d'huîtres, beautifully prepared and presented. Menus go all the way up to €74 for a lobster special. Closed Sun in summer, Sun eve & all Mon Sept–June.

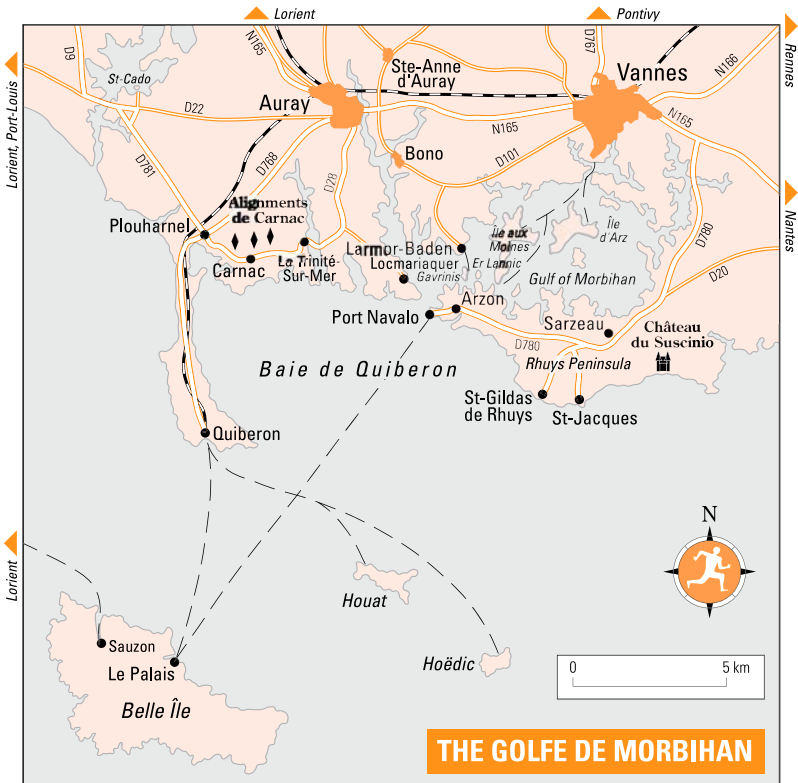

La Saladière 36 rue du Port ☎02.97.42.52.10. Tasty, healthy fresh-made salads, in an inexpensive restaurant a short way down from the tourist office, with views towards the port. Closed Sun & Wed eve in low season.

The Golfe de Morbihan

It comes as rather a surprise to discover that Vannes is on the sea. Its harbour is a channelled inlet of the ragged-edged Golfe de Morbihan – mor bihan means “little sea” in Breton – which lets in the tides through a narrow gap between the peninsulas of Rhuys and Locmariaquer. By popular tradition the islands scattered around this enclosure used to number the days of the year, though for centuries the waters have been rising and there are now fewer than one for each week. Of these, thirty are owned by film stars and the like, while two – the Île aux Moines and Île d’Arz – have regular populations and ferry services and end up extremely crowded in summer. The rest are the best, and a boat tour around them, or at least a trip out to Gavrinis near the mouth of the gulf, is a compelling attraction. As the boats thread their way through the baffling muddle of channels, you lose track of what is island and what is mainland; and everywhere there are megalithic ruins, stone circles disappearing beneath the water and solitary menhirs on small hillocks.

Gavrinis

The reason to visit the island of Gavrinis, which can only be reached on guided boat tours from Larmor-Baden, is its megalithic site. The most impressive and

Gulf tours

In season, dozens of boats leave on gulf tours each day from Vannes, Port Navalo, La Trinité, Locmariaquer, Auray, Le Bono and Larmor-Baden. These are among the options:

Navix 📞 www.navix.fr. Up to six deluxe half-day (€21) and full-day (€28) tours around the gulf from Vannes (☎08.25.13.21.00) every day between mid-April and September. From mid-April until late June the first boat sails each day at 8.45am; it's at 9am until late Aug, and then at 10am until the end of Sept. They also offer lunch and dinner cruises to varying schedules. During the same period, similar tours also depart from Port Navalo (☎08.25.13.21.20) and Locmariaquer (☎08.25.13.21.30), while trips leave from Auray or Le Bono (☎08.25.13.21.50), and La Trinité (☎08.25.13.21.50) between early July and late August only.

Compagnie des Îles 📞 www.compagniedesiles.com. At least three gulf tours daily from Vannes between April and October (☎08.25.13.41.00; €15–28), plus slightly more limited schedules from Port Navalo (☎08.25.13.41.20; mid-April to Sept; €15–28); Locmariaquer (☎08.25.13.41.30; April–Oct €13.50–23); and Port Haliguen in Quiberon (☎08.25.13.41.40; April–Sept; €13.50–28).

Izenah Croisières ☎02.97.57.23.24 or 02.97.26.31.45, 📞 www.izenah-croisieres.com. Gulf tours from Port Blanc at Baden in summer (April–Sept; €14–22) and a year-round ferry service, with departures every half-hour, to the Île aux Moines (daily: July & Aug 7am–10pm, Sept–June 7am–7.30pm; €3.80 return).

Vedettes Angelus ☎02.97.57.30.29, 📞 www.vedettes-angelus.com. Up to five gulf tours of varying lengths daily from Locmariaquer, between mid-April and September, with their first departure at 10am; €12–24.

remarkable in Brittany, it stands comparison with Newgrange in Ireland and – in shape as well as size and age – with the earliest pyramids of Egypt.

It is essentially a tumulus, an earth mound covering a stone cairn and “passage grave”. However, half of the mound has been peeled back and the side of the cairn that faces the water was reconstructed to make a facade resembling a step-pyramid. Inside, every stone of both passage and chamber is covered in carvings, with a restricted “alphabet” of fingerprint whorls, axe-heads and other conventional signs, including the spirals familiar in Ireland but seen only here in Brittany.

△ Megalithic remains at Gavrinis

Gavrinis can be reached between March and November only. Tides permitting, ferries leave Larmor-Baden at half-hourly intervals, and the cost includes a guided tour of the cairn (April, June & Sept daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm; May Mon–Fri 1.30–6.30pm, Sat & Sun 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm; July & Aug daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm; March, Oct & Nov daily except Wed 1.30–5pm; ☎02.97.57.19.38; €10). The last boat of the morning leaves Larmor-Baden at noon in July & Aug, and at 11am otherwise; the last afternoon boat leaves at 3pm or 3.30pm daily, depending on how busy things are.

The Presqu’île de Rhuys

The tip of the Presqu’île de Locmariaquer is only a few hundred metres away from Port Navalo and the Presqu’île de Rhuys. This peninsula has a microclimate of its own – warm enough for pomegranates, figs, bougainvillea and the only Breton vineyards. Oysters are cultivated on the muddy gulf shores, but the currents of the gulf make this no place for swimming. The ocean beaches are the ones to head for: east from St-Gildas-de-Rhuys is the most enticing and least crowded stretch, with glittering gold- and silver-coloured rocks. For details on the whole peninsula, call in at the information centre just off the main road as you come into Sarzeau (Feb–June, Sept & Oct Mon–Sat 9.15am–12.15pm & 2–6pm, Sun 2–5.30pm; July & Aug daily 9am–7pm; Nov–Jan Mon–Sat 9.15am–12.15pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.97.26.45.26, 🌐www.rhuys.com).

Near SARZEAU, the impressive fourteenth-century Château de Suscinio is a completely moated castle that was once a hunting lodge of the dukes of Brittany, set in marshland at the edge of a tiny village and holding a sagging but still vivid mosaic floor. You can take a precarious stroll around its high ramparts (April–Sept daily 10am–7pm; Oct & Feb–March daily except Wed 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Nov–Jan daily except Wed 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €5). At the beautifully positioned little Hôtel Bar du Port in ST-JACQUES, 6km south, (☎02.97.41.93.51; 📍), all seven rooms have balconies that look out across the port to the gulf.

South to the Loire

When you cross the Vilaine on the way south, you’re not only leaving the Morbihan département but also technically leaving Brittany itself. The roads veer firmly east and west – to Nantes or La Baule, avoiding the marshes of the Grande-Brière. For centuries these 20,000 acres of peat bog have been deemed to be the common property of all who lived in them. The scattered population, the Briérois, still make their living by fishing for eels in the streams, gathering reeds and – on the nine days permitted each year – cutting peat. Tourism has arrived relatively recently, and is resented. The touted attraction is renting a punt to get yourself lost for a few hours with your pole tangled in the rushes.

Guérande

On the edge of the marshes of the Grande-Brière, just before you come to the sea, stands the tiny, gorgeous walled town of GUÉRANDE. It gave its name to this peninsula, and derived its fortune from controlling the salt pans that form a checkerboard across the surrounding inlets. This “white country” is composed of bizarre-looking oillettes, each 70 to 80 square metres in extent, in which sea water has been collected and evaporated since Roman times.

Guérande today is still entirely enclosed by its stout fifteenth-century ramparts. Although you can't walk along them, a spacious promenade leads right the way around the outside, passing four fortified gateways; for half its length the broad old moat remains filled with water. The main entrance, the Porte St-Michel on the east side of town, now holds a small museum of local history (April–Sept Mon 2.30–7pm, Tues–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–7pm; Oct Mon 2–6pm, Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3.50).

Guérande's tourist office is just outside the Porte St-Michel at 1 place du Marché au Bois (June & Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5pm; Oct–May Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; ☎02.40.24.96.71, 🌐www.ot-guerande.fr). Tucked out of sight behind the market, the pretty Roc-Maria, 1 rue des Halles (☎02.40.24.90.51, 🌐www.hotelcreperierocmaria.com; 📍; closed Mon in low season), offers cosy rooms above a crêperie in a fifteenth-century town house. To the north, opposite the Porte Vannetoise and the most impressive stretch of ramparts, the Hôtel des Voyageurs, 1 place du 8 Mai 1945 (☎02.40.24.90.13; 📍; closed late Dec to late Jan, plus Sun eve & Mon), is a Logis serving good menus from €12.

La Baule

There is something very surreal about emerging from the Brière to the coast at LA BAULE – an imposing, moneyed landscape where the dunes are no longer bonded together with scrub and pines, but with massive apartment buildings and luxury hotels. Sited on the long stretch of dunes that links the former island of Le Croisic to the mainland, it owes its existence to a storm in 1779 that engulfed the old town of Escoublac in silt from the Loire, and thereby created a wonderful crescent of sandy beach.

Neither La Baule's permanence nor its affluence seems in any doubt these days. It's a resort that very firmly imagines itself in the south of France: around the crab-shaped bay, bronzed nymphettes and would-be Clint Eastwoods ride across the sands into the sunset against a backdrop of cruising lifeguards, horse-dung removers and fantastically priced cocktails. It can be fun if you feel like a break from the more subdued Breton attractions – and the beach is undeniably impressive. But it's not a place to enjoy strolling around in search of hidden charms; the backstreets have an oddly rural feel, but hold nothing of any interest.

La Baule has two gare SNCFs, the barely used La-Baule-les-Pins, and the main La-Baule-Escoublac near the tourist office on place Rhin-et-Danube, where the TGVs from Paris arrive. The gare routière is away from the seafront, at 4 place de la Victoire (☎08.25.24.34.44), while the tourist office is nearby at 8 place de la Victoire (July & Aug daily 9.30am–7.30pm; Sept–June Mon & Wed–Sat 9.15am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Tues 10.15am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎02.40.24.34.44, 🌐www.labaule.fr).

Few of the hotels are at all cheap, particularly in high season, and in low season more than half are closed. Relatively lower-priced options near the main gare SNCF include the comfortable Marini, 22 av Clemenceau (☎02.40.60.23.29, 🌐www.hotel-marini.com; 📍), while the Mascotte, 26 av Marie-Louise (☎02.40.60.26.55, 🌐www.la-mascotte.fr; 📍; closed Dec–Feb), is a quieter and classier option less than 100m back from the beach. The finest of the many local campsites, 2km from the sea, is the four-star La Roseaie, 20 av Sohier (☎02.40.60.46.66, 🌐www.laroseaie.com; closed Oct–March).

Le Croisic

The small port of LE CROISIC, sheltering from the ocean around the corner of the headland, but stretching right across the peninsula, is a more attractive place to stay than La Baule. These days it's basically a pleasure port, but fishing boats do still sail from its harbour, near the very slender mouth of the bay, and there's a modern fish market near the long Tréhic jetty, where you can watch the day's catch being auctioned. The hills on either side of the harbour, Mont Lenigo and Mont Esprit, are not natural; they were formed from the ballast left by the ships of the salt trade. If you're staying, choose between the hotels Castel Moor, 500m beyond the town centre towards the end of the headland, on the sheltered side (☎02.40.23.24.18, 🌐www.castel-moor.com; 📍; closed Jan), or Les Nids, set slightly back from the ocean side of the peninsula at 15 rue Pasteur (☎02.40.23.00.63, 🌐www.hotellesnids.com; 📍; closed mid-Nov to early April), which has its own small indoor swimming pool. Both have good restaurants.

Close by, all around the rocky sea coast known as the Grande Côte, are a range of campsites, including the Océan (☎02.40.23.07.69, 🌐www.camping-ocean.com; closed Oct–March). For equally good beaches and a chance of cheaper hotel accommodation, you could go east past La Baule to Pornichet (though preferably keeping away from the plush marina) or to the tiny St-Marc, where in 1953 Jacques Tati filmed Monsieur Hulot's Holiday.

Nantes

NANTES, the former capital of Brittany, is no longer officially part of the province: it was transferred to the Pays de la Loire in 1962 when the modern administrative regions were established. Nonetheless, such bureaucracy is not taken too seriously in a city whose history is so intimately bound up with Breton fortunes. A considerable medieval centre, it later achieved great wealth from colonial expeditions, the slave trade and shipbuilding – activities in turn surpassed by more recent industrial growth. Although much of the former provincial character of the city has been lost, thanks to such recent accretions as the tower blocks masking the Loire and motorways tearing past the city, it remains to its inhabitants an integral part of Brittany.

Arrival and information

Nantes' gare SNCF, a little way east of the centre, is served by a dozen TGVs daily from Paris (just two hours away). It has two exits; for most facilities (tramway, buses, hotels) use Accès Nord. There are two main bus stations. The one just south of the centre on allée Baco, near place Ricordeau, is used by buses heading south and southwest, while the one where the cours des 50 Ôtages meets rue de l'Hôtel de Ville serves routes that stay north of the river. Modern rubber-wheeled trams run along the old riverfront, past the gare SNCF and the two bus stations. Flat-fare tickets, at €1.50, are valid for one hour, rather than just a single journey, though one-day tickets are also available for €3.50.

Nantes' tourist office is between the medieval city and the nineteenth-century town at 3 cours Olivier-de-Clisson (Mon, Tues & Wed–Sun 10am–6pm; Thurs 10.30am–6pm; ☎08.92.46.40.44, 🌐www.nantes-tourisme.com); it provides free book-size guides to local hotels and restaurants, and runs various guided tours of the city. It also sells the Pass Nantes, available in 24-hour (€14), 48-hour (€24) and 72-hour (€30) versions, which grants unrestricted use of local transport, including river cruises, and free admission to a wide range of museums. Cyber Cité, 14 rue de Strasbourg, offers Internet access (daily 1pm–1am; ☎02.40.89.57.92; €4 per hr).

Accommodation

Although it holds plenty of hotels to suit all budgets, Nantes is one of those cities where you won't necessarily stumble upon a suitable place just by walking or driving around at whim. Instead, there are two main concentrations: one, as ever, in the immediate vicinity of the gare SNCF, and the other in the narrow streets around the place Graslin. The tourist office runs a booking service (☎08.92.46.40.44, 🌐www.resanantes.com), while at weekends you can get two nights for the price of one (🌐www.bon-week-end-en-villes.com).

The hostel, La Manu, in a postmodern former tobacco factory at 2 place de la Manufacture (☎02.40.29.29.20, 📧nanteslamanu@fuaj.org; €14.90 per night), is a few hundred metres east of the gare SNCF, and accessible by taking tramway #1 towards Malachère.

Hotels

Amiral 26bis rue Scribe ☎02.40.69.20.21,  www.hotel-nantes.fr. Well-maintained little hotel on a lively pedestrianized street just north of place Graslin. All rooms have TV, bath and double-glazing. Mon–Fri 4, Sat & Sun 3

Cholet 10 rue Gresset ☎02.40.73.31.04,  www.hotelcholet-nantes.com. Quiet, friendly option very close to place Graslin, with a wide assortment of rooms, all with en-suite facilities. Mon–Fri 4, Sat & Sun 3

Des Colonies 5 rue du Chapeau Rouge ☎02.40.48.79.76,  www.hoteldescolonies.fr. Spruce, good-value hotel a couple of blocks up from place Graslin, within walking distance of everything. The lobby doubles as an art gallery, and one entire floor is reserved for non-smokers. Discounts at weekends. No restaurant. 4

L'Hôtel 6 rue Henri-IV ☎02.40.29.30.31,  www.nanteshotel.com. An insouciant name for one of the city's finest options, a very grand modern edifice facing the château with a high standard of comfort.

Buffet breakfasts cost €8.50; parking is €8. 5

La Pérouse 3 allée Duquesne ☎02.40.89.75.00,  www.hotel-laperouse.fr. Superb contemporary building ingeniously integrated with the older architecture that surrounds it. The interior is decorated with 1930s furniture, stucco walls and ultramodern touches such as high-tech TVs and wireless Internet access in the rooms. An original, comfortable and friendly place to stay, with excellent breakfasts to boot. Mon–Fri 6, Sat & Sun 6

Pommeraye 2 rue Boileau ☎02.40.48.78.79,  www.hotel-pommeraye.com. Extremely good-value modern boutique hotel with large, designer-decor rooms, beautiful bathrooms and free parking; good buffet breakfast. Mon–Fri 5, Sat & Sun 4

St-Daniel 4 rue du Bouffay ☎02.40.47.41.25,  www.hotel-saintdaniel.com. These simple but pleasant and well-lit rooms, on a cobbled street just off the place du Bouffay in the very heart of the old city, are much in demand in summer. Paying €5 extra secures a TV and en-suite toilet. 2

The City

The Loire, the source of Nantes' riches, has dwindled from the centre. As recently as the 1930s, the river crossed the city in seven separate channels, but German labour as part of reparations for World War I filled in five. What are still called “islands” in the centre are now surrounded and isolated, not by water, but by hectic dual carriageways. These are not easy to cross, but they do at least mean that Nantes is separated into a series of discernible districts: the older medieval city is concentrated around the cathedral, with the château prominent in its southeast corner, while the elegant nineteenth-century town lies to the west, across the cours des 50-Otages.

The old town

Though no longer on the waterfront, the Château des Ducs still preserves the form in which it was built by two of the last rulers of independent Brittany, François II, and his daughter Duchess Anne, born here in 1477. The list of famous people who have been guests or prisoners, defenders or belligerents, of the castle includes Gilles de Rais (Bluebeard), publicly executed in 1440; Machiavelli, in 1498; John Knox as a galley-slave from 1547–49; and Bonnie Prince Charlie preparing for Culloden in 1745. In addition, the Edict of Nantes was signed here in 1598 by Henri IV, ending the Wars of Religion by

At the time this book went to press, the tourist office in Nantes was promising that a remarkable new attraction would open in the city in the summer of 2007. The plan is for a giant artificial elephant to carry thirty passengers at a time through the streets, for €6 per person. Tours of the workshop responsible for constructing the preposterous pachyderm, on the Île de Nantes, will also be available.

granting a degree of toleration to the Protestants. It had far more crucial consequences when it was revoked, by Louis XIV, in 1685.

The stout ramparts of the château remain pretty much intact, and most of the encircling moat is filled with water, surrounded by well-tended lawns that make a popular spot for lunchtime picnics. Within the walls stand a rather incongruous potpourri of buildings added in differing styles over the years. At the time of writing the entire château complex had for many years been in the process of a major facelift, which made it impossible to visit. Assuming it has finally reopened when you read this, it should hold a new museum covering the history of Nantes, and it should also be possible to walk the complete circuit of the ramparts.

In 1800 the Spaniards Tower, the castle's arsenal, exploded, shattering the stained glass of the Cathédrale de St-Pierre-et-St-Paul over 200m away. This was just one of many disasters that have befallen the church. It was used as a barn during the Revolution, bombed during World War II, and damaged by fire in 1972. Restored and finally reopened, its soaring height and lightness are emphasized by its clean white stone. It contains the tomb of François II and his wife Margaret – with somewhat grating symbols of Power, Strength and Justice for him and Fidelity, Prudence and Temperance for her.

Nantes' Musée des Beaux-Arts, east of the cathedral on rue Clemenceau, has a respectable collection of paintings displayed in excellent modern galleries, and plays host to a high standard of temporary exhibitions (Mon, Wed & Fri–Sun 10am–6pm, Thurs 10am–8pm; €3.50, €2 after 4.30pm). Not all its Renaissance and contemporary works are on display at any one time, but you should be able to take in canvases ranging from a gorgeous David Triumphant by Delaunay to Chagall's Le Cheval Rouge and Monet's Nymphéas.

The nineteenth-century town

The financier Graslin took charge of the development of the western part of the city in the 1780s, when Nantes' prosperity was at a high due to the sugar and slave trades. Place Royale, with its distinctive fountain, was first laid out in the closing years of the eighteenth century, and has been rebuilt since it was bombed in 1943; the 1780s also produced the nearby place Graslin, named after its creator, with the elaborately styled Grand Théâtre, whose Corinthian portico contrasts with the 1895 Art Nouveau of the not-to-be-missed La Cigale brasserie (see opposite) on the corner.

West of the place Royale on rue Crebillon, a spectacular nineteenth-century multi-level shopping centre mentioned by Flaubert, the Passage Pommeraye, drops down three flights of stairs towards the place du Commerce. The attention to detail lavished upon it is on a scale undreamt of in modern malls, giving a glimpse of early consumerism; each of the gas lamps that light the central area is held by an individually crafted marble cherub.

Rue Voltaire runs west of the place Graslin, leading to the Musée d'Histoire Naturelle at no. 12 (daily except Tues 10am–6pm, www.museum.nantes.fr; €3.50). This holds an eccentric assortment of oddities, including tatty stuffed specimens of virtually every bird and animal imaginable, plus rhinoceros toenails, a coelacanth, an aepyornis egg and an Egyptian mummy. There's even a complete tanned human skin, taken in 1793 from the body of a soldier whose dying wish was to be made into a drum. Further along is Viollet-le-Duc's Palais Dobrée (Tues–Fri 1.30–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 2.30–5.30pm; €3, free on Sun), a nineteenth-century mansion given over to two museums, one of which claims to feature Duchess Anne's heart in a box.

Eating

Restaurants fill the winding lanes of the old city and it shouldn't take long to come up with something if you wander the pedestrian streets in the centre. Nantes is big enough to have all sorts of ethnic alternatives as well, with Algerian, Italian, Chinese, Vietnamese and Indian places in addition to those listed here.

L'Atlantide Centre des Salorges, 16 quai Ernest-Renaud ☎02.40.73.23.23. Designer restaurant, with big views from the fourth floor of a modern block, that serves the contemporary French cuisine of chef Jean-Yves Gueho. Fish is the speciality, but expect quirky twists like the bananas braised in beer. Menus at €28 and €70. Closed Sat lunch & all Sun, plus first 3 weeks of Aug.

Chez L'Huître 5 rue des Petites-Écuries ☎02.51.82.02.02. Much as the name suggests, this lovely little restaurant specializes in oysters of all sizes and provenance, priced from €7.80 to €15 per half-dozen. The "apérihuître" consists of six oysters and a glass of Muscadet for €8.50; you can also get smoked fish, fish soup and other simple dishes. Open until late nightly, closed Sun lunch.

La Cigale 4 place Graslin ☎02.51.84.94.94. Fabulous late nineteenth-century brasserie, offering fine meals in opulent surroundings, with seating at terrace tables or in a more formal indoor dining room. Fish is a speciality, with lunch options like the €16.90 tartare de thon. The €11.90 and €22.90 menus are served until midnight.

Au P'tit Beurre 18 rue de Richebourg ☎02.40.74.11.61. Friendly little place with outdoor seating near the château, that serves good-value local food. The €14 weekday lunch menu is good value; dinner menus range up to €30. Closed Sat lunch, Sun eve & Mon.

Lou Pescadou 8 allée Baco ☎02.40.35.29.50. Despite being somewhat off the beaten track, near the gare routière, this is Nantes' most fashionable venue for fresh fish, with menus from €14. Closed Mon eve, Sat lunch & Sun.

Travel details

Trains

Brest to: Le Mans (1 daily; 3hr 40min); Morlaix (16 daily; 35min); Paris-Montparnasse (7 TGVs daily; 4hr 20min); Quimper (7 daily; 1hr 15min); Rennes (8 daily; 2hr 15min).

Guingamp to: Paimpol (June–Sept only, 4–5 daily; 45min).

Quimper to: Lorient (5 daily; 40min); Nantes (3 daily; 2hr 30min); Redon (6 daily; 1hr 40min); Vannes (8 daily; 1hr 10min).

Rennes to: Brest (5 TGVs daily; 2hr 15min, plus 6 daily slower services, 2hr 40min); Caen (4 daily; 3hr) via Dol (35min) and Pontorson (1hr); Morlaix (10 daily; 1hr 45min), via Lamballe (40min), St-Brieuc (50min); Nantes (5 daily; 1hr 30min); Paris-Montparnasse (10 TGVs daily; 2hr 10min); Quimper (9 daily; 2hr 30min); Vannes (6 daily; 1hr); Vitré (10 daily; 35min).

Roscoff to: Morlaix (4 daily; 35min).

St-Malo to: Rennes (6 daily; 50min; connections for Paris on TGV). All trains pass through Dol (20min).

Buses

Brest to: Brignogan (7 daily; 1hr); (Camaret (5 daily; 1hr 10min); Le Conquet (7 daily; 40min); Le Faou (7 daily; 30min); Quimper (5 daily; 1hr 15min); Roscoff (3 daily; 1hr 50min).

Quimper to: Audierne (10 daily; 50min); Beg-Meil (8 daily; 50min); Bénodet (3–8 daily; 30min); Camaret (3 daily; 1hr 20min); Concarneau (7 daily; 30min); Crozon (3 daily; 1hr 10min); Douarnenez (10 daily; 40min); Fougères (8 daily; 30min); Locronan (3 daily; 20min); Pointe du Raz (5 daily; 1hr 30min); Roscoff (1 daily; 2hr 30min).

Rennes to: Dinan (6 daily; 1hr 20min); Dinard (5 daily; 1hr 40min); Fougères (10 daily; 1hr); Mont St-Michel (5 daily; 1hr 20min).

Roscoff to: Brest (3 daily; 2hr); Morlaix (5 daily; 1hr); Quimper (1 daily; 2hr 30min).

St-Malo to: Cancale (4 daily; 45min); Combourg (2 daily; 1hr); Dinan (4 daily; 45min); Dinard (8 daily; 30min); Fougères (3 daily; 2hr 15min); Mont St-Michel (4 daily; 1hr 30min); Pontorson (4 daily; 1hr 15min); Rennes (3 daily; 1hr 30min).

Vannes to: Arzon (4 daily; 50min); Auray (8 daily; 30min); Carnac (7 daily; 1hr 20min); Quiberon (7 daily; 2hr); Pontivy (9 daily; 1hr 10min); Malestroit (3 daily; 50min).

Ferries

For details of ferries to Ouessant & Molène, see p.443; to Bréhat, see p.433; to Batz, see p.441; to Sein, see p.453; to Belle-Île, see p.470; and for tours of the Gulf of Morbihan see p.480.

6

The Loire

6

THE LOIRE

- * Stained glass at Bourges cathedral Some of France's finest stained-glass windows are preserved in Bourges' extravagant Gothic cathedral. See p.510
- * Château de Chenonceau The most graceful of all the Loire châteaux bridges the River Cher. See p.512
- * Château de Chambord With this Renaissance "hunting lodge", François I planned to outshine all the kings of Europe. See p.525
- * The gardens at Villandry These superb gardens are home to allegorical Renaissance hedge-work and a world-beating vegetable plot. See p.537
- * Bed and breakfast in Azay-le-Rideau This tiny but pretty town has two unusual bed and breakfasts: one in a château, another in a troglodytic cave. See p.539
- * The Tapestry of the Apocalypse Dramatically displayed in Angers' half-ruined château, this is one of the greatest works of medieval art. See p.551

△ Château du Plessis-Bourré

The Loire

When the Loire reaches its halfway point and finally turns west towards the Atlantic, locals say that it ceases to be a mere rivière, it becomes a fleuve – which is something altogether grander. In this proudest stretch, from the hills of Sancerre to the city of Angers, it flows past an extraordinary parade of castles, palaces and fine mansions – a relic of late medieval times, when the Loire was the favoured region of the French royal family and the chief hunting and pleasure ground of the aristocracy. In fact, the Loire valley is so densely populated with these châteaux that when it came to choosing which should be awarded the title of World Heritage Site, UNESCO just bestowed the label on the entire valley. The roll call can be intimidating for the visitor, but if you pick your châteaux carefully, rid yourself of a sense of duty to guided tours and spend days on riverbanks with supplies of local cheese, fruit and wines, the Loire can be the most beguiling of all French regions.

The region's heartland Touraine, long known as “the garden of France”, has some of the best wines, the tastiest goat's cheese, the most regal history and, it's argued, the purest French accent in the land. It also has one of the finest châteaux in Chenonceau and by far the most developed tourist industry to match. But Touraine also takes in three of the Loire's pleasantest tributaries: the Cher, Indre and Vienne, each of which can be explored at a slower, more intimate pace. If you have just a week to spare for the region, then these are the parts to concentrate on. The attractive towns of Blois and Amboise, each with their own exceptional châteaux, make good bases for visiting the area upstream of Tours. Numerous grand châteaux dot the wooded country immediately south and east of Blois, including Chambord, the grandest of them all, while the wild and watery region of the Sologne stretches away further to the south-east. Downstream of Tours, around handsome Saumur, fascinating troglodyte dwellings have been carved out of the rock faces.

As well as the many châteaux, the region has a few unexpected sights, most compelling of which are the gardens at Villandry, outside Tours; the abbey at

Château and monument pass

The handy Passeport Val de Loire “la clef des temps” (€25, free to under-18s) allows you to visit ten national monuments in the Loire valley over the course of a year. You can purchase it at any participating site, including the châteaux at Angers, Azay-le-Rideau, Chambord and Chaumont, the Cloître de la Psalette at Tours cathedral, and the Abbaye de Fontevraud.

Fontevraud; and the apocalyptic tapestry sequence in Angers, capital of the ancient wine-producing county of Anjou. Of the three main cities, Tours and Angers provide the best urban bases, though Orléans has its own charm. Each city has its distinctive cathedral, though none is as impressive as the hybrid Romanesque-Gothic cathedral of busy, modern Le Mans, located some way north of the Loire valley in the topographically uninspiring département of Sarthe, or the stunningly glazed Gothic fantasy of medieval Bourges, which lies well south of the Loire, in the marshy farmland of the Berry.

The Loire itself is often called the last wild river in France, mostly because unpredictable currents and shallow water brought an end to commercial river traffic as soon as the railways arrived, and the many quays remain largely forgotten, except by the occasional tour boat. The river's wildness also takes shape

The Loire is renowned for the softness of its climate and the richness of its soil, qualities that help produce some of the best fruit and vegetables you'll find anywhere. From Anjou's orchards come greengages, named Reine Claudes after François I's queen, and the succulent Anjou pear. Market stalls overflow with summer fruits, particularly local apricots. Tarte tatin, an upside-down apple tart, is said to originate in Lamotte-Beuvron, in the Sologne. Tours is famous for its French beans and Saumur for its potatoes. Asparagus, particularly the fleshy white variety, appears in soufflés, omelettes and other egg dishes as well as on its own, accompanied by vinaigrette made (if you're lucky) with local walnut oil. Finally, from Berry, comes the humble lentil, whose green variety often accompanies salmon or trout.

Given the number of rivers that flow through the region, it's hardly surprising that fish features on most restaurant menus, though this doesn't guarantee that it's from the Loire itself. In fact, if it's salmon – protected by law – you can be certain that it's not. Favourites are filet de sandre (pike-perch – a fish native to Central Europe), usually served in the classic Loire beurre blanc sauce; stuffed bream; matelote of local eels softened in red wine; salmon (often flavoured with sorrel); and little smelt-like fishes served deep-fried (la friture).

The favoured meat of the eastern Loire is game, and pheasant, guinea fowl, pigeon, duck, quails, young rabbit, venison and even wild boar are all hunted in the Sologne. They are served in rich sauces made from the wild mushrooms of the region's forests or the common champignon de Paris, cultivated on a huge scale in caves cut out of the limestone rock near Saumur. In recent years, some producers have experimented with exotic varieties such as pleurotes (oyster mushrooms), shiitake and pieds bleus. Both Tours and Le Mans specialize in rillettes, or potted pork; in Touraine charcuteries you'll also find pâté au biquion, made from pork, veal and young goat's meat.

Though not as famous as the produce of Bordeaux and Burgundy, the Loire valley has some of the finest wines in France, and there are well over twenty different appellations to discover. Sancerre, the easternmost Loire appellation, produces perhaps the finest white wines in the region from the great Sauvignon grape, while at the other end of the river, the whites of Muscadet around Nantes have an acidity which makes them perfect for washing down the local shellfish. Anjou's rosé wines are ideal for a summer evening, though in the same region you'll also find the famous Coulée de Serrant, part of Anjou's dry white Savennières appellation. A little further east, around Saumur, the renowned soft red of Saumur-Champigny stands out. Touraine's finest reds – Chinon, Bourgueil and St-Nicolas de Bourgueil – get their ruby colour from the Cabernet Franc grape, while many of its attractive white wines are made from the Chenin Blanc (known locally as the Pineau de la Loire), including the highly fashionable Jasnières.

Fruity, Beaujolais-like reds made from the Gamay grape are increasingly popular, and best suited for drinking young. At the other end of the spectrum is the honeyed complexity of Côteaux du Layon's so-called dessert wines – best with blue cheese or foie gras rather than pudding – and Vouvray's still, sweet and semi-sweet whites, which only release the best of the Chenin Blanc grape after decades in the bottle. Vouvray, just east of Tours, is equally renowned for its sparkling méthode champenoise wines, a rival to Montlouis, across the river, and the full, fruity sparkling Saumur – a good example of which is a serious match for most Champagnes.

Touraine makes something of a cult of its goat's cheese, and a local chèvre fermier (farm-produced goat's cheese) can be a revelation. Four named cheeses are found on most boards: Ste-Maure is a long cylinder with a piece of straw running through the middle; Poulligny-St-Pierre and Valençay are pyramid-shaped; and Selles-sur-Cher is flat and round.

The Loire by bike

Thanks to the Loire à Vélo scheme (www.loire-a-velo.fr), the Loire valley is now one of the loveliest and safest – not to mention flattest – places in the world to have a cycling holiday or take a day out on a hired bike. A mix of dedicated cycle paths and meticulously signposted routes along minor roads now runs all the way along the Loire from Orléans to beyond Angers – a distance of more than 300km. Or almost all the way: a single gap upstream of Tours means you'll have to follow ordinary roads for 50km between Tours and Candé-sur-Beuvron, 14km downstream of Blois – or work out a much lengthier route on back roads. Work is now under way to fill this gap, however, and to extend the network further up- and downstream. The region around Blois offers an additional, 300-kilometre network, Châteaux à vélo (www.chateauxavelo.com; see p.522). These routes thread inland among the forests, linking the area's many châteaux.

Tourist offices can provide detailed maps and other information, and you can download most details, including maps, online. French villages are well accustomed to cyclists parading round in garish gear, and all larger towns have at least one hire agency. Bikes can also be hired at many hotels, campsites, tourist offices, train stations and even restaurants along the way. Many have signed up to the admirable Détours de Loire scheme (02.47.61.22.23, www.locationvelos.com), which allows you to pick up a bike in one place and drop it off in another, paying inexpensive drop-off costs per zone crossed – on top of the bike rental charge, of course.

in dramatic floods, but for most of the year it meanders gently past its shifting sandbanks, shaded by reeds and willows, and punctuated by long, sandy islands beloved by birds. The dangers of collapsing sandbanks and strong currents mean that swimmers should confine themselves to one of the many tributaries, though it's possible to rent a kayak in many places.

In general, this is a region where rental cars and bus tours are the norm. Yet train lines run along the river towards Nantes and Brittany and up through Tours to Paris, and most sites are accessible by public transport. If you're exploring on your own, however, it's a good idea to hire some means of transport, at least for occasional forays, because bus schedules can be skeletal and mostly geared to commuters and schoolchildren, and trains too limiting. Hiring a bike is perhaps the most enjoyable option of all: this is wonderful and easy cycling country, best of all on the flood banks, or levees, of the river itself, on the quiet country backroads, and on the dedicated cycle routes that make up the new Loire à Vélo network (see box above).

Orléans and around

ORLÉANS is the northernmost city on the Loire, sitting at the apex of a huge arc in the river as it switches direction and starts to flow southwest. Its proximity to Paris, just over 100km away, has always shaped this ancient city. Goods and passengers sailing up the Loire would disembark at Orléans for the overland journey on to the capital, and it became an important port. The city's glory may have faded in the late nineteenth century along with the fortunes of the river, but recent years have seen an economic renaissance. High-speed train and motorway links to the capital and a rash of cosmetics factories set up in the suburbs have brought new jobs and prosperity. The ancient riverside quays have been redeveloped and ultramodern trams have been introduced stained glass of the vast Neo-Gothic cathedral. One of the best times to visit is the evening before and the day of May 8 (Joan of Arc Day), when the city is filled with parades, fireworks and a medieval fair.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare SNCF leads straight into the modern shopping centre on place d'Arc, which fronts onto a huge swathe of busy roads; the old town centre lies on the far side of the traffic. The gare routière, on rue Marcel-Proust, is just north of place d'Arc. The main tourist office, 2 place de l'Étape (April & May Mon–Sat 9.30am–1pm & 2–6.30pm; June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–1pm & 2–7pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.38.24.05.05), is in the old centre, opposite the cathedral.

Accommodation in Orléans is mostly uninspiring. A few inexpensive central hotels stand out from the rest and there are plenty of fall-back choices near the station.

Hotels

D'Arc 37 rue de la République ☎02.38.53.10.94, 🌐www.hoteldarc.fr. This long-established Art Nouveau hotel has touches of grandeur. The most attractive rooms have small balconies with window boxes, looking down onto the tramlines and pedestrianized street below. ⑥

Le Brin de Zinc 62 rue Ste-Catherine ☎02.38.53.88.77, 🌐www.brindezinc.fr. Half a dozen sparsely furnished but pleasant and well-maintained rooms in an old building above a popular and very central restaurant. ②

 Des Cèdres 17 rue Maréchal-Foch ☎02.38.62.22.92, 🌐www.hoteldescedres.com. Welcoming, newly renovated three-star with a garden in a peaceful quarter of town. The interconnecting rooms are useful for families. ⑤

Charles Sanglier 8 rue Charles-Sanglier ☎02.38.53.38.50, 📧hotelsanglier@wanadoo.fr. Very central, so tends to get booked up. The modern building is unprepossessing, and the rooms are small and a little shabby, but it's a friendly place, and comfortable enough. ③

Jackotel 18 Cloître-St-Aignan ☎02.38.54.48.48, ☎02.38.77.17.59. Unrivalled location overlooking the church of St-Aignan across a shaded square, but the decor is anonymous 1980s-style. ④

Marguerite 14 place du Vieux-Marché ☎02.38.53.74.32, 📧hotel.marguerite@wanadoo.fr. Central, friendly and well run. The large, immaculate rooms are painted in cheery modern colours – a few unrenovated rooms are cheaper. ④

De Paris 29 Faubourg-Bannier ☎02.38.53.39.58. Old-fashioned but clean rooms above a very ordinary bar, near the train station. Extremely friendly and helpful management. ①

Hostel and campsite

Auberge de Jeunesse d'Orléans-La Source Stade Omnisports, 7 av Beaumarchais ☎02.38.53.60.06, 📧auberge.crjs@wanadoo.fr. Good hostel, with friendly management and very modern rooms and facilities. The major downside is the suburban location, underneath a stand of Orléans' stadium: take tram A from the train station, get off at "Université l'Indien" (30min), then walk 500m east down av du Président-Kennedy. Reception Mon–Fri 8am–7pm; €9 per night with HI membership.

Camping Gaston Marchand chemin de la Roche, St-Jean-de-la-Ruelle ☎02.38.88.39.39. The municipal campsite, and the closest to Orléans, 3km away out on the Blois road, beside the Loire; bus #26, stop "Petite Espère". Closed Sept–June.

The City

St Joan turns up all over town. In pride of place in the large, central place du Martroi, a mostly pedestrianized square at the end of rue de la République, rises a bulky mid-nineteenth-century likeness of her on horseback. Just beyond place du Martroi, the grand nineteenth-century boulevard of rue Jeanne-d'Arc marches arrow-straight up to the doors of the Cathédrale Sainte-Croix (daily 9.15am–noon & 2–6pm), where Joan celebrated her victory over the English – although the uniformly Gothic structure actually dates from well after her death. Huguenot iconoclasts destroyed the transepts in 1568, and in 1601 Henri IV inaugurated a rebuilding programme which lasted until the nineteenth century. The lofty towers of the west front, which culminate in a delicate stone palisade, were only completed at the time of the Revolution. Inside, skeletal columns of stone extend in a single vertical sweep from the cathedral floor to the vault. Joan's canonization in 1920 is marked by a garish monumental altar next to the north transept, supported by two jagged and golden leopards that represent the English. In the nave, the late nineteenth-century stained-glass windows tell the story of her life, starting from the north transept. In a series of cartoon-like images, L'Anglois Perfide, or perfidious Albion, gets a rough ride, while the role of the Burgundians in her capture and the French clergy in her trial is rather brushed over. Across place d'Étape from the cathedral, outside the red-brick Renaissance Hôtel Groslot, the old Hôtel de Ville, Joan appears again, in pensive mood, her skirt now shredded by World War II bullets.

You're spared the Maid in the cavernous Musée des Beaux-Arts, opposite the Hôtel Groslot (Tues–Sat 10am–12.15pm & 1.30–5.45pm, Sun 2–6.30pm, €3), where the highlights of the main French collection on the first floor include Claude Deruet's Four Elements, the Le Nain brothers' dream-like and compelling Bacchus Discovering Ariane on Naxos, and the exquisite collection of eighteenth-century pastel portraits in room eight. The suite of rooms on the mezzanine level leads from nineteenth-century Neoclassicism through Romanticism and on to a large chamber devoted to the early Realists, dominated by Antigna's taut, melodramatic The Fire. Foreign art, mainly Flemish and Italian sixteenth- and seventeenth-century works, is on the second floor – look out for Coreggio's renowned Holy Family (1522) and Velázquez's St Thomas. Twentieth-century art lurks in the basement, where the big names include Picasso and Gauguin; a small inner chamber has a number of African-influenced sculptures by Henri Gaudier-Brzeska (1891–1915), who was born just outside Orléans at St-Jean-de-Braye.

If you follow rue Jeanne-d'Arc east from the cathedral and turn left down rue Charles-Sanglier, you'll find the ornate Hôtel Cabu (May, June & Sept Tues–Sat 1.30–5.45pm, Sun 2–6.30pm; July & Aug Tues–Sat 9.30am–12.15pm & 1.30–5.45pm, Sun 2–6.30pm; Oct–April Wed & Sat 1.30–5.45pm, Sun 2–5.45pm; same ticket as Musée des Beaux-Arts), whose three tiers faithfully follow the three main classical orders in strict Renaissance style. Inside, a small historical and archeological museum houses the extraordinary Treasure of Neuvy-en-Sullias, a collection of bronze animals and figurines found near Orléans in 1861. The cache was probably buried in the second half of the third century AD, either to protect it from Germanic invaders or to stop it being melted down for coinage at a time of rampant inflation, and possibly represents the last flourishing of Celtic religion at the end of the Gallo-Roman period. The floors above house various medieval oddities and Joan-related pieces, as well as exhibits on the history of Orléans. The entrance is on square Abbé-Desnoyers.

At the end of rue Jeanne-d'Arc, on place Général-de-Gaulle, is the semi-timbered Maison de Jeanne d'Arc (Tues–Sun: May–Oct 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; Nov–April 1.30–6pm; €2), a 1960s reconstruction of the house where Joan stayed. Its contents are fun, most of all for children, with good models and displays of the breaking of the Orléans siege. Despite the consistency in artists' renderings of the saint, it seems the pageboy haircut and demure little face are part of the myth – there is no contemporary portrait of her, save for a clerk's doodle in the margin of her trial proceedings, kept in the National Archives in Paris.

The riverfront and around

The scattered vestiges of the old city are on the east, down towards the river. Rue de Bourgogne was the Gallo-Roman main street, and is now lined with lively bars and restaurants. The Salles des Thèses is all that remains of the medieval university of Orléans where the hardline Reformation theologian Calvin studied Roman law. A short distance west on rue de Bourgogne, the circular Greek Revival-style Protestant chapel dates from the 1830s.

To the south, the attractive narrow streets of the old industrial area slope gently down towards the river. Once semi-derelict, it is now the focus of a campaign to make the riverfront once more the focus of the city. On the place de la Loire, which slopes down to the river from a nine-screen cinema complex, the flagstones are inset with a pattern that's supposed to suggest waves. At least two of the quarter's churches are on the list of precious monuments: the remains of St-Aignan and its well-preserved eleventh-century crypt; and the Romanesque St-Pierre-le-Puellier, a former university church now used for concerts and exhibitions. St-Aignan was destroyed during the English siege, rebuilt by the Dauphin and extended into one of the greatest churches in France by Louis XII. More sieges of the city during the Wars of Religion took their toll, leaving just the choir and transepts standing. Tours of the crypt, which was built in the early eleventh century to house the relics of St-Aignan, are occasionally conducted by the tourist office.

Eating and drinking

Rue de Bourgogne is the main street for restaurants and nightlife. You can choose from among French, Spanish, North African, Middle Eastern, Indian and Asian cuisines, all of which can be sampled at very reasonable prices. For buying your own provisions there are the covered market halls on place du Châtelet, near the river.

Restaurants

Les Antiquaires 2 & 4 rue au Lin

☎02.38.53.52.35. Run by a renowned chef, Philippe Bardau, this is Orléans' best restaurant and must be booked in advance. Lobster consommé, wild turbot with girolle mushrooms and pike-perch steak are some of its delights.

Menus begin at €46, but there's an excellent €38 menu (not available Sat eve or Sun) which includes selected wines. Closed Sun eve & Mon.

Le Brin de Zinc 62 rue Ste-Catherine. Bustling bistro just off place du Martroi in hotel of the same name. The outside tables are packed with a noisy crowd tucking into huge seafood platters (€14–28) and plats du jour (€7.40).

Les Fagots 32 rue du Poirier ☎02.38.62.22.79.

Wonderfully convivial place that looks like it has been crammed into someone's grandmother's kitchen. Traditional main courses and grilled meats feature on the €11 and €15 menus. Closed Sun & Mon.

La Mangeoire 28 rue du Poirier ☎02.38.68.15.38. This homely, brightly lit bistro is packed full of locals enjoying straightforward pasta, salads and French standards, with starters at €5 and mains from €10–15. Closed Sun.

La Petite Folie 223 rue de Bourgogne

☎02.38.53.39.87. Youthful, designer bar-restaurant serving fresh, light and exciting food – you might have asparagus flan, chicken with sauce Canadienne, then strawberry soup with wine – all for around €20. Closed Sun; closed at lunch-time Oct–April.

La Petite Marmite 178 rue de Bourgogne ☎02.38.54.23.83.

The most highly regarded restaurant on this busy street combines a stylish but homely feel with excellent regional cuisine. The excellent €20 menu du terroir features local products such as rabbit and guinea fowl from the Sologne. Closed Tues & Wed.

Bars and nightlife

L'Atelier 203 rue de Bourgogne. Arty, studenty place, with regular concerts and exhibitions. The mood is cosily friendly rather than pretentious and drinks are reasonably priced.

Le Club 266 rue de Bourgogne. Cellar club-bar with a tiny dance floor overlooked by a little mezzanine seating level. Nothing special but a friendly choice if you're out late at the weekend and want to push on past 2am. Entry €10 with a drink.

Paxton's Head 264–266 rue de Bourgogne.
English pub with a club in the cellars that's popular with a trendy, 20-something crowd, with occasional karaoke or live music. Daily 3pm–3am.

Listings

Bike hire The only central option is CAD, 95 rue Faubourg-Bannier ☎02.38.81.23.00. Otherwise, try Kit Loisirs, 1720 rue Marcel-Belot (☎02.38.63.44.34, @www.kitloisirs.com), out in the suburb of Olivet.

Car rental Avis, Gare SNCF ☎02.38.62.27.04; Rent-a-Car, 3 rue Sansonnieres ☎02.38.62.22.44; Europcar, 17 av de Paris ☎02.38.73.00.40.

Cinemas Le Select, 45 rue Jeanne-d'Arc, often shows good art-house movies in the original language; Cinema Multiplex Pathé, 45 rue des Halles, place de la Loire, sometimes shows Hollywood blockbusters in English. Programme info for both on ☎08.92.68.69.25, @www.cinemaspathe.com.

Festivals Fête de Jeanne d'Arc is a series of period-costume parades held on April 29, May 1

Which châteaux?

Choosing which Loire châteaux to visit can be a bewildering business, and trying to pack in the maximum can quickly blunt your sensibilities. The most famous sites usually justify the crowds they draw, but it's often wise to time your visit for lunchtime, or first and last thing. Visiting one of the lower-key sites, particularly if you have the place practically to yourself, is something special.

Of the most famous, Azay-le-Rideau (see p.539) and Chenonceau (see p.512) both belong exclusively to the Renaissance period, and their settings in the middle of moat and river respectively are very beautiful, rivalled only by the wonderful Renaissance gardens of Villandry (see p.537). Blois (see p.520), with its four wings representing four distinct eras, is extremely impressive, as is the monstrously huge Chambord (see p.525), the triumph of François I's Renaissance. At Valençay (see p.516), the interior of the Renaissance château is Napoleonic, while Cheverny (see p.523) is the prime example of seventeenth-century magnificence.

Many châteaux that started life as serious military defences were turned into luxurious residences by their royal or ducal owners: good examples are Brissac (see p.555), Chaumont (see p.523), with its nineteenth-century stables, and Ussé (see p.540), the most fairy-tale of them all. Le Plessis-Bourré (see p.553) is a fine example of late fifteenth-century elegant residence and strong defences combined, while Sully (see p.504) projects the power of its most famous owner, the Duc de Sully. Other feudal fortresses have preserved their medieval feel, among them: the ruined Chinon (see p.543); Langeais (see p.538), beautifully furnished in fifteenth-century style; Meung-sur-Loire (see opposite), with its dungeons; Fougères-sur-Bière (see p.524), whose towers and staircases you can explore on your own; and Amboise (see p.535), which rears above the Loire like a cliff. For an evocation of medieval times, the citadel of Loches (see p.517) is hard to beat.

Other châteaux are more compelling for their contents than for their architecture: Beauregard (see p.524) is most famous for its portrait gallery while La Bussière (see p.506) for its obsessive nineteenth-century decoration, entirely dedicated to freshwater fishing, and La Ferté-St-Aubin is a living aristocratic home. At Saumur (see p.546), a museum on horses rivals the attraction of the castle itself, while at Angers (see p.551) the stark, largely ruined medieval castle houses the Tapestry of the Apocalypse, the greatest work of art in the Loire valley.

Entry prices are pretty steep, particularly for the châteaux that have remained in private hands – and there are a surprising number of French aristocrats still living the fine life in the region. There is no consistency in concessions offered, and children rarely go free. If you're over 65, under 25, a student or still at school, check for any reductions and make sure you've got proof of age or a student card with you.

and May 7–8, with the big set-pieces occurring in front of the cathedral on the night of the 7th and morning of the 8th May. The Festival de Jazz d'Orléans is held right through June, culminating in concerts held in the Campo Santo (@www.ville-orleans.fr/orleansjazz). Every Sept in odd years, the Loire Festival takes place, with five days of concerts and shows beside the Châtelet quay.

Internet Leader Best Phone, 196 rue de Bourgogne (July & Aug 9.30am–11.30pm; Sept–June 11am–11.30pm; €3 per hour).

Medical assistance Centre Hospitalier, 1 rue Porte-Madeleine ☎02.38.51.44.44; emergencies ☎15.

Police 63 rue du Faubourg-St-Jean ☎02.38.24.30.00; emergencies ☎17.

Taxis Taxi Radio d'Orléans ☎02.38.53.11.11.

Château de Meung

Little streams known as les mauves flow between the houses in the village of MEUNG-SUR-LOIRE, 14km southwest of Orléans on the Blois rail line. During the summer months they leave slimy green high-water marks, but the sound of water is always pleasant, and Meung is an agreeable place to spend an afternoon, having also accumulated a number of literary associations over the centuries.

In the late thirteenth century, Jean de Meun, or de Meung, added 18,000 lines to the already 4000-line-long Roman de la Rose, a poetic hymn to sexuality written half a century earlier (by Guillaume de Lorris, from the town of the same name in the nearby Forêt d'Orléans). Inspired by the philosophical spirit of the times, de Meun transformed the poem into a finely argued disquisition on the nature of love, and inspired generations of European writers. Most recently, the town featured in the works of Georges Simenon – his fictional hero, Maigret, takes his holidays here.

Looming at the western edge of the old town centre, the Château de Meung (March–Oct daily 10am–7pm; Nov–Feb Sat & Sun 2–6pm; €7, @www.chateaudemeung.com) remained in the hands of the bishops of Orléans from its construction in the twelfth century right up to the Revolution, since when it has passed through seven or eight private hands. The exterior of the château on the side facing the old drawbridge looks grimly defensive, retaining its thirteenth-century pepper-pot towers, while the side facing the park presents a much warmer facade, its eighteenth-century windows framed by salmon-pink stucco. You can explore the older part on your own, even poking around under the roof but most of this pleasantly shambolic section of the building was remodelled in the nineteenth century, and little sense of the building's history remains. More impressive is the eighteenth-century wing, where the bishops entertained their guests in relative comfort. Below here are the cellars where criminals condemned by the Episcopal courts were imprisoned. The most famous of the detainees was the poet François Villon, who was kept under lock and key between May and October 1461.

Beaugency

Six kilometres southwest of Meung along the Loire, BEAUGENCY is a pretty little town, which, in contrast to its innocuous appearance today, played its part in the conniving games of early medieval politics. In 1152 the marriage of Louis VII of France and Eleanor of Aquitaine was annulled by the Council of Beaugency in the church of Notre-Dame, allowing Eleanor to marry Henry Plantagenet, the future Henry II of England. Her huge land holdings in southwest France thus passed to the English crown – which already controlled Normandy, Maine, Anjou and Touraine – and the struggles between the French and English kings over their claims to these territories, and to the French throne itself, lasted for centuries.

Liberated by the indefatigable Joan of Arc on her way to Orléans in 1429, Beaugency was a constant battleground in the Hundred Years War due to its strategic significance as the only bridge-crossing point of the Loire between Orléans and Blois. Remarkably, the 26-arch bridge still stands and gives an excellent view of the once heavily fortified medieval heart of the town, which clusters tightly around a handful of central squares. Place St-Firmin, with its statue of Joan, is overlooked by a tower of a church destroyed during the Revolution, while place Dunois is bordered by the massive eleventh-century Tour de César, formerly part of the rather plain, fifteenth-century Château Dunois, which is closed to visitors for major structural works, probably until 2009. The square is completed by the rather severe Romanesque abbey church of Notre-Dame, the venue for the council's fateful matrimonial decision in 1152. Shady place du Docteur-Hyvernaud, two blocks north of place Dunois, is dominated by the elaborate sixteenth-century facade of the Hôtel de Ville. Inside, the main council chamber is graced by eight fine embroidered wall hangings from the era of Louis XIII, but you'll have to ask at the tourist office (on the same square) to be allowed inside to have a look. One set illustrates the four continents as perceived in the seventeenth century, with the rest dramatizing pagan rites such as gathering mistletoe and sacrificing animals.

Practicalities

A small tourist office (May–Sept 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9.30am–noon & 2.30–6pm; ☎02.38.44.54.42, 🌐www.beaugency.fr) is on place Docteur-Hyvernaud. Two rather lovely hotels make the most of Beaugency's atmosphere of genteel charm: the 🏠 Hôtel de l'Abbaye, 2 quai de l'Abbaye (☎02.38.44.67.35, 🌐www.hotel-abbaye-beaugency.com; 📍), is set in a beautiful seventeenth-century abbey with painted ceilings and beds on raised platforms; while the small, delightful Hôtel de la Sologne, 6 place St-Firmin (☎02.38.44.50.27, 🌐www.hoteldelasologne.com; 📍); closed Dec 20–Jan 15) has some rooms with views of the Tour de César. The family-run Relais de Templiers, 68 rue du Pont (☎02.38.44.53.78, 🌐www.hotelrelaistempliers.com; 📍) is relatively inexpensive, but it's cosy, characterful and very welcoming. There's also a good HI hostel in the suburb of Vernon at 152 rte de Châteaudun, 2km north off the main Orléans–Blois road from the east side of town (☎02.38.44.61.31; closed Jan), and a riverside campsite (☎02.38.44.50.39; closed Oct–Easter), on the opposite bank from town.

Le Relais du Château, 8 rue du Pont (☎02.38.44.55.10; closed Wed), is a decent, traditional restaurant with menus from €14; alternatively, Le P'uit Bateau, 54 rue du Pont (☎02.38.44.56.38; closed Mon), has a pleasant terrace and slightly more elevated gastronomic ambitions, with menus from €20 upwards. Midway between the two, La Crep'zeria, 32 rue du Pont, serves decent pizzas and crêpes on its sunny terrace.

Château de la Ferté-St-Aubin and around

The Château de la Ferté-St-Aubin lies 20km south of Orléans (mid-Feb to mid-Nov daily 10am–7pm; €7, children aged 4–15 €4.50; 🌐www.chateau-ferte-st-aubin.com), at the north end of the village of the same name. The late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century building presents an enticing combination of salmon-coloured brick, creamy limestone and dark roof slates, while the interior is a real nineteenth-century home – and you are invited to treat it as such. You can wander freely into almost every room, playing billiards or the piano, picking up the old telephone, sitting on the worn armchairs or washing your hands in a porcelain sink; only the rather fancier grand salon, with its boiseries painted with views of the château and its antique furnishings, is cordoned off. Roughly every hour there are demonstrations down in the kitchens of how to make Madeleine cakes – the sweet spongy biscuit that so inspired Proust. At the rear of the château, also enclosed by the moat, there's a play fort with sponge balls supplied for storming it, little cabins with dummies acting out fairy tales, and a toy farm. Older children and adults can explore the adjacent reconstructed 1930s railway station building, with its original Compagnie des Wagons Lits (Orient Express) carriages pulled up outside.

The gare SNCF is roughly 200m southwest of the village square; around nine trains arrive daily from Orléans and continue south to Vierzon and Bourges. For eating, an inexpensive option is the Auberge Solognote, at 50 rue des Poulies (closed Tues eve & Wed), behind the covered market on La Ferté's main square.

Six kilometres east of La Ferté-St-Aubin, halfway between Ménestreau-en-Villette and Marcilly-en-Villette, just off the D108, is the little hamlet of CIRAN, where you can explore the 300 hectares of the Domaine de Ciran (daily 10am–sunset; €5). Its working farm is a typical Sologne setup where the principal activities are deer breeding, keeping goats and making chèvre, but the main reason to come is to explore the forested parts of the domaine, where you may well catch a glimpse of wild deer, as well as herons and geese around the ponds and sometimes even coypus. It's also possible to come across wild boar, so be careful, though they are not very threatening unless they're with their young. The six-kilometre signed walk – for which waterproof footwear is advisable – gives a good taste of the different landscapes of the region.

East to the Burgundy border

Upstream from Orléans, the rambling Forêt d'Orléans spreads to the north. Beyond it, a bland, treeless wheat plain stretches to Paris, and the immediate countryside to the south is similarly drab: sticking to the Loire itself is the best advice. Along the river are plenty of lesser-known attractions, most notably the abbey at St-Benoît, the château at Sully-sur-Loire, the small town of Gien, the aqueduct at Briare and the hilltop town of Sancerre, right on the Burgundy border, which makes some of the best dry whites in France.

Germigny-des-Près and St-Benoît-sur-Loire

Heading east of Orléans on the D960, you pass through Châteauneuf-sur-Loire – whose château has very pleasant gardens of rhododendrons and magnolias and a small museum of traditional Loire shipping – en route to GERMIGNY-DES-PRÈS, 30km from the city. It's a pleasant afternoon's bike ride. The small, plain church at Germigny (daily: April–Oct 8.30am–7.30pm; Nov–March 8.30am–6pm; €2 coin needed for lighting) incorporates at its east end one of the few surviving buildings from the Carolingian Renaissance, a tiny, perfectly formed church in the shape of a Greek cross. It was built in 806 as a private oratory for Theodulf, who was one of Charlemagne's counsellors as well as bishop of Orléans and abbot of St-Benoît. The chapel's horseshoe arches suggest the Arabic form but in fact reflect Theodulf's Visigothic origins, while the chapel itself is a typically Carolingian design, rationally planned and drawing on Classical design. The oratory's sheer antiquity is spoiled by too-perfect restoration work, but the unique gold and silver mosaic on the dome of the eastern chapel preserves all its rare beauty. Covered by distemper, it was only discovered by accident in the middle of the nineteenth century when children were found playing with coloured glass cubes in the church.

Five kilometres further upstream, along the D60, ST-BENOÎT-SUR-LOIRE offers a more impressive edifice, the Romanesque Abbaye de Fleury (daily: April–Oct 7am–9pm; Nov–March 9am–7pm; www.abbaye-fleury.com). In around 672, monks from Fleury returned home from a daring expedition to Monte Cassino in Lombard-occupied Italy with the remains of St-Benoît (St Benedict), the sixth-century founder of the reforming Benedictine order. The presence of the relics secured a prestigious future for the abbey, and over the course of the next 1100 years its abbots included many familiar names from French and Loire history, including the Cardinal of Guise, murdered in the château at Blois, and the great Cardinal Richelieu, who received the title of abbot as a political reward in 1621. For all its importance, the abbey stagnated as often as it flourished, and its population had dwindled to ten monks at the time of the Revolution, after which it was abandoned and dismantled. But the church itself survived, and Benedictine monks returned in 1944. The community now numbers some forty brothers, who still observe the original Rule – poverty, chastity and obedience – and can be heard singing Gregorian chant at the daily midday mass (11am on Sun).

Built in warm, cream-coloured stone between 1020 and 1218, the church dates from the abbey's greatest epoch. The oldest part, the porch tower, illustrates St John's vision of the New Jerusalem in Revelation – foursquare, with open gates on each side. The fantastically sculpted capitals of the heavy pillars are alive with acanthus leaves, birds and exotic animals. Three of them depict scenes from the Apocalypse, while another shows Mary's flight into Egypt. Inside, the choir is split into two levels: above, a marble mosaic of Roman origin covers the chancel floor; below, in the ancient crypt, the relics of St-Benoît lie buried at the very root of the church's forest of columns and arches. You can leave by the north door, where an unfinished Romanesque frieze, discovered only in 1996, shows the progress of sculpture from blind block of stone to finished work.

Sully-sur-Loire and around

SULLY-SUR-LOIRE lies on the south bank of the Loire, 7km east of St-Benoît and accessible by bus from Orléans. The grand château here is pure fantasy, despite savage wartime bombing that twice destroyed the nearby Loire bridge and caused incidental damage to the château itself. From the outside, rising massively out of its gigantic moat, it has all the picture-book requirements of pointed towers, machicolations and drawbridge. The interior is slowly being refurbished by its owners – the département of the Loiret – and is expected to reopen to visitors in July 2007.

The castle originally belonged to one of Charles VII's favourites, Georges de la Trémoille, who infuriated Joan of Arc by encouraging the Dauphin to devote himself to idle hunting in the forests around Sully, and by pursuing a pacifying, diplomatic solution to the wars. After Joan's failure to liberate Paris in 1430, de la Trémoille virtually imprisoned her in the castle. She escaped, but was captured less than two months later at the disastrous battle of Compiègne. The castle changed hands in 1602, this time being snapped up by Henri IV's minister, the Duke of Sully, who added the moat and park. After Henri's death, the duke was forced into retirement, which he spent writing in his castle. In the eighteenth century young Voltaire, exiled from Paris for libellous political verse, also spent time at the château. Sully's International Music Festival (www.festival-sully.com) runs right through June, featuring classical concerts held in a huge marquee in the château grounds.

The village of Sully itself is brick-built and fairly humdrum, but the quiet riverbank roads are worth exploring by bike, or you can venture north into the Forêt d'Orléans, on the far bank. From the village of Les Bordes, 6km north of Sully on the D948/D961, a seven-kilometre forest road will take you due east to the Carrefour de la Résistance, a crossroads in the heart of the wood surrounded by stands of giant oaks and sequoias.

Practicalities

The gare SNCF, on the Bourges–Étampes line, is 500m from the centre of the village, where the tourist office can be found on place de Gaulle (May–Sept Mon–Sat 9.45am–12.15pm & 2.30–6.30pm, Sun 10.30am–1pm; Oct–April Mon 10am–noon, Tues, Wed, Fri & Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Thurs 2–6pm; ☎02.38.36.23.70). Bikes can be hired from Passion Deux Roues, 10 rue des Epinettes (☎02.38.35.13.13).

Two decent hotels stand around the central marketplace: the Hostellerie du Grand Sully, 10 bd du Champ-de-Foire (☎02.38.36.27.56, www.grandsully.com; 🍴; closed Sun eve & Mon) is a reliable choice with a swish restaurant (menus from €27); while the rambling Hôtel de la Tour, above a bar at 21 rue Porte de Sologne (☎02.38.36.21.72, ☎02.38.36.37.63; 🍴), has simple rooms freshly done up in a modern style. For camping, Camping Hortus (☎02.38.36.35.94, www.camping-hortus.com; closed Nov–April) is on the opposite side of the Loire. For eating out, Côtes et Jardin, 8 rue du Grand Sully (☎02.38.36.35.89; closed Sun & Tues eves, Wed & last 2 weeks in Sept), on the château side of the village, is a distinctly classy affair, with an exceptionally good-value lunchtime menu for €13.

Gien and around

The pretty town of GIEN has been restored to its late fifteenth-century quaintness after extensive wartime bombing, and the sixteenth-century stone bridge spanning the river gives excellent views as you approach from the south. Looking downstream, the huge cooling towers of the nuclear power station at Dampierre-en-Burly, can be seen emitting streaming clouds of water vapour. The fifteenth-century château in the town centre – where the young Louis XIV and his mother, Anne of Austria, hid during the revolts against taxation known as the Frondes (see p.1273) – has been turned over to the Musée International de la Chasse et de la Nature (Feb, March & Oct–Dec daily except Tues 10am–noon &

△ Along the river at Gien

2–5pm; (April–June & Sept daily except Tues 10am–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–6pm; closed Jan; €5). Numerous exhibits venerating la chasse – hunting horns, tapestries, exquisite watercolours of horseback hunts, guns and falconers’ gear – rather outweigh la nature. The château itself is modest, but unusual in its brick construction, a pattern of dark red interrupted by geometric inlays of grey; the interior is similarly striking, with its warm combination of brick and timber. Although the exhibits here are dominated by depictions of royal and aristocratic hunting as a sport, it’s worth remembering that one of the significant consequences of the French Revolution for rural people was the right to hunt; a right jealously guarded today, particularly in the nearby Sologne.

Gien has also long been known in France for its fine china, and a large factory employs more than two hundred people today. You can buy the ordinary tableware, some of it attractive enough, in the factory shop on place de la Victoire, 1km west of the château and bridge, and the hand-worked, arty stuff either in the shops all over town, or direct from the Musée de la Faïencerie, immediately adjacent to the factory shop (Jan & Feb Mon–Fri 2–6pm, Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; March–Dec Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3.50), which displays the more extravagant ceramic knick-knacks produced over the last 180-odd years, ranging from exquisitely worked vases to some monstrously pretentious objets d’art. A video shows current fabrication techniques, which you can sometimes see for real in the factory (by appointment only; closed July, Aug & Dec; ☎02.38.67.44.92).

Practicalities

Gien’s tourist office is on place Jean-Jaurès, between the château and the river (June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon; Oct–May Mon–Sat 9.30am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎02.38.67.25.28). Bus #3, which runs between Briare and Orléans, stops at place Leclerc, at the north end of the bridge. For accommodation, La Poularde, 13 quai de Nice (☎02.38.67.36.05, @lapoularde2@wanadoo.fr; 📍), on the way out of town on the road to Briare, has some lovely rooms looking out onto the river, and an excellent restaurant (menus €29–50). If they’re full, try the rather ugly, modern Sanotel (☎02.38.67.61.46, 🌐www.sanotel.fr; 📍), which is just about redeemed by the views from the river-facing rooms. Adjacent is the campsite (☎02.38.67.12.50, 🌐www.camping-gien.com; closed mid–Nov to Feb), which has a swimming pool and lays on outdoor activities, including bike hire and canoe trips. For an alternative to the restaurant at La Poularde, make for the small strip of decent places on quai Lenoir, by the bridge; the pick of the bunch is the Restaurant de la Loire, at no. 18 (☎02.38.67.00.75; closed Mon), which is a refined place serving a wide variety of fish on menus from €18.50.

La Bussière

Twelve kilometres northeast of Gien is another château dedicated to catching your own dinner – this time by fishing. The so-called Château des Pêcheurs at LA BUSSIÈRE is moored like a ship on its enormous, six-hectare fish-pond, connected to a formal arrangement on its mainland of gardens and huge outbuildings (April–June & Sept to mid–Nov Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–6pm; €7). Initially a fortress, the château was turned into a luxurious residence at the end of the sixteenth century, but only the gateway and one pepper-pot tower are recognizably medieval. Guided tours are available, but you’re free to wander around, soaking up the genteel atmosphere evoked by the handsome, largely nineteenth-century furnishings and the eccentrically huge collection of freshwater fishing memorabilia bequeathed by Count Henri de Chasseval, whose widow lives in an apartment in one of the outbuildings. Paintings, models, stuffed fish, engravings, flies and rods are scattered throughout the house, while a huge coelacanth (a giant prehistoric relic discovered in the Comoros islands) lurks in a formaldehyde tank in the basement, next to the well-preserved kitchens and laundry.

Briare

The small town of BRIARE, 10km southeast of Gien on the Orléans–Nevers road and the Paris–Nevers rail line, centres on its belle-époque iron aqueduct, the Pont Canal, linking the Canal de Briare to the north with the Canal Lateral à la Loire, which runs south to the Saône. The design of the Pont Canal came from the workshops of Gustav Eiffel (of Tower fame), but parts of the canal scheme date back to the early seventeenth century, when internal waterways linking the Mediterranean, Atlantic and Channel coasts were devised. Poised high above the Loire, you can walk along the aqueduct's extraordinary 625-metre span, with its wrought-iron crested lamps and railings, hopefully without a bateau-mouche spoiling the effect.

On the opposite side of town from the canal, at the northern end, the tiny Maison des Deux Marines (daily: March–Sept 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; Oct to mid–Nov 2–6pm; €5, or €8 with Musée de la Mosaïque) is dedicated to the rival boatmen who plied the Loire and the Canal Lateral; its basement houses a modest aquarium of Loire species. Just across the street, the Musée de la Mosaïque et des Emaux (daily: Feb–Sept 10am–6.30pm; Oct–Dec 2–6pm; €5), has a small collection of reproduction and contemporary mosaics made using locally manufactured tiles – Briare's wares adorn sites as prestigious and varied as the mosque at Medina and Paris's RER stations.

The tourist office, 1 place Charles-de-Gaulle (April–Sept Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–noon; Oct–March Mon 2–5pm, Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎02.38.31.24.51, 🌐www.briare-le-canal.com), can provide details of canal boats and canoe rental as well as maps of footpaths, towpaths and the locks (the one at Chatillon-sur-Loire, 4km upstream, is particularly appealing). For accommodation, the modern Auberge du Pont Canal at 19 rue du Pont-Canal (☎02.38.31.24.24, 📧nicolas.rou@wanadoo.fr; 📍) is right next to the bridge.

Sancerre and around

Huddled at the top of a steep, round hill with the vineyards below, SANCERRE could almost be in Tuscany. The village trades heavily on its famous wines – there are endless caves offering tastings – rather than any particular sights or attractions, but it's certainly picturesque and the rolling hills of the Sancerrois, to the northwest, make an attractive venue for walks and cycle rides. First port of call for wine enthusiasts should be the Maison de Sancerre, 3 rue du Méridien (April, May, Oct & Nov 10am–6pm, June–Sept 10am–7pm; €5; 🌐www.maison-des-sancerre.com), which has an elaborate permanent exhibition on winemaking in Sancerre, and a garden of aromatic plants that represent the sixty key flavours found in Sancerre wines. The building itself is a fine fourteenth-century town house, the top of whose tower offers a great view over the rolling, vine-clad hills around.

Wine outlets in the village itself tend to belong to the most famous names, with prices to match, but the informative Aronde Sancerroise, at 4 rue de la Tour, just off the central Nouvelle Place (☎02.48.78.05.72) offers excellent, free tastings as well as tours of local vineyards. The tourist office, on Nouvelle Place (daily: June–Sept 10am–6pm; Oct–May 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–5.30pm; ☎02.48.54.08.21, 🌐www.sancerre.fr) can supply lists of vignerons; most are small-scale, traditional winemakers and welcome visitors on at least six days of the week. The Daumy family, based in Crézancy-en-Sancerre (☎02.48.79.05.75), has been making excellent organic wines for three generations, including the wonderful but much less commonly made red Sancerre. For a more unusual buy than the well-known white Sancerre, it's well worth exploring the neighbouring areas of Menetou-Salon and Pouilly-Fumé. Well suited to the wines is the local crottin de Chavignol, a goat's cheese named after the neighbouring village in which it's made; signs in Chavignol direct you to fromageries open to visitors.

The stretch of the Loire upstream of Sancerre is particularly lovely, and kayaks are available to hire (April–Oct 7.30am–9pm; ☎02.48.78.00.34) from a shop at the campsite in St-Satur, the town at the foot of the hill below Sancerre. The owner, Yvan Thibaudat, is something of a naturalist, and his guided kayak expeditions (€14 for a half day) are fascinating, even if you don't speak French.

Practicalities

The choice of hotels in Sancerre is surprisingly poor, but two charming chambres d'hôtes more than make up for it: Le Logis du Grillon, 3 rue du Chantre (☎02.48.78.09.45; 📍); and La Belle Époque, rue St-André (☎02.48.78.00.04; 📍). The two-star St-Martin, rue St-Martin (☎02.48.54.21.11; 📍), is comfortable enough, but you're better off down by the river in St-Satur, at the antique-furnished 🏠 Hôtel de la Loire, 2 quai de la Loire (☎02.48.78.22.22, 🌐www.hotel-de-la-loire.com; 📍) or the welcoming Auberge de St-Thibault, 37 rue J.-Combes (☎02.48.78.04.10; 📍), a block away from the river, which has five simple and exceptional-value rooms. An excellent campsite (☎02.48.54.04.67; closed Oct–April) is found a little further along the quay, beyond the kayak shop.

There are two fine restaurants in Sancerre: 🏠 La Pomme d'Or, 1 rue de la Panneterie (☎02.48.54.13.30; closed Tues & Wed eve); and the more formal La Tour, 31 place de la Halle (☎02.48.54.00.81), both with reasonably priced as well as more showy menus. The Auberge Joseph Mellot, Nouvelle Place (☎02.48.54.20.53; closed Sun, Tues eve & all Wed) serves good, simple meals that are designed to complement its own top notch wines.

Bourges

BOURGES, the chief town of the rather bland region of Berry, is some way from the Loire valley proper but linked to it historically. The miserable Dauphin (later Charles VII), mockingly dubbed “King of Bourges” by the English, retreated to the city after Henry V's victory at Agincourt had put all of northern France under English control. The presence of one of the finest Gothic cathedrals in France, rising gloriously out of the unpretentious and handsome medieval quarter, provides reason enough for making a detour, but the city also offers an impressive mansion belonging to the Dauphin's financial advisor, Jacques Coeur. Sadly, the citizens of Bourges aren't called “Bourgeois” but instead, “Berruyer”.

Bourges's festival programme is excellent. Les Printemps de Bourges (🌐www.printemps-bourges.com) features hundreds of contemporary music acts from rock to rap, and lasts for one week during the French Easter holidays. More esoteric are the Festival Synthèse, an electronic and acoustic music bash during the first week of June, and Un Été à Bourges (late June to late Sept), a line-up of free, outdoor performances of anything from local organ music to Chinese jazz. Atmospheric ambient lighting transforms the streets of the old town every evening in July and August (and from Thurs to Sat in May, June and Sept).

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare routière is west of the city beyond boulevard Juranville on rue du Prado. The gare SNCF lies 1km north of the centre; it's a straightforward-enough walk along avenues Henri Lauder and Jean-Jaurès to place Planchat, from where rue du Commerce connects with the main street, rue Moyenne. The tourist office is just off the top end of rue Moyenne, at 21 rue Victor-Hugo, facing the south facade of the cathedral (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–7pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 2–5pm; ☎02.48.23.02.60, 🌐www.bourges-tourisme.com). The old medieval quarter falls away to the east, below the cathedral.

Accommodation in Bourges mostly fails to make the best of the old city, the only attractive options being two three-star hotels and a superb chambre d'hôte.

Hotels and chambres d'hôtes

D'Angleterre place des Quatre-Piliers ☎02.48.24.68.51, 🌐www.bestwestern-angleterre-bourges.com. This is the old, traditional town-centre hotel, with an excellent location right next to the Palais de Jacques-Coeur. It has a degree of old-fashioned charm though a recent refurbishment has made it conform to Best Western three-star standards. The less expensive rooms are very small for the price. ③–⑦

 Les Bonnets Rouges 3 rue de la Thaumassière ☎02.48.65.79.92, 🌐bonnets-rouges.bourges.net. Five beautifully furnished chambres d'hôtes in a striking seventeenth-century house with views of the cathedral from the attic rooms. ⑤

De Bourbon bd de la République ☎02.48.70.70.00, 🌐hoteldebourbon.fr. Between the town centre and the railway station, this is a luxurious hotel converted from a seventeenth-century abbey, though inside it's standard luxury-hotel-chain fare. ⑦

Le Central 6 rue du Docteur-Témoin ☎02.48.24.10.25. Tiny, inexpensive and deeply old-fashioned rooms above a friendly bar just off rue Moyenne. ⑦

Le Christina 5 rue de la Halle ☎02.48.70.56.50, 🌐www.le-christina.com. The six-storey modern exterior is uninspiring, but inside you'll find a friendly, professionally run hotel with seventy cheerfully decorated rooms, some with a/c. Good value and close to the old centre. ③

Hostel and campsite

HI hostel 22 rue Henri-Sellier ☎02.48.24.58.09, 🌐bourges@fuaj.org. Hostel located a short way southwest of the centre, overlooking the River Auron. Bus #1 from the station towards "Golf", stop "Europe"; or a 10min walk from the cathedral or gare routière. Open mid-Jan to mid-Dec daily 8am–noon & 6–10pm. HI membership required.

Camping Robinson 26 bd de l'Industrie ☎02.48.20.16.85. Decent-sized three-star site located south of the HI hostel. Bus #1 from place Cujas, stop "Joffre", or a 10min walk from the gare routière. Closed mid-Nov to mid-March.

The City

The centre of Bourges sits on a hill rising from the marshes of the River Yèvre, in the shadow of its main attraction, the magnificent early Gothic cathedral. Having seen the cathedral, many people move straight on, but the rest of the city is worth at least a couple of hours of wandering, with a number of ancient hôtels and burghers' houses displaying the wealth of a place that was built to rival the ruling provincial city of Dijon.

The cathedral

The exterior of the twelfth-century Cathédrale St-Étienne (daily: April–June & Sept 8.30am–7.15pm; July & Aug 8.30am–7.45pm; Oct–March 9am–5.45pm) is characterized by the delicate, almost skeletal appearance of flying buttresses supporting an entire nave that has no transepts to break up its bulk. A much-vaunted example of Gothic architecture, it's modelled on Notre-Dame in Paris but incorporates improvements on the latter's design, such as the astonishing height of the inner aisles.

The tympanum above the main door of the west portal could engross you for hours with its tableau of the Last Judgement, featuring carved, naked figures with bodies full of movement and faces alive with expression. Thirteenth-century imagination has been given full rein in the depiction of the devils, complete with snakes' tails and winged bottoms and faces appearing from below the waist, symbolic of the soul in the service of sinful appetites.

The interior's best feature is the twelfth- to thirteenth-century stained glass. There are geometric designs in the main body of the cathedral, but the most glorious windows, with astonishing deep colours, are around the choir, all created between 1215 and 1225. You can follow the stories of the Prodigal Son, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the life of Mary, Joseph in Egypt, the Good Samaritan, Christ's Crucifixion, the Last Judgement and the Apocalypse – binoculars come in handy for picking up the exquisite detail. On either side of the central absidal chapel, polychrome figures kneel in prayer; these are Jean de Berry, the great artistic patron of late fourteenth-century Bourges, and his wife. The painted decoration of the astronomical clock in the nave celebrates the wedding of Charles VII, who married Marie d'Anjou here on April 22, 1422.

On the northwest side of the nave aisle is the door to the Tour de Beurre (daily except Sun morning: April & Sept 9.45–11.45am & 2–5.30pm; May & June 9.30–11.30am & 2–6pm; July & Aug 9.30am–6.15pm; Oct–March 9.30–11.30am & 2–4.45pm; €5, or €9 with the crypt and Palais de Jacques-Coeur), which you can climb unsupervised for fantastic views over the old city, the marshes and the countryside beyond. You can also join a guided tour of the crypt (same hours and ticket; tours roughly every hour), where you can see the alabaster statue of a puggish Jean de Berry, a small bear, symbol of strength, lying asleep at his feet. Alongside are fragments of the cathedral's original rood screen, which survived the Protestant siege of 1562 but not the modernizers of the mid-eighteenth century, while a wonderful polychrome Entombment from the 1530s adorns the dark centre of the crypt. The same ticket allows you to climb unsupervised to the top of the north tower, rebuilt in flamboyant style after the original collapsed in 1506.

Next to the cathedral in place E.-Dolet, the Musée des Meilleurs Ouvriers de France (Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm, Sun 2–5pm; free) displays show-off pieces by French artisans. The theme changes each year, and recent features have included glassblowing, woodwork and pastry-making.

The rest of the city

Bourges's museums may be modest, but they are housed in some beautiful medieval buildings, the finest of which are all within a stone's throw of the north end of rue Moyenne. Rue Bourbonnoux, parallel to rue Moyenne to the east of the cathedral, is worth a wander for the early Renaissance Hôtel Lallemand, richly decorated in an Italianate style. It houses the Musée des Arts Décoratifs (Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm, Sun 2–5pm; free), a diverting enough museum of paintings, tapestries, furniture and objets d'art, including works by the Berrichon artist Jean Boucher (1575–1633). The coffered ceiling of the oratory is carved with alchemical symbols. Halfway along the street, you can take a narrow passage up to the remains of the Gallo-Roman town ramparts, lined with old houses and trees. On rue Edouard-Branly, you'll find the fifteenth-century Hôtel des Échevins, home to the Musée de Maurice Estève (Mon & Wed-Sat 10am-noon & 2-5pm, Sun 2-5pm; free), dedicated to the highly coloured, mostly abstract paintings and tapestries by the locally born artist, who died in 2001.

The continuation of rue Edouard-Branly, rue Jacques-Coeur, was the site of the head office, stock exchange, dealing rooms, bank safes and home of Charles VII's finance minister, Jacques Coeur (1400-56), a medieval shipping magnate, moneylender and arms dealer who dominates Bourges as Joan of Arc does Orléans – Charles VII just doesn't get a look-in. The Palais de Jacques-Coeur (daily: May & June 9.45-11am & 2-5.15pm; July & Aug 9.45-11.30am & 2-5.45pm; Sept-April 9.45-11am & 2-4.15pm; €6.10; guided tours every 30min-1hr, depending on the season) is one of the most remarkable examples of fifteenth-century domestic architecture in France. The visit starts with the fake windows on the entrance front from which two realistically sculpted half-figures look down. There are hardly any furnishings, but much of the decoration of the house's stonework recalls the man who had it built, including a pair of bas-reliefs on the courtyard tower that may represent Jacques and his wife, and numerous hearts and scallop shells inside that playfully allude to his name. On the first floor, a wonderful bas-relief of a galleasse, with its oars and sails spread, symbolizes Jacques' trading empire. The house is unusually modern for its time, with latrines, a steam room, and a rationally planned design that predates the symmetries of French Renaissance architecture. A reconstruction of the tomb of Jean de Berry dominates one of the rooms on the upper floor.

Steps lead down beside the palace to rue des Arènes, where the sixteenth-century Hôtel Cujas houses the Musée du Berry (Mon & Wed-Sat 10am-noon & 2-5pm, Sun 2-5pm; free), which has an interesting collection of local artefacts, most notably ten of the forty pleurants that survived the breaking up of Jean de Berry's tomb; Rodin considered these weeping statues so beautiful that he paid 6000 francs for one shortly before his death. Etruscan bronzes and Roman funerary monuments bear witness to Bourges's ancient history, while an exhibition on the theme of traditional rural life occupies the first floor. Close by is the pleasant place Notre-Dame, with its church clearly showing the shift from Gothic to Renaissance.

Eating and drinking

Bourges's main centre for eating is along rue Bourbonnoux, which runs between place Gordaine and the cathedral. D'Antan Sancerrois, at 50 rue Bourbonnoux (☎02.48.65.96.26; closed Sun & Mon lunch), features excellent local dishes (à la carte mains around €18), while the friendly Bourbonnoux, at no. 44 (☎02.48.24.14.76; closed Sat lunch, Fri & Sun eve out of season) has some ambitious regional menus (€13-30); La Crêperie des Remparts, at no. 59, (☎02.48.24.55.44; closed Sun & Mon lunch) has a better-than-usual range of crêpes and salads. Just off rue Bourbonnoux, the deliciously refined tea room Cak'it, promenade des Remparts (☎02.48.24.94.60; closed Sun & Mon) serves home-made quiches and tarts at lunchtime and afternoon tea.

Just off attractive, medieval place Gordaine, the smart Bourges institution Au Sénat, 8 rue de la Poissonnerie (☎02.48.24.02.56; closed Wed & Thurs) cooks excellent traditional dishes, and has tables out on the street (menus €17-33). Le Louis XI, 200m down from the cathedral at 11 rue Porte Jaune (☎02.48.70.92.14; closed Sun), serves impeccable steaks and chargrilled meats in a small, informal dining room (menus €17–26). For a complete change, the friendly Margouillat, at 53 rue Edouard Vaillant, beyond place Gordaine (☎02.48.24.08.13; closed Sun, plus Sat & Mon lunch) offers delicious, reasonably priced food from Réunion such as giant prawns or pork and beans served with hot dips, plus delicious tropical desserts and cocktails.

Those with a sweet tooth should head for the excellent patisserie, Aux Trois Flûtes, on the corner of rues Joyeuse and Bourbonnoux; for chocolates and the local sweet speciality of fourrées au praliné, try the imposing Maison Forestines, on place Cujas, at the foot of rue Porte Jaune. On warm nights, place Cujas is also a great spot for a drink; the bar Le Cujas has plenty of outside seating.

6

THE LOIRE

The Cher and upper Indre

The Cher and upper Indre

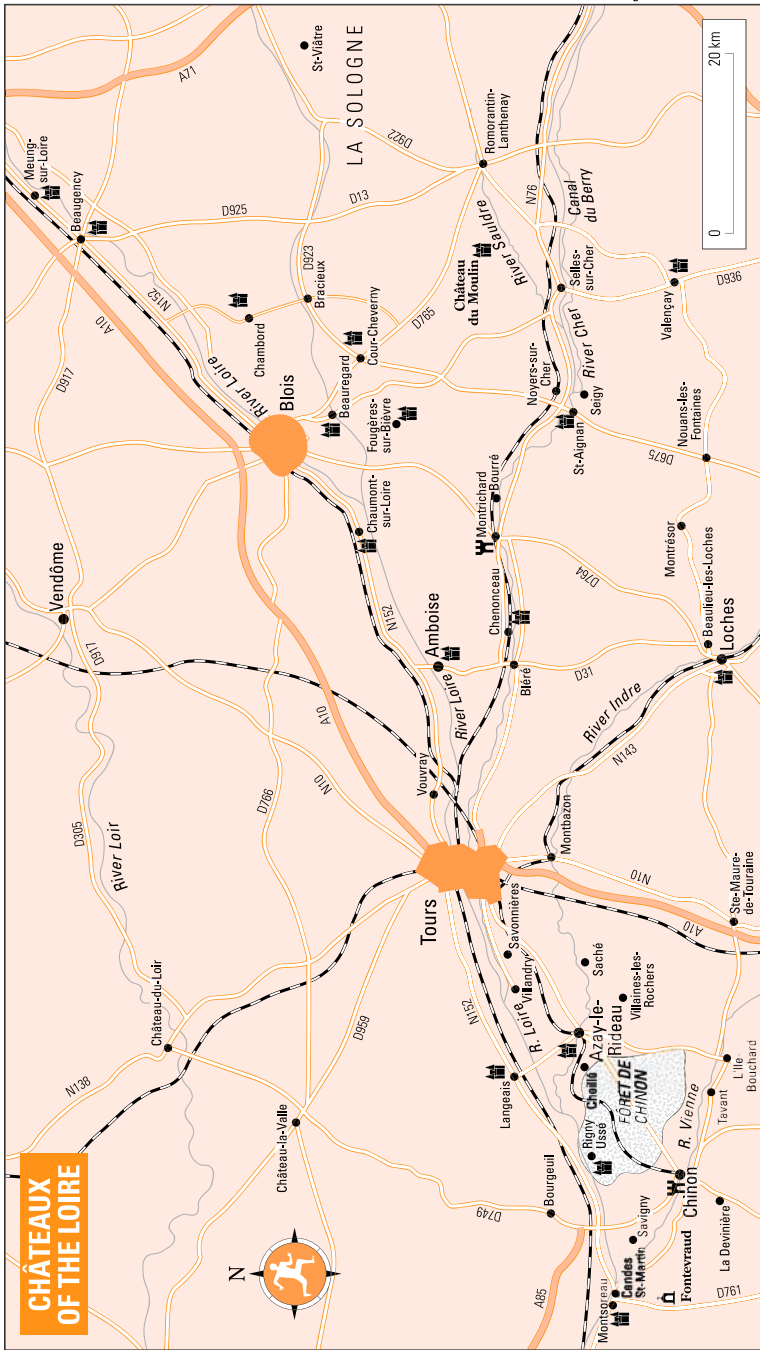

Of all the Loire's many tributaries, the slow-moving Cher and Indre are closest to the heart of the region, watering a host of châteaux as they flow northwest from the little-visited region to the south. Twenty kilometres southeast of Tours, spanning the Cher, the Château de Chenonceau is perhaps the best of all the Loire châteaux for its architecture, site, contents and atmosphere. Further upstream, Montrichard and St-Aignan make quieter diversions from the endless stream of castle tours. To the south is the château of Valençay, with its exquisite Empire interiors. A short drive west of here, on the River Indre itself, Loches possesses the most magnificent medieval citadel in the region.

Château de Chenonceau

Unlike the Loire, the gentle River Cher flows so slowly and passively between the exquisite arches of the Château de Chenonceau (daily: first 2 weeks Feb & first 2 weeks Nov 9am–5pm; last 2 weeks Feb & last 2 weeks Oct 9am–5.30pm; first 2 weeks March & first 2 weeks Oct 9am–6pm; mid-March to mid-Sept 9am–7pm; last 2 weeks Sept 9am–6.30pm; Nov 16 to Jan 9am–4.30pm; €9; ☎www.chenonceau.com) that you're almost always assured of a perfect reflection. The château is not visible from the road so you have to pay before even getting a peek at the residence. While the tree-lined path to the front door is dramatic, for a more intimate approach, head through the gardens, which were laid out under Diane de Poitiers, mistress of Henri II.

The building of Chenonceau was always controlled by women. Catherine Briçonnet – whose husband Thomas Bohier bought the site on the proceeds from embezzling from his master, François I – hired the first architects in 1515 and had them begin building on the foundations of an old mill that stood on the granite bed of the Cher. The château's most characteristic feature, the set of arches spanning the River Cher, was begun later in the century by Diane de Poitiers and completed by the indomitable Catherine de Médicis (wife of Henri II), after she had evicted Diane and forced her to hand over the château in return for Chaumont (see p.523). Mary, Queen of Scots, child bride of François II, also spent time here until her husband's early death. Then, after a long period of disuse, one Madame Dupin brought eighteenth-century life to this gorgeous residence, along with her guests Voltaire, Montesquieu and Rousseau, whom she hired as tutor to her son. Restoration back to the sixteenth-century designs was completed by another woman, Madame Pelouze, in the late nineteenth century. It's now a profitable business, owned and run by the Menier chocolate family firm.

CHÂTEAUX OF THE LOIRE

During summer the place teems with people, and it can become uncomfortably crowded, especially mid-morning and mid-afternoon. Visits are unguided – a relief, for there’s an endless array of arresting tapestries, paintings, ceilings, floors and furniture on show. It’s worth seeking out the numerous portraits of the château’s female owners. On the ground floor the François I room features two contrasting images of the goddess Diana. One is in fact a portrait of Diane de Poitiers by Primaticcio while the other represents a relatively aristocratic Gabrielle d’Estrées. In the same room is Zurbarán’s superb Archimedes, and elsewhere you’ll find works by or attributed to Veronese, Tintoretto, Coreggio, Murillo and Rubens, among others; Madame Dupin’s winsome portrait hangs in the Louis XIV room. The tiled floors throughout, many original, are particularly lovely, and there are some unique decorative details, such as the seventeenth-century window-frame in the César de Vendôme room, supported by two carved caryatids, and the moving ceiling in the bedroom of Louise de Lorraine, which mourns her murdered husband Henri III in black paint picked out with painted tears and the couple’s intertwined initials. The vaulted kitchens, poised above the water in the foundations, are well worth a look as well.

The section of the château that spans the Cher is relatively empty. The seemingly incongruous chequerboard flooring of the elegant long gallery is in fact true to the Renaissance design, though potted plants have replaced the classical statues which Louis XIV carried off to Versailles. Catherine de Médicis used to hold wild parties here, all naked nymphs and Italian fireworks. She intended the door on the far side to continue into another building on the south bank, but the project was never begun, and these days the gallery leads to quiet, wooded gardens. During the war, the Cher briefly formed the boundary between occupied and “free” France, and the current proprietors, who rode out Nazi occupation, like to make out that the château’s gallery was much used as an escape route. Given that their adjacent farm quartered a German garrison, it would have been a risky place to cross. In July and August, as part of the “Nocturne à Chenonceau”, the gardens and château are lit up between 10 and 11.30pm, with atmosphere provided by classical music played through speakers. Also in the summer months, you can take boats out onto the Cher.

Practicalities

The tiny village of Chenonceaux – spelt with an “x” on the end – has been almost entirely taken over by a handful of rather swish hotels. All of them are on rue du Docteur-Bretonneau, within easy reach of the gare SNCF and the château. The Hostel du Roy at no. 9 ☎02.47.23.90.17, 🌐www.hostelduroy.com; ③ is comfortable and relatively inexpensive; while La Roseraie, at no. 7 ☎02.47.23.90.09, 🌐www.charmingroseraie.com; ④, is very welcoming, with good food, extensive grounds and a swimming pool; and at no. 6, the luxurious Auberge du Bon Laboureur ☎02.47.23.90.02, 🌐www.bonlaboureur.com; ⑦ is spread around five former village houses. For camping, the municipal site ☎02.47.23.90.13; closed Oct–March) is between the railway line and the river.

Montrichard and Bourré

In many ways just a laid-back market town, MONTRICHARD also happens to have a full complement of medieval and Renaissance buildings, plus a hill-top fortress, of which just the keep remains after Henri IV broke down the rest of the defences at the end of the sixteenth century. Between mid-July and mid-August costumed medieval spectacles (daily at 4.30pm and around 9pm;

€15) in the former château grounds entertain mostly children. At any time, you can climb up the hill for the view of the Cher – though the keep itself is out of bounds. Montrichard's Romanesque church was where the disabled 12-year-old princess, Jeanne de Valois, who would never be able to have children, married her cousin the Duc d'Orléans. When he became King Louis XII, after the unlikely death of Charles VIII at Amboise, politics dictated that he marry Charles VIII's widow, Anne of Brittany. Poor Jeanne was divorced and sent off to govern Bourges, where she founded a new religious order and eventually took the veil herself, before dying in 1505. It's not all gloom: in summer, you can rent pedalos and kayaks (☎02.54.71.49.48; closed Sept–June) at the pleasant artificial beach on the opposite bank of the Cher. Some hardy locals swim from here, but be sure to seek advice before entering the water.

Three kilometres to the east of Montrichard, the hills around BOURRÉ are riddled with enormous, cave-like quarries, dug deep to get at the famous château-building stone that gets whiter as it weathers. Some of the caves are now used to cultivate mushrooms – big business in the Loire – a peculiar process that you can witness at the Caves Champignonnières, 40 rte des Roches (guided visits daily: Easter to mid-Nov 10am, 11am, 2pm, 3pm, 4pm & 5pm; €6; 🌐www.le-champignon.com). A second tour takes you to a “subterranean city” (€6, or €10 for both tours) sculpted in recent years as a tourist attraction, and there's an excellent shop including rare varieties of mushroom and various mushroom products. You can visit a fascinating troglodyte dwelling at La Magnanerie, 4 chemin de la Croix-Bardin (guided visits only: Easter–Aug daily except Tues at 11am, 3pm, 4pm & 5pm; Sept Sun–Thurs at 3pm, 4pm & 5pm; Oct Fri–Sun at 4pm; €6). The owner demonstrates how his family and their ancestors lived a troglodyte life here, quarrying the soft stone using huge saws, and producing silk in a chamber riddled with pigeonhole-like niches and stocked with living silkworms.

Practicalities

Montrichard's tourist office is in the Maison Ave Maria (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–noon; ☎02.54.32.05.10, 🌐www.officetourisme-montrichard.com), an ancient house with saints and beasts sculpted down its beams, on rue du Pont. The only enticing hotel is La Tête Noir, 24 rue de Tours (☎02.54.32.05.55, @g.galimard@wanadoo.fr; 📍), with its terrace on the river, though the atmospheric Manoir de la Salle du Roc, 69 rte de Vierzon (☎02.54.32.73.54, 🌐manoirdelasalleduroc.monsite.wanadoo.fr; 📍), offers grand chambres d'hôtes set in an ancient manor house above the main road leading west from Bourré. There's also a campsite, L'Étourneau (☎02.54.32.10.16; closed mid-Sept to May), right in town, on the banks of the Cher. Decent meals can be had at Les Tuffeaux, a straightforward brasserie on Montrichard's main square, place Bartélémy-Gilbert.

St-Aignan

ST-AIGNAN, 15km southeast of Montrichard, is a small town comprising a cluster of houses below a huge Romanesque collegiate church and sixteenth-century private château. The lofty Collégiale de St-Aignan (Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 1–7pm) features some fine capitals carved in the twelfth century, though many more are nineteenth-century recreations. The crypt is renowned for its remarkably preserved, brightly coloured twelfth- and thirteenth-century frescoes, some of which show the beginnings of naturalistic Gothic tendencies. A flight of 144 steps climbs from the collégiale to a grand gravelled terrace of the château, enclosed on one side by the L-shape of the Renaissance logis, and on the other by the remnants of the eleventh-century fortress. Private ownership means it's closed to visitors, but you're free to stroll around – the far corner of the terrace leads through to a great view of the river, and you can continue down some steep steps to the river. You can ask at the tourist office for details of boat trips on the Cher, or hire windsurfers, canoes and sail boats at the lake a couple of kilometres upstream, in Seigy. The Maison du Vin, on place Wilson (July & Aug daily 10am–noon & 3–6pm; Sept–June Tues & Thurs 8am–noon), is open for tastings and sales of Côteaux du Cher wines.

One of the region's biggest tourist attractions is the excellent Zoo Parc Beauval (daily: 9am–dusk; €17, children aged 3–12 €12; 🌐 www.zoobeauval.com), 2km to the south of town on the D675. The space given to the animals is ample, and it's part of a Europe-wide programme for breeding threatened species in captivity. Sumptuous flower-beds give way to little streams and lakes where islands provide natural enclosures for some of the monkeys. Two hothouses with tropical flowers and greenery are home to an extraordinary collection of birds as well as a large group of chimpanzees and two families of orang-utans.

Practicalities

The tourist office, 60 rue Constant-Ragot (June & Sept Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 3–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 3–6pm; Oct–May Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎ 02.54.75.22.85, 🌐 www.tourisme-valdecher-staignan.com) is just off the car park-like place Président-Wilson, in the upper part of town. The only two hotels are both alongside the river, on either side of the bridge: Hôtel du Moulin, 7 rue Novilliers (☎ 02.54.75.15.54; 🍷; closed Sun), is fairly basic but friendly; while Le Grand Hôtel St-Aignan, 7–9 quai J.-J.-Delorme (☎ 02.54.75.18.04, 📧 grand.hotel.st.aignan@wanadoo.fr; 🍷) is a hushed, well-furnished affair, with a good restaurant (menus €13–36). St-Aignan has an excellent campsite on the bank of the river near Seigy, the Camping des Cochards (☎ 02.54.75.15.59; closed mid-Oct to March). For an alternative to the hotel restaurants, the Mange-Grenouille, 10 rue Paul-Boncour (☎ 02.54.71.74.91; closed Tues eve & Wed; menus €14–28) has a delightful sixteenth-century decor and outside seating in its courtyard. The welcoming L'Amarena, place de la Paix (☎ 02.54.75.47.98, closed Mon lunch), serves inexpensive Italian food on an attractive square.

Château de Valençay

There is nothing medieval about the fittings and furnishings of the Château de Valençay, 20km southeast of St-Aignan on the main Blois–Châteauroux road (daily: April, May & Sept 10.30am–6pm; June 9.30am–6pm; July & Aug 9.30am–7.30pm; Oct 10.30am–5.30pm; €9; 🌐 www.chateau-valencay.com), for all its huge pepper-pot towers and turreted, decorated keep. This refined castle was originally built to show off the wealth of a sixteenth-century financier, but the lasting impression of a visit today is the imperial legacy of its greatest owner, the Prince de Talleyrand.

One of the great political operators and survivors, Talleyrand owes his greatest fame to his post as Napoleon's foreign minister. A bishop before the Revolution, with a reputation for having the most desirable mistresses, he proposed the nationalization of church property, renounced his bishopric, escaped to America during the Terror, backed Napoleon and continued to serve the state under the restored Bourbons. One of his tasks for the emperor was keeping Ferdinand VII of Spain entertained for six years here after the king had been forced to abdicate in favour of Napoleon's brother Joseph. The Treaty of Valençay, signed in the château in 1813, put an end to Ferdinand's forced guest status, giving him back his throne. The interior consequently is largely First Empire: elaborately embroidered chairs, Chinese vases, ornate inlays to all the tables, faux-Egyptian details, finicky clocks and chandeliers. A single discordant note is struck by the leg-brace and shoe displayed in a glass cabinet along with Talleyrand's uniforms – the statesman's deformed foot was concealed in every painting of the man, including the one displayed in the portrait gallery that runs the length of the graceful Neoclassical wing.

The château park (same hours as above) keeps a collection of unhappy-looking camels, zebras, llamas and goats, and there's a small, imaginative maze. In the village, about 100m from the château gates, a car museum (daily: April–June, Sept & Oct 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; July & Aug closes 7.30pm; €3) houses an excellent collection of sixty-odd mostly prewar cars.

Loches and around

LOCHES, 42km southeast of Tours, is the obvious place to head for in the Indre valley. Its walled citadel is by far the most impressive of the Loire valley fortresses, with its unbreached ramparts and the Renaissance houses below still partly enclosed by the outer wall of the medieval town. Tours is only an hour away by bus, but Loches makes for a quiet, relatively untouristy base for exploring the Cher valley, or the much lesser-known country south, up the Indre.

The old town is dominated by the Tour St-Antoine belfry, close to the handsome place du Marché, which links rue St-Antoine with Grande Rue. Two fifteenth-century gates to the old town still stand: the Porte des Cordeliers, by the river at the end of Grande Rue, and the Porte Picois to the west, at the end of rue St-Antoine. Rue du Château, lined with Renaissance buildings, leads to the twelfth-century towers of Porte Royale, the main entrance to the citadel.

The citadel

Behind the Porte Royale, the Musée Lansyer occupies the house of local nineteenth-century landscape painter Emmanuel Lansyer, done up in period style (April–Oct daily except Tues 10.30am–12.30pm & 2.30–5pm; €3). Straight ahead is the Romanesque church, the Collégiale de St-Ours, with its distinctively odd roofline – the nave bays are capped by two octagonal stone pyramids, sandwiched between two more conventional spires. The porch has some entertaining twelfth-century monster carvings, and the stoup, or basin for holy water, is a Gallo-Roman altar. But the church's highlight is the shining white tomb of Agnès Sorel, the mistress of the Dauphin Charles VII. It's a beautiful recumbent figure tenderly watched over by angels. The alabaster is rather more pristine than it should be, as it had to be restored after anticlerical revolutionary soldiers mistook her for a saint – an easy error to make.

The northern end of the citadel is taken up by the Logis Royal, or Royal Lodgings, of Charles VII and his three successors (daily: Jan–March & Oct–Dec 9.30am–5pm; April–Sept 9am–7pm; €5, €7 including the donjon). It has two distinct halves, similar at first glance, but separated by a century in which the medieval need for defence began to give way to a more courtly, luxurious lifestyle. The first section was built in the late fourteenth century as a kind of pleasure palace for the Dauphin Charles and Agnès Sorel. A copy of Charles's portrait by Fouquet can be seen in the antechamber to the Grande Salle, where the Dauphin met the second woman of importance in his life between June 3 and June 5, 1429 – Joan of Arc, who came here victorious from Orléans to give the defeatist Dauphin another pep talk about coronations.

From the Logis Royal, cobbled streets overlooked by handsome town houses wind through to the far end of the elevated citadel, where the donjon (same hours and ticket as Logis Royal) begun by Foulques Nerra, the eleventh-century count of Anjou, stands in grim ruin. Vertiginous gantry stairways climb up through the empty shell of the massive keep to its very top, but the main interest lies in the dungeons and lesser towers. The Tour Ronde was built under Louis XI to provide a platform for artillery and also served as a prison for his adviser, Cardinal Balue, who was kept locked up in a wooden cage in one of the upper rooms. Perhaps he was kept in the extraordinary graffiti chamber on the second floor, which is decorated with an enigmatic series of deeply carved, soldier-like figures that may date from the thirteenth century. From the courtyard, steps lead down into the bowels of the Martelet, which became the home of a more famous prisoner: Ludovico “Il Moro” Sforza, duke of Milan, patron of Leonardo da Vinci and captive of Louis XII. In the four years he was imprisoned here, from 1500, he found time to decorate his cave-like cell with ruddy wall-paintings, still faintly visible. The dungeons peter out into quarried-out galleries which produced the stone for the keep.

Practicalities

From Tours, trains and buses alike arrive at the gare SNCF on the east side of the Indre, just up from place de la Marne, where the tourist office is housed in a little wooden chalet (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm; ☎02.47.91.82.82, 🌐www.loches-tourainecotesud.com).

The best accommodation option is the old-fashioned and characterful Hôtel de France, 6 rue Picois (☎02.47.59.00.32, 🌐www.hoteldefranceloches.com; 🍴), which has a good restaurant. The Hôtel George Sand, 37 rue Quintefol (☎02.47.59.39.74, 🌐www.hotelrestaurant-georgesand.com; 🍴), just below the eastern ramparts, has its best rooms at the back, looking onto the river; its restaurant has a lovely terrace overlooking the Indre. Inexpensive rooms can be found at the charmingly tumbledown Hôtel de Beaulieu, 3 rue Foulques-Nerra (☎02.47.91.60.80; 🍴), right next to the abbey in Beaulieu-les-Loches, 1km across the river (see below). The municipal campsite La Citadelle (☎02.47.59.05.91; closed mid-Oct to mid-March) is between two branches of the Indre by the swimming pool and stadium.

For an alternative to the hotel restaurants, L'Entracte, 4 Grande-Rue (☎02.47.94.05.70, closed Sun; menus from €10) does hearty and generous bistro food, and has a lovely courtyard out back. The recreations of medieval recipes at Le Vicariat, next to the château on place Charles-VII (☎02.47.59.08.79; closed Mon & Sun eve; menus €19–43), can be fun, and there is a great outside terrace. The best option of all is to stock up at the superb market, held in the winding streets just above the château gate on Wednesday and Saturday mornings.

Beaulieu-les-Loches

Just across the Indre from Loches is the village of BEAULIEU-LES-LOCHES – a little-known place, thoroughly medieval in appearance, with its parish church built into the spectacular ruins of an abbey contemporary with Loches’ grisly donjon. Its other church, St-Pierre, holds the bones of Foulques Nerra, the eleventh-century count of Anjou responsible for the donjon.

Blois and around

The château at BLOIS, the handsome former seat of the dukes of Orléans, is one of the most stately and historic of them all. Its great facade rises above the modern town like an Italianate cliff, with the dramatic esplanade and courtyard behind and the rooms within steeped in, sometimes bloody, history. The town itself is unexceptional but makes a good base for getting out into the countryside, with several stretches of woodland within striking distance including the Forêt de Blois to the west of the town on the north bank of the Loire, and the Parc de Chambord and Forêt de Boulogne, further upstream. To the south and east, the forested, watery, game-rich area known as the Sologne lies between the Loire and Cher, stretching beyond Orléans almost as far as Gien. And if you haven't yet tired of châteaux, some of the grandest of all, as well as some of the most intimate, are within cycling distance.

Arrival, information and accommodation

Blois is easy to get around: avenue Jean-Laigret is the main street leading south from the gare SNCF to place Victor-Hugo and the château, and past it to the town centre. The gare routière is directly in front of the gare SNCF, with buses leaving up to three times a day for Cheverny and Chambord. The tourist office, 23 place du Château, the château esplanade (May–Sept Mon & Sun 10am–7pm, Tues–Sat 9am–7pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 9.30am–12.30pm; ☎02.54.90.41.41, 🌐www.loiredeschateaux.com), organizes hotel rooms for a small fee and has information on day coach tours of Chambord and Cheverny. It also sells a combined ticket (€15) to the château, son et lumière and Maison de la Magie. Regional information is available online at 🌐www.chambordcountry.com. Bikes can be hired from Cycles Leblond, 44 levée des Tuileries (☎02.54.74.30.13, 🌐cycles.leblond.free.fr), and Bike in Blois, 8 rue Henri Drussy (☎02.54.56.07.73, 🌐www.locationdevelop.com). The hotels in Blois are decent but none are outstanding.

Hotels

Du Bellay 12 rue des Minimes ☎02.54.78.23.62, 🌐hoteldubellay.free.fr. Comfortable budget option with twelve well-worn but clean little rooms, much cheered up by pictures of local sights and the odd wooden beam. Good location at the top of the hill, above the town centre. 2

Côté Loire 2 place de la Grève ☎02.54.78.07.86, 🌐www.coteloire.com. Charming boutique hotel, tucked away in a quiet corner by the river. Rooms have antique furnishings and brand-new bathrooms – those on the front have views of the river. 4

De France et de Guise 3 rue Gallois ☎02.54.78.00.53, 🌐annedebretagne.free.fr. Grand, comfortable old hotel on a busy road just below the château. Formerly the Guise's town house, though little evidence remains. Some rooms have balconies with views of the château's loggia. 3

Mercure 28 quai St-Jean ☎02.54.56.66.66, 🌐www.mercure.com. No character whatsoever, but it certainly offers tout confort – all mod cons, including a pool. Overlooks the river to the east of the town centre. 7

Le Monarque 61 rue Porte Chartraine ☎02.54.78.02.35, 🌐annedebretagne.free.fr. Professional and energetically managed hotel with rooms cheerfully renovated in a modern style. Usefully located at the top end of town. 3

Le Savoie 6 rue du Ducoux ☎02.54.74.32.21, 🌐www.hotel-blois.com. Unexceptional but nonetheless likeable hotel near the train station, with pretty little rooms. Run by a friendly young couple. 3

Hostel and campsite

HI Hostel 18 rue de l'Hôtel-Pasquier ☎02.54.78.27.21, 📧blois@fuaj.org. Five km downstream from Blois, between the Forêt de Blois and the river. Bus #4 runs at least once an hour, but stops at around 7pm, so you'll need wheels. Closed mid-Nov to Feb.

Camping Rives de Loire Vineuil

08.00.30.04.10. On the south bank of the river, 4km from the town centre. Bus #3C (stop "Mairie Vineuil") only runs four times daily, but the campsite offers bike hire. Closed Oct–May.

The château

The six great kings of the sixteenth century all spent time at the Château de Blois (daily: April–Oct 9am–6.30pm; Nov–March 9am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; €6.50), and the ones who didn't build here left their mark on its history instead. From the plateau-like esplanade in front of the château, you step into the courtyard, where the extraordinary clash of architectural styles has only been slightly muted by time. The relatively plain stone of the Gothic Salle des États, the manorial assembly hall, juts forward in the near right-hand corner, while immediately to the left, the graceful lines and inspired Italianate stonework of

6

THE LOIRE

Blois and around

EATING & DRINKING		ACCOMMODATION
Les Banquettes Rouges	5	Du Bellay	C
Le Castelet	4	Côté Loire	F
L'Orangerie du Château	3	De France et de Guise	D
Au Rendez-Vous des Pêcheurs	6	Hostel	G
Le St-James	2	Mercure	B
Velvet Jazz Lounge	1	Le Monarque	A
		Le Savoie	E

François I's Renaissance north wing is interrupted by a superb spiral staircase. Ahead, the grandly Classical west wing was built in the 1630s by François Mansart for Gaston d'Orléans, the brother of Louis XIII. Turning to the south side you return 140-odd years to Louis XII's St-Calais chapel, which contrasts with the more exuberant brickwork of his flamboyant Gothic east wing.

The signposts point you straight ahead and up Mansart's breathtaking staircase, which leads you round to the François I wing. The garish decor dates from Félix Duban's mid-nineteenth-century efforts to turn an empty barn of a château into a showcase for sixteenth-century decorative motifs. One of the largest rooms is given over to paintings of the notorious murder of the Duke of Guise and his brother, the Cardinal of Lorraine, by Henri III. As leaders of the radical Catholic League, the Guises were responsible for the summary execution of Huguenots at Amboise. The king had summoned the States-General to a meeting in the Grande Salle, only to find that an overwhelming majority supported the Duke, along with the stringing up of Protestants, and aristocratic rather than royal power. Henri had the duke summoned to his bedroom in the palace, where he was ambushed and hacked to death, and the cardinal was murdered in prison the next day. Their deaths were avenged a year later when a monk assassinated the king himself.

The château was also home to Henri III's mother and manipulator, Catherine de Médicis, who died here a few days after the murders in 1589. The most famous of her suite of rooms is the study, where, according to Alexandre Dumas' novel, La Reine Margot, she kept poison hidden in secret caches in the skirting boards and behind some of the 237 narrow carved wooden panels; they now contain small Renaissance objets d'art. In the nineteenth century, revolutionaries were tried in the Grande Salle for conspiring to assassinate Napoléon III, a year before the Paris Commune of 1870. You can return to the courtyard via the vast space of the Salle des États, where the arches, pillars and fireplaces are another riot of nineteenth-century colour.

The Louis XII wing houses an undistinguished Musée des Beaux-Arts, with portraits from the gallery at Beauregard and a tapestry collection. If you're still not flagging, you can head back across the courtyard to the ground floor of the François I wing, where an archeological museum displays original stonework from the staircase and dormer windows, as well as carved details rescued from other châteaux.

French-speakers may want to take the two-hour guided visite privilégiée (July & Aug daily at 3pm; €7.50), which explores parts of the château you won't normally see, such as the roof and cellars. You can usually just turn up at the gate for the son et lumière (mid-April to mid-Sept daily; €6.50, or €10 including château entrance; in English on Wed), which takes place at dusk on summer evenings. It's one of the best in the region, rising above the usual mix of melodrama, light and musical effects by making the most of the château's fascinating history and lovely courtyard setting.

The rest of the town

Just below the château on rue St-Laumen, the church of St Nicholas (daily 9am–6.30pm) once belonged to an abbey, and the choir is a handsome example of the humble Benedictine treatment of the Romanesque style. Children are unlikely to be convinced by the rather shoddy optical illusions housed in the cavernous Maison de la Magie, facing the château on the far side of the esplanade (April–Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €7.50 or €12 with château entry; @www.maisondelamagie.fr); the afternoon magic shows are in mime, so at least there's no need to understand French. More instructive is the Musée d'Histoire Naturelle, rue Anne-de-Bretagne (daily except Mon 2–6pm; €2.50), with some good dioramas showing the different environments of the region, and the birds and animals that live in them.

At the top of town, the superb Musée de l'Objet, 6 rue Franciade (March–June & Sept–Nov Sat & Sun 1.30–6.30pm; July & Aug Wed–Sun 1.30–6.30pm; €4), celebrates modern sculptures created from found objects rather than traditional materials. A forest of hammers hanging from the staircase ceiling gradually morphs into handbags, and the two long, spacious galleries are filled with similarly witty or alarming artworks, including some by major figures in modern art.

At the east end of town, on the handsome place St-Louis, look out for the half-timbered and sculpted facade of the Maison des Acrobates. The Gothic cathédrale St-Louis (daily 7.30am–6pm), at the west end of the square, leans against a weighty bell tower whose lowest storey is twelfth-century. The interior is fairly bare, but the most interesting feature is the modern stained-glass windows, completed in 2003 by the Dutch artist Jan Dibbets. Leading off place St-Louis, rue du Palais traverses above the town centre, passing the long stairs at the head of rue Denis-Papin and leading into rue St-Honoré. At no. 8, the elaborate Hôtel Alluye, the private house of the royal treasurer Florimond Robertet, is a rare survival of Blois' golden years under Louis XII.

Eating and drinking

Most of Blois' traditional restaurants can be found on or around rue Saint-Lubin, between the château and the river. Le Castelet, 40 rue Saint-Lubin (☎02.54.74.66.09; closed Wed & Sun; meals from €15) specializes in homely Loire cuisine, using regional produce. A little further along the same street, Les Banquettes Rouges, 16 rue des Trois Marchands (☎02.54.78.74.92; closed Sun & Mon), serves modern French, Mediterranean-influenced food, with evening menus from €21. The best gastronomic experience in town is unquestionably ★ Au Rendez-Vous des Pêcheurs, 27 rue du Foix (☎02.54.74.67.48; closed Mon lunch, Sun and 3 weeks in Aug), with elaborate fish dishes on the eight-course, €74 menu découverte. There is also a week-night menu at €28. The elaborate and sprawling L'Orangerie du Château, 1 av Jean-Laigret (☎02.54.78.05.36; menus €30–68) is also excellent, though the atmosphere can suffer from the group banqueting factor.

The small square at the end of rue Vauvert, on the east side of town, has a number of crêperies and pizzerias with tables set out under the trees. Immediately below, rue de la Foulerie is the best place for ethnic food – Portuguese, Moroccan and Indian – and for late-night bars as well. The cocktail bar Le St-James, 50 rue de la Foulerie, is a good bet, as is the Velvet Jazz Lounge, nearby at 15bis rue Haute.

Around Blois

On the south bank of the river, within a 20km radius south and east of Blois, is a cluster of impressive and easily visited châteaux. By car you could call at all of them in a couple of days, but they also make ideal cycling or walking targets if you arm yourself with a map and strike out along minor roads and woodland rides. A new 300-kilometre-long network of tranquil cycle routes and dedicated cycle paths takes advantage of the mostly flat forest alleys and wooded back roads. Chaumont has frequent daily trains from Blois (make for Onzain, on the north side of the river, then cross the bridge), but otherwise public transport in the area is very poor, with even the main routes served by only a couple of commuter buses a day. Note, however, that the local bus company TLC (☎02.54.58.55.55, 🌐www.tlcinfo.net) runs coach trips to Chambord and Cheverny, with two morning and one lunchtime departure from Blois' gare SNCF (mid-May to Aug; €10.75). Check exact times when you buy your ticket – from the tourist office. Staff may also be able to find places on a chartered taxi or minibus tour.

Château de Chaumont

Catherine de Médicis forced Diane de Poitiers to hand over Chenonceau in return for the Château de Chaumont (daily: April & late Sept 10.30am–5.30pm; May to mid-Sept 9.30am–6.30pm; Oct–March 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–5pm; €6.10; grounds open daily 9.30am–dusk; free), 20km downstream from Blois. Diane got a bad deal but this is still one of the lovelier châteaux.

The original fortress was destroyed by Louis XI in the mid-fifteenth century in revenge for the part its owner, Pierre d'Amboise, played in the “League of Public Weal”, an alliance of powerful nobles against the ever-increasing power of the monarch. But Pierre found his way back into the king's favour, and with his son Charles I, built much of the quintessentially medieval castle that stands today. Proto-Renaissance design is more obvious in the courtyard, which today forms three sides of a square, the fourth side having been demolished in 1739 to improve views over the river, which are spectacular. Inside, the heavy nineteenth-century decor of the ground-floor rooms dates from the ownership of the Broglie family, but a few rooms on the first floor have been remodelled in the Renaissance style. The large council chamber is particularly fine, with seventeenth-century majolica tiles on the floor and its walls adorned with wonderfully busy sixteenth-century tapestries showing the gods of each of the seven planets known at the time.

The Broglie family also transformed the 21-hectare landscaped park into the fashionable English style and built the remarkable belle époque stables, with their porcelain troughs and elegant electric lamps for the benefit of the horses at a time before the château itself was wired – let alone the rest of the country. A corner of the château grounds now plays host to an annual Festival des Jardins (May to mid-Oct daily 9.30am to dusk; €8.50, or €11 with château entry), which shows off the extravagant efforts of contemporary garden designers.

On weekends in summer, you can secure the best view of the château from the deck of a traditional Loire boat. Contact the Association Millière Raboton (☎06.88.76.57.14, 🌐www.milliere-raboton.net), whose boat trips (€12–15) leave from the quay immediately below the château, and last roughly an hour and a half. Best for wildlife are the regular dawn excursions, and you can organize longer trips – even camping out overnight on an island sandbank.

Château de Cheverny

Fifteen kilometres southeast of Blois, the Château de Cheverny (daily: April–June & Sept 9.15am–6.15pm; July & Aug 9.15am–6.45pm; Oct–March 9.45am–5pm; 🌐www.chateau-cheverny.fr; €6.50) is the perfect example of a seventeenth-century château. Built between 1604 and 1634 and never altered, it presents an immaculate picture of symmetry, harmony and the aristocratic good life – descendants of the first owners still own, live in and go hunting from Cheverny today. Its stone, from Bourré on the River Cher, lightens with age, and the château gleams like a great white brick in its acres of rolling parkland. The interior decoration has only been added to, never destroyed, and the extravagant display of

Tintin in the Loire

Cheverny's architecture, minus the outermost towers, was used by Hergé as a model for Marlinspike Hall (Moulinart in French), the ancestral home of Tintin's nautical friend Captain Haddock. The connection is milked dry in the slick exhibition, Les Secrets de Moulinart, housed in the outbuilding next to the main gate (daily 9.30am–6.45pm; adults €11.50 with château ticket, children aged 7–14 €6.40 with château ticket), which retells various stories of the Belgian fictional hero in rooms dressed up in the style of the cartoon, enlivened by audiovisual effects and film clips.

6

THE LOIRE

Blois and around

paintings, furniture, tapestries and armour against the gilded, sculpted and carved walls and ceilings is extremely impressive. The most precious objects are hard to pick out from the sumptuous whole, but some highlights are the painted wall panels in the dining room telling stories from Don Quixote; the vibrant, unfaded colours of the Gobelin tapestry in the arms room; and the three rare family portraits by François I's court painter, François Clouet, in the gallery.

You can explore the elegant grounds on foot, or take a sedate tour by golf buggy and boat (April to mid-Nov; €11.20 including château entry). The kennels near the main entrance are certainly worth a look: a hundred lithe hounds mill and loll about while they wait for the next stag; feeding time (5pm) is something to be seen. Cheverny's hunt culls around thirty deer a year, a figure set by the National Forestry Office.

You can stay in the rustic Hôtel des Trois Marchands (☎02.54.79.96.44, 🌐www.hoteldes3marchands.com; 📍), in COUR-CHEVERNY, Cheverny's larger neighbour, 1km north. The hotel's restaurant is rather smart, or there's the inexpensive bar and grill next door.

Château de Fougères

The proudly defensive Château de Fougères (mid-May to mid-Sept daily 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; mid-Sept to mid-May daily except Tues 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; €4.60) provides a good contrast to Cheverny. It lies in the village of FOUGÈRES-SUR-BIÈVRE, 10km southwest of Cheverny, and was built in 1470 by Louis XI's chancellor, who was clearly sceptical about long-term peace. It is a veritable fortress, turned tightly in on its internal courtyard, and you can scurry freely about the many corridors, rooms and spiral staircases, even clambering under the roof and strolling along the guard's walk. There are rarely other visitors to interfere with the medieval fantasy, though various exhibits along the way explain medieval building techniques. You'll need fairly good French to appreciate the explanations.

Château de Beauregard

An easy cycle ride from Blois, the little-visited Château de Beauregard, 7km south of Blois on the D956 to Contres (Feb 8 to end March, Oct, Nov & Dec 20 to end Dec daily except Wed 9.30am–noon & 2–5pm; April–June & Sept daily 9.30am–noon & 2–7.30pm; July & Aug daily 9.30am–6.30pm; €6.50; 🌐www.beauregard-loire.com), lies amid the Forêt de Russy. It was – like Chambord – one of François I's hunting lodges, but its transformation in the sixteenth century involved beautification rather than aggrandizement. It was added to in the seventeenth century and the result is sober and serene, very much at ease in its manicured geometric park.

The highlight of the château is a richly decorated, long portrait gallery, whose floor of Delft tiling depicts an army on the march. The walls are entirely panelled with 327 portraits of kings, queens and great nobles, including European celebrities such as Francis Drake, Anne Boleyn and Charles V of Spain. All of France's kings are represented from Philippe VI (1328–50), who precipitated the Hundred Years War, to Louis XIII (1610–43), who occupied the throne when the gallery was created. Kings, nobles and executed wives alike are given equal billing – except for Louis XIII, whose portrait is exactly nine times the size of any other. It's worth strolling down through the grounds to the sunken Jardin des Portraits, a Renaissance-influenced creation by contemporary landscaper Gilles Clément, who was responsible for Paris's futuristic Parc André Citroën. It could be better tended, but the garden's formal arrangement – by colour of flower and foliage – is fascinating.

Château de Chambord

The Château de Chambord, François I's little "hunting lodge", is the largest and most popular of the Loire châteaux (daily: April to mid-July & mid-Aug to end Sept 9am–6.15pm; mid-July to mid-Aug 9am–7.30pm; Oct–March 9am–5.15pm; July & Aug €9.50, Sept–June €8.50; @www.chambord.org) and one of the most extravagant commissions of its age. Its patron's principal object – to outshine the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V – would, he claimed, leave him renowned as "one of the greatest builders in the universe".

Before you even get close, the sheer gargantuan scale of the place is awe-inspiring: there are more than 440 rooms and 85 staircases, and a petrified forest of 365 chimneys runs wild on the roof. In architectural terms, the mixture of styles is as outrageous as the size. The Italian architect Domenico da Cortona was chosen to design the château in 1519 in an effort to establish prestigious Italian Renaissance art forms in France, though the labour was supplied by French masons. The château's plan (attributed by some to da Vinci) is pure Renaissance: rational, symmetrical and totally designed to express a single idea – the central power of its owner. Four hallways run crossways through the central keep, at the heart of which the Great Staircase rises up in two unconnected spirals before opening out into the great lantern tower, which draws together the confusion on the roof like a great crown.

The cold, draughty size of the château made it unpopular as an actual residence – François I himself stayed there for just 42 days in total – and Chambord's role in history is slight. A number of rooms on the first floor were fitted out by Louis XIV and his son, the Comte de Chambord, and as reconstructed today they feel like separate apartments within the unmanageable whole. You can explore them freely, along with the adjacent eighteenth-century apartments, where the château was made habitable by lowering ceilings, building small fireplaces within the larger ones, and cladding the walls with the fashionable wooden panelling known as boiseries. The second floor houses a rambling Museum of Hunting where, among the endless guns and paintings that glorify hunting, are two superb seventeenth-century tapestry cycles: one depicts Diana, goddess of the hunt; another, based on cartoons by Lebrun, tells the story of Meleager, the heroic huntsman from Ovid's Metamorphoses. Children love playing on the double spiral staircase that leads up to the airy rooftop, where you can get a good feel for the contrasting and occasionally discordant architectural styles.

The events and festivals calendar is a busy one, with evening lighting displays, guided nature walks, cycle rides and jeep tours in the forest, costumed tours for children and a twice-daily dressage display, among other attractions. A free leaflet available at the château gives details, or you can call ☎02.54.50.50.00.

The Parc de Chambord around the château is an enormous walled game reserve – the largest in Europe. Wild boars roam freely, though red deer are the beasts you're most likely to spot. You can explore on foot, or by bike or boat – both rentable from the jetty where the Cosson passes alongside the main facade of the chateau.

▲ Cycling near Chambord

Accommodation in the village of Chambord itself can be found opposite the chateau (and beside the cafeterias and postcard stalls) at the Hôtel du Grand St-Michel (☎02.54.20.31.31; 🌐www.saintmichel-chambord.com; 📍3–6). Taking in the sight of Chambord after the crowds have left is very satisfying, but the hotel is otherwise unexceptional. In BRACIEUX, a small village just beyond the southern wall of the Parc de Chambord, 8km from the chateau, the Hôtel de la Bonneheure, 9bis rue R.-Masson (☎02.54.46.41.57, 🌐www.hoteldelabonneheure.com; 📍4) has various rooms and apartments set around floral gardens. Bracieux also has a top-flight restaurant, Le Relais de Bracieux (☎02.54.46.41.22; €38–140; closed Tues & Wed), and a large campsite (☎02.54.46.41.84; closed Nov to mid-March) with a summer-only pool.

The Sologne

Stretching southeast of Blois, the Sologne is one of those traditionally rural regions of France that help keep alive the national self-image. Depending on the weather and the season, it can be one of the most dismal areas in central France: damp, flat, featureless and foggy. But at other times its forests, lakes, ponds and marshes have a quiet magic – in summer, for example, when the heather is in bloom and the ponds are full of water lilies, or in early autumn when you can collect mushrooms. Wild boar and deer roam here, not to mention the ducks, geese, quails and pheasants, who far outnumber the small human population. The Sologne remains the refuge of the French aristocracy, along with the descendants of rich industrialists who bought land and built châteaux here in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Hunting is the thing, not tourism, and much of the region is out of bounds or simply physically impenetrable.

La Fête Étrange

There is much dispute as to where the magical party in Alain-Fournier's novel *Le Grand Meaulnes was set, despite the fact that it was clearly an imaginary mixture of many places. Fournier was born in La Chapelle d'Angillon, 34km north of Bourges. He spent much of his childhood in the château there, but went to school in Épineuil-le-Fleurlial (the Ste-Agathe of the novel) well beyond the Sologne and Bourges, some 25km south of St-Armand-Montrond (turn right off the Montluçon road from Bourges to cross the Cher at Meaulne). Albicoco's 1967 film of the book was shot around Épineuil, where the elementary school described in the book now houses a small museum. But the "domain with no name" where the fête étrange takes place is certainly in the Sologne: "In the whole of the Sologne," he wrote, "it would have been hard to find a more desolate spots".

Two grandes randonnées lead through the Sologne, both variants of the main GR3 along the Loire. The northern GR3C runs through Chambord and east mostly along forest roads to Thoury and La Ferté-St-Cyr, where it rejoins the southern branch, the GR31, which has taken a more attractive route through Bracieux and along footpaths through the southern part of the Forêt de Chambord. There are numerous other well-signposted paths, and tourist offices in most of Sologne's towns and villages can provide maps and details of bike rental or horse riding, as well as accommodation details. If you're exploring the Sologne during the hunting season (Oct 1–March 1), don't stray from the marked paths: there are endless stories of people being accidentally shot.

Romorantin-Lanthenay

ROMORANTIN-LANTHENAY, 67km south of Orléans, is the biggest town in the Sologne and best visited in the last weekend in October for the Journées Gastronomiques, a major food festival when every restaurant and hundreds of street stalls tempt you with traditional and novel dishes centred on game, wild mushrooms, apples and pumpkins. The rest of the year the only sight of interest is the Musée de Sologne, in the old mills in the centre of Romorantin (daily: Mon & Wed–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; €4.50; 📍 www.museedesologne.com), which presents the history, ecology and traditions of the area.

For information on walking routes in the Sologne, as well as bike hire, contact the tourist office on place de la Paix (Mon 10am–12.15pm & 2–6.30pm, Tues–Sat 8.45am–12.15pm & 1.30–6.30pm; July & Aug also Sun 10am–noon; ☎ 02.54.76.43.89, 📍 www.tourisme-romorantin.com). If you fancy a splurge, head for Grand Hôtel du Lion d'Or, 69 rue G.-Clemenceau (☎ 02.54.94.15.15, 📍 www.hotel-liondor.fr; 📍), an old manor house, with a fabulous courtyard garden, sixteen well-appointed rooms and a stellar restaurant (meals more than €100).

Château du Moulin

Built almost entirely of brick, surrounded by water, and standing in romantic isolation at the end of a long avenue of oak trees, the château du Moulin (April–Sept daily except Wed 10am–11.30pm & 2–5.30pm; €7.50) is the quintessential Sologne château. It lies just outside the village of LASSAY-SUR-CROISNE, 10km west of Romorantin-Lanthenay, and is still occupied by its elderly owner, Mme de Marchéville, whose family bought it off the du Moulins in 1901. The original builder, Philippe du Moulin, earned the right to set himself up as a nobleman with a fortified château after saving Charles VIII's life at the 1495 Battle of Fornova. The château's brickwork is striking, curving smoothly around the various towers, the pink tint offset by an inlaid lozenge pattern in dark grey and the window frames of white tufa stone. Guided visits of the interior, on which you're shown half a dozen beautifully furnished rooms in the main keep section, take place roughly every half-hour.

St-Viâtre and Lamotte-Beuvron

Deep in the Sologne, the tiny village of ST-VIÂTRE is ringed by the étangs, or artificial lakes that characterize swathes of the Sologne. A panel in the centre of the village details circular walks in the locality, but the best place for information is the Maison des Étangs, 2 rue de la Poste (April–Oct 10am–noon & 2–6pm; rest of year call ☎02.54.88.23.00; 🌐www.maison-des-etangs.com). It occupies a half-timbered house in the centre of St-Viâtre and has an excellent exhibition on local social and natural history (€4.50). The handsome village church houses a sixteenth-century polyptych of eight richly coloured and superbly realized panels, painted in the Flemish style.

Bikes can be hired from the flowershop, La Malle aux Raboliots (☎02.54.88.43.75). A splendidly unreconstructed French meal – along with a decent room for the night – can be had at the Auberge le Creusard, 6 place de l'Église (☎02.54.88.91.33, ☎02.54.96.18.06; 🍷), but gastro-tourists should make the pilgrimage 15km northeast to the modest town of LAMOTTE-BEUVRON, where the large, well-to-do Hôtel Tatin, 5 av de Vierzon (☎02.54.88.00.03, 🌐www.hotel-tatin.com; 🍷; closed first week in Aug), is the original home of tarte Tatin – supposedly created by accident by the Tatin sisters, who once ran the hotel. It serves the tart all day long, along with refined cuisine (menus €21–51).

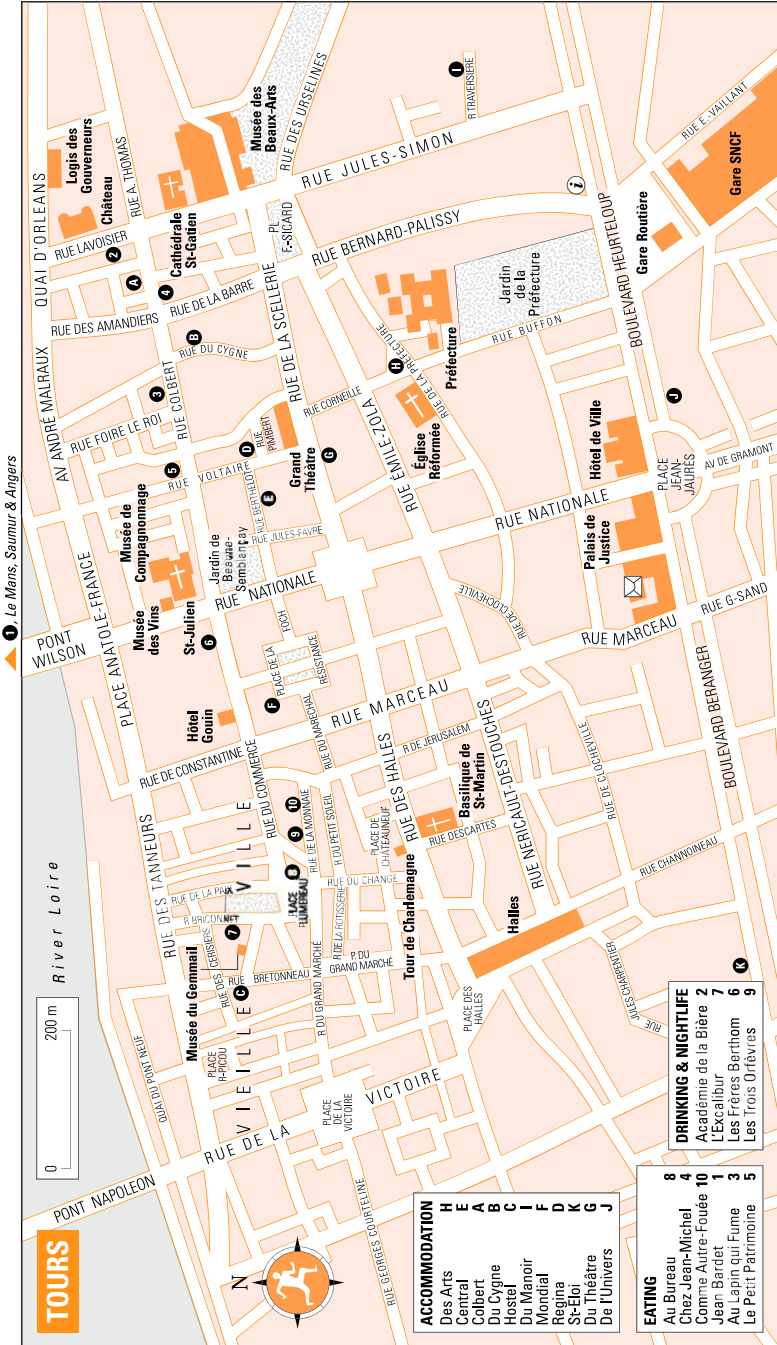

Tours and around

Straddling a spit of land between the rivers Loire and Cher, the ancient cathedral city of TOURS is the chief town of the Loire valley. It has long had a reputation as a staid, bourgeois place, the home of lawyers and administrators rather than, say, artists or factory workers. However, the city's proximity to Paris – less than an hour away on the TGV line – has always tempered its nature, ensuring that Tours is indefinitely more switched on than other French provincial cities, and in recent years an influx of smart commuters has perceptibly modified its conservative feel.

There are scores of bustling bars and cafés, an active if limited nightlife, and some fine restaurants – among the best in the region. It has a prettified and animated old quarter, some unusual museums – of wine, crafts, stained glass and an above-average Beaux-Arts museum – and a great many fine buildings, not least St Gatien cathedral. If you don't have your own transport, it's the obvious Touraine base, with both bus and train connections to some of the most notable châteaux – Villandry, Langeais, Azay-le-Rideau and Amboise.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare routière and gare SNCF are situated a short way southeast of the cathedral district, facing the futuristic Centre de Congrès Vinci. Most TGVs stop at St-Pierre-des-Corps station, in an industrial estate outside the city, but frequent shuttles (or sometimes buses) provide a link to the main station.

Le Mans, Saumur & Angers

River Cher & Loches

TOURS

ACCOMMODATION	H	E	A	B	C	L	F	D	K	G	J
Des Arts
Central Calbert
Du Cygne
Hostel
Du Manoir
Mondial
Regina
SC-Elor
Du Théâtre
De l'Univers

EATING	8	4	10	1	3	6	5
Au Bureau
Chez Jean-Michel
Comme Autre-Fouée
Jean Bardet
Au Lapin qui Fume
Le Petit Patrimoine

DRINKING & NIGHTLIFE	2	1	6	9
Académie de la Bière
L'Excalibur
Les Frères Berthom
Les Trois Orifèvres

Château tours

It's possible to get to most of the more-visited châteaux by public transport but if you're short of time it's worth considering a minibus trip. The main drawback is that you're usually limited to fairly brief visits. A number of companies run excursions from Tours, and on most schedules you'll find the following châteaux: Amboise, Azay-le-Rideau, Blois, Chambord, Chenonceau, Cheverny, Clos-Lucé (in Amboise), Fougères-sur-Bièvre, Langeais, Ussé and Villandry. Ticket prices are usually around €19 for a morning trip, taking in a couple of châteaux, and €40–50 for a full-day tour; prices do not usually include entrance fees or lunch. Ask at tourist offices or contact the following Touraine-based agencies directly: Acco Dispo (☎06.82.00.64.51, 🌐www.accodispo-tours.com); Saint-Eloi Excursions (☎06.70.82.78.75, 🌐www.chateauxexcursions.com); Alienor Excursions (☎06.10.85.35.39, 🌐www.alienortours.com); and Quart de Tours (☎06.30.65.52.01, 🌐www.quartdetours.com.) There's little to choose between them, and most pick up from the tourist office in Tours or from your hotel.

The excellent tourist office is on the corner of rue Bernard-Palissy and busy boulevard Heurteloup (mid-April to mid-Oct Mon–Sat 8.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–5pm; mid-Oct to mid-April Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎02.47.70.37.37, 🌐www.ligeris.com), just across the square from the train and bus stations. It sells a museum pass (carte multi-visites; €7) that lets you into the five city museums, and can give information on château tours.

Tours does well for accommodation, with some great budget and two-star hotels in the area just west of the cathedral, though there's less choice at the higher end of the market. It's worth booking in advance at almost all times of the year.

Hotels

Des Arts 40 rue de la Préfecture

☎02.47.05.05.00, 🌐hoteldesartstours@orange.fr. Newly opened and warmly decorated hotel with a choice of rooms, including inexpensive ones in the garret, and larger rooms on the lower floors. All are en suite. 2–5

Central 21 rue Berthelot ☎02.47.05.46.44,

🌐www.tours-online.com/central-hotel. The best bet at the upper end of the market. It's overpriced and part of a business-oriented chain (Best Western), but the rooms are large and high-ceilinged, and there's a small garden and garage parking for €9 a night. 6

Colbert 78 rue Colbert ☎02.47.66.61.56,

🌐hotel-colbert@club-internet.fr. Pleasant, well-furnished hotel in a good location near the cathedral. Rooms overlooking the small back garden are a little more expensive. 3

 Du Cygne 6 rue du Cygne

☎02.47.66.66.41, 🌐www.hotel-cygne-tours.com. Pleasantly old-fashioned and well-run hotel on a quiet street. The rooms are dated but comfortable and preserve the flavour of the house. Garage parking available. 4

Du Manoir 2 rue Traversière ☎02.47.05.37.37,

🌐site.voila.fr/hotel.manoir.tours. Set in an over-modernized nineteenth-century town house, but friendly, comfortable and in a peaceful location between the cathedral and train station. 3

Mondial 3 place de la Résistance

☎02.47.05.62.68, 🌐www.hotelmondialtours.com. Well situated on a central square, with new and functional rooms. 3

Regina 2 rue Pimbert ☎02.47.05.25.36,

☎02.47.66.08.72. Friendly and well-run budget place right in the town centre. Popular with backpackers, with a range of room prices. 1

St-Éloi 79 bd Béranger ☎02.47.37.67.34. Excellent-value, intimate hotel run by a friendly young couple. 2

Du Théâtre 57 rue de la Scellerie

☎02.47.05.31.29, 🌐www.hotel-du-theatre37.com. Charming, friendly hotel set in a tastefully restored medieval town house in the cathedral quarter. 4

De l'Univers 5 bd Heurteloup ☎02.47.05.37.12,

🌐www.hotel-univers-loirevalley.com. The grandest and most historic hotel in town, and the most luxuriously expensive – but the rooms aren't particularly special. 9

Hostel

HI Hostel 5 rue Bretonneau ☎02.47.37.81.58, ©tours@fuaj.org. Large, modern youth hostel with an excellent central location near place Plumereau.

Singles or twin-bed rooms available. Bicycles are hired out inexpensively, too. Reception 8am–noon & 6–11pm.

The City

The centre of Tours lies between the Loire and its tributary, the Cher, but the city has spread far across both banks, with industrial Tours north of the Loire. Neither river is a particular feature of the town, though there are parks on islands in both and an attractive new footbridge leads across the Loire from the site of the old castle on quai d'Orléans. The city's two distinct old quarters lie on either side of rue Nationale, which forms the town's main axis. The quieter of the areas lies around the cathedral, while the more developed, touristy zone around picturesque place Plumereau, some 600m to the west, was once a major pilgrimage site.

The cathedral quarter

The great west towers of the Cathédrale St-Gatien, standing on the square of the same name, are visible all over the city. Their surfaces crawl with decorated stone in the flamboyant Gothic style, and even the Renaissance belfries that cap them share the same spirit of refined exuberance. Inside, the style moves back in time, ending with relatively severe High Gothic east end – built in the thirteenth century – and its glorious stained-glass windows. Just beyond the south transept stands the tomb of the sons of Charles VIII and Anne de Bretagne. After their deaths, and the accidental death of their father, the Valois line proper came to an end, and Anne was obliged by law to marry Charles's cousin, Louis XII.

A door in the north aisle leads to the Cloître de la Psalette (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; Oct–March Wed–Sun closes 5pm; €2.30), which has an unfinished air, with the great foot of a flying buttress planted in the southeast corner and the missing south arcade – lost when a road was driven through in 1802 by the same progressive, anticlerical prefect who destroyed the basilica of St-Martin. The area behind the cathedral and museum, to the east, is good for a short stroll. There's a fine view of the spidery buttresses supporting the cathedral's painfully thin-walled apse from place Grégoire de Tours. Overlooking the square is the oldest wing of the archbishop's palace, whose end wall is a mongrel of Romanesque and eighteenth-century work, with an early sixteenth-century projecting balcony once used by clerics to address their flock.

Just south of the cathedral, the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues 9am–12.45pm & 2–6pm; €4) is housed in the former archbishop's palace. Other than Mantegna's intense, unmissable Agony in the Garden (1457–59), in the basement, there are few celebrity works in the large collection. Even Rembrandt's much-advertised Flight into Egypt is a small oil study rather than a finished work. But the stately, loosely chronological progression of palatial seventeenth- and eighteenth-century rooms, each furnished and decorated to match the era of the paintings it displays, is extremely attractive. Local gems include Boulanger's portrait of Balzac, and engravings of The Five Senses by the locally born Abraham Bosse, which have been interpreted as full-size canvases in the handsome Louis XIII room.

On the other side of the cathedral, between rue Albert-Thomas and the river, just two towers remain of the ancient royal château of Tours. You can get inside when an exhibition is being held but there's nothing much left of the interior. In the fifteenth-century Logis des Gouverneurs alongside (Wed & Sat 2–6pm, sometimes closed during school holidays; free), across the remnants of the city's Gallo-Roman wall, there's an exhibition of historical artefacts called "Vivre à Tours" (Life in Tours) that gives a good sense of how the city has developed over the centuries.

The old quarter

To the west, the pulse of the city quickens as you approach place Plumereau – or place Plum' as it's known locally. The square's tightly clustered, ancient houses have been carefully restored as the city's showpiece, transforming what was once a slum into a vibrant and wealthy quarter. On sunny days, the square is packed almost end to end with café tables, and students and families drink and dine out until late in the evening. One of the less brash places on the square is the Café du Vieux Mûrier, so named for the large mulberry tree outside, a reminder of the days when Tours' silkworms used to feed on mulberries planted in their thousands in and around the city.

To escape the maelstrom, slip down rue Briçonnet into a miniature maze of quiet, ancient streets. Opposite an oddly Venetian-looking, fourteenth-century house, at no. 41 rue Briçonnet, a passageway leads past a palm tree and an ancient outdoor staircase to the quiet and insulated Jardin de St-Pierre-le-Puellier, laid out around the dug-out ruins of a conventual church. Further down rue Briçonnet, at no. 16, just before the heavily modernized riverfront, is the Gothic Maison de Tristan.

Off rue Briçonnet at 7 rue du Mûrier, the Musée du Gemmail (April to mid-Oct Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-Oct to March Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €5.40) is dedicated to an obscure, locally invented modern art form that uses fragments of backlit stained glass as a medium. Although some of the works are signed by such luminaries as Dufy, Modigliani and Picasso – who was particularly enamoured of the technique – the actual execution is by professional technicians working from a design.

To the south lay the pilgrim city once known as Martinopolis after St Martin, the ex-soldier who became bishop of Tours in the fourth century and went on to be a key figure in the spread of Christianity through France. Among Catholics he is usually remembered for giving half his cloak to a beggar, an image repeated on capitals and in stained-glass windows all over the region. The Romanesque basilica stretched along rue des Halles from rue des Trois-Pavées–Ronds almost to place de Châteauneuf: the outline is traced out in the street, but only the north tower, the Tour de Charlemagne, and the western clock tower survived the iconoclastic Huguenot riots of 1562. The new Basilique de St-Martin, on rue Descartes, is a late nineteenth-century neo-Byzantine affair built to honour the relics of St Martin, rediscovered in 1860. They are now housed in the crypt, watched over by hundreds of votive prayers carved into the walls. St Martin's day, 11 November, is still celebrated. A short distance away, down rue des Halles, lies the huge, modern Halles, or covered market – an excellent place to browse for a picnic in the morning.

Around rue Nationale

At the head of rue Nationale, Tours' main street, statues of Descartes and Rabelais – both Touraine-born – overlook the scruffy walkways that run along the bank of the Loire. A short walk back from the river and you come to the Benedictine church of St Julien, whose old monastic buildings are home to two museums. The dry-as-dust Musée des Vins, 16 rue Nationale (daily except Tues 9am–noon & 2–6pm; €4.20), is only worth visiting for its location in the barn-like twelfth-century cellars of the abbey, though if your French is up to it, there's a comprehensive display on the history, mythology and production of wine. Behind the museum, a Gallo-Roman winepress from Cheillé sits in the former cloisters of the church. The Musée de Compagnonnage, at 8 rue Nationale (mid-June to mid-Sept daily 9am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-Sept to mid-June closed Tues; €4) is housed in the eleventh-century guesthouse and sixteenth-century monks' dormitory. It honours the peculiarly French cult of the artisan, displaying the “masterpieces” that craftsmen had to create in order to join their guild (compagnonnage) as a master craftsman. The skills are unquestionable but many of these showpieces are breathtakingly vulgar, displaying arts as diverse as cake-making, carpentry, clog-making and cooperage.

A few steps west of rue Nationale, the Hôtel Gouin, 25 rue du Commerce, has a Renaissance facade to stop you in your tracks, but the museum inside (Tues–Sun 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; €4.50) is a dull collection of archeological oddities and the remnants of a private scientific laboratory from Chenonceau – more rich man's toys than cutting-edge research tools.

At the southern end of rue Nationale, the huge, traffic-ridden place Jean-Jaurès is the site of the grandiose Hôtel de Ville and Palais de Justice. To the west of place Jean-Jaurès, a giant flower market takes over boulevard Béranger on Wednesdays and Saturdays, lasting from 8am into the early evening.

St-Cosme

In May, when the roses are in full bloom, the Prieuré de St-Cosme, 3km west of the centre (mid-March to April & Sept to mid-Oct daily 10am–6pm; May–Aug daily 10am–7pm; mid-Oct to mid-March daily except Tues 10am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; €4.50), is one of the loveliest sights in Touraine even if it is hemmed in by suburbs and barred off from the nearby Loire by a trunk road. Once an island priory, now a semi-ruin, it was here that Pierre de Ronsard – arguably France's greatest poet – lived as prior from 1565 until his death in 1585. Vestiges of many monastic buildings survive but the most affecting sight is the lovingly tended garden of roses, which has some 2000 rose bushes, and 250 varieties – including the tightly rounded, pink rose called “Pierre de Ronsard”. To get there by public transport, take bus #7 from immediately outside the Palais de Justice, on place Jean-Jaurès, towards La Riche-Petit Plessis, getting off at the La Pléiade stop.

Eating

The streets around place Plumereau, especially rue du Grand-Marché, are overrun with cafés, bars and bistros, and if you're looking for pizza, pasta or steak-frites, and don't mind paying a little extra for the bustling atmosphere and an outside table, this is the area to head for. On the cathedral side of rue Nationale, rue Colbert is lined with much less touristy bars and ethnic eateries, as well as a few good restaurants serving regional cuisine. For a drink or a snack, make for the pleasant café-pâtisserie Aux Délices de Michel Colombe, 1 place François-Sicard, near the cathedral, or Scarlett, a relaxed tearoom at 70 rue Colbert.

Au Bureau place Plumereau. One of a number of places serving pizzas and simple dishes on the square but worth recommending for its decent plats du jour, late-night service and outside tables.

Chez Jean-Michel 123 rue Colbert

☎ 02.47.20.80.20. Intimate wine bar and restaurant that manages to be elegant and relaxed at the same time. Serves good regional dishes to go along with the excellent local wines. Main courses at around €15. Closed Sat & Sun.

Comme Autre-Fouée 11 rue de la Monnaie

☎ 02.47.05.94.78. Something of a gimmick, in that the food is a revival of the archaic fouace (or fouée) breads praised by Rabelais, served hot and heavily garnished with local titbits. Good fun and inexpensive. Closed Sun, Mon & Tues lunch.

Jean Bardet 57 rue Groison ☎ 02.47.41.41.11, 🌐 www.jeanbardet.com. Tours' top restaurant, on the north side of the Loire. Extremely sophisticated, healthy food with rare herbs and old varieties of vegetables straight from the hotel's renowned vegetable garden. Menus €60–165, and an unmissable all-vegetable menu at €69. Closed Tues, plus Mon & Sat lunch.

Au Lapin qui Fume 90 rue Colbert ☎ 02.47.66.95.49. Tiny, relaxed but elegant restaurant serving a good menu that's half Loire and half south of France. Lots of lapin (rabbit) – it comes as a terrine, as a fricassée with rosemary, or confit – but it's not obligatory. Evening menus around the €20 mark.

Le Petit Patrimoine 58 rue Colbert ☎ 02.47.66.05.81. Romantic little place serving rich, lovingly prepared Loire dishes and good Loire wines. Menus €14–26.

Drinking and nightlife

Packed with tables and chairs, place Plumereau is the place to start the evening with an open-air aperitif and to finish it with a coffee. Giant Irish pubs, pizzerias and branded ice cream parlours are slowly making inroads into the area, but there are plenty of less commercial places to be found in the streets around, with some good café-bars on rue du Commerce – try Les Frères Berthom, which has lots of outside tables. In the cathedral quarter, the bars on rue Colbert are mostly strip-lit local affairs, but the Académie de la Bière, just up from the cathedral at 43 rue Lavoisier, is a lively, student-friendly place, though dead when school's out.

Even in summer, when local students are away, the nightclubs just off place Plumereau fill up with backpackers, locals and language students, though things don't usually get going until past midnight. Try Les Trois Orfèvres, 6 rue des Orfèvres, or L'Excalibur, which has a medieval theme. For details of classical music concerts, ask at the tourist office which provides a free monthly magazine of exhibitions, concerts and events in Touraine, Détours et des nuits.

Listings

Airport Aéroport Tours Val de Loire

☎ 02.47.49.37.00, 🌐 www.tours-aeroport.com.

Bike hire Store Trek, 31 bd Heurteloup, opposite the tourist office ☎ 02.47.61.22.35, 🌐 www.locationdevelos.com. Runs the Détours de Loire scheme (see p.495), which allows you to drop off the bike at various locations along the river, for a small extra charge.

Car hire Avis, gare de Tours ☎ 02.47.20.53.27; Budget, 194 av André-Maginot ☎ 02.47.88.00.50; Europcar, 76 rue Bernard-Palissy ☎ 02.47.64.47.76; Hertz, 57 rue Marcel-Tribut ☎ 02.47.75.50.00. All offer pick up and drop off at Tours airport, at St-Pierre-des-Corps TGV station or near the gare SNCF in Tours.

Cinema Les Studios, 2 rue des Urselines ☎ 02.47.20.27.00, 🌐 www.studiocine.com), shows arty, obscure and old favourites in their original language.

Emergencies Ambulance ☎ 15; different hospital departments are spread around the city – call ☎ 02.47.47.47.47 to check where to head, or ask at the tourist office; late-night pharmacy, phone police (see below) for address.

Internet Alliance Arena, 32bis rue Briçonnet (Mon–Sat 11am–7pm; Sun 1–8pm), is good value. Otherwise try L'Alexandra, 106 rue du Commerce (daily 3pm–1am or 2am); or Globilis Communication, 30 rue Michelet (Mon–Sat 9am–11pm, Sun 2–11pm).

Laundries In the old quarter: 20 rue Bretonneau, 45 rue Georges-Courtelaine and 17 place du Grand-Marché. Just west of the train station: 88 rue Michelet.

Police Commissariat Général 70–72 rue Marceau ☎ 02.47.70.88.88.

Taxis Groupement Taxis Radio Tours ☎ 02.47.20.30.40.

Amboise

Twenty kilometres upstream of Tours, AMBOISE is a prim little riverside town trading on long-gone splendours, notably its impressive but disappointingly empty château and Leonardo da Vinci's peaceful residence of Clos-Lucé, with its exhibition of the great man's inventions. Amboise draws a busy tourist trade that may detract from the quieter pleasures of strolling around town, but makes it a good destination for children. In July and August, son et lumière shows are held around 10pm at the château (Wed & Sat; adults from €12, children 6–14 from €6; 🌐 www.renaissance-amboise.com), with Leonardo images projected on the walls and costumed actors prancing about to loud Renaissance-style music. The one concession to modern art in Amboise is a twentieth-century fountain by Max Ernst of a turtle topped by a teddy bear figure, standing in front of the spot where the market takes place every Saturday and Sunday morning by the riverside.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare SNCF is on the north bank of the river, at the end of rue Jules-Ferry, about 1km from the château. There are good connections to Tours and Blois. Information on Amboise and its environs, including the vineyards of the Touraine-Amboise appellation, is available at the tourist office on quai du Général-de-Gaulle, on the riverfront (June & Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–1pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–8pm, Sun 10am–6pm; Oct–May Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; ☎ 02.47.57.09.28, 🌐 www.amboise-valde Loire.com).

Bikes can be hired from Cycles Richard, 2 rue Nazelles, near the station (☎ 02.47.57.01.79), or Locacycle, on rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau (April–Oct; ☎ 02.47.57.00.28). Canoes are available from the Club de Canoë-Kayak, at the Base de l'Île d'Or (☎ 02.47.23.26.52, 🌐 www.loire-aventure.com), which also runs guided trips.

Hotels

Café des Arts place Michel-Debré

☎ 02.47.57.25.04. Simple but friendly backpacker-oriented place – think pine bunkbeds and hard-wearing carpet – set up above an inexpensive café. ①

Le Belle Vue 12 quai Charles-Guinot

☎ 02.47.57.02.26, 📧 bellevuehotel.amboise@wanadoo.fr. Long-established Logis de France three-star just below the château, with comfortable, old-fashioned bedrooms. Some rooms at the front overlook the Loire – and the main road. Closed mid-Nov to mid-March. ④

Le Blason 11 place Richelieu ☎ 02.47.23.22.41,

🌐 www.leblason.fr. Very smartly kept but homely hotel in a quiet corner. The furnishings are modern, but all rooms have pretty, exposed beams. Triples and quads available. Parking and Internet access free. ③

Le Chaptal 13 rue Chaptal ☎ 02.47.57.14.46.

The rooms are plain and rather Spartan, and the welcome not exactly effusive, but it's inexpensive, perfectly decent and all rooms are equipped with bathrooms and TVs. ②

Le Choiseul 36 quai Charles-Guinot

☎ 02.47.30.45.45, 🌐 www.le-choiseul.com.

Serious luxury, set in an eighteenth-century riverside mansion. Rooms have heavy curtains, thick carpets and fresh flowers – the best have views over the river. Open-air swimming pool in summer. ⑤

Le Vieux Manoir 13 rue Rabelais

☎ 02.47.30.41.27, 🌐 www.le-vieux-manoir.com. Eighteenth-century mini-manoir house converted for use as a luxury bed and breakfast, with antique furniture coupled with a/c and brand new fittings. Closed mid-Nov to mid-Feb. ⑤

Hostel and campsite

Camping de l'Île d'Or Île d'Or ☎ 02.47.57.23.37.

Pleasant, leafy campsite alongside the hostel, with access to the pool. Closed Oct–March.

Centre Charles Péguy Île d'Or ☎ 02.47.30.60.90,

📧 cis.amboise@wanadoo.fr. Ordinary but recently done-up hostel in a pleasant location on the midstream island, halfway across the town bridge, with a small summer swimming pool. Reception is open Mon–Fri 3–8pm, but it's best to reserve in advance. Prices vary, but beds cost no more than €11.50 a night.

Château d'Amboise

Rising above the river is the remains of the château (daily: Feb to mid-March 9am–noon & 1.30–5.30pm; last 2 weeks March & Sept to mid-Nov 9am–6pm; April–June 9am–6.30pm; July & Aug 9am–7pm; mid-Nov to Jan 9am–noon & 2–4.45pm; €8, @www.chateau-amboise.com), once five times its present size, but much reduced by wars and lack of finance. It was in the late fifteenth century, following his marriage to Anne of Brittany at Langeais that Charles VIII decided to turn the old castle of his childhood days into an extravagant palace, adding the flamboyant Gothic wing that overlooks the river and the chapelle de St-Hubert, which perches incongruously atop a buttress of the defensive walls. But not long after the work was completed, he managed to hit his head, fatally, on a door frame. He left the kingdom to his cousin, Louis XII, who spent most of his time at Blois but built a new wing at Amboise (at right angles to the main body) to house his nearest male relative, the young François d'Angoulême, thereby keeping him within easy reach. When the young heir acceded to the throne as François I he didn't forget his childhood home. He embellished it with classical stonework (visible on the east facade of the Louis XII wing), invited Leonardo da Vinci to work in Amboise under his protection, and eventually died in the château's collegiate church.

Henri II continued to add to the château, but it was during the reign of his sickly son, François II, that it achieved notoriety. The Tumult of Amboise was one of the first skirmishes in the Wars of Religion. Persecuted by the young king's powerful advisors, the Guise brothers, Huguenot conspirators set out for Amboise in 1560 to "rescue" their king and establish a more tolerant monarchy under their tutelage. But they were ambushed by royal troops in woods outside the town, rounded up and summarily tried in the Salle des Conseils. Some were drowned in the Loire below the château, some were beheaded in the grounds, and others were hung from the château's balconies.

After such a history, the interior of the château is a letdown, though there's a fairly atmospheric progression of large rooms hung with tapestries. The last French king, Louis-Philippe, also stayed in the château, hence the abrupt switch from the solid Gothic furnishings of the ground floor to the 1830s post-First Empire style of the first-floor apartments. The Tour des Minimes, the original fifteenth-century entrance, is architecturally the most exciting part of the castle. With its massive internal ramp, it was designed for the maximum number of fully armoured men on horseback to get in and out as quickly as possible. These days it leads down to the pleasant gardens which in turn lead to the exit.

Clos-Lucé

Following his campaigns in Lombardy, François I decided that the best way to bring back the ideas of the Italian Renaissance was to import one of the finest exponents of the new arts. In 1516, Leonardo da Vinci ventured across the Alps in response to the royal invitation, carrying with him the Mona Lisa among other paintings. For three years before his death in 1519, he made his home at the Clos-Lucé, at the end of rue Victor-Hugo (daily: Jan 10am–5pm; Feb, March, Nov & Dec 9am–6pm; April–June, Sept & Oct 9am–7pm; July & Aug 9am–8pm; April–Oct €12, Nov–March €9). Leonardo seems to have enjoyed a semi-retirement at Amboise, devoting himself to inventions of varying brilliance and impracticability, and enjoying conversations with his royal patron. The house – an attractive brick mansion with Italianate details added by Charles VIII – is now a museum to Leonardo, and if you can ignore the persistently piped Renaissance music it's interesting to browse through the forty models of his mechanical inventions. From the suspension bridge to the paddle-wheel boat and turbine, they are all meticulously constructed according to Leonardo's plans and sketches.

Beyond the town centre

If you take the main road south out of Amboise and turn right just before the junction with the D31, you'll come to an unlikely looking eighteenth-century pagoda, once part of the enormous but now demolished château of Chanteloup. You can climb to the top for an expansive view and explore the grounds of the surrounding park (April Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sat & Sun 10am–6pm; May & Sept daily 10am–6.30pm; June daily 10am–7pm; July & Aug daily 9.30am–7.30pm; Oct to mid–Nov Sat & Sun 10am–5pm; €6.90). Just south of town on the D751 to Chenonceaux, near the pagoda, the park Mini-Châteaux (daily: April–June, Sept & Oct 10am–6pm, July & Aug closes 7pm; €12, children 4–15 years €8) houses more than forty surprisingly good scale models of the chief Loire châteaux.

At Lussault, 5km west towards Tours, the mammoth Aquarium du Val de Loire (daily: July & Aug 10am–7pm; Sept–June 10am–6pm, closed last 2 weeks Jan & last 2 weeks Nov; adults €12, children 4–15 years €8; 🌐 www.aquariumduvalde Loire.com) boasts 10,000 fish, along with turtles, alligators and a tunnel through a large shark tank.

Eating and drinking

For a real blowout meal, make for Pascal Bouvier's Michelin-starred dining room at the hotel Le Choiseul (☎02.47.30.45.45; menus at €59 & €90). L'Épicerie, 46 place Michel-Debré (☎02.47.57.08.94; menus €11–37; closed Mon & Tues except July & Aug), is overlooked by the chapelle St-Hubert and serves good country cuisine, while L'Alliance, 14 rue Joyeuse (☎02.47.30.52.13; menus €18–43; closed Wed & Jan), serves mainly fish; in summer, both need to be booked in advance. Chez Hippeau, 1 rue François-I (☎02.47.57.26.30; menus €11–30), is a bustling brasserie next to the Hôtel de Ville, with good lunchtime menus and pleasant outdoor seating out back. If you fancy a late drink, head over to the Île d'Or, where you'll find the cocktail bar Le Shaker (6pm–2am; closed Mon), whose outside terrace has great views across to the château.

Château de Villandry

Even if gardens aren't your thing, those at the Château de Villandry (gardens open daily: Jan, Nov & Dec 9am–5pm; Feb 9am–5.30pm; March 9am–6pm; April–June & Sept 9am–7pm; July & Aug 9am–7.30pm; Oct 9am–6.30pm; château closes 30min–1hr earlier, plus mid–Nov to mid–Dec; €8 château and gardens, €5.50 gardens only; 🌐 www.chateauvillandry.com) are definitely worth a visit. Thirteen kilometres west of Tours along the Cher – a delightful bike trip along the Loire on the cycle path – this recreated Renaissance garden is as much symbolic as ornamental or practical. At the topmost level and in the elevated Classical spirit is a large, formal water garden. Next down, beside the château itself, is the ornamental garden, which features geometrical arrangements of box hedges symbolizing different kinds of love: tender, passionate, fickle and tragic. But the highlight, spread out at the lowest level across 12,500 square metres, is the potager, or Renaissance kitchen garden. Carrots, cabbages and aubergines are arranged into intricate patterns, while rose bowers and miniature box hedges form a kind of frame. Even in winter, there is almost always something to see, as the entire area is replanted twice a year. At the far end of the garden, overlooked by the squat tower of the village church, beautiful vine-shaded paths run past the medieval herb garden and the maze.

▲ Villandry gardens

The elegant château was erected in the 1530s by one of François I's royal financiers, Jean le Breton, though the keep – from which there's a fine view of the gardens – dates back to a twelfth-century feudal castle. Le Breton's Renaissance structure is arranged around three sides of a cour d'honneur, the fourth wing having been demolished in the eighteenth century. In summer you can take a minibus directly from Tours (☎02.47.70.37.37); the service leaves from the tourist office at 10am and 2.30pm and costs €16 return.

There are some top-class options for eating out in and around Villandry. In the centre of the tiny village, just down from the château, the wine bar, deli and restaurant, 🍷 L'Épicerie Gourmande (☎02.47.43.37.49) matches Loire wines with delicious delicatessen specialities, served all day. For something hearty, head 1km down the D121 towards Druye, where you'll find a hearty farmhouse restaurant, the Étape Gourmande at the Domaine de la Giraudière (☎02.47.50.08.60; menus €15–30; closed mid-Nov to mid-March); its courtyard throngs with families enjoying honest home-cooked fare, with the farm's own goat's cheese featuring prominently. Right beside the Loire in Berthenay, a tiny village across the Cher from Villandry – you have to make a 7km round trip via Savonnières – 🍷 Au Bout du Monde (☎02.47.43.51.50; evening menus €28–52; closed Sun eve, Mon eve & Tues) serves fresh, light, imaginative cuisine in a lovely garden setting.

Château de Langeais

Twenty-three kilometres west of Tours, the small riverside town of LANGEAIS huddles in the shadow of its forbidding château (daily: Feb–June & Sept to mid-Nov; July & Aug 9am–7pm; mid-Nov to Jan 10am–5pm; €7.20), which was built to stop any incursions up the Loire by the Bretons. This threat ended with the marriage of Charles VIII and Duchess Anne of Brittany in 1491, which was celebrated in the castle, and a diptych of the couple portrays them looking less than joyous at their union – Anne had little choice in giving up her independence. The event is also recreated in waxworks in the chapel.

Few châteaux have such a good collection of furnishings, and the ones here are mostly fifteenth century, to match the building. There are fascinating tapestries, some rare paintings, cots and beds, a number of chaires, or seigneurial chairs, and in the huge marriage chamber, the gilded and bejewelled wedding coffer of Charles and Anne, carved with a miniature scene of the Annunciation and figures of the apostles, the wise and foolish virgins depicted on the lid.

Langeais has a pleasant hotel, the Errard-Hosten, 2 rue Gambetta (☎02.47.96.82.12, 🌐www.errard.com; 📍), with a good but expensive restaurant. The Anne de Bretagne, 27 rue Anne de Bretagne (☎02.47.96.08.52; 📍), offers some exceptional chambres d'hôtes in a restored early nineteenth-century home. Sixteen kilometres north along the D57, just outside the village of Hommes, the Vieux Château d'Hommes, (☎02.47.24.95.13, 🌐www.le-vieux-chateau-de-hommes.com; 📍) offers well-furnished rooms in a fifteenth-century outhouse of the main château.

Azay-le-Rideau and around

Even without its château (daily: April–June & Sept 9.30am–6pm; July & Aug 9.30am–7pm; Oct–March 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; €7.50), the quiet village of AZAY-LE-RIDEAU would bask in its serene setting, complete with an old mill by the bridge and curious, doll-like Carolingian statues embedded in the facade of the church of St Symphorien. On its little island in the Indre, the château is one of the loveliest in the Loire: perfect turreted early Renaissance, pure in style right down to the blood-red paint of its window frames. Visiting the interior, furnished in mostly period style, doesn't add much to the experience although the grand staircase is worth seeing, and it's fun to look out through the mullioned windows across the moat and park and imagine yourself the seigneur. In summer, the château's grounds are the setting for a restrained and rather lovely son et lumière (July & Aug daily; early Sept Fri & Sat only; €9, or €12 with daytime château entry).

Practicalities

Azay's tourist office sits just off the village's main square, place de la République (May, June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–1pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2–5pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–6pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 9am–1pm & 2–6pm; ☎02.47.45.44.40, 🌐www.ot-paysazaylerideau.fr). The bus stop is next to the tourist office on the main road, but the gare SNCF is awkwardly situated a fifteen-minute walk west of the centre, along avenue Adélaïde-Riché – trains from Tours call at Azay-le-Rideau on their way to Chinon roughly every two hours (some services are replaced by SNCF buses). You can hire bikes from Cycles Leprovost, 13 rue Carnot (☎02.47.45.40.94), and in summer canoes can be hired from beside the bridge on the road out towards Chinon (daily 11am–7pm; ☎06.61.21.80.29).

Azay-le-Rideau has some of the best accommodation in the area, with two very pleasant hotels on or just off the main square. The Hôtel de Bien-court, 7 rue Balzac (☎02.47.45.20.75, 🌐www.hotelbiencourt.com; 📍; closed mid–Nov to Feb) is attractive and friendly, while Le Grand Monarque, 3 place de la République (☎02.47.45.40.08, 🌐www.legrandmonarque.com; 📍–📍) is indeed rather grand, and has a wide range of rooms. But the best options are all chambres d'hôtes: the welcoming 🏡 Manoir de la Rémonière, 1km from Azay on the opposite side of the Indre, on the road to Saché (☎02.47.45.24.88; www.manoirdelaremoniere.com; 7–9) was once the château's fifteenth-century hunting lodge; Le Clos Philippa, 10 rue Pineau (02.47.45.26.49; 4) occupies an elegant old town house; while the two rooms offered by M. et Mme Sarrazin, 9 chemin des Caves Mecquelines (02.47.45.31.25, www.troglododo.com; 4) are both in troglodyte chambers hollowed out of the rock. Upstream from the château is a large campsite, the Camping du Sabot (02.47.45.42.72; closed Nov–March), signposted off the D84 to Saché.

For restaurants, La Ridelloise, 24 rue Nationale (02.47.45.46.53; menus €11–33), has a family atmosphere and inexpensive but decent cooking. In summer, L'Aigle d'Or, 10 av Adélaïde-Riché (02.47.45.24.58; closed Wed & Sun evening), serves elegant cuisine in its delightful garden, with menus from €24 to 60. At the relatively touristy Les Grottes, 23ter rue Pineau (02.47.45.21.04; menus from €16), you can eat good regional specialities in a troglodyte cave.

Château d'Ussé

Fourteen kilometres west of Azay-le-Rideau, as the Indre approaches its confluence with the Loire, is the Château d'Ussé in RIGNY-USSÉ (daily: mid-Feb to March & Oct to mid-Nov 10am–noon & 2–5pm; April–Sept 9.30am–6.30pm; €9.80). With its shimmering white towers and terraced gardens, this is the ultimate fairy-tale château – so much so that it's supposed to have inspired Charles Perrault's classic retelling of the Sleeping Beauty myth. The exterior is a beautiful, late fifteenth-century vision of white turrets and machicolations largely built by Antoine de Bueil, comte de Sancerre, who married the illegitimate daughter of Charles VII and Agnès Sorel. The inner courtyard was once closed by a fourth wing, demolished in the seventeenth century to improve the picturesque view. Going inside for the guided tour isn't half as compelling as you'd expect, but the gardens, designed by Le Nôtre, are pleasant to wander, and children may enjoy climbing the tall round tower whose theatrical attic rooms are populated by dressed-up dummies illustrating the story of Sleeping Beauty. The loveliest feature of all is the Renaissance chapel in the grounds, shaded by ancient cedars.

The tiny village of Rigny-Ussé has a welcoming, family-run hotel-restaurant, Le Clos d'Ussé (02.47.95.55.47; 3), with eight simple rooms. Behind the château, in a tranquil, wooded fold of the valley, the Domaine de la Juranvillerie, 15 rue des Fougères (02.47.95.57.85, www.lajuranvillerie.com; 3), is a charming little group of cottages, one housing a simple, attractive chambres d'hôtes. The friendly owners are enthusiastic naturalists and can advise on walks in the Forêt de Chinon.

Les Goupillières

As the D84 back road passes out of Azay-le-Rideau, heading east, it's overshadowed on the left by low, creamy cliffs riddled with caves used as storehouses, wine caves and even homes. These are the modern-day remnants of the region's fascinating troglodyte (cave dwellers) traditions, which can be explored at the fascinating complex of Les Goupillières, 3km from Azay-le-Rideau (April–Nov Mon–Fri 10am–7pm, Sat & Sun 2–7pm; €4; www.troglodoytedesgoupillieres.fr). The “troglodyte valley” is actually a paddock-like area depressed below the level of the surrounding farmland, its outer edges burrowed away to create cave-farmhouses, cave-barns, cave-grain silos and even a cave-rabbit hutch. The whole “village” was hacked out of the soft tufa rock by hand, over hundreds of years. It was gradually abandoned around a hundred years ago, but has been rediscovered and re-excavated by a knowledgeable local family, who now run the guided tours with infectious enthusiasm.

Chinon and around

CHINON lies on the north bank of the Vienne, 12km from its confluence with the Loire, and is surrounded by some of the best vineyards in the Loire valley. The spectacular line of towers and ramparts on the high ridge to the east of the town look as if they must enclose one of the best of this region's châteaux, but all is ruined within, and the town's dedication to tourism detracts from its charm.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare SNCF lies to the east of the town, from where rue du Dr-P.-Labusière and rue du 11-Novembre lead to the gare routière on place Jeanne-d'Arc, where Joan is sculptured in mid-battle charge. Keep heading west, either along the riverbank or across place Mirabeau into rue Rabelais, and you'll soon reach the old quarter. The tourist office is on place d'Hofheim, on the central rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau (May–Sept daily 10am–7pm; Oct–April Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎02.47.93.17.85, 🌐www.chinon.com), and can provide addresses of local vineyards where you can taste Chinon's famous red wine. Just beside the campsite, Chinon Loisirs Activités Nature (☎06.23.82.96.33) hires out canoes and kayaks, and runs half-day and full-day guided trips in summer.

Hotels

Agnès Sorel 4 quai Pasteur ☎02.47.93.04.37, 🌐www.agnes-sorel.com. The situation down by the main road, at the western edge of the old town, lacks atmosphere and is awkward for the train station, but it's very clean and welcoming inside. Bikes are rented to all-comers. ③

 Château de Danzay near Avoine, 5km north of Chinon ☎02.47.98.44.51, 🌐www.chateaudedanzay.com. The seven rooms at this miniature medieval castle have rich, medieval-stye colour schemes, stone walls, huge fireplaces, four-poster beds tucked under the roof beams and lots of luxurious little touches. Heated swimming pool and manicured gardens. Prices begin at €180. Closed Oct–April. ③

Diderot 7 rue Diderot ☎02.47.93.18.87, 🌐www.hoteldiderot.com. Solidly bourgeois hotel with an old-fashioned welcome in a venerable town house. Has some grand old rooms with antique furnishings in the main building, and some brighter modern ones in the annexe. ③–④

De France 47–49 place du Général-de-Gaulle ☎02.47.93.33.91, 🌐www.bestwestern.com/fr/

hotelfrancechinon. Historic hotel overlooking the leafy main square. Rooms are attractive and cosy, with big comfy beds, beams and exposed stone walls. ④

Le Plantagenêt 12 place Jeanne-d'Arc ☎02.47.93.36.92, 🌐www.hotel-plantagenet.com. Decent, welcoming two-star hotel on the large market square on the eastern edge of town. Rooms in the main, nineteenth-century house are pleasantly decorated; those in the garden annexe are characterless but have a/c. Family rooms available. ③

Le Tennessee 11 rue Voltaire ☎02.47.93.02.85. Three basic but acceptable rooms above a central Tex-Mex bar and restaurant. ②

La Treille 4 place Jeanne-d'Arc ☎02.47.93.07.71. Tiny, Spartan and full of character, with four basic rooms shoe-horned into an ancient building. ②

Campsite

Camping de l'Île Auger ☎02.47.93.08.35. Overlooks the old town and château from the south bank of the Vienne; turn right from the bridge along quai Danton. Closed mid-Oct to mid-March.

The Town

A fortress of one kind or another existed at Chinon from the Stone Age until the time of Louis XIV, the age of the most recent of its ruins. It was a favourite residence of Henry Plantagenet, who held title to it long before he inherited the throne of England. He added a new castle to the first medieval fortress on the site, built by his ancestor Foulques Nerra, and died here, crying vengeance on his son Richard, who had treacherously allied himself with the French king Philippe-Auguste. Henry's youngest son, John, with no English inheritance, stayed in Chinon off and on but after a year's siege in 1204–05, Philippe-Auguste finally took the castle and put an end to the Plantagenet rule over Touraine and Anjou.

Over two hundred years later, Chinon was one of the few places where the Dauphin Charles, later Charles VII, could safely stay while Henry V of England held Paris and the title to the French throne. Charles's situation changed with the arrival here in 1429 of Joan of Arc from Domrémy in Lorraine, who was able to talk her way into meeting him. The usual story – as depicted in a tapestry on display on the site – is that as Joan entered the great hall, the Dauphin remained hidden anonymously among the assembled nobles, as a test, but that Joan picked him out straight away. Joan herself told a different story, claiming that an angel had appeared before the court, bearing a crown. Either way, it is clear that she begged him to allow her to rally his army against the English. To the horror of the courtiers, Charles said yes.

Today, the château (currently daily, though times may vary during ongoing works: April–Sept 9am–7pm; Oct–March 9.30–11.30am & 2–5.30pm; €3) is little more than a ring of tumbledown walls and broken towers. The scene of Joan's encounter, the Logis Royal, is being partially rebuilt under a new roof, with works expected to continue at least until the end of 2008. Access will be permitted throughout, so you will be able to watch traditional artisans at work, and an exhibition will explain the techniques involved.

Below, the medieval streets with their half-timbered and sculpted town houses are pleasant enough to wander through, or you could duck into one of the town's low-key museums – but avoid the tacky wine- and barrel-making museum. The Musée d'Art et d'Histoire de Chinon, 44 rue Haute St-Maurice (June–Sept daily 10.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–May Mon–Fri 2.15–6pm; €3), has some diverting oddments of sculpture, pottery and paintings related to the town's history. The Maison de la Rivière, on the riverbank at 12 quai Pasteur (July & Aug Tues–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm, Sat & Sun 3–5.30pm; €3; ☎02.47.93.21.34, 🌐www.cpie-val-de-loire.org), displays models of the many kinds of Loire river vessels, and on weekend afternoons in summer you can take a short river trip on a traditional fûtreau or toue (€6); staff also lead regular guided nature walks. Though it's better with a good meal, if you want to try a glass of Chinon you could visit the Caves Peinctes, off rue Voltaire, a deep cellar carved out of the rock where a fancy

The troglodyte saint

A rewarding excursion out of Chinon starts along the road that leads east through town from rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau, passing the Romanesque church of St-Mexme and then continuing along the cliffs past numerous troglodyte dwellings, some of which are still inhabited. After a kilometre or so the path runs out at the Chapelle Ste-Radegonde, a rock-cut church which is part of a complex of cave dwellings in which St Radegonde lived with her followers. The sixth-century German princess renounced the world and her husband – probably not a great sacrifice, since he eventually murdered her brother – in order to devote her life to God. The chapel's guardian has lived in the troglodyte home next door for nearly thirty years and often takes visitors into the chapel and caves behind – check with the tourist office in advance, or ask politely.

local winegrowers' guild runs tastings (July to mid-Sept daily except Mon 11am, 3pm, 4.30pm & 6pm; €3). The name of the cave supposedly derives from Rabelais, the author of the sixteenth-century satirical romps Gargantua and Pantagruel. Rabelais was born at the manor farm of La Devinière, 6km southwest of town, where there's a good but rather dry museum. An antiques and flea market takes place every third Sunday of the month, while regular market day is Thursday.

Eating and drinking

Chinon's main square, place du Général-de-Gaulle, is enticingly filled with outdoor tables. Among the restaurants on the square, Au Chapeau Rouge (☎02.47.98.08.08), serves top-quality regional cuisine with menus from €26, while the Café des Arts offers reliable and reasonably priced brasserie fare. A more intimate square a short walk west, place de la Victoire de Verdun, conceals a good, homely restaurant, La Bonne France (☎02.47.98.01.34; closed Thurs eve & Wed). The cosy and old-fashioned Les Années 30, 78 rue Voltaire (☎02.47.93.37.18) has some adventurous dishes on its menus (€23 and €36).

Forêt de Chinon

Northeast of Chinon, the elevated terrain of the landes is covered by the ancient Forêt de Chinon, crisscrossed by roads and forest alleys that make for delightful cycling or walking – the GR3 long-distance footpath runs right through from Chinon to Azay-le-Rideau (see p.539). If you want to stay in the area, there's a good chambres d'hôtes near Rigny-Ussé (see p.540). Just outside St-Benoît-la-Forêt, the village in the heart of the forest, is a woodland adventure park, Saint-Benoît Aventure (Easter school holidays daily 1.30–7pm; May & June Sat & Sun 10am–7pm; July & Aug daily 10am–8pm; Sept & Oct Sat & Sun 1.30–7pm; adults €18, children aged 5–8 €8, aged 9–12 €12, aged 13–15 €15; ☎06.89.07.18.96, 🌐www.stbenoitaventure.new.fr). It offers a chance to let kids off the leash – or rather attach them to it, in the form of an alarming aerial ropeway assault course that threads its way through the trees. There's also a mountain bike circuit and a nature walk.

Tavant

Sixteen kilometres southeast of Chinon, the village of TAVANT hides a little jewel-box of a church, St-Nicolas (March–Nov Wed–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, closed first Sun of every month; €3). The exterior is unremarkable, but the twelfth-century, Romanesque wall paintings in its crypt rank among the finest in Europe. It's not clear why this crypt was so richly painted, as it hasn't been identified with any major relic cult or tomb. It's thought that the entire structure, inside and out, would once have been painted in bright colours, but today just fragments survive in the upper church, as well as a giant figure of Christ in Majesty on the half-dome of the apse. If the chapel isn't open when you arrive, ask for the guardian at the nearby mairie.

Saumur and around

Of all the Loire's comfortable towns, SAUMUR is perhaps the most elegantly bourgeois, with its graceful château lording it over the handsome town houses spread out below on both banks of the river and on the large island midstream. The town's 250-year association with the military, as home to the French Cavalry Academy and its successor, the Armoured Corps Academy, has only further elevated its pretensions. Even the local sparkling wines are renowned for their charm.

The stretch of the Loire from Chinon to Angers, which passes through Saumur, is particularly lovely, with the bizarre added draw of troglydite dwellings carved out of the cliffs. The land on the south bank, under grapes and sunflowers, gradually rises away from the river, with long-inactive windmills still standing. Across the water cows graze in wooded pastures. For transport to Angers, you can either take the train, bus #5 along the south bank or bus #11 crossing to the north bank halfway at Gennes.

Arrival, information and accommodation

Saumur spreads along both banks of the Loire and over the small Île d'Offard in the middle of the river too. Arriving at the gare SNCF, you'll find yourself on the north bank: turn right onto avenue David-d'Angers and either take bus #30 to the centre or cross the bridge to the island on foot. From the island the old Pont Cessart leads across to the main part of the town on the south bank, where you'll find the gare routière, a couple of blocks west of the bridge on place St-Nicolas, and the tourist office, next to the bridge on place de la Bilange (mid-May to mid-Oct Mon-Sat 9.15am-7pm, Sun 10.30am-5.30pm; mid-Oct to mid-May Mon-Sat 9.15am-12.30pm & 2-6pm, Sun 10am-noon; ☎ 02.41.40.20.60, 🌐 www.saumur-tourisme.com). The old quarter, around St-Pierre and the castle, lies immediately behind the Hôtel de Ville, on the riverbank 100m east of the bridge.

Accommodation in Saumur is mostly upmarket and overpriced, but there are a number of very attractive hotels.

Hotels

Anne d'Anjou 32 quai Mayaud ☎ 02.41.67.30.30,

🌐 www.hotel-anneanjou.com. Comfortable hotel, with a wide range of attractively decorated rooms in a grand, eighteenth-century listed building. Ⓜ

La Bouère-Salée rue Grange-Couronne

☎ 02.41.67.38.85, 🌐 www.ifrance.com/labouere. Delightful bed and breakfast in a handsome nineteenth-century town house, though it's two blocks north of the train station, on the far side of the river from the historic centre. Ⓜ

Cristal 10-12 place de la République

☎ 02.41.51.09.54, 🌐 www.cristal-hotel.fr. One of the nicer hotels in town, with a great situation on the riverfront, and friendly proprietors. Rooms on the side street can be noisy, but those with river or château views are usually fine. Some inexpensive attic rooms are also available. Ⓜ-Ⓜ

De Londres ☎ 02.41.51.23.98, 🌐 www.londres.

com. This sprawling but comfortable old town-centre hotel has been spotlessly renovated in recent years, but retains some period charm. Ⓜ

St-Pierre 3 rue Haute-St-Pierre ☎ 02.41.50.33.00,

🌐 www.saintpierresaumur.com. Hushed boutique hotel with ancient beams and a stone spiral staircase. The rooms are a little fussy and overpriced, though the tiny, cheaper garret rooms are relatively inexpensive. Ⓜ-Ⓜ

Le Volney 1 rue Volney ☎ 02.41.51.25.41,

🌐 www.levolney.com. This simple, budget hotel on the south side of town is a bit tired round the edges, but has friendly management and some inexpensive but cosy little rooms under the roof. Ⓜ

Hostel and campsite

Hostel rue de Verden, Île d'Offard

☎ 02.41.40.30.00, 🌐 www.hebergement-international-saumur.com. Large hostel at the east end of the island with laundry facilities, swimming-pool access and views of the château. Reception 9am-noon & 2-7pm. Boat and bike hire available. Closed Nov-Feb.

Camping de l'Île d'Offard rue de Verden, Île d'Offard ☎ 02.41.40.30.00, 🌐 www.cvtloisirs.com. Big, well-run site right next door to the hostel.

The Town

Set high above town, Saumur's airy, gleaming white fantasy of a château (interior closed for restoration works; exterior daily except Tues 10am–1pm & 2–5.30pm; €2), may seem oddly familiar, but then its famous depiction in Les Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, the most celebrated of all the medieval illuminated prayer books, is reproduced all over the region. It was largely built in the latter half of the fourteenth century by Louis I, Duc d'Anjou, who wanted to compete with his brothers Jean de Berry and Charles V. The threat of marauding bands of English soldiers made the masons work flat out – they weren't even allowed to stop for feast days. The château's serenely impregnable image took a knock in April 2001, when a huge chunk of the star-shaped outer fortifications collapsed down the hill towards the river. In the aftermath, the alarmed authorities decided to embark on a major renovation programme, which looks likely to continue until 2008. Until works are complete, large parts of the interior will remain closed to visitors, including the formerly excellent Musée des Arts Décoratifs and Musée du Cheval.

Down by the public gardens south of the château, Saumur's oldest church, Notre-Dame de Nantilly (daily 9am–6pm), houses a large tapestry collection in its Romanesque nave. The original Gothic church of St Pierre, in the centre of the old town (daily 9am–noon & 2–5pm), hides behind a Counter-Reformation facade built as part of the church's efforts to overawe its persistently Protestant population – Louise de Bourbon, abbess of Fontevraud, called the town a “second Geneva”, horrified at the thought that Saumur might become a similarly radical Calvinist power-base. Meanwhile, the theological college at Notre-Dame des Ardilliers, down by the river on the eastern edge of town (daily 8am–noon & 2–6.30pm) is dominated by the tremendous dome of its classical rotunda, rebuilt after bombing in June 1940.

For relief from military and ecclesiastical history, try a glass of the famous Saumur méthode champenoise wines at the Maison du Vin on quai Lucien-Gautier (April–Sept Mon 2–7pm, Tues–Sat 9am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 9.30am–1pm; Oct–March Tues–Sat 10.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; @www.interloire.com), which can also provide addresses of wine-growers and caves that you can visit. Alternatively, make for the Caves des Vignerons at St-Cyr-en-Bourg (☎02.41.53.06.06), a short train hop south of Saumur and near the station, where there are kilometres of cellars.

Beyond the town centre

Saumur's cavalry traditions are displayed most proudly at the École Nationale d'Équitation, in St-Hilaire-St-Florent, a suburb to the east of the centre (if you don't have your own transport, take bus #31 from the south end of rue Franklin-Roosevelt to the “Alouette” stop, then continue down the route de Marson, turning right at the signpost; it's a walk of a little over 1km). The Riding School (April–Sept Mon 2–6pm, Tues–Fri 9am–6pm, Sat 9am–12.30pm; €7.50) provides guided tours in which you can watch training sessions (mornings are best) and view the stables. Displays of dressage and anachronistic battle manoeuvres by the crackshot Cadre Noir, the former cavalry trainers, are regular events (programme details from the tourist office or online at @www.cadrenoir.fr). The history of the tank – traditionally considered as cavalry not infantry – is covered in the separate Musée des Blindés, at 1043 rue Fricotelle, to the southeast of the centre (daily: May–Sept 9.30am–6.30pm; Oct–April 10am–5pm; €6).

△ Saumur market

The main activity in St-Hilaire-St-Florent, especially along the main stretch of the riverside road, along rue Ackerman and rue Leopold-Palustre, is making sparkling wine. You can visit the impressive rock-carved cellars of any of Ackerman-Laurance, Bouvet-Ladubay, Langlois-Château, Gratien & Meyer, Louis de Grenelle and Veuve Amiot. Choosing between them is a matter of personal taste, and possibly a question of opening hours, though most are open all day every day throughout the warmer months (generally 10am–6pm, though most close for a couple of hours at lunchtime out of season).

Eating and drinking

There are several reasonably inexpensive places around place St-Pierre, many of which offer a chance to enjoy a glass of sparkling Saumur brut at an outside table. There's nothing much to do after hours except seek out a café or "pub" that's still serving.

Les Ardilliers 35 rue Rabelais ☎02.41.67.12.86. Relaxed, contemporary bistro-restaurant on the way out towards Notre-Dame des Ardilliers. There's a sleek bar area, a pleasant summer terrace and some modern twists on the classic dishes – three fish and three meat, every day. Menus €15–30; closed Tues lunch, Sun eve & Mon.

Auberge Reine de Sicile 71 rue Waldeck-Rousseau Île d'Offard. ☎02.41.67.30.48. Over the bridge, on the Île d'Offard, with an atmospherically ancient dining room. The food is delicious, with fish dishes grilled in front of you in the old chimney place. Menus at €19 and €33; closed Mon & Sun eve, plus for the last week in Aug and first week in Sept.

Les Forges de St-Pierre 1 place St-Pierre ☎02.41.38.21.79. Specializing in grilled meats, this is one of the busy, slightly touristy but ultimately enjoyable restaurants on the atmospheric old square. Steaks around €10–15; closed Tues eve & Sun.

Le Grand Bleu 6 rue du Marché ☎02.41.67.41.83. Specializes in sea fish – Brittany is, after all, not so far away. Pleasant situation on a miniature square, with outside seating in summer. Menus from €14–26; closed Wed.

Les Ménestrels At the Hôtel Anne d'Anjou, 32 quai Mayaud ☎02.41.67.71.10. Saumur's best place for serious, formal gastronomy, though the stone walls and exposed beams add a note of rustic relaxation. The set lunch menu is a bargain at €19, but expect to pay at least twice that for an evening meal.

Troglodyte dwellings around Saumur

The "falun" or soft shellstone found in the Loire valley lends itself to troglodyte dwellings – homes carved out of rocky outcrops, of which there are more in this area (between Saumur and Angers) than anywhere else in France. It's reckoned that in the twelfth century half the local population lived in homes carved out of the rock. Today, some of the rock dwellings have surprising uses, along with the more predictable "Troгло" bars and restaurants.

Away from the Loire cliffs on the plains to the south, troglodyte villages were built by digging holes like large craters and then carving out the walls. The best example is at ROCHEMENIER, northwest of Doué-la-Fontaine and about 20km west of Saumur, where an underground village housed a small farming community with its own underground chapel (daily: April–Nov 9.30am–7pm; €4.70), and was only abandoned in the 1930s. The visit includes a typical troglodyte dwelling, along with a museum of domestic items, including wine and oil presses. Just 3km north, at DÉNEZÉ-SOUS-DOUÉ, there are underground carvings thought to have been sculpted by a secret sixteenth-century sect of libertarians. The cartoon-style figures mock religion, morality, the state and the ruling class, with scenes of sex, strange deformities and inverted Christian imagery (April–Oct Tues–Sun 10.30am–1pm & 2–6.30pm; €4).

East of Saumur, the sunny microclimate and rocky soil provides the ideal conditions for making red wine, which is produced under the renowned appellation of Saumur-Champigny. You can visit numerous wine-growers' caves in the pretty villages around PARNAY. Set well back from the Loire's floodplain in the shelter of the tufa escarpment, the sandy stone walls of its ancient houses are hardly distinguishable from the surrounding natural rock. Just beyond, in LE VAL-HULIN, are the last producers of the once common Saumurois dried whole apples, known as pommes tapées – each apple, after drying, is given a little expert tap to check its readiness for bottling. At the Troгло des Pommes Tapées (hours and price vary; ask at the tourist office in Saumur), you're taken through the apple drying and tapping process, before rounding off the visit with a tasting. TURQUANT, a few hundred metres beyond Le-Val-Hulin, is the starting point for a sentier d'interprétation, a two-hour circular walk around the village following signposts describing the local flora and fauna set up by the regional Parc Naturel.

From a distance, the château de Brézé, 10km southeast of Saumur (Feb to mid-April & Oct–Dec Tues–Fri 2–6pm, Sat & Sun 10am–6pm; mid-April to Sept daily 10am–6.30pm; tunnels €8.15, château and tunnels €14), looks like a typically noble sixteenth-century château built in creamy-white tufa. Get up close, however, and the eighteen-metre-deep dry moat – one of the largest in Europe – reveals itself. The guided tour of the château's refined interior isn't particularly gripping, but exploring the moat and the medieval tunnels hacked out of the soft rock beneath the château is very enjoyable.

The Abbaye de Fontevraud

At the heart of the stunning Romanesque complex of the Abbaye de Fontevraud, 13km southeast of Saumur, are the tombs of the Plantagenet royal family, eerily lifelike works of funereal art that powerfully evoke the historical bonds between England and France (daily: June–Sept 9am–6.30pm; Oct–May 10am–5.30pm; €6.50). A religious community was established in around 1100 as both a nunnery and a monastery with an abbess in charge – an unconventional move, even if the post was filled solely by queens and princesses. The remaining buildings date from the twelfth century and are immense, built as they were to house and separate not only the nuns and monks but also the sick, lepers and repentant prostitutes. There were originally five separate institutions, of which three still stand in graceful Romanesque solidity. Used as a prison from the Revolution until 1963, it was an inspiration for the writer Jean Genet, whose book Miracle of the Rose was partly based on the recollections of a prisoner incarcerated here.

The abbey church is an awe-inspiring space, not least for the four tombstone effigies: Henry II, his wife Eleanor of Aquitaine, who died here, their son Richard the Lionheart and daughter-in-law Isabelle of Angoulême, King John's queen. Carved as they were at the time of their deaths, the figures are eerily lifelike. The strange domed roof, the great cream-coloured columns of the choir and the graceful capitals of the nave add to the atmosphere. Elsewhere in the complex you can explore the magnificent cloisters, the chapterhouse, decorated with sixteenth-century murals, and the vast refectory. All the cooking for the religious community, which would have numbered several hundred, was done in the – now perfectly restored – Romanesque kitchen, an octagonal building as extraordinary from the outside (with its 21 spiky chimneys) as it is from within.

The abbey is now the Centre Culturel de l'Ouest (CCO), the cultural centre for western France, and one of Europe's most important centres of medieval archeology, and is used for a great many activities, from concerts to lectures, art exhibitions and theatre. Programme details are available at the abbey (☎02.41.51.73.52, 🌐www.abbaye-fontevraud.com) or from the Saumur tourist office. Bus #1 runs from Saumur to Fontevraud, but it's not a frequent service and the timetable varies throughout the year, so check with the tourist office in advance.

Candes St-Martin and Montsoreau

The ancient village of CANDES-ST-MARTIN, on the Loire 5km north of Fontevraud, gets part of its name from the renowned local saint, Martin, who died here in around 400 while trying to settle a dispute between squabbling monks. This is a beautiful corner of the region, the village set under a rocky bluff overlooking the confluence of the Loire and Vienne. The principal sight is the airy collégiale, notably its elaborately sculpted porch. The oldest part of the church, though heavily restored, is the chapelle St-Martin, on the left of the choir, where you can trace the life of the saint in nineteenth-century stained-glass windows. From the quay below the village, you can take trips in an old-fashioned Loire riverboat, L'Amarante (mid-June to mid-Sept; ☎02.47.95.80.85 or 06.33.34.57.16; from €12 per person). You can extend the cruise to include barbecues or breakfasts, or even sleeping out overnight.

The fifteenth-century château de Montsoreau, 1km downstream (Feb–April & Oct to mid-Nov 2–6pm; May–Sept daily 10am–7pm; €8.10), is one of the most photogenic châteaux of them all, its north side rising cliff-like almost straight out of the river. The interior has been turned into an elaborately presented museum dedicated to the river trade and the history of the castle, and there's a panoramic view from the open-air battlements.

Right beside the Candes-St-Martin's church in a venerable building is an excellent, relaxed local restaurant, the Auberge de la Route d'Or (☎02.47.95.81.10; closed Tues & Wed). In Montsoreau, the welcoming and well-run Hôtel le Bussy, 4 rue Jeanne-d'Arc (☎02.41.38.11.11, 🌐www.hotel-lebussy.fr; 📍), is a tranquil place to spend the night.

Angers and around

ANGERS, capital of the ancient county of Anjou, stands majestically on the banks of the Maine, which feeds the Loire just south of the city with the waters of the Mayenne, Sarthe and Loire rivers. Long known as “Black Angers” from the gloomy-coloured slate and stone quarried here since the ninth century, it is actually a very pretty, friendly town, with a lively atmosphere. The overriding reason for coming here is to see its two stunning tapestry series, the fourteenth-century Apocalypse and the twentieth-century Le Chant du Monde.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare SNCF is south of the centre. Bus #6 (#25 on Sun) makes the one-kilometre journey to the tourist office and château, while buses #1 and #16 will take you to central place du Ralliement, which is roughly twice as far away; a flat-rate bus ticket, which you can buy on board, costs €1.10. The gare routière is down by the river, just past the Pont de Verdun on place Molière. The main tourist office is on place Kennedy, facing the château (May–Sept Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–6pm; Oct–April Mon 2–6pm, Tues–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎02.41.23.50.00, 🌐www.angersloiretourisme.com); it sells a city pass (€14 for 24 hours, €21 for 48), which allows access to the tapestries as well as the city's museums and galleries.

There's a wide range of accommodation on offer, and finding a room shouldn't present too many problems, though it's still wise to book ahead in summer.

Hotels

Centre 12 rue St-Laud ☎02.41.87.45.07.

Recently renovated hotel above a lively bar. Double-glazing keeps out the worst of the street noise. 3

Continental 12–14 rue Louis-de-Roman

☎02.41.86.94.94, 🌐www.hotelcontinental.com.

Well-equipped and well-run hotel with good service and a/c. Gets busy during the week with a business crowd. 4

Des Lices 25 rue des Lices

☎ 02.41.87.44.10. A real bargain in a balustraded town house on a distinctly posh, town-centre street. Closed August 1–15. ②

Du Mail 8 rue des Ursules ☎ 02.41.25.05.25,

📧 www.hotel-du-mail.com. Old-fashioned and extremely attractive two-star, with courtyard, pleasant rooms and a great location in a quiet corner of the centre. Parking available. ④

St-Julien 9 place du Ralliement ☎ 02.41.88.41.62,

📧 www.hotelsaintjulien.com. Large hotel right in the centre of the city, offering a good spread of modernized rooms. Some of the pretty little ones under the roof have views over town. ④

Hostel and campsite

Centre d'Accueil du Lac de Maine 49 av du Lac de Maine ☎ 02.41.22.32.10, 📧 www.lacdemaine.fr. Rather swish hostel-style accommodation, complete with extensive sports facilities, a 20min ride southwest of the town; bus #6 (bus #11 from 7.30pm–midnight, bus #26 on Sun) either from the train station or bd Général-de-Gaulle. Single rooms €35, dorms €17. You can rent canoes at the Base Nautique in the complex. There's also a campsite here (☎ 02.41.73.05.03, 📧 camping@lacedemaine.fr; closed Oct–March), agreeably situated next to the lake.

The City

Your lasting impression of Angers will be of the château, an impressive, sturdy fortress by the river, its moat now filled with striking formal flower arrangements and softened by trees. From here, it's just a fifteen-minute stroll east to the cathedral and its entourage of several smaller churches and museums.

Across the pont Verdun from the château is the suburb of La Doutre, where the Hôpital St-Jean houses the modern response to the castle's Apocalypse tapestry, Le Chant du Monde. Further out in the suburbs is a rash of interesting museums, easily reached by bus, exalting everything from early aeroplanes to Cointreau and communication methods.

The château and Apocalypse tapestry

The Château d'Angers (daily: May–Aug 9.30am–6.30pm; Sept–April 10am–5.30pm; €7.50) is a formidable early medieval fortress. The sense of impregnability is accentuated by its dark stone, the purple–brown schist characteristic of western Anjou. The château's mighty kilometre-long curtain wall is reinforced by seventeen circular towers, their brooding stone offset by decorative bands of pale tufa. Inside are a few miscellaneous remains of the counts' royal lodgings and chapels, but the chief focus is the astonishing Tapestry of the Apocalypse. Woven between 1373 and 1382 for Louis I of Anjou, it was originally 140m long, of which 100m now survives. From the start, it was treated as a masterpiece, and only brought out to decorate the cathedral of Angers on major festival days. The sheer grandeur of the conception is overwhelming but the tapestry's reputation rests as much on its superb detail and stunning colours, preserved today by the very low light levels in the long viewing hall. These reds and greens and golds were once even more vivid – as you can see if you buy the handy English-language booklet (€5.30), which uses photographs of the tapestry's unfaded reverse side – astonishingly, this is a perfectly finished mirror-image of the front. If you plan to follow the apocalypse story right through, the booklet comes in handy but a Bible would be even better. In brief: the Day of Judgement is signalled by the breaking of the seven seals – note the four horsemen – and the seven angels blowing their trumpets. As the battle of Armageddon rages, Satan appears first as a seven-headed red dragon, then as the seven-headed lion-like Beast. The holy forces break the seven vials of plagues, whereupon the Whore of Babylon appears mounted on the Beast. She is challenged by the Word of God, seen riding a galloping horse, who chases the hordes of Satan into the lake of fire, allowing the establishment of the heavenly Jerusalem.

Those feeling in need of a drink can head straight out of the castle and into the Maison du Vin de l'Anjou, 5bis place Kennedy (May–Sept Tues–Sat 9am–1pm & 3–6.30pm, Sun 9am–1pm; Oct–April Tues–Sat 9.30am–1pm & 3–6.30pm), where the helpful staff will offer you wine to taste before you buy, and can provide lists of wine-growers to visit.

The cathedral and around

The most dramatic approach to the Cathédrale St-Maurice is via the quay-side, from where a long flight of steps leads straight up to the mid-twelfth-century portal – which shows another version of the apocalypse. Built in the 1150s and 1160s, the cathedral exemplifies the Plantagenet style – in fact, it's probably the earliest example in France of this influential architectural development. The three aisle-less bays of the nave span a distance of over 16m, the dome-like Plantagenet or Angevin vaulting creating structural strength as well as a faintly Byzantine feel. The fifteenth-century rose windows in the transepts are particularly impressive.

In front of the cathedral, on place Sainte-Croix, is the town's favourite carpentry detail, the unlikely genitals of one of the carved characters on the medieval Maison d'Adam. Heading northeast from place Sainte-Croix, you pass place du Ralliement, hub of modern Angers and site of the nineteenth-century Théâtre Municipal. From here, proceed into rue Lenepveu, the main shopping street, where the turreted facade of the Hôtel Pincé, at no. 32, crawls with Italianate decoration. The museum of antiquities formerly inside – mostly ceramics from Greece, China and Japan, with a few Japanese caricatures of actors – looks set to be closed for restoration for the foreseeable future.

Arguably the greatest stoneworks in Angers are the creations of the famous local sculptor David d'Angers (1788–1856), whose Calvary adorns the cathedral. His great civic commissions can be seen all over France, but these large-scale marbles and bronzes are almost all copies of the smaller plaster of Paris works created by the artist himself. It's mostly these plaster originals that are exhibited in the Galerie David d'Angers, 37bis rue Toussaint (June–Sept daily 10am–7pm; Oct–May Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4), set impressively in the glazed-over nave of a ruined thirteenth-century church, the Église Toussaint.

The Musée des Beaux-Arts, at 10 rue du Musée (June–Sept daily 10am–7pm; Oct–May Tues–Sun 1–6pm; €4), is housed in the Logis Barrault, a proudly decorated mansion built by a wealthy late fifteenth-century mayor. Years of extensive restoration have cleaned up – and in some places entirely remade – the flamboyant Gothic stone carving. Eighteenth- and nineteenth-century paintings dominate the collection, with works by Watteau, Chardin and Fragonard, as well as Ingres' operatic Paolo et Francesca – the same subject depicted by Rodin in The Kiss – and a small collection devoted to Boucher's Génie des Arts.

La Doutre

The district facing the château across the Maine is known as La Doutre (literally, “the other side”), and still has a few mansions and houses dating from the medieval period, despite redevelopment over the years.

In the north of the area, a short way from the Pont de la Haute-Chaine (and just under 2km from the château), the Hôpital St-Jean, at 4 bd Arago, was built by Henry Plantagenet in 1174 as a hospital for the poor, a function it continued to fulfil until 1854. Today it houses the Musée Jean Lurçat et de la Tapisserie Contemporaine (June–Sept daily 10am–7pm; Oct–May Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4), which contains the city's great twentieth-century tapestry, Le Chant du Monde. The tapestry sequence was designed by Jean Lurçat in 1957 in response to the Apocalypse tapestry, though he died nine years later before its completion. It hangs in a vast vaulted space, the original ward for the sick, or Salle des Malades. The first four tapestries deal with La Grande Menace, the threat of nuclear war: first the bomb itself; then Hiroshima Man, flayed and burnt with the broken symbols of belief dropping from him; then the collective massacre of the Great Charnel House; and the last dying rose falling with the post-Holocaust ash through black space – the End of Everything. From then on, the tapestries celebrate the joys of life: Man in Glory in Peace; Water and Fire; Champagne – “that blissful ejaculation”, according to Lurçat; Conquest of Space; Poetry; and Sacred Ornaments. Subject matter and treatment are intense, and the setting helps: it’s a huge echoey space, with rows of columns supporting soaring Angevin vaulting. The artist’s own commentary is available in English. The Romanesque cloisters at the back, with their graceful double columns, are also worth a peek.

There are more modern tapestries in the building adjoining the Salle des Malades, where the collection is built up around the donation by Lurçat’s widow of several of his paintings, ceramics and tapestries, along with the highly tactile but more muted abstract tapestries of Thomas Gleb, who died in Angers in 1991, and Josep Grau Garriga. With four local ateliers, Angers is a leading centre for contemporary tapestry, and the neighbouring Centre Régional d’Art Textile, 3 bd Daviers (Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 2–4pm), can put you in touch with local artists and let you know where to find private exhibitions.

South of the Hôpital St-Jean, on La Doutre’s central square, place de la Laiterie, the ancient buildings of the Abbaye de Ronceray are now occupied by one of France’s elite grandes écoles, the École des Arts et Métiers, which trains the leading students of aerospace technology, among others. The abbey church is used to mount art exhibitions, worth visiting just to see the Romanesque galleries of the old abbey and admire their beautiful murals. When there’s no exhibition, you can only visit as part of the tourist office’s weekly tour of La Doutre. Inside the adjacent twelfth-century Église de la Trinité, an exquisite Renaissance wooden spiral staircase fails to mask a great piece of medieval bodging used to fit the wall of the church around a part of the abbey that juts into it.

Musée de l’Ardoise

The Musée de l’Ardoise (July to mid-Sept daily except Mon 2–6pm; mid-Feb to June & mid-Sept to Nov Sun 2–6pm; demonstrations at 3pm; €5.50; www.lemuseedelardoise.fr) is rather lost in the industrial satellite village of Trelaze, 2km southeast of the centre – take bus #2 to stop “Ludovic Ménard”. It’s not a museum as such, rather a demonstration of traditional slate-mining techniques by former miners, on the site of a shut-down open-cast slate mine. Just watching a sexagenarian split a giant block of schist into millimetre-perfect, size-graded slates using a big wooden hammer and a pair of outside clogs is fairly astounding, even if you don’t understand the commentary.

Eating

The streets around place du Ralliement and place Romain have a wide variety of cafés and restaurants, many of them very inexpensive.

Le 14 14 rue Bodinier ☎02.41.20.15.20. Eccentrically decorated bistro crammed with chattering diners tucking into the speciality bruschetta (€9–13). Closed Sun, Mon & first two weeks of July.

La Cantina 9 rue de l’Oisellerie ☎02.41.87.36.34. Relaxed café-bistro serving southwestern dishes such as magret de canard (duck steak). Good value for lunch, with straightforward fish and meat plats and salads for around €15. Closed Mon.

Les Caves du Ralliement 9 place du Ralliement ☎02.41.88.47.77. Busy brasserie underneath the posh and well-regarded Provence Caffé. Good for inexpensive moules- or steak-frites at lunchtime, and oysters or eels with a glass of wine in the evening, sitting at an outside table on the square. Closed Mon evening.

Le Grandgousier 7 rue St-Laud ☎02.41.87.81.47. Serves meats grilled on the wood fire, complemented by local wines, which are included in the price of the €15 and €24 menus. Closed Sun.

Papagayo 44 bd Ayraud ☎02.41.87.03.35. Friendly bar-bistro near the university campus, with a great atmosphere during term-time and a conservatory room for summer. Serves decent, inexpensive traditional French food. Closed Mon lunch, Sat lunch & Sun.

Le Soufflerie 8 place Piloni ☎02.41.87.45.32. Popular café specializing in soufflés, both large and savoury (at around €11) and small and sweet (around €8). Closed Sun, Mon & 4 weeks in July/Aug.

Villa Toussaint 43 rue Toussaint ☎02.41.88.15.64. Fashionable, ultra-contemporary bar-restaurant serving high quality seafood (platters from €14), with sushi featuring on some menus. The leafy terrace is a lovely spot in summer. Closed Sun.

Drinking and nightlife

Late-opening bars congregate around rue St-Laud: Bar du Centre, below Hôtel Centre is full of young Angevins, and there's a cluster of popular Irish-type places at the bottom end of the road, around place Romain. Just beyond the square, Safari, 23 rue du Mail (closed Mon), is a trendy bar with DJs playing salsa, reggae or hip-hop. Over in La Doutre, La Descente de la Marine, at 28 quai des Carmes, is an old-time bar with a strong nautical flavour, attracting lots of students and young people who come down for an outdoor, early evening apéro on the quay. Among Angers' numerous clubs, Boléro, 38 rue St-Laud, is popular and central, with an unpretentious, sometimes cheesy music policy. Le Mid'Star, 25 quai Félix-Faure, is the biggest and best-known clubbing venue, with a more serious playlist. Chabada, 56 bd du Doyenné, in the Monplaisir quarter just north of St-Serge (take a taxi) puts on live music.

Listings

Bike hire A desk in the tourist office hires out bikes.

Boat hire Numerous companies hire out canoes and run guided kayak trips on the five rivers in the vicinity of Angers. Try: Canoe Kayak Club d'Angers, 75 av du lac de Maine (on the Maine and Lac de Maine) ☎02.41.72.07.04, @ckcac.free.fr; Club Nautique d'Écouflant, rue de l'île St-Aubin, Écouflant (Sarthe, Mayenne, Loire, Maine) ☎02.41.34.56.38, @www.kayakecouflant.com; and Club de Canoe Kayak les Ponts de Cé, 30 rue Maximin-Gelineau, Les Ponts de Cé (on the Loire) ☎02.41.44.65.15, @www.canoespontsdece.new.fr. The tourist office has details of more sedate trips on sightseeing boats.

Car hire Budget 14 rue Denis-Papin ☎02.41.24.96.18; Anjou Auto Location, 100 av Victor-Chatenay ☎02.41.18.59.18; Europcar, 10 rue Fulton ☎02.41.24.05.89; Hertz, place de la Gare ☎02.41.88.15.16.

Emergencies Ambulance ☎15; Centre Hospitalier, 4 rue Larrey ☎02.41.35.36.37; for late-night pharmacies, phone the police on ☎02.41.57.52.00.

Festivals At the end of May, the Tour de Scènes festival (@www.tourdescenes.com) brings rock and world music acts to the city centre for four days of concerts. The Festival Angers l'Été features jazz and world music gigs in the atmospheric Cloître Toussaint, the cloisters behind the Galerie David d'Angers, on Tuesday and Thursday evenings throughout July and August; book through the tourist office. In early September, the festival Les Accroche Coeurs brings a host of theatrical companies, musicians and street-performers for three days of surreal entertainment.

Internet Go online at 48 rue Plantagenêt, near Les Halles; 37 rue Bressigny, near bd Foch; and 25 rue de la Roë, just east of place de la République.

Laundries 9 place Héroult; 17 rue Marceau; 15 rue Plantagenêt; 5 place de la Visitation.

Market There are a number of markets Tues–Sat throughout the city including a flower market on place Leclerc on Sat – Anjou is a major flower-growing region – and an organic produce market on rue Saint-Laud on Sat.

Police Commissariat, 15 rue Dupetit-Thouars ☎02.41.66.86.35.

Taxis Accueil Taxi Angevin ☎02.41.34.96.52; Allo Anjou Taxi ☎02.41.87.65.00.

Around Angers

Lazing around the Loire and its tributaries between visits to vineyards can fill a good summer week around Angers, as long as you have your own transport, and you can easily reach a couple more châteaux in these parts: Brissac-Quincé, 20km south of the town (also bus #9), and Le Plessis-Bourré near Ecuillé (impossible to get to by public transport), 17km to the north. For a more accessible glimpse of a real monster of a mansion, head for the Château de Serrant, just outside St-Georges-sur-Loire, on bus routes #7 and #18 from Angers.

Château de Brissac

The giant Château de Brissac at BRISSAC-QUINCÉ (guided tours only: April–June, Sept & Oct daily except Tues 10.15am–12.15pm & 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–6.30pm; €8.50; www.brissac.net) has been owned since 1502 by the same line of dukes. It boasts of its status as the tallest in France but it's by no means the most handsome, looking like an ugly duckling frozen halfway through its transformation into a swan. On the main west front, two round towers survive from an earlier, fifteenth-century fortress, with the château's ill-proportioned seventeenth-century facade awkwardly wedged in between them. Under the original rebuilding plan, the old fortified towers were to be pulled down, but the death of Duke Charles II in 1621 brought the project to a standstill. The interior is a riot of opulent taste, with some beautiful ceilings and tapestries, and lots of priceless furnishings; the guided tours supplies various family anecdotes. The château has had a vineyard since 1515, with its own label, and a wine tasting – with opportunity to buy, of course – concludes the tour. There are also some extravagantly wonderful chambres d'hôtes – at €390 per room.

Château du Plessis-Bourré

Five years' work at the end of the fifteenth century produced the fortress of Le Plessis-Bourré (guided tours only: mid-Feb to end March, Oct & Nov daily except Wed 2–6pm; April–June & Sept Mon, Tues & Fri–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Thurs 2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–6pm; closed Jan to mid-Feb & Dec; €9; www.plessis-bourre.com), 17km north of Angers, between the Sarthe and Mayenne rivers. Despite the vast, full moat, spanned by an arched bridge with a still-functioning drawbridge, it was built as a luxurious residence rather than a defensive castle. The treasurer of France at the time, Jean Bourré, received important visitors here, among them Louis XI and Charles VIII.

Given the powerful, medieval exterior, the first three rooms on the ground floor are a surprise, being beautifully decorated and furnished in the Louis XVI, XV and Régence styles respectively, though things revert to type in the Gothic Salle du Parlement. The highlight of the tour comes in the Salle des Gardes, just above, where the original, deeply coffered ceiling stems from Bourré's fashionable interest in alchemy. Every inch is painted with allegorical scenes: sixteen panels depict alchemical symbols such as the phoenix, the pregnant siren and the donkey singing Mass, while eight cartoon-like paintings come with morals attached – look out for “Chichiface”, the hungry wolf that only eats faithful women, whose victim is supposed to be Jean Bourré's wife.

Château de Serrant

At the Château de Serrant, 15km west of Angers beside the N23 near ST-GEORGES-SUR-LOIRE, the combination of dark-brown schist and creamy tufa give a rather pleasant cake-like effect to the outside (guided tours only, departing on the hour; mid-March to June & Sept to mid-Nov daily except Tues 9.45am–noon & 2–5.15pm; July & Aug daily 9.45am–5.15pm; €9.50; (www.chateau-serrant.net). But with its heavy slate bell-shaped cupolas pressing down on massive towers, the exterior is grandiose rather than graceful. The building was begun in the sixteenth century and added to up until the eighteenth century. In 1755 it belonged to an Irishman, Francis Walsh, to whom Louis XV had given the title Count of Serrant as a reward for Walsh's help against the old enemy, the English. The Walsh family married into the ancient La Trémoille clan, whose descendants – via a Belgian offshoot – still own the château. The massive rooms of the interior are packed with all the trappings of old wealth. Much of the decor dates from the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, but it's tastefully – and expensively – done, and you are also shown the Renaissance staircase, the sombre private chapel designed by Mansart, a bedroom prepared for Napoleon (who only stopped here for a couple of hours), and the attractive vaulted kitchens.

Le Mans and around

LE MANS, the historic capital of the Maine region, is taken over by car fanatics in the middle of June for the famous 24-hour race, but during the rest of the year it's a fascinating and unusually peaceful place to visit. As a large, industrial and traditionally left-wing city, its atmosphere could hardly be more different from the bourgeois Loire valley proper, 80km to the south, but it shares a good deal of history: Le Mans was the favourite home of the Plantagenet family, the counts of Anjou, Touraine and Maine. The old quarter, in the shadow of the magnificent cathedral, is unusually well preserved, while outside town you can visit the serene Cistercian abbey of Epau and, of course, the racetrack.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The hub of Le Mans today is place de la République, beneath which, in the underground shopping centre, is the city bus terminal. At the time of writing, bus #16 ran between here and the gare SNCF via avenue Général-Leclerc, where the gare routière is located – but expect disruption to traffic and bus routes in the town centre until at least the end of 2008, when a new tram system is expected to be up and running. From place de la République, rue Bolton leads east into rue de l'Étoile, where you'll find the tourist office (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–5pm; Sept–June same hours except closed Sat noon–2pm and all day Sun; ☎02.43.28.17.22, (www.lemanstourisme.com)). To hire a bike, make your way to the northern suburb of La-Chapelle-St-Aubin, where you'll find Veloland at 1 rue du Moulin-aux-Moines (☎02.43.51.16.00, (www.veloland.com) – take bus #8 to its terminus, "Moulin aux Moines").

Unless your visit coincides with one of the big racing events during April, June or September – when hotel rates can quadruple – you should be able to find accommodation easily without having to book, though there's nothing in the old quarter.

Hotels

Chantecler 50 rue de la Pelouse ☎02.43.14.40.00, (www.hotelchantecler.fr. Quiet, professionally run hotel, offering dull but well-fitted-out rooms and parking. 5 Levasseur 5–7 bd René-Levasseur ☎02.43.39.61.61, (hotellevasseur@wanadoo.fr. Well located just off place de la République, if rambling and functional in feel. Closed Aug. 4

ACCOMMODATION
Chantecler	C
Le Flore	B
Levasseur	A
De Rennes	E
Select	D

EATING
Auberge des 7 Plats	1
Le Flambadou	3
Le Fontainebleau	2
Le Grenier à Sel	4

Laval & Mayenne

Chartres & Paris

LE MANS

De Rennes 43 bd de la Gare ☎02.43.24.86.40, ☎02.43.87.02.95. Simple, inexpensive hotel right next to the gare SNCF done up in bright colours and cheery pastels, and spotlessly kept. 2

Select 13 rue du Père-Mersenne, off av du Général-Leclerc ☎02.43.24.17.74. Freshly refurbished budget hotel – especially good value for families, who can have a room with a double bed and two bunks for under €50. 2

Hostel

Le Flore 23 rue Maupertuis ☎02.43.81.27.55, ☎florefjt@noos.fr. Mainly a workers' hostel, but reserves some beds for HI members. Has 24hr reception and a cheap canteen. The location is fairly central: take av du Général-de-Gaulle from place de la République, continue along av Bollée; rue Maupertuis is the third on the left; or catch the "Citadine" bus from the station or place de la République to stop "Flore". Beds €12.

6

The City

The complicated web of the old quarter lies atop a minor hill above the River Sarthe, to the north of the central place de la République. Its medieval streets, a hotchpotch of intricate Renaissance stonework, medieval half-timbering, sculpted pillars and beams and grand classical facades, are still encircled by the original third- and fourth-century Gallo-Roman walls, supposedly the best preserved in Europe and running for several hundred metres. Steep, walled steps lead up from the river, and longer flights descend on the southern side of the enclosure, using old Gallo-Roman entrances. If intrigued, you can see pictures, maps and plans of the old quarter, Vieux Mans, plus examples of the city's ancient arts and crafts, in the rather dull Musée de la Reine Bérengère (Tues–Sun: May–Sept 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; Oct–April 2–6pm; €2.80, or €6 with Musée de Tessé), housed in a beautiful fifteenth-century construction on rue de la Reine-Bérengère. The Maison des Deux-Amis, opposite, gets its name for the carving of two men (the "two friends") supporting a coat of arms between the doors of nos. 18 and 20. Heading away from the cathedral, you enter the equally ancient Grande Rue.

The high ground of the old town has been sacred since ancient times, as testified by a strangely human, pink-tinted menhir now propped up against the southwest corner of the immense, hybrid Cathédrale St-Julien, which crowns the hilltop. The nave of the cathedral was only just completed when Geoffroi Plantagenet, the count of Maine and Anjou, married Matilda, daughter of Henry I of England, in 1129, thus founding the English dynastic line. Inside, for all the power and measured beauty of this Romanesque structure, it's impossible not to be drawn towards the vertiginous High Gothic choir, filled with coloured light filtering through the stained-glass windows. At the easternmost end of the choir, the vault of the chapelle de la Vierge is painted with angels singing, dancing and playing medieval musical instruments.

In the 1850s a road was tunnelled under the old quarter – a slum at the time – helping to preserve its self-contained unity. On the north side of the quarter, the road tunnel comes out by an impressive monument to Wilbur Wright – who tested an early flying machine in Le Mans – which points you into place des Jacobins, the vantage point for St-Julien's double-tiered flying buttresses and apse. From here, you can walk northeast alongside the park to the Musée de Tessé, on avenue de Paderborn (July & Aug daily except Mon 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; Sept–June Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4 or €6 with Musée de la Reine Bérengère), where the highlight is an exquisite enamel portrait of Henry II's father, Geoffroi Le Bel, which was originally part of his tomb in the cathedral. Otherwise it's a mixed bag of paintings, furnishings and sculptures, while in the basement there's a full-scale reconstruction of the ancient Egyptian tomb of Queen Nefertari.

The modern centre of Le Mans is place de la République, bordered by a mixture of belle-époque buildings and more modern office blocks, and the Baroque bulk of the church of the Visitation, built in 1730, with a balustrade inside designed by one of the sisters of the order.

On summer nights, the cathedral and various other buildings in the old town are illuminated in Le Mans' son et lumière show, called La Nuit des Chimères. The displays are free and take place daily, starting at 11pm in July and 10.30pm in August. The highlight is a parade of mythical monsters projected along the length of the Gallo-Roman walls.

Eating and drinking

In the centre of town, the cafés and brasseries on place de la République stay open till late, while on nearby place l'Éperon there's a very good, if expensive, restaurant, Le Grenier à Sel (☎02.43.23.26.30; closed Sun & Mon; menus from €18). The most atmospheric restaurants, however, are located in the old quarter. The Auberge des 7 Plats, 79 Grande-Rue (☎02.43.24.57.77; closed Sun & Mon), does a good range of good-value plats and menus. For a special occasion make for the rustically styled Le Flambadou, 14bis rue St-Flaceau (☎02.43.24.88.38; closed Sat lunch & Sun), which offers a very meaty menu from Périgord and the Landes with mains from around €15. Nearby on place St-Pierre, Le Fontainebleau (☎02.43.14.25.74; closed Mon & Tues) has pleasant outside seating facing the Hôtel de Ville and serves moderately priced classic French cuisine. There's a daily market in the covered halls on place du Marché, plus a bric-a-brac market on Wednesday, Friday (when there's also food) and Sunday mornings on place du Jet-d'Eau, below the cathedral on the new town side.

The racetrack and car museum

The first big race at Le Mans was in 1906, and two years later aviator Wilbur Wright took off here, remaining in the air for a record-breaking one hour and 31 minutes and 30 seconds. The first 24-hour car race was run as early as 1923, on the present 13.6-kilometre Sarthe circuit, with average speeds of 92kph (57mph) – these days, the drivers average around 210kph (130mph). The Sarthe circuit, on which the now world-renowned 24 Heures du Mans car race takes place every year in mid-June, stretches south from the outskirts of the city, along ordinary roads. During the race weekend, you'll need a ticket to get anywhere near the circuit. These can be bought direct from the organizers at www.lemans.org, or via the tourist office, and cost €61 for all three days, €25 for trial days (Fri & Sat), and €39 for race day, which is always on a Sunday. You'll need a separate ticket (€61–102) to get access to the grandstands, and be sure to book well in advance. Many enthusiasts' clubs and ticket agencies offer tour packages including accommodation – otherwise impossible to find at race times – and the crucial parking passes; try www.clubarnage.com or www.pageandmoy.com, or look through the adverts in a motor-sports magazine. True petrol-heads book themselves a place at one of the circuit-side campsites.

At other times of year, you can watch practice sessions, or there's the bikers' 24 Heures Moto in early April or the Le Mans Classic in September. Outside race days, the simplest way to get a taste of the action is just to take the main road south of the city towards Tours, a stretch of ordinary highway which follows the famous Mulsanne straight for 5.7km – a distance that saw race cars reach speeds of up to 375kph, until two chicanes were introduced in 1989. Alternatively, visit the Musée de l'Automobile (daily: Feb–May & Oct–Dec 10am–6pm; June–Sept 10am–7pm; €7), on the edge of the Bugatti circuit – the dedicated track section of the main Sarthe circuit, where the race starts and finishes. It parades some 150 vehicles, ranging from the humble 2CV to classic Lotus and Porsche race cars.

The Abbaye de L'Epau

If car racing holds no romance, there's another outing from Le Mans of a much quieter nature, to the Cistercian Abbaye de l'Epau (daily 9.30–11.30am & 2–5.30pm; opening hours may vary in summer to accommodate exhibitions; ☎02.43.84.22.29; €3), 4km out of town off the Chartres–Paris road (bus #14 from place de la République in Le Mans, stop “Pologne”, then a walk of some 500 metres). The abbey was founded in 1229 by Queen Berengaria, consort of Richard the Lionheart, and it stands in a rural setting on the outskirts of the Bois de Changé more or less unaltered since its fifteenth-century restoration after a fire. The visit includes the dormitory, with the remains of a fourteenth-century fresco, the abbey church and the scriptorium, or writing room. The church contains the recumbent figure of Queen Berengaria over her tomb.

6

THE LOIRE

Travel details

Travel details

Trains

Angers to: Le Mans (frequent; 40min–1hr 20min); Nantes (frequent; 45min); Paris (frequent; 1hr 40min); Saumur (frequent; 20–30min); Tours (frequent; 1hr–1hr 30min).

Bourges to: Nevers (8–12 daily; 50min); Orléans (9 daily; 1hr–1hr 40min); Tours (12 daily; 1hr 40min).

Le Mans to: Angers (frequent; 40min–1hr 20min); Nantes (frequent; 55min–1hr 45min); Paris (frequent; 1hr); Rennes (frequent; 2hr); Saumur (3 daily; 2hr); Tours (frequent; 1hr).

Orléans to: Beaugency (frequent; 20min); Blois (frequent; 40min); La Ferté-St-Aubin (frequent; 15–25min); Meung-sur-Loire (frequent; 15min); Paris (at least hourly; 1hr); Romorantin-Lanthenay (change at Salbris; 7 daily; 1hr 30min); Tours (frequent; 1hr–1hr 30min).

Tours to: Amboise (frequent; 20min); Azay-le-Rideau (7 daily; 30min); Blois (frequent; 40min); Chenonceaux (6 daily; 35min); Chinon (7 daily; 45min); Langeais (8 daily; 25min); Le Mans (7 daily; 1hr); Montrichard (10 daily; 30min); Orléans (frequent; 1hr–1hr 30min); Paris (hourly; 2hr 30min, TGVs via St-Pierre-des-Corps 1hr); Saumur (frequent; 45min).

Buses

Angers to: Brissac-Quincé (5–7 daily; 30min).

Blois to: Chambord (1–3 daily; 45min); Cour-Cheverny (3 daily; 35min); Romorantin-Lanthenay (3 daily; 1hr); St-Aignan (2–3 daily; 1hr 10min); Valençay (3 daily; 1hr 30min).

Bourges to: Sancerre (1–3 daily; 1hr 15min).

Orléans to: Beaugency (4–6 daily; 45min); Chartres (9 daily; 1hr 10min–1hr 45min); Germigny-des-Près (3 daily; 1hr); Gien (3 daily; 1hr 50min); Meung-sur-Loire (8 daily; 35min); St-Benoît-sur-Loire (3 daily; 1hr); Sully-sur-Loire (2–3 daily; 45min–1hr 20min).

Saumur to: Fontevraud (4–6 daily; 35min).

Tours to: Amboise (7 daily; 50min); Azay-le-Rideau (2 daily; 50min); Chinon (2 daily; 1hr 10min); Loches (12 daily; 40min); Richelieu (1–4 daily; 1hr 50min).

Burgundy

- * à la bourguignonne Voluptuaries, prepare to indulge – Burgundy’s ambrosial sauces are based on its full-flavoured red wines. Snails meanwhile are stewed in dry, white Chablis. See opposite
- * Château d’Ancy-le-Franc Utterly refined, still sumptuous; a textbook Renaissance villa designed by the great theorist Sebastiano Serlio. See p.574
- * Fontenay Abbey Stunningly simple, serene and austere Fontenay perfectly evokes the stark atmosphere of a Cistercian community. See p.576
- * Semur-en-Auxois Almost impossibly beautiful, this postcard-perfect market town perches above the lovely River Armançon. See p.578
- * Vézelay An intensely atmospheric pilgrim destination, the Basilica of La Madeleine is the embodiment of Romanesque splendour. See p.582
- * Beaune’s Hôtel-Dieu Topped by a myriad of glazed, multicoloured tiles, the medieval hospice at Beaune also houses Rogier van der Weyden’s Last Judgement. See p.602

△ Fontenay Abbey

Burgundy

Peaceful, rural Burgundy is one of the most prosperous regions in modern France, but for centuries its powerful dukes remained independent of the French crown. During the Hundred Years War, they even sided with the English, selling them the captured Joan of Arc. By the fifteenth century their power extended over all of Franche-Comté, Alsace and Lorraine, Belgium, Holland, Picardy and Flanders, and their state was the best organized and richest in Europe, its revenues equalled only by Venice. It finally fell to the French kings only when Duke Charles le Téméraire (the Bold) was killed besieging Nancy in 1477.

There's evidence everywhere of this former wealth and power, both secular and religious: in the dukes' capital of Dijon, in the great abbeys of Vézelay and Fontenay, in the ruins of the monastery of Cluny (whose abbots' influence was second only to the pope's), and in the châteaux of Tanlay and Ancy.

The food of Burgundy

The cuisine of Burgundy is known for its richness, due in large part to two factors: the region's heavy red wines and its possession of one of the world's finest breeds of beef cattle, the Charollais. The wines are used in the preparation of the sauces which earn a dish the designation of à la bourguignonne. Essentially, this means cooked in a red wine sauce to which baby onions, mushrooms and lardons (pieces of bacon) are added. The classic Burgundy dishes cooked in this manner are bœuf bourguignon and coq au vin. Another term which frequently appears on menus is meurette, also a red wine sauce but made without mushrooms and flambéed with a touch of marc brandy. It's used with eggs, fish and poultry as well as red meat.

Snails (escargots) are hard to avoid in Burgundy, and the local style of cooking them involves stewing for several hours in the white wine of Chablis with shallots, carrots and onions, then stuffing them with a butter of garlic and parsley and finishing them off in the oven. Other specialities include the parsley-flavoured ham (jambon persillé); hams from the Morvan hills cooked in a cream saupiquet sauce; calf's head (tête de veau, or sansiot); a pauchouse of river fish (that is, poached in white wine with onions, butter, garlic and lardons); a poussin (tender chicken) from Bresse; a saddle of hare (rabale de lièvre à la Piron); and a potée bourguignonne, or soup of vegetables cooked in the juices of long-simmered bacon and pork bits.

Like other regions of France, Burgundy produces a variety of cheeses. The best known are the creamy white Chaurouze, the soft St-Florentin from the Yonne valley, the orange-skinned Époisses and the delicious goat's cheeses from the Morvan. And then there is gougère, a kind of cheesecake, best eaten warm with a glass of Chablis.

Because of its monastic foundations, Burgundy became – along with Poitou and Provence – one of the great church-building areas in the Middle Ages. Practically every village has its Romanesque church, especially in the country around Cluny and Paray-le-Monial, and where the Catholic Church built, so had the Romans before; with their legacy hugely visible in the substantial Roman remains at Autun. And the history goes back further: Bibracte, on the vast, windswept hill of Mont-Beuvray, was an important Gallic capital, and Alésia was the scene of Julius Caesar's epic victory over the Gauls in 52 BC. In more modern times the rustic backwater of Le Creusot became a powerhouse of the Industrial Revolution, with the manufacture of railway engines, artillery pieces and latterly nuclear boilers – using the ample forests and iron-ore deposits to fuel the forges.

For voluptuaries, wine is, of course, the region's most obvious attraction, and devotees head straight for the great vineyards, whose produce has played the key role in the local economy since Louis XIV's doctor prescribed wine as a palliative for the royal dyspepsia. If you lack the funds to indulge your taste for expensive drink, go in September or October when the vignerons are recruiting harvesters.

Between bouts of gastronomic indulgence, you can engage in some moderate activity: for walkers there's a wide range of hikes, from the gentle to the relatively demanding, in the Parc Régional du Morvan and the Côte d'Or. There are also several long-distance canal paths, which make great bike trips. As for the waterways themselves, aficionados rate most highly the Canal de Bourgogne and the Canal du Nivernais, both of which can be cruised by rented barge; contact the Comité Régional du Tourisme de Bourgogne (☎03.80.28.02.80, @www.burgundy-tourism.com/fleuve).

The road to Dijon

The old road to Dijon, the Nationale 6, runs from Paris down to the Côte d'Azur, the route taken by the National Guardsmen of Marseille when they marched on Paris singing the Marseillaise in 1792. It enters the province of Burgundy just south of Fontainebleau, near where the River Yonne joins the Seine, and follows the Yonne valley through the historic towns of Sens, Joigny and Auxerre. Scattered in a broad corridor to the west and east of the road, in the valleys of the Yonne's tributaries, the Armançon, Serein, Cure and Cousin rivers, is a fascinating collection of abbeys, châteaux, towns, villages and other sites as ancient as the history of France. It makes for a route far more interesting, albeit slower, than speeding around the bland curves of its modern replacement, the Autoroute du Soleil (A6), entrance to which requires a modest toll payment.

Sens

The name of SENS, the northernmost town in Burgundy, commemorates the Senones, the Gallic tribe whose shaggy troops all but captured Rome in 390

BC; they were only thwarted by the Capitoline geese cackling and waking the garrison. Its heyday as a major ecclesiastical centre was in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, but it lost its pre-eminence in the ensuing centuries largely through damage caused by the Hundred Years War and the Wars of Religion. Nowadays, it is a quiet, relaxed place on the banks of the River Yonne – although the cathedral, its treasury and the adjacent museum make a stop worthwhile.

The Town

Contained within a ring of tree-lined boulevards where the city walls once stood, the town's ancient centre is still dominated by the Cathédrale St-Étienne (daily: April–Oct 7.30am–7pm; Nov–March 8am–6pm, reserved for mass Sun morning) close to the intersection of Grande-Rue and rue de la République, which, together with their prolongations, neatly quarter the town centre. Begun around 1130, it was the first of the great French Gothic cathedrals, and having been built without flying buttresses – these were added later for stability – its profile is relatively wide and squat. The architect who completed it, William of Sens, went on to rebuild the choir of Canterbury Cathedral in England – the link being Thomas Becket, who had previously spent several years in exile around Sens. The story of Thomas's murder is told in the twelfth-century windows in the north aisle of the choir. The treasury, which can be entered either from the cathedral or the museum (see below for times), is also uncommonly rich, containing Islamic, Byzantine and French vestments – including those belonging to Thomas Becket – jewels and embroideries.

Next door is the thirteenth-century Palais Synodal, with its roof of Burgundian glazed tiles restored by the nineteenth-century “purist” Viollet-le-Duc, as were those of so many other buildings in this region. Its vaulted halls, originally designed to accommodate the ecclesiastical courts, now house the excellent Musée de Sens (June–Sept Wed–Mon 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct–May Wed, Sat & Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Mon, Thurs & Fri 2–6pm; €5), which makes use of all available space to display a prize collection of artifacts found locally, including statuary from the cathedral and Gallo-Roman mosaics. Prize exhibits include the Villedieu treasure, which consists of 867 items of bronze jewellery in a jar which are thought to be a craftsman's hoard. The vaults of the building – partly constituting the remains of a Gallo-Roman building, including baths heated through the pavement – have also been incorporated into the museum. There are guided tours of the cathedral, treasury and museum each afternoon in July and August.

Facing the cathedral across the central place de la République are fine wood and iron halles, where a market is held on Monday, Friday and Saturday mornings. Near by, rue de la République and Grande-Rue are lined with old houses now converted into shops, and mainly reserved for pedestrians. There are three particularly finely carved and timbered houses on the corner of rue Jean-Cousin one block south of the square: the Maison d'Abraham and the Maison du Pilier, with Maison Jean Cousin on rue du Général-Alix.

Practicalities

From the gare SNCF, Grande-Rue crosses over the two broad arms of the River Yonne and leads straight to the place de la République and the cathedral – about fifteen minutes' walk. The tourist office is an octagonal building in place Jean-Jaurès (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9am–noon &

1.30–6.15pm, Sat 9am–noon & 1.30–5.15pm; ☎03.86.65.19.49, 🌐www.office-de-tourisme-sens.com), just north of the Hôtel de Ville, where rue de la République becomes rue Leclerc.

For central places to stay, try the simple but spotless Esplanade, (☎03.86.83.14.70, 📞03.86.83.14.71; closed Sun & Aug; 📍), 2 bd du Mail, above a bar at the east end of place Jean-Jaurès. Just round the corner at 21 rue de Trois Croissants, is the Hôtel Brennus (☎03.86.64.04.40, 🌐www.hotel-brennus.fr; 📍), where rooms have more character, some with crooked angles and painted beams. Close to the cathedral is the old-time-feel Hôtel de Paris et de la Poste (☎03.86.65.17.43, 🌐www.hotel-paris-poste.com; 📍), at 97 rue de la République. Here the halls and stairways are lined with polished wood and tapestries but the bedrooms tend to be more anonymous. The hotel also has an excellent restaurant specializing in traditional country cuisine (menus €20–30). The local campsite, Entre-deux-Vannes, is at 191 av de Sénigallia (☎03.86.65.64.71, 📧espacesverts@mairie-sens.fr; June to late Sept), twenty minutes' walk south of town.

For eating, you'll find pizza, Mexican and French food on place de la République, which is also the place for a coffee or drink. In the same area – almost on the doorstep of the cathedral – is the friendly, bustling crêperie Au P'tit Creux, at 3 rue de Brennus, where you can enjoy excellent home-made desserts. Superb seafood can be had at Le Soleil Levant, 51 rue Emile-Zola (☎03.86.65.71.82; closed Wed, Sun eve & Aug; menus €15–35), near the train station.

Joigny

As you travel from Sens towards Auxerre, the next place of any size on the Yonne is the modest town of JOIGNY, its elegant old houses ranged up the slope above the river. The first fort was constructed here at the end of the tenth century, with houses built beneath it, though much of the original settlement was destroyed by a fire in 1530. The town is not worth a prolonged visit, but makes a pleasant rest stop, particularly on market days (Wed & Sat). Buildings worthy of attention are the Château des Gondi, built by Cardinal Gondi in the sixteenth century and wilfully Classical, and the remains of the twelfth-century ramparts on Chemin de la Guimbarde. A few half-timbered houses that somehow escaped the 1530 fire can be seen on rue Montant-au-Palais, the street leading up to the church of St-Jean, including the best known, Maison du Pilon, combining Gothic and Renaissance styles, with some carvings strangely reminiscent of crocodile heads. On place Jean de Joigny, the main beam supporting the Maison de l'Arbre de Jessé illustrates Christ's family tree, with worn, tendril-like branches adorned with figures from the Old Testament.

The helpful tourist office is by the bridge at 4 quai Henri Ragobert (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Sept–June Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–5/6pm, Mon 2–5/6pm; ☎03.86.62.11.05, 🌐www.tourisme-joigny.fr) by the gare routière. There are no hotels in the old town itself but Le Rive Gauche (☎03.86.91.46.66, 🌐www.hotel-le-rive-gauche.fr; menus €27–35; 📍), at Chemin du Port au Bois, has a view of it and a terrace overlooking the water. In a less picturesque, but very handy, location the Hôtel Paris-Nice (☎03.86.62.06.72, 📧parisnice@orange.fr; 📍) at Rond Point de la Résistance, is two minutes walk from the train station. But the nicest place, both to stay and eat, is 6km west of town, along the D182 towards St-Julien-du-Sault.

Le P'tit Claridge (☎03.86.63.10.92, ☎03.86.63.01.34; 📍; closed Jan & Feb) in Thèmes, has rooms full of charm and a restaurant offering a very good-value menu at €16 (closed Sun evening & Mon).

An interesting side trip from Joigny, located about 45 minutes away by car, is the village of ST-SAUVEUR-EN-PUISAYE and the birthplace, in 1873, of the French writer Colette. The Musée Colette is in the château (April–Oct daily except Tues 10am–6pm; Nov–March Sat & Sun 2–6pm; €5) and includes a reconstruction of her apartment in Paris, as well as personal items and original manuscripts.

Auxerre and around

A pretty old town of narrow lanes and unexpected open squares, AUXERRE stands on a hill a further 15km up the Yonne from Joigny. It looks its best from Pont Paul-Bert and the riverside quais, where houseboats and barges moor, its churches soaring dramatically and harmoniously above the surrounding rooftops.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare SNCF in rue Paul-Doumer, is across the river from the town: follow signs for the centre ville, crossing Pont Paul-Bert. The tourist office sits by the river at 2 quai de la République (mid-June to mid-Sept Mon-Fri 9am–1pm & 2–7pm, Sun 9.30am–1pm & 3–6.30pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎03.86.52.06.19, 🌐www.ot-auxerre.fr), with an annexe in rue de Fourbisseurs near the clock tower in summer. They can advise about bike rental (€3 per hour), cycle routes and boat cruises (€7.40 per hour). The gare routière lies in place des Migrations off the boulevard périphérique. To enjoy some local colour, and local produce, try the market in place de l'Arquebuse (Tues & Fri morning). The post office, just south of place des Cordeliers, has Internet access.

Hotels

Maxime 2 quai de la Marine ☎03.86.52.14.19, 🌐www.lemaxime.com. An elegant option sandwiched between the old town and the river, with tall ceilings, modern furnishings and old wooden wine-making machinery dotted about the place. Ask for a room with river views as they are not necessarily more expensive; instead it's the size that matters here. There's also an excellent €33 menu in the restaurant, or go for the €60 option – including a glass of wine with each course. Closed mid-Dec to Jan. ⑤

Normandie 41 bd Vauban ☎03.86.52.57.80, 🌐www.hotelnormandie.fr. Just outside the old town centre, this fairly luxurious, creeper-covered chain hotel occupies a former nineteenth-century country house. Its airy rooms are tastefully decorated, the staff are welcoming and it's also good for nocturnal sauna and billiards – should you require them, these amenities are available 24hr. ④

De la Poste 9 rue d'Orbandelle ☎03.86.52.12.02, ☎03.86.51.68.61. To enter this hotel is to enter a world of bizarre decor. In the corridors burgundy coconut-matting-clad walls meet a burgundy-check-carpeted floor. But they lead, surprisingly, to charmingly decorated, modern rooms. A great, central location and a good mid-range choice. ④

De la Renommée 27 rue d'Egleny ☎03.86.51.31.45. A reasonable family-run, budget option. It's also a good half-hour uphill walk from the train station, sitting just inside the western ring-road. The restaurant has menus from €11. Closed Sun & three weeks in Aug. ②

Le Seignelay 2 rue du Pont ☎03.86.52.03.48, 🌐www.leseignelay.com. Very well placed – just a few minutes walk from the old town centre – the rooms can be a bit dingy. Friendly staff, a hearty buffet breakfast and a good little restaurant (closed Sun & Mon) in its courtyard. Closed Feb. ②–⑤

Hostel and campsite

Foyer Auxerrois des Jeunes Travailleurs 16 bd Vaulabelle ☎03.86.52.45.38. Hard to find (it's at the back of the courtyard of the Citroën garage and isn't signed) this hostel is a strange place. Downstairs are old wood and upholstered benches whilst upstairs is reminiscent of a run-down block of flats. Rooms are very bare bones and rather depressing – but then it is cheap; €15.20 including breakfast.

Camping Municipal D'Auxerre 8 rte de Vaux ☎03.86.52.11.15, 🌐camping.marie@auxerre.com. Next to the riverside football ground, a pleasant site on the south side of town. Open April–Sept.

The Town

The most interesting of Auxerre's many churches is the disused abbey church of St Germain, now a museum (daily except Tues: June–Sept 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; Oct–May 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4.30 or €6 combined ticket with the Musée Leblanc-Duvernoy, see below), at the opposite end of rue Cauchois from the cathedral. Partial demolition has left its belfry detached from the body of the building, but what gives it special interest is the crypt, one of the few surviving examples of Carolingian architecture, with its plain barrel vaults still resting on their thousand-year-old oak beams. Deep inside, the faded ochre frescoes of St Stephen (St-Étienne) are among the most ancient in France, dating back to around 850 AD.

The cathedral itself (daily: April–Oct 7.30am–6pm; Nov–March 7.30am–5pm; Sunday mornings reserved for Mass) still remains unfinished, despite the fact that its construction was drawn out over more than three centuries from 1215 to 1560: the southernmost of the two west front towers has never been completed. Look out for the richly detailed sculpture of the porches and the glorious colours of the original thirteenth-century glass that still fills the windows of the choir, despite the savagery of the Wars of Religion and the Revolution. There has been a church on the site since about 400 AD, though nothing visible survives earlier than the eleventh-century crypt (€2.80). Among its frescoes is a unique depiction of a warrior Christ mounted on a white charger, accompanied by four mounted angels.

From in front of the cathedral, rue Fourier leads to place des Cordeliers and off left to the Hôtel de Ville and the old city gateway known as the Tour de l'Horloge, with its fifteenth-century coloured clock face. The whole quarter, from place Surugue through rue Joubert and down to the river, is full of attractive old houses.

Eating

Le Ble d'or 5 rue d'Orbandelle

☎ 03.86.48.16.84. A good little crêperie, slightly light on atmosphere, but excellent, filling, tasty food at fair prices (€4–8).

Le Jardin Gourmand 56 bd Vauban

☎ 03.86.51.53.52. Polished glass, crisp linen and immaculate décor; this is truly fine dining. Beef with foie gras, roast turbot risotto with langoustines – the least expensive menu comes in at €40 (though they do give you a lot of food for your money). Or sample the range of their culinary skills and go for the menu dégustation (5 petits plats, cheese and desserts) for €85 including wine.

Closed Tues & Wed.

Le Quai place St-Nicholas ☎ 03.86.51.66.67. The perfect lazy-lunch spot, its rows of tables line up in the very pretty place St-Nicholas, beside the river. At lunchtime its plats du jour are around €12.

Le Saint Pelerin 56 rue St-Pélerin

☎ 03.86.52.77.05. Near the Pont Paul-Bert, this intimate restaurant has an excellent traditional menu at €25. Choices include eggs cooked in the wonderfully rich Burgundy wine sauce, local duck and roasted pig's trotters. Closed Sun, Mon & three weeks in Aug.

Around Auxerre

On or close to the D965 and the Paris–Dijon train route in the open, rolling country east of Auxerre lie several minor attractions, ranging from Greek treasures to Cistercian abbeys and Renaissance châteaux. The valley of the aptly named Serein River is the location of the villages of Pontigny, of monastic origin, Chablis, famed for its excellent vineyards, and the time-locked Noyers-sur-Serein; while to the south, a string of villages along the upper valley of the Yonne provides a glimpse of a gentler, more secluded countryside.

Pontigny

The ravages of time – in particular the 1789 Revolution – have destroyed most of the great monastic buildings of the Cistercian order of monks. Their rigorous insistence on simplicity and manual labour under their most influential twelfth-century leader, St Bernard, was a revolutionary response to the worldliness and luxury of the Benedictine abbots of Cluny. The only places in Burgundy where you can get an idea of how Cistercian ideas translated into bricks and mortar are at Pontigny and Fontenay.

PONTIGNY lies 18km northeast of Auxerre, and its beautifully preserved twelfth-century abbey church stands on the edge of the village, where its functional mass rises from the meadows. There's no tower, no stained glass and no statuary to distract from its austere, harmonious lines, though the effect is marred by the seventeenth-century choir that occupies much of the nave. Built through the 1100s, it spans the transition between the old Romanesque and the new Gothic, and was much copied in the country round about – in Chablis, for example.

Three Englishmen played a major role in the abbey's early history, all of them archbishops of Canterbury: Thomas Becket took refuge from Henry II in the abbey in 1164, Stephen Langton similarly hid here during an argument over his eligibility for the primacy from 1207 to 1213, and Edmund Rich retired here in 1240 after unsuccessfully trying to stand up to Henry III. The abbey was also the origin of an attraction with which a nearby village is more often associated: the famous Chablis wine. It was the monks of Pontigny who originally developed and refined the variety, and the village and its unassuming neighbouring hamlets are better places to sample the wine than in the expensive bars of Chablis itself.

There's a simple hotel-restaurant in Pontigny: the Relais de Pontigny on the N77 (☎03.86.47.96.74; ②), but, with more cash, it's better to go for the comfortable Relais St-Vincent (☎03.86.47.53.38, ✉relais.saint.vincent@liberty-surf.fr; ③; menus from €13), 14 Grande-Rue in nearby Ligny-le-Chatel, 4km along the D91. Ligny also has a campsite by the Serein off the D8 Auxerre road (mid-May to Sept).

Chablis

Sixteen kilometres to the south of Pontigny on winding, rural D965, the pretty red-roofed village of CHABLIS is the home of the region's famous light dry white wines. It lies in the valley of the River Serein between the wide and mainly treeless upland wheat fields typical of this corner of Burgundy. As you head into town you'll notice rows of vines etching the hills, interspersed by the yellow splashes of fields full of sunflowers. While wandering around the village you could take a look at the side door of the church of St-Martin, decorated with ancient horseshoes and other bits of rustic ironwork left as ex votos by visiting pilgrims. Legend has it that Joan of Arc was one of them.

If you're using public transport the summer bus service from Auxerre and Tonnerre is "on demand" and has to be booked before 5pm the day before you want to travel – pick up a leaflet at a tourist office or train station. Chablis tourist office (Maison de la Vigne et du Vin) is just over the Serein bridge at 1 rue du Maréchal de Lattre de Tassigny (daily 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; Dec–March closed Sun; ☎03.86.42.80.80, 🌐www.chablis.net). If you want to stay the night, a superb choice is the nearby Relais de la Belle Etoile (☎03.86.18.96.08, 🌐www.chablis-france.fr; ⑤; closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan) at 4 rue des Moulins, a charming bed-and-breakfast-style hotel, its rooms are beautifully and individually decorated. Meanwhile the Hostellerie des Clos (☎03.86.42.10.63, 🌐www.hostellerie-des-clos.fr; ④) in rue Jules-Rathier, is impeccably presented and undeniably luxurious though also more formulaic. It offers mini-apartments for up to €183 and has an excellent restaurant (menus €38–73). If you're camping there's an attractive campsite, the Camping de Chablis (☎03.86.42.44.39, ☎03.86.42.49.71; June–Sept), beside the river just outside the village. For food, A vins du Domaine Laroche, 18 rue des Moulins (☎03.86.42.47.30), is a good, stylish restaurant (plats €13–20) where they'll happily advise you on a choice of wine. Alternatively, Bistro des Grand Clos (☎03.86.42.19.41), 8 rue Jules-Rathier, has a very affordable plat-plus-wine menu at €9.50, with three courses for €20.

Chablis: the wine

The neatly staked Chablis vineyards, originally planted by the monks of Pontigny (see p.570), cover the sunny, well-drained, stony slopes on both sides of the valley. The grape is the chardonnay, which is to white wine what the pinot noir is to red: raw material of all the greatest Burgundies. To taste the wines, avoid Chablis itself: the town milks its product for all it's worth. Overpriced wine bars and stuffy restaurants abound, meaning you don't get the opportunity to taste the cheaper varieties, and there's haughty disapproval if you hope to spend less than €15 a bottle. You'd be better off walking ten minutes south from the centre to the co-operative, La Chablisienne, 8 bd Pasteur (July & Aug daily 9am–7pm, Sept–June 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.86.42.89.98, @www.chablisienne.com), which offers maximum variety in a casual environment – better still, drink in one of the other villages like Pontigny or Maligny. If you want to buy a good wine, go for one with an appellation; the seven distinguished grands crus, from the northern slopes of the valley, are the best, with the premiers crus, made from more widely planted grapes, next in line.

7

BURGUNDY

Auxerre and around

Noyers-sur-Serein

Twenty-three kilometres to the southeast of Chablis, you come to the beautiful little town of NOYERS-SUR-SEREIN. With no public transport, it's sealed from the modern world in a medieval time warp. Half-timbered and arcaded houses, ornamented with rustic carvings – particularly those on place de la Petite-Étape-aux-Vins and round place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville – are corralled inside a loop of the river and the town walls, and pleasant hours can be passed wandering the path between the river and the irregular walls, with their robust towers. The Serein here is as pretty as in Chablis, but Noyers, being remarkably free of commercialism, has more charm.

The town's main sight is the Musée de Noyers (Feb–May & Oct–Dec Sat & Sun 2.30–6.30pm; June–Sept Wed–Mon 11am–6.30pm; €4), comprising the remarkable collection of art historian Jacques Yankel. The Naive painters had no formal training and were often workers lacking academic education (one, Augustine Lesage, worked as a miner for sixty years before he started painting). Some star exhibits include Gérard Latier's morbid comic-strip-style work, the excellent collages of Louis Quilici and dreamy early twentieth-century paintings of Jacques Lagrange. If you're in shape, you might want to attempt the hike up to the Chateau Vieux after visiting the museum. The ruins of the twelfth-century castle are in the midst of a slow restoration, but the site offers a beautiful panorama over the town. To reach the dilapidated castle, turn right just before the town entrance archway.

The best place to stay is the ivy-covered seventeenth-century Hôtel de la Vieille Tour (☎03.86.82.87.69, ☎03.86.82.66.04; 📍) in place du Grenier-à-Sel in the town centre. The Dutch-owned establishment offers ten beautifully furnished rooms rife with personality and views across the gardens to the river. Their restaurant, run by the son, does excellent table d'hôte meals for €15 – reservations are essential for dinner. If you can't get in there, try L'Étape Nucerienne (☎03.86.82.60.92), which is a few doors down from the tourist office at 27 place de la Petite-Étape-aux-Vins.

The valley of the Yonne

If you're travelling south from Auxerre and want a break from the main roads, head along the D163, a twisting minor road which follows the course of the River Yonne through a score of peaceful rural villages. Several have places both to stay and eat, making for a much more restful overnight stop than the towns.

VAUX and ESCOLIVES-STE-CAMILLE, the first villages you come to, both have attractive Romanesque churches. VINCELOTTES and IRANCY, on the opposite bank of the river, are flower-decked and picturesque: Irancy produces the only red wine in this area, much loved by Louis XIV, while Vincelottes was the port for shipping it.

A nice place to stay hereabouts is Le Castel (☎03.86.81.43.06, 🌐www.lecastelmailly.com; 📍), a chambre d'hôte on place de l'Église in MAILLY-LE-CHÂTEAU, a further 10km along the river which offers an excellent table d'hôte for €32, including wine. The main part of the village is on high ground above the river, but there's also a lovely riverside quarter, with ancient houses huddling under cliffs.

The Canal de Bourgogne

From Migennes near Joigny on the N6, the River Armançon, in tandem with the Canal de Bourgogne, branches off to the north of the River Yonne. Along or close to its valley are several places of real interest: the Renaissance châteaux of Ancy-le-Franc and Tanlay, Fontenay Abbey, and the site of Julius Caesar's victory over the Gauls at Alésia. Just east of the Canal, perched above the River Armançon as it flows through a miniature gorge, is the exquisitely picturesque town of Semur-en-Auxois.

Further east the Canal encompasses the upper reaches of the River Seine: at Châtillon-sur-Seine is the famous Celtic Treasure of Vix, and you can trace the river south as far as its source.

Tonnerre and around

On the Paris–Sens–Dijon TGV train route, TONNERRE is a useful, though not that inspiring, starting point for exploring this corner of the region. A run-down little town, it clearly has not enjoyed the same prosperity as its neighbour Chablis.

In the centre of town the principal sight is the vast and well-conserved medieval hospital, the Hôtel-Dieu (entrance via the tourist office, same hours – see p.574; €4.50). The late thirteenth-century building is dominated by the staggering curve of a huge boat's-keel roof in pale oak, but it's otherwise mostly empty, apart from occasional exhibitions. A gnomon, or meridian line, traced on the floor allowed the calculation of astronomic time, but the real draw lurks in the small chapel at the far end, where there's an expressive and realistic Entombment of Christ in the Burgundian style pioneered by Claus Sluter.

A couple of blocks from the hospital, the Hôtel d'Uzès saw the birth of Tonnerre's quirkiest claim to fame, an eighteenth-century gentleman with the fittingly excessive moniker Charles-Geneviève-Louis-Auguste-André-Timothé Déon de Beaumont (b.1728). He tickled his contemporaries' prurience by going about his important diplomatic missions for King Louis XV dressed in women's clothes. His act was so convincing that while he was in London bookmakers took bets on his real sex. Interestingly he was also a fearsome swordsman, though history does not relate what he wore to fight in. When he died, the results of the autopsy were eagerly awaited by the gossip columnists of the day.

Despite all this architecture, Tonnerre's big draw is a natural feature on the hill tucked under the Église Saint Pierre. The Fosse Dionne is a fascinating – and more than slightly spooky – blue-green pool encircled by an eighteenth-century lavoir, or washing place. A number of legends are attached to the spring (the name derives from Divona, Celtic goddess of water), one of which holds that it was the lair of a ferocious serpent slain by a local saint – a tale which may refer to the draining of the malarial marshes. The dark, alarming hole at the bottom is popularly supposed to lead to hell, and divers have penetrated 360m along a narrow underwater passageway with no end in sight. Further exploration is now banned as three divers have died in exploration attempts.

The tourist office is next to the old hospital at 12 rue François-Mitterrand (April–Oct Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm, Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; Nov–March closed Sun; ☎03.86.55.14.48, 🌐www.tonnerre.fr). You can hire bikes here, and pick up an interesting, free, town history-trail leaflet. Directly opposite is the least expensive accommodation in town; the Hôtel du Centre (☎03.86.55.10.56, ☎03.86.55.10.53; 📍), 65 rue de l'Hôpital, a relaxed, old-fashioned provincial hotel with a reasonable little restaurant (menus from €14). For the pinnacle of luxury, try L'Abbaye Saint Michel (☎03.86.55.05.99, 🌐www.abbayesaintmichel.com; 📍), at montée St-Michel, which sits impossibly gorgeous and super-chic atop the town in an orchard of green serenity. Here suites will set you back €200–400. More centrally, in fact directly overlooking the spring, the Ferme de la Fosse Dionne, 11 rue de la Fosse Dionne (☎03.86.54.82.62, 🌐www.fermefossedionne.com; 📍; breakfast included) is a tiny, sensitively restored former farm, with lovely rooms in bright colours and a beamed, covered balcony overlooking a small courtyard. The local campsite, La Cascade (☎03.86.55.15.44; June–Oct), is between the River Armançon and the Canal de Bourgogne. For eating, Ankara, a popular local hangout on rue de l'Hôpital in the centre, has decent kebabs for €3.50, while just round the corner Les Vieux Vòlets (closed Mon & Sun eve), on the rue de l'Hôtel-de-Ville, is an excellent crêperie.

The châteaux of Ancy-le-Franc and Tanlay

Close to Tonnerre are two of the finest, though least-known and least-visited, châteaux in France: Ancy-le-Franc and Tanlay. The former has the edge for architectural purity, the latter for romantic appeal. There's no longer any public transport from Tonnerre, but if you turn up at the gare SNCF 24 hours in advance you can book a taxi for the same price per kilometre as for a train journey of equivalent length.

The Château d'Ancy-le-Franc (guided tours only, April to mid-Nov Tues–Sun hourly at 10.30am, 11.30am & 2–4pm; plus July & Aug 9.30am and April–Sept 5pm; €8; 🌐www.chateau-ancy.com) is 25km from Tonnerre and was built in the mid-sixteenth century for the brother-in-law of the notorious Diane de Poitiers, mistress of Henri II. More Italian than French, with its textbook classical countenance, it is the only accepted work of the Italian Sebastiano Serlio, one of the most important architectural theorists of the Renaissance, who was brought to France in 1540 by François I to work on his palace at Fontainebleau. The exterior is rather austere and forbidding, but the inner courtyard is an utterly refined embodiment of the principles of classical architecture. Some of the apartments are sumptuous, decorated by the Italian artists Primaticcio and Niccolò dell'Abbate, who also worked at Fontainebleau. If you're visiting in August or October, it's worth asking if they're staging one of their night-time openings, complete with candlelit tours, costumed guides and sixteenth-century singing.

Ancy has a small hotel, the modernized Hostellerie du Centre, 34 Grande-Rue (☎03.86.75.15.11, 🌐www.diaphora.com/hostellerieducentre; 📍; good restaurant from €15), which has a tiny indoor heated swimming pool. The brasserie at Bar du Château, 12 Place Clermont Tonnerre, serves a plat du jour for €10.

The Château de Tanlay (April to mid-Nov, guided tours daily except Tues: 10 & 11.30am, 2.15 & 5.15pm, July & Aug also 5.45pm; €8), is some 8km from Tonnerre. This 1559 construction, very French in feel and full of ambience is only slightly later in date than its near-neighbour, but those extra few years were enough for the purer Italian influences visible in Ancy to have become Frenchified. Encircling the château are water-filled moats and standing guard over the entrance to the first grassy courtyard is the grand lodge, from where you enter the château proper across a stone drawbridge. Domed and lanterned turrets terminate the wings of the cour d'honneur and urns line the ridge of the roof, from whose slates project carved and pedimented dormers. The round, white stone medieval towers, leftovers from the original fortress, add to the irregularity and charm. To get here cheaply by taxi you can follow the same procedure as for the Château d'Ancy-le-Franc, or cover the distance by walking or cycling alongside the Canal de Bourgogne.

For a bite to eat, Le Bonheur Gourmand (☎03.86.75.82.18; €15–23), just next to the château entrance, has ample menus.

Châtillon-sur-Seine

For those interested in pre-Roman France, there is one compelling reason for going to CHÂTILLON-SUR-SEINE: the so-called Treasure of Vix. Housed in the town's museum in the Maison Philandrier, 7 rue du Bourg, close to the centre (July & Aug daily 10am–6pm; Sept–June daily except Tues 9.30am–noon & 2–5pm; €4.50), it consists of the finds from the sixth-century BC tomb of a Celtic princess buried in a four-wheeled chariot at Vix, 6km northwest of Châtillon. In addition to pieces of the chariot, the finds include exquisite jewellery and Etruscan bowls. But the best objects on show are the starkly beautiful heavy gold torc that she was wearing and the largest bronze vase (krater) of Greek origin known from antiquity. It stands an incredible 1.64m high on triple tripod legs, and around its rim is a superbly modelled high-relief frieze depicting naked hoplites and horse-drawn chariots, with Gorgons' heads for handles. The village of Vix is the highest navigable point on the Seine, and it's thought the Celtic chieftains who controlled it received these foreign treasures as gifts possibly from traders in Cornish tin shipped south from Britain via here on its way to the Adriatic. It is an indication of the Princess' status that items of such value were buried with her.

Archaeology aside, Châtillon makes for a very picturesque stop. Here the Seine embarks on gloriously complex series of tangents and S-bends; many spanned by ancient, flower-decked bridges crying out to be photographed. Set against this – on the rocky bluff overlooking the steep-pitched roofs of the old quarter – are the ruins of a castle and the beautifully spare, early Romanesque church of St Vorles. At its foot in a luxuriantly verdant spot, a spring swells out of the rock forming an enchanting pool before tumbling off to join the infant Seine.

The tourist office is off place Marmont (Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm, plus June–Sept Sun 10am–noon; ☎03.80.91.13.19), and can provide an English-language town history-trail leaflet. If you decide to stay, try Sylvia (☎03.80.91.02.44, 🌐www.sylvia-hotel.fr; 2–3), north of the centre at 9 av de la Gare – here you'll find charming rooms and great breakfasts, which includes home-made cake on Sundays. In the middle of town at 2 rue Charles-Ronot there's the Hôtel de la Côte d'Or (☎03.80.91.13.29, ☎03.80.91.29.15; 3; closed Jan & Feb), a wonderfully atmospheric old post-house, complete with hunting trophies on the walls. It also has a very good restaurant (from €17). Otherwise the Grill-Creperie O Chapo ron (☎03.80.91.32.41), 21 rue de la Liberation, is a great little place, with a large (heated if necessary) terrace and a blazing cooking fire (plats €8). Or you can kick back with a pint of Belgian draught and scoff down a baguette (€3) along the banks of the river at Pub le Splendide, on quai de Seine by the bridge.

Fontenay Abbey

Six kilometres east of the small industrial town of Montbard, and accessible from the GR213 footpath is the privately owned Abbey of Fontenay (📧www.abbayedefontenay.com; daily: April to mid-Nov 10am–6pm; mid-Nov to March 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €8.90). Founded in 1118, it's the only Burgundian monastery to survive intact, despite conversion to a paper mill in the early nineteenth century. It was restored in the early 1900s to its original form and is one of the world's most complete monastic complexes, comprising caretaker's lodge, guesthouse and chapel, dormitory, hospital, prison, bakery, kennels, dovecote and abbot's house, as well as a church, cloister, chapterhouse and even a forge.

On top of all this, the abbey's physical setting, at the head of a quiet stream-filled valley enclosed by woods of pine, fir, sycamore and beech, is superb. There's a bucolic calm about the place, particularly in the graceful cloister, and in these surroundings the spartan simplicity of Cistercian life seems utterly attractive. Hardly a scrap of decoration softens the church: even the carving on the capitals is reduced to the barest-bones outline of an acanthus leaf – the motherly statue of the Virgin arrived after St Bernard's death. There's no direct lighting in the nave, just an other-worldly glow from the square-ended apse. The effect is beautiful but daunting, the perfect structural embodiment of St Bernard's ascetic principles.

Alésia and around

One train stop south of Montbard (or three hours on the GR213) brings you to the dull little industrial town of VENAREY-LES-LAUMES. It was here, or rather behind and above the town, on the flat-topped hill of Mont Auxois, that the Gauls, united for once under the leadership of Vercingétorix, made their last stand against the military might of Rome at the Battle of Alésia in 52 BC. Julius Caesar himself commanded the Roman army, surrounding the hilltop town with a huge double ditch and earthworks and starving the Gauls out, bloodily defeating any and all attempts at escape. Vercingétorix surrendered to save his people, was imprisoned in Rome for six years until Caesar's formal triumph and then strangled. The battle was a fundamental turning point in the fortunes of the region. Thereafter, Gaul remained under Roman rule for four hundred years.

The site of Alésia (March–June, Oct & Nov 10am–6pm; daily: July–Sept 10am–7pm; €3), treeless and exposed, is back along the ridge 3km from the modern village of ALISE-STE-REINE, which overlooks Venarey from the top of Mont Auxois. At the site you can re-create the scenes of the battle in your mind's eye as well as visit the excavations of the town, including the theatre and a Gallo-Roman house. In town it's worth checking to see if the small archaeological museum has re-opened after renovations – its home to a plethora of artifacts found locally.

On the first weekend of September the martyrdom of St Reine is celebrated in a costume procession through the village, a custom that goes back to the year 866. St Reine was a young Christian girl who was put to death in 263 for refusing to marry the proconsul of the Gauls, Olibrius. The year of her martyrdom is held to mark the advent of Christianity in Alésia.

Directly above Alise-Ste-Reine, steps climb up to a great bronze statue of Vercingétorix. Erected by Napoléon III, whose influence popularized the rediscovery of France's pre-Roman roots, the statue represents Vercingétorix as a romantic Celt, half virginal Christ, half long-haired 1970s matinee idol. On the plinth is inscribed a quotation from Vercingétorix's address to the Gauls as imagined by Julius Caesar: "United and forming a single nation inspired by a single ideal, Gaul can defy the world". Napoléon signs his dedication, "Emperor of the French", inspired by a vain desire to gain legitimacy by linking his own name to that of a "legendary" Celt.

Practicalities

There's a tourist office in Venarey at place de Bingerbrück (April–Sept Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–7pm, Sun 10am–noon; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 3–6pm, Sun 10am–noon; ☎03.80.96.89.13, 🌐www.alesia-tourisme.net), which can direct you to accommodation. The most attractive local stopover is three kilometres away up in Alise-Ste-Reine, where the Hôtel-Restaurant Alésia (☎03.80.96.19.67; 📍) at 16 rue du Miroir is a welcoming, family-run hotel with a simple restaurant; all rooms have shared baths. A little further up the street at no. 9, L'Auberge du Cheval Blanc (☎03.80.96.01.55; closed Mon & Tues) serves excellent regional cuisine, with wonderful menus at €17–40 (choices include snails, rabbit or foie gras de canard). In Venarey, L'Orient Express, a popular pizza-and-kebab locale by the gare, serves great, inexpensive food.

The Château de Bussy-Rabutin

Eight kilometres east of Alésia, on the D954, stands the handsome Château de Bussy-Rabutin (guided tours only, Tues–Sun: mid-May to mid-Sept 9.15am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-Sept to mid-May 9.15am–noon & 2–5pm; €6.50). It was built for Roger de Rabutin, a member of the Academy in the reign of Louis XIV and a notorious womanizer. The scurrilous tales of life at the royal court told in his book Histoires Amoureuses des Gaules earned him a spell in the Bastille, followed by years of exile in this château, which contains some interesting portraits of great characters of the time, including the famous female beauties of the age, each underlined by an acerbic little comment such as: "The most beautiful woman of her day, less renowned for her beauty than the uses she put it to".

The source of the Seine

You'll need your own car to get to the source of the Seine, which lies some 15km southeast of Alésia, or be prepared to hitch to the hamlet of COURCEAU. From there, by road, take the D103 through the upland hamlet of St-Germain, all crumbling stone farms and barns; or, better still, because rides are unlikely, pick up the GR2 at the bridge in Courceau for a two-hour walk.

The Seine, no more than a trickle here, rises in a tight little vale of beech woods. The spring is now covered by an artificial grotto complete with a languid nymph, Sequana, spirit of the Seine. In Celtic times it was a place of worship, as is clear from the numerous votive offerings discovered there, including a neat bronze of Sequana standing in a bird-shaped boat, now in the Dijon archaeological museum.

Semur-en-Auxois

Extraordinarily beautiful, the small fortress town of SEMUR-EN-AUXOIS sits on a rocky bluff – a place of cobbled lanes, medieval gateways and ancient gardens tumbling down to the River Armançon. Thirteen kilometres west of Alésia, all roads here lead to place Notre-Dame, a handsome square dominated by the large thirteenth-century church of Notre-Dame (another Viollet-le-Duc restoration) characterized by its huge entrance porch and the narrowness of its nave. The best view is from the east in place de l’Ancienne-Comédie, past the finely sculpted north transept door (depicting the Life of Doubting Thomas), with a couple of Burgundy snails, symbol of the region’s culinary traditions, carved on the flanking columns. Inside, the windows of the second chapel on the left commemorates the dead of World War I – Semur was the general headquarters of the American 78th division, and the battlefields were not far away.

Down the street in front of the church you come to the four sturdy towers of Semur’s once-powerful castle, all that is left after the body of the fortress was dismantled in 1602 because of its utility to enemies of the French crown. You can explore the winding streets around the castle – there’s scarcely a lane in town without some building of note – and continue down to the delightful stretch of river between the Pont des Minimes and the Pont Joly, from where there’s a dramatic view of town. The museum on rue J.-J.-Collenet (April–Sept daily except Tues 2–6pm; Oct–March Mon & Wed–Fri 2–5pm; €3.25) is a very old-fashioned affair – and retains a deal of charm because of it; featuring an almost overwhelming ammonite collection, although the pickled snakes will be an exhibit too far for some. It also has a tiny but good section on the Middle Ages. In the same complex is the town library (☎03.80.97.20.43), if you have time, call ahead to try and arrange to see their fantastic collection of illuminated manuscripts and early printed books.

Cheese connoisseurs might like to take a twelve-kilometre hop further west on the Avallon road to ÉPOISSES, not just for its village and château (July &

△ Semur-en-Auxois

Aug daily except Tues 10am–noon & 3–6pm; €6), but for its distinctive soft orange-skinned cheeses washed in marc de Bourgogne.

Practicalities

Semur's tourist office is on the small place Gaveau (July & Aug 9.30am–1pm & 1.45–7pm; Sept–June 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.80.97.05.96, 🌐www.ville-semur-en-auxois.fr), at the junction of rues de l'Ancienne-Comédie, de la Liberté and Buffon, where the medieval Porte Sauvigny and Porte Guillier combine to form a single long, covered gateway. Cyber Kfé, next to the hotel Le Commerce, has Internet access (Mon–Sat 7.30am–1pm & 4.30–8pm; €4 per hour), although it's opening hours can be a little erratic.

The least expensive hotel rooms in town are at 19 rue de la Liberté at Le Commerce (☎03.80.96.64.40, 📧cyber21@free.fr; 📍), a basic but friendly and acceptable affair. However, the Hôtel des Gourmets (☎03.80.97.09.41, 🌐www.hotellesgourmets.tk; 📍), inside the medieval city proper at 4 rue de Varenne, is a better bet. Simple, but with much more homespun appeal, its been in the same family for three generations and the engaging owners take great pride in the locally sourced delights prepared for their courtyard restaurant (menus €22). A few minutes away the Hôtel des Cymaises (☎03.80.97.21.44, 🌐www.hotelcymaises.com; 📍; closed Nov & Feb), is tucked away off a winding backstreet at 7 rue du Renaudot. It provides a degree of old-world charm, with decent rooms in a grand old mansion house. The local campsite is at Lac-de-Pont, 3km south of town.

Decent plats du jour and grills can be had at Le Saint-Vernier (☎03.80.97.32.96) at 13 rue Févret – including a filling menu de jour for €10.70. For something special, it is well worth wandering down to the river and the Pont des Minimes, where the Maison Dieu Les Minimes (☎03.80.97.26.86; menus €16–27; closed Sun eve & Mon) is a great find: excellent food, a warm atmosphere and an extremely good price – look out for their great-value recommended wines. In the heart of the old town, the patisserie-chocolaterie at 14 rue Buffon (closed Mon) specializes in local semurettes, addictive little nuggets of chocolate made without butter.

The Morvan to the Loire

The Morvan region lies smack in the middle of Burgundy between the valleys of the Loire and the Saône, stretching roughly from Clamecy, Vézelay and Avallon in the north to Autun and Le Creusot in the south. It's a land of wooded hills, close and rounded rather than mountainous, although they rise to 900m above Autun. With poor soil and pastures only good for a few cattle, villages and farms are few and far between. In the old days, wood was the main business – supplying firewood and charcoal to Paris – and large tracts of hillside are now covered in coniferous plantations. But the region's chief export has been its escaping young, helping it earn a reputation as one of the poorest and most backward regions in the country, with few resources to trade on and little inspiration for outside investment.

The creation of a parc naturel régional in 1970 did something to promote the area as a place for outdoor activities and refuge from commuterdom, but more than anything it was the election of François Mitterrand, local politician and mayor of Château-Chinon for years, as president of the Republic that rescued the Morvan from oblivion. In addition to lending it some of the glamour of his office, he took concrete steps to beef up the local economy. Plentiful local information can be found online at www.morvan.com.

West of the Morvan, the landscape softens as it descends towards the River Loire and the fine medieval town of Nevers, on Burgundy's western border.

7

Avallon

Approaching AVALLON along the N6 from the north, you wouldn't give the place a second look. That though, would be a mistake; the southern aspect is altogether more promising, clustered high on a ridge above the wooded valley of the River Cousin, looking out over the hilly, sparsely populated country of the Morvan regional park. Once a staging post on the Romans' Via Agrippa from Lyon to Boulogne, it's a small and ancient town of stone façades and sleepy cobbled streets.

The Town

Bisecting the town north to south, the narrow Grande-Rue-Aristide-Briand leads under the straddling arch of the fifteenth-century Tour de l'Horloge – the spire of which dominates the town – to the pilgrim church of St Lazare, on whose battered Romanesque facade you can still decipher the graceful carvings of signs of the zodiac. Almost opposite, in a fifteenth-century house, is the tourist office, with the municipal museum (May–Oct daily except Tues 2–6pm; free) behind it. Exhibits include a room of modern silverware, designed by local boy Jean Despres, and a second-century mosaic from a Gallo-Roman villa. There is also the Musée du Costume at 6 rue Belgrand (April–Nov daily 10.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–5.30pm; €4), just off Grande-Rue, with a collection of regional dress.

Continuing from St-Lazare down what's now called rue Bocquillot brings you to the lime-shaded Promenade de la Petite Porte, with precipitous views across the plunging valley of the Cousin. You can walk from here around the outside of the walls. From the Parc des Chaumes, on the east side of town, there's a great view back to the old quarter, snug within its walls, with garden terraces descending on the slope beneath.

Practicalities

The tourist office is at 6 rue Bocquillot (April, May & Oct–March Mon 2.30–6pm, Tues–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm, June–Sept daily 10am–1pm & 2.30–7pm; ☎03.86.34.14.19, www.avallonais-tourisme.com), between the clock tower and the church and has Internet access. Bikes can be hired from Loisirs en Morvan, 40 rue de Lyon (☎03.86.31.90.10; €23 per day).

For accommodation, Les Capucins (☎03.86.34.06.52, www.avallonlescapucins.com; Ⓣ), at 6 av du Paul Doumer, is a few minutes' walk from the train station and is a delightful mid-range choice with its tree-shaded terrace. About 1km from the town centre on the busy 119 rue de Lyon – not

AVALLON

- ACCOMMODATION
- A Les Capucins
 - B Dak' Hôtel
 - C Hostellerie de la Poste
 - D Du Rocher

Gare SNCF

- EATING
- 1 Relais des Gourmets
 - 2 Restaurant de la Tour

Camping Municipal de Sous-Roche

to be confused with the nearby route de Lyon – is the modern complex of the Dak' Hôtel (☎03.86.31.63.20, 🌐www.dak-hotel.com; 4), complete with its own pool. The most expensive option is the charming Hostellerie de la Poste (☎03.86.34.16.16, 🌐www.hostelleriedelaposte.com; 3), at 13 place Vauban – a former coaching inn with twelve sumptuous, stylish rooms and some more expensive suites, set round a long, cobbled courtyard lined with wooden balconies. It also has a restaurant serving an overwhelming choice of desserts (menus €30–65). A great option beside the water on the road south out of town is the basic but cosy Hôtel du Rocher (☎03.86.34.19.03; 1), 11 rue des Îles Labaume; from the train station it's a steep, but lovely, thirty-minute hike, through the city walls and down a switchback path alongside intricately farmed plots of land. For food the Relais des Gourmets (☎03.86.34.18.90), 45–47 rue de Paris, has menus from €17, but if you can afford it, go for the €65 menu, served with appropriate wines. For something simpler the Restaurant de la Tour, 84 de la Grand-Rue, is a cosy little pizza and pasta restaurant in the heart of the old town – they also serve grilled meats (plats €6–14).

If you have a car, take the scenic, wooded road that runs alongside the River Cousin towards Vézelay. After 5km, you'll find the swish, efficient Moulin des Ruats (☎03.86.34.97.00, 🌐www.moulin-des-ruats.com; 5–6; closed Nov to mid-Feb), with an exceptional restaurant (menu from €28; evenings only). A kilometre or two further along, just short of Pontaubert, where the back road joins the main road to Vézelay, the lovely, ivy-clad Moulin des Templiers (☎03.86.34.10.80, 🌐www.hotel-moulin-des-templiers.com; 3; closed Jan) huddles round an inner courtyard and provides a more romantic atmosphere, smack alongside the bank of the Cousin. As the name suggests, the owners compound the rumour that the hotel has links to the Knights Templar. There's a table d'hôte for guests for €17.

The attractive, riverside Camping Municipal de Sous-Roche (☎03.86.34.10.39; 📧campingsousroche@ville-avallon.fr; March–Oct), which connects well with hiking and mountain biking trails, is to the south of town. The Ferme-Auberge des Chatelaines (☎03.86.34.16.37; closed Thurs–Sun mid-Oct to April), is a couple of kilometres out of town on the route de Corbigny/Us.

Vézelay

The coach buses winding their way like ants up the steep incline to VÉZELAY should not deter you from visiting this picturesque hilltop hamlet, surrounded by ramparts and with some of the most picturesque, winding streets and crumbly buildings in Burgundy. It's also a significant destination for pilgrims – with the town, and its shops geared-up for their presence.

The Town

The pilgrims journey here to venerate the relics of Mary Magdalene, housed in one the seminal buildings of the Romanesque period, the Basilica of Ste-Mary La Madeleine (daily sunrise–sunset, reserved for worship during services).

Saved from collapse by Viollet-le-Duc in 1840, the church's restored west front begins with the colossal narthex, added to the nave around 1150 to accommodate the swelling numbers of pilgrims. Inside, your eye is first drawn to the superlative sculptures of the central doorway, on whose tympanum a Pentecostal Christ is shown swathed in exquisitely figured drapery. From Christ's outstretched hands, the message of the Gospel shoots out to the apostles in the form of beams of fire, while the frieze below depicts the converted and the pagan peoples – among those featured are giants, pygmies (one mounting his horse with a ladder), a man with breasts and huge ears, and dog-headed heathens. Better preserved are the charming small-scale medallions of zodiacal signs and the labours of the months in the outermost arch.

From this great doorway you look down the long body of the church, vaulted by arches of alternating black and white stone, to a choir of pure early Gothic (completed in 1215), with a delicacy in sharp contrast to the more measured Romanesque nave. Its arches and arcades are edged with fretted mouldings, and the supporting pillars are crowned with 99 finely cut capitals, depicting scenes from the Bible, classical mythology, allegories and morality stories. One of the more famous is “The Mystic Mill” at the end of the fourth bay on the right, showing Moses pouring grain (Old Testament Law) through a mill (Christ), the flour (New Testament) being gathered by St Paul. St Bernard preached the Second Crusade at Vézelay in 1146. Because the church was too small, he preached in the open, down the hill to the north, where a commemorative cross marks the spot. Richard the Lionheart and Philippe-Auguste, king of France, also made their rendezvous here before setting off on the Third Crusade in 1190. But by the mid-thirteenth century the abbey was in decline, the final blow coming in 1279 when rumours spread that Mary Magdalene’s bones were false relics. The monastery’s surviving buildings were pillaged by Protestants in the sixteenth-century Wars of Religion, and much of the complex was dismantled during the Revolution. Today, a significant Franciscan community has been re-established, and pilgrims stream here to view different relics of Mary Magdalene, given to Vézelay in the 1870s, at an intensely atmospheric shrine in the crypt.

Before moving on, be sure to take a look at the beautiful Gothic church in the village of ST-PÈRE, a half-hour walk from the abbey at the southern foot of the hill. The village is also home to one of the greatest restaurants in the land, L’Espérance (☎03.86.33.39.10, 🌐www.marc-meneau-esperance.com; lunch menus from €90, dinner €160), and where you can also sleep amid antiques in the exquisite luxury of the adjoining hotel (📍).

Practicalities

Most visitors arrive by bus, car or coach party, but cycling is a pleasant way of covering the 20km from Avallon to Vézelay, despite the final ascent. Another option is a taxi (☎03.86.32.31.88; €20) from the train station at Sermizelles, 10km from Vézelay on the Auxerre–Avallon line. There’s Internet access at Vézelay’s small tourist office (daily 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; Nov to mid-June closed Thurs; ☎03.86.33.23.69, 🌐www.vezelaytourisme.com) which is on the right of rue St-Pierre as you go up towards the abbey; ask for a brochure listing the numerous summer concerts and art exhibitions.

For accommodation, you’ll need to book far in advance at weekends and in high season. In a beautiful old building above an art gallery on the main street the delightful 🐷 Au Porc Épic (☎03.86.33.32.16, 🌐www.le-porc-epic.com; 📍), at 80 rue St-Pierre, is a delightful choice. Exposed stone, wood and tapestry line lovely rooms and there’s also a raised courtyard-terrace for the excellent breakfast, which is included in the price. Further up the road, La Terrasse (☎03.86.33.25.50; 📍; closed March & Tues except July & Aug) has four reasonably priced rooms, and the location right outside the basilica is excellent.

Most of the town hotels cluster round the bustling place Champ-du-Foire, just outside the walls at the foot of town and still a very pleasant location. Le Cheval Blanc (☎03.86.33.22.12, 📞03.86.33.34.29; 📍) offers simple, old-fashioned accommodation with shared facilities, and has a popular restaurant downstairs. If you can though, opt for their neighbour Le Compostelle (☎03.86.33.28.63, ☎03.86.33.34.34; ③–④) which has a lovely garden, and nicer, all en-suite, rooms – you can pay more for one with a balcony overlooking the gorgeously wide sweep of the valley. There are also some pilgrims' hostels, run by religious orders and very much designed for those visiting Vézelay for spiritual reasons. One, the Centre Ste-Madeleine (☎03.86.33.22.14; ①), is on rue St-Pierre. The inexpensive youth hostel is about 1km along the route de l'Étang (☎03.86.33.24.18; closed Jan); it also offers camping space (closed Nov–March).

Vézelay's restaurants can be rather touristy and overpriced. One great option is 🍷 Auberge de la Coquille (☎03.86.33.35.57), 81 rue St-Pierre. Deservedly popular with a lovely courtyard, they serve a huge range of dishes from crêpes to delicious Burgundian specialties. Their menu de jour (€14.50) is a good bet – but their five-course menu gastronomique (€26) is certainly worth the extra euros. Lower down the main street at no. 28, Le Bougainville (☎03.86.33.27.57; closed Tues, Wed, Dec & Jan; menus €19–26), serves good regional cuisine in a genteel dining room.

Clamecy

In sharp contrast to its rustic neighbours, CLAMECY, 23km to the west of Vézelay on the banks of the River Yonne, has a distinctly industrial feel. It was the centre of the Morvan's logging trade from the sixteenth century to the completion of the Canal du Nivernais in 1834. Individual woodcutting gangs working in the hills floated their logs down the Yonne and its tributaries as far as Clamecy, where they were made up into great rafts for shipment on to Paris. This contact with the capital – and cradle of new egalitarian political ideas – led to the early spread of revolutionary thoughts among the workers and peasantry of the Morvan, who staged a number of violent insurrections even before 1789. The history of the logging trade is documented in the museum on rue de la Mirandole (daily: 10am–noon & 2–6pm, June–Sept closed Tues & Sun mornings, Oct–May closed Sun, Mon & Tues mornings; €3).

There's nothing special to see in town, apart from the many fifteenth- to eighteenth-century buildings in the centre, but it does have an interesting history and a bizarre connection with Bethlehem. In 1168 William IV, crusading Count of Nevers, died in Palestine, bequeathing one of his properties in Clamecy to the bishopric of Bethlehem, to serve as a sanctuary in the case of Palestine falling into the hands of what he perceived to be the infidel. When the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem fell, the first bishop arrived to claim his legacy, and from 1225 until the Revolution fifty bishops of Bethlehem succeeded each other in Clamecy, honouring the little town with the title of bishopric. A curious little chapel by the bridge, built in 1927 in reinforced concrete, commemorates the connection.

The tourist office is at 24 rue du Grand-Marché (Tues–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6/7pm, plus June–Sept Sun 10am–1pm; ☎03.86.27.02.51). For places to stay, try the lovely, old-fashioned Hostellerie de la Poste, on place Émile-Zola not far from the bridge (☎03.86.27.01.55, 🌐www.hostelleriedelaposte.fr; ③; restaurant from €20). Or just across the river on the road to Auxerre at 5 place Bethléem, there's the excellent-value Auberge de la Chapelle (☎03.86.27.11.55, ☎03.86.27.06.21; ③), where you can dine in unusual surroundings – an atmospheric renovated thirteenth-century chapel. There's also a good riverside campsite on the edge of town on the route de Chevroches (☎03.86.27.05.97; May–Sept). If you're travelling south towards Nevers, the Ferme-Auberge du Vieux Château (☎03.86.68.06.77, 🌐www.vieuxchateau.com; 🍳 with breakfast; dinner at €17) is 20km from Clamecy near the village of Oulon and just off the D977. It makes an ideal place to taste the good life, Burgundy-style, amid bucolic luxury and beautiful surroundings; meals are served exclusively with ingredients from the château's garden and farm.

Saulieu

SAULIEU suffered something of a decline with both the depopulation of the Morvan and then the construction of the A6 autoroute that took away the traffic from the old N6. These days however, it's a highly engaging old market town, with a reputation for its gastronomy. Every year the town waits hungrily for its Charollais festival on the third weekend of August – a super-gourmet festival featuring mountains of meat and other local produce, and there's a festival of produce from the Morvan on the Ascension Day weekend. Saulieu is also a good springboard for the cycling, hiking and riding possibilities of the Parc du Morvan (see p.586).

The old town – on the west side of the N6 – is pretty enough and perfect for an after-dinner stroll. Its main sight is the twelfth-century Basilique St-Andoche, noted for its lovely capitals (probably carved by a disciple of Gislebertus, the master sculptor of Autun), but little else. Next door, the Musée François-Pompon (Mon 10.30–noon, Wed–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm, Sun 10.30am–noon & 2.30–5pm; closed Jan & Feb; €4) is surprisingly interesting, with good local folklore displays and a large collection of the works of the local nineteenth-century animal sculptor, François Pompon.

The tourist office (mid-June to mid-Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–7pm, Sun 9am–12.30pm & 2–5pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–5/6pm; ☎03.80.64.00.21, 🌐www.saulieu.fr) is on the N6 near the hospital. The gare SNCF is straight up avenue de la Gare opposite the marketplace/car park.

You may want to stay the night if you've been tempted by the menus and wine lists at some of the restaurants (Saulieu makes for an excellent stopping point, halfway between Paris and Lyon). A good nine or ten hotel-restaurants are ranged along the N6, which zooms past the old town walls; luckily, most have very quiet rooms facing peaceful gardens at the back. Amongst the best is La Borne Imperiale, 14–16 rue d'Argentine (☎03.80.64.19.76, 🌐www.borne-imperiale.com; 🍷; restaurant from €18, closed Wed evening & Thurs). Run by a charming couple, it has a fantastic atmosphere, a great restaurant with an attractive terrace and rooms with garden views. A few minutes walk away on rue Courtépée, Le Bourgogne (☎03.80.64.08.41, 📧hotelbourgog@orange.fr; 🍷; restaurant from €15, closed Sun) has a warm, old-fashioned feel and some rooms overlooking a vine-covered courtyard. Should your trust fund mature while in Saulieu, head for 2 rue d'Argentine and Le Relais Bernard Loiseau (☎03.80.90.53.53, 🌐www.bernard-loiseau.com; 🍷), which also bears the sign of its former name: La Côte d'Or. This hotel-restaurant-spa was created by the famed chef Bernard Loiseau (and made even more famous after his suicide in 2003 following a long bout with depression). It is an enchanting, elegant, beyond-luxurious place of rich woods, stone arches and plush furnishings which exudes wealth. Unfortunately it'll also drain yours; menus start at €145, rooms at €150 and suites go up to €470. Alternatively, there are also a couple of gîtes d'étape (Easter–Nov) and a campsite (☎03.80.64.16.19, 📍camping.saulieu@orange.fr; April–Sept), 1km out along the Paris road.

The Parc du Morvan

Carpeted with forest and etched by cascading streams, the Parc Régional du Morvan was only officially designated in 1970, when 170,000 hectares of hilly countryside were set aside in an attempt to protect the local cultural and physical environment with a series of nature trails, animal reserves, museums and local craft shops. The Maison du Parc, its official information centre (April to early Nov Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–5pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–5.30pm; early Nov to March Mon–Fri 9.30am–12.30pm; ☎03.86.78.79.57, 🌐www.parcdu morvan.org), is located 13km from Saulieu in beautiful grounds about a kilometre outside ST-BRISSON on the D6. There's no public transport to get you there, but if you're walking or cycling it's a good place to head for, as they have all available information on routes and facilities in the park. There's also a small museum (April to mid-Nov daily 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; €4; ☎03.86.78.72.99), devoted to the region's World War II Resistance movement, which was particularly active in this hard-to-patrol forested backwater. The museum closes on odd Tuesdays, so if you're making a special detour, call to check it'll be open.

A map, Saulieu Vêlo Tout-Terrain en Morvan, marks cycling and walking routes. For walkers the most challenging trip is the three-to four-day hike along the GR13 footpath, crossing the park from Vézelay to Mont Beuvray and taking in the major lakes, which are among the park's most developed attractions. There are also hosts of less strenuous possibilities (ask at any of the local tourist offices for suggestions) including the four-kilometre walk from Saulieu to Lac Chambois. Riding is a fairly popular way of seeing the park, and numerous gîtes d'étape offer pony-trekking facilities – again tourist offices can advise.

Every other village in the park seems to have its own campsite (most of which are open from April or May to Sept), and the larger ones often have a couple of simple hotels as well. There are several campsites and small, beach-resortish hotels round the large, wooded Lac des Settons, which basks at the heart of the park and makes for a good break from more strenuous activities with its watersports, café-restaurants and small beach areas. The plain, modern village of MONTSAUCHE, 4km to the northwest of the lake, is a good bet for provisions, including camping gas, and has a municipal campsite; MOUX, a similar distance to the southeast, can provide the same facilities, and also has a couple of decent hotels. Bikes are available from most campsites in the area: for a complete list ask at any tourist office, or check online for VTT (mountain bikes) at 🌐www.morvan.com.

Château-Chinon

The most substantial community in the park – approximately 2500 residents – and accessible by bus from Autun, is the rather ugly village of CHÂTEAU-CHINON. It nestles though in contrastingly beautiful countryside dotted with evergreens, lakes and limestone deposits. President Mitterrand was mayor here from 1959 to 1981, and the town was the home base of his political life for half a century. Thanks largely to him, it now boasts a major hosiery factory and military printing works, both of which have provided much needed employment to an isolated and often forgotten region.

Atop the town in the Musée du Septennat (July & Aug daily 10am–1pm & 2–7pm; Sept–June Wed–Mon 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €4), you can see the extraordinary variety of gifts Mitterrand received as head of state: carpets from the Middle East, ivory from Togo, Japanese puppets, beaded spears from Burundi and the bizarre table decorated with butterfly wings. Another of the town's attractions is the Musée du Costume, 4 rue du Château (April–June & Sept Wed–Mon 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; July & Aug 10am–1pm & 2–7pm; €4), featuring a collection of over five thousand articles, the biggest in France.

Mitterrand's preferred hotel was the Au Vieux Morvan (☎03.86.85.05.01, 🌐www.auvieuxmorvan.com; 📍; closed mid-Dec to Jan), just past the main drag at 8 place Gudin, with a nice restaurant (from €18). Cheaper is the cosy and comfortable Lion d'Or (☎03.86.85.13.56, ☎03.86.79.42.22; 📍; restaurant from €12, closed Sun evening & Mon) at 10 rue des Fossés; be sure to ask for one of the rooms with views to the hillside surrounding Château-Chinon. There's also a campsite here, Le Perthuy d'Oiseau (☎03.86.85.08.17; May–Sept).

Autun

With its Gothic spire rising against a backdrop of Morvan hills, AUTUN, even today, is scarcely bigger than the circumference of its medieval walls, which in turn follow the line of earlier Roman fortifications. The emperor Augustus founded the town in about 10 BC as part of a massive and, in the long term, highly successful campaign to pacify and Romanize the brooding Celts of defeated Vercingétorix. Augustodunum, as it was called, was designed to eclipse by its splendour the memory of Bibracte (see p.590), the neighbouring capital of the powerful tribe of the Aedui. And it did indeed become one of the leading cities of Roman Gaul.

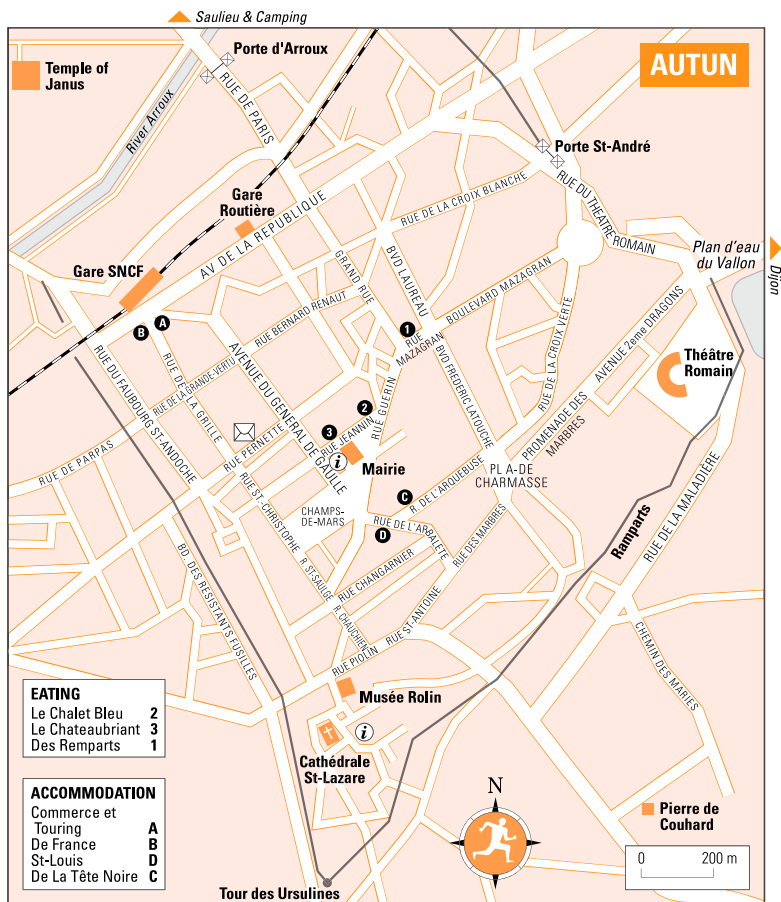

The Town

This city's Roman past is still present – and very tangible. Two of its four Roman gates survive: Porte St-André, spanning rue de la Croix-Blanche in the north-east, and Porte d'Arroux in Faubourg d'Arroux in the northwest. In a field just across the River Arroux stands a lofty section of wall known as the Temple of Janus, which was probably part of the sanctuary of a Gallic deity, while on the east side of the town, on avenue du 2ème-Dragon just off the Dijon road, you can see the remains of what was the largest Roman theatre in Gaul, with a capacity of fifteen thousand – in itself a measure of Autun's importance at that time. It's not a totally evocative site – the remaining seats now overlook a football pitch – but in July and August its authenticity is enhanced by the performances of a play in which six hundred locals, dressed in period costume, reconstruct the Gallo-Roman past of the town. An artificial lake below the football pitch, the Plan d'eau du Vallon, provides the usual watersports.

The most enigmatic of the Gallo-Roman remains in the region is the Pierre de Couhard, off Faubourg St-Panrace to the southeast of the town. It's a 27-metre-tall stone pyramid situated on the site of one of the city's necropolises, thought to date from the first century, and most probably either a tomb or a cenotaph.

The Cathédrale St-Lazare and around

Autun's great twelfth-century Cathédrale St-Lazare was built nearly a thousand years after the Romans had gone and stands in the highest and best-fortified corner of the town. Its greatest claim to artistic fame lies in its sculptures, the work of Gislebertus, generally accepted as one of the greatest Romanesque sculptors.

The tympanum of the Last Judgement above the west door bears his signature – Gislebertus hoc fecit (“Gislebertus made this”) – beneath the feet of Christ. To his left are depicted the Virgin Mary, the saints and the apostles, with the saved rejoicing below them; to the right the Archangel Michael disputes souls with Satan, who tries to cheat by leaning on the scales, while the damned despair beneath. During the eighteenth century the local clergy decided the tympanum was an inferior work and plastered it over, saving it from almost certain destruction during the Revolution. The head of Christ, however, had been hacked off, and was only rediscovered – hiding anonymously in the collection of the Musée Rolin – in 1948.

The interior of the cathedral, whose pilasters and arcading were modelled on the Roman architecture of the city’s gates, was also decorated by Gislebertus, who carved most of the capitals himself. Conveniently for anyone wanting a close look, some of the finest are now exhibited in the old chapter library, up the stairs on the right of the choir, among them a beautiful Flight into Egypt and Adoration of the Magi.

Just outside the cathedral on rue des Bancs, the Musée Rolin (April–Sept Wed–Mon 9.30am–noon & 1.30–6pm, Oct–March Wed–Mon 10am–noon & 2.30–5pm; €3) occupies a Renaissance hôtel built by Nicolas Rolin, chancellor of Philippe le Bon. In addition to interesting Gallo-Roman pieces, the star attractions are Gislebertus's representation of Eve as an unashamedly sensual nude, and the Maître de Moulins' brilliantly coloured Nativity.

Practicalities

Whether you arrive at the gare SNCF or gare routière down the road, you'll find yourself on avenue de la République, which in turn leads to the wide square of the Champs-de-Mars and into the old town. The main tourist office is at 2 av de Charles-de-Gaulle (June to mid-Oct 9am–7pm; mid-Oct to May 9am–noon & 2–7pm; ☎03.85.86.80.38, 🌐www.autun-tourisme.com), with an information point opposite the cathedral, at place du Terreau (June to mid-Oct 9am–7pm; ☎03.85.52.56.03). Bikes can be rented at the campsite, below, and at the Plan d'eau du Vallon (☎03.85.86.95.80).

There's a good choice of accommodation in Autun. The inexpensive options are all on the main road opposite the station: the Hôtel de France (☎03.85.52.14.00, ☎03.85.86.14.52; ①–③), 18 av de la République, is solid and traditional, and the Commerce et Touring (☎03.85.52.17.90, ☎03.85.52.37.63; ②; closed Jan; reasonable restaurant from €11), 20 av de la République, is also perfectly decent. For something a bit more quiet and classy, try one of the old coaching inns just off the Champs-de-Mars. Napoleon twice slept at the now slightly faded but once magnificent St-Louis (☎03.85.52.01.01, 🌐www.hotelsaintlouis.net; ④), 6 rue de l'Arbalète. He obviously knew how to travel in style – he had his own suite installed (now a mini-museum) before he arrived; these days a suite will cost you up to €300. The comfortable but bland Hôtel de La Tête Noire is opposite at 3 rue de l'Arquebuse (☎03.85.86.59.99, 🌐www.hoteltetenoire.fr; ④; restaurant from €22). There's also a campsite just across the river on the road to Saulieu, Camping Pont d'Arroux (☎03.85.52.10.82, 🌐www.camping-autun.com; closed Oct–Easter).

As well as the hotel restaurants, there are a couple of brasseries on the Champs-de-Mars, but the best options are in the street behind the Hôtel de Ville: Le Chalet Bleu, 3 rue Jeannin (☎03.85.86.27.30; menus €16–48; closed Mon evening, Tues & most of Feb) is innovative and distinctly stylish, while Le Chateaubriant, 14 rue Jeannin (☎03.85.52.21.58; menu from €14; closed Sun evening, Mon & most of July) offers a more traditional menu. Slightly north of the centre, at 17 rue Mazagran, is the Restaurant des Remparts (☎03.85.52.54.02; menu €15.50–36; closed Mon): the kind of place where everyone seems to know everyone else – there's much kissing of cheeks, and the food is good too.

Mont-Beuvray and Bibracte

The base for the climb up Mont-Beuvray to the 2000-year-old site of the Gallic capital of Bibracte is ST-LÉGER-SOUS-BEUVRAY, about 26km southwest of Autun and reached along the N81 and D61 through typical Morvan countryside of wooded hills and scattered farms, coarse marshy pastures and brown streams. There's a morning and an afternoon bus from Autun to St-Léger. If you want to stay the Hôtel-Restaurant du Morvan (☎03.85.82.51.06, 🌐www.hoteldumorvan71.com; ②), at place de la Marie, has old-fashioned but decent rooms, and serves local food menus at €16–22.

From St-Léger, it's the best part of a two-hour walk, or 8km by road, to the ancient site of BIBRACTE on top of the hill, at an altitude of 800m. If you want to recapture a pre-Roman mood, it's worth doing it on foot along the path winding up through woods of conifer and beech. The settlement of Bibracte, the lines of which you can still follow through the trees, was inhabited from 5000 BC. In 52 BC it was the scene of an assembly of all the Gallic tribes, which resulted in the election of Vercingétorix as their commander-in-chief, in one last desperate attempt to fight off Roman imperialism. Although it is two millennia since Bibracte was abandoned – probably on Roman orders – memories of its significance were preserved in the folk tales of the Morvan and a fair was held on the summit every May until the beginning of World War I. Close to the fortified earthwork that surrounds the site, great ceremonial stones like the Pierre de la Vivre are still standing. The Bibracte Musée de la Civilisation Celtique (mid-March to mid-Nov 10am–6pm, until 7pm in July & Aug; €5.75 museum entry, €9.50 with guided tour of the archeological site; ☎03.85.86.52.35 for bookings) is a fascinating state-of-the-art museum displaying the many Celtic coins, jugs, platters and pieces of statues unearthed from the neighbouring site – and a café, intriguingly, serving “Gaulish cuisine”.

Le Creusot

LE CREUSOT (not to be confused with Le Creuset, the northern French town of cast-iron cookware fame) means one thing to French ears: the Schneider iron and steelworks, maker of the first French locomotive in 1838, the first steamship in 1839, the 75mm field gun – mainstay of World War I artillery – and the ironwork of the Pont Alexandre-III and the Gare d'Austerlitz in Paris. The last Schneider died in 1960, whereupon the company was broken up, and a number of different firms now carry on the tradition: Creusot-Loire manufactures specialized steels for the French military and nuclear industry, while Alstom manufactures parts of the TGV.

The town's main attraction is the Écomusée le Creusot-Montceau in the Château de la Verrerie on place Schneider (June to mid-Sept Mon–Fri 10am–noon & 1–6pm, Sat & Sun 2.30–7pm; mid-Sept to May Mon–Fri 11am–12.30pm & 3–6pm, Sat & Sun 2.30–6pm; €6). Built as a glassworks in 1786–87 – Louis XVI was a shareholder before losing his head – the château was sold to the Schneider family in 1838 and transformed into their private home and the administrative centre of their business empire. The Schneiders were paternalistic but despotic employers, providing housing, schools and health care for their workers, but expecting “gratitude and obedience” in return.

Today, the château houses a museum dedicated to the iron and steel industry, with paintings of various Schneiders, mock-ups of workers' quarters, and giant model trains. The peculiar cone-shaped constructions in the courtyard of the château were glass furnaces; one of them was transformed into a tiny Neoclassical theatre where plays were put on to entertain the Schneiders' wealthy and influential guests, and can be visited on regular tours.

A more recent development in town is the huge Parc Touristique des Combes, which boasts a narrow-gauge steam train (April–Oct 11am–7pm; Nov–March 2–7pm; €6), a karting track, a 435-metre-long dry luge piste (April–Oct; €2.50) and an unusual panorama. From the top of the Combe des Mineurs the view takes in the modern steelworks, the gleaming white Château de la Verrerie and the terraces of old workers' houses, all set against the northeastern bulwark of the Massif Central.

Practicalities

The tourist office, in the gatehouse of the Château de la Verrerie (Mon–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, Sat & Sun 2–6.30pm; ☎ 03.85.55.02.46, 🌐 www.creusot.net), can provide information about a mining museum in nearby Blanzay, and can direct you to tours of the modern ironworks. Frequent buses connect Le Creusot town with its TGV station 6km away in Montchanin, in turn connecting with Paris. If you need to stay overnight, head for La Belle Époque (☎ 03.85.73.00.00, ☎ 03.85.73.00.10; 🍷), 9 place Schneider, featuring a decent restaurant and rooms decked out in peach, orange and blue pastel. Or if on a budget, try Le Bodsonn (☎ 03.85.55.03.34, ☎ 03.85.55.63.96; 🍷), 26 rue de l'Yser, above a café-bar a bit out of the centre but with comfy rooms. On the more expensive side the curiously characterless Le Petite Verrerie, 4 rue Jules Guesde (☎ 03.85.73.97.97, 🌐 www.hotelfp-lecreusot.com; 🍷), has modern decor, a stylish restaurant and courtyard dining (menus €23).

Nevers

Some sixty kilometres west of the Parc du Morvan, at the western confines of Burgundy, NEVERS is a small provincial city on the confluence of the rivers Loire and Nièvre. In France it's known for its nougatine sweets and fine porcelain, hand-painted with a deep blue colour known as bleue de Nevers. Faïence, as it's called, has been a hallmark of Nevers since the seventeenth century and is now something of a growth industry, with six small artisans' workshops in town, all of which sell their wares in elegant, expensive shops called faïenceries. Parts of the old town date back to the twelfth century and make for a relaxed stroll away from the busier centre. Best viewed from the bridge over the Loire, the town is not necessarily a destination in itself, but with its open-air summer concert programme and some lively bars and restaurants it makes a pleasant stopover.

The Town

Nevers centres on place Carnot, close to the fifteenth-century Palais Ducal, former home of the dukes of Nevers, with octagonal turrets and an elegant central tower. Nearby, opposite the Hôtel de Ville, the stunning Cathédrale de St-Cyr, with its wonderful display of jutting gargoyles, reveals a sort of wall display of French architectural styles from the tenth to the sixteenth centuries; it even manages to have two opposite apses, one Gothic, the other Romanesque. Even more interesting and aesthetically satisfying is the late eleventh-century church of St-Étienne, on the east side of the town centre. Behind its plain exterior lies one of the prototype pilgrim churches, with galleries above the aisles, ambulatory and three radiating chapels around the apse.

On the north side of Parc Roger-Salengro is the convent of St-Gildard, where Bernadette of Lourdes ended her days. A steady flow of pilgrims come to visit her tiny, embalmed body, displayed in a glass-fronted shrine (daily 7am–noon & 1.30–7pm) in the convent chapel. Next door a small but very engaging, free museum displays some of her belongings and correspondence.

By place Mossé and the bridge over the Loire, there's a section of the old town walls and the eleventh-century Tour Goguin. The Porte de Croux is nearby; a cream stone tower with intact machicolations and a steep tiled roof. The archeology museum inside is due to reopen in 2007 but until then, some of the main pieces can be viewed in the basement of the Palais Ducal. Nearby, rue du 14-Juillet has a number of faïencerie shops where you can see the pieces being painted by hand.

To the north of the ducal palace on the way out of town towards Orléans, Porte de Paris, a triumphal arch, straddles rue des Ardilliers. It commemorates one of Europe's major conflicts, the battle of Fontenoy, fought out between Charlemagne's sons in 841 AD. The stakes were Charlemagne's empire, and the outcome the division of his lands east and west of the Rhine, which formed the basis of modern France and Germany.

Practicalities

The gare SNCF and gare routière are on rue du Chemin-de-Fer. The tourist office, in the foyer of the Palais Ducal (Mon–Sat 9am–6.30pm, Sun 10am–6pm; Nov & Feb closed Sun; ☎03.86.68.46.00, 🌐www.nevers-tourisme.com), provides maps and information on the summer music festival, and can help arrange trips on the Loire. Bike and canoe rental is available from Eaux Mêlées Randonnées (☎03.86.57.69.76). Internet access can be found at the Forum shopping centre on rue Nievre.

There aren't many hotels in the old centre, but the Hôtel de Cleves, 8 rue St Didier (☎03.86.61.15.87, ☎03.86.57.13.80; 📍) is comfortable and well located just off place Carnot. Here the welcome is slightly eccentric but very warm; the owners have both perfected a vigorous handshake, and delight in speaking English. The likeable Beauséjour, 5 rue St-Gildard (☎03.86.61.20.84, 🌐www.hotel-beausejour-nevers.com; 📍), is almost opposite the church of Ste-Bernadette and has small rooms and a tiny outdoor garden for breakfast. The one star Hôtel Thermidor (☎03.86.57.15.47, 📧hotel.thermidor@9business.fr; 📍), is within a few minutes of the train station: turn left then almost immediately right down the narrow side street rue Claude-Tillier (number 14). The municipal campsite (☎06.84.98.69.79, 🌐www.campingnevers.com; mid-March to mid-Oct) is just across the Pont de Loire, beside the river at rue de la Jonction.

Avenue de-Gaulle has a few inexpensive restaurants and cafés, such as La Mange'oir, 24 av de-Gaulle (☎03.86.57.28.61; lunch menu €11.50, dinner €22; closed Sat & Sun lunch, & all day Mon), and some more upmarket places too, such as Gambrinus, 37 av de-Gaulle (☎03.86.57.19.48; closed Mon & Sat lunch, & all day Sun; menu from €21), and the excellent Aux Chœurs de Bacchus, 25 av de-Gaulle (☎03.86.36.72.70; closed Mon & Sat lunch, & all day Sun), which has a good menu at €15.10 and a wine-tasting version at €22.30. Le Goemon, 9 rue du 14-Juillet (closed Sun & Mon eve), is a wonderful, atmospheric crêperie with high-quality salads, and live jazz on Saturday nights. Donald's Pub, on rue François Mitterand near the river, is a good place for a drink.

Dijon and southern Burgundy

If the much-touted image of “rural Burgundy” has conjured up an image of slightly ramshackle rustic charm in your mind, you'll have to do some adjusting when you encounter the slick prosperity of Dijon and the wine-producing country to the south, known as the Côte d'Or. It may look peacefully pastoral, but there's nothing medieval about the methods or the profits made in today's wine business. For any trace of the older traditions you have to head into the southwestern corner of the region, into the wine-producing regions of the Mâconnais and Beaujolais, and the cattle country of the Charollais.

Dijon

DIJON owes its origins to its strategic position in Celtic times on the tin merchants' route from Britain up the Seine and across the Alps to the Adriatic. It became the capital of the dukes of Burgundy around 1000 AD, but its golden age occurred in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries under the auspices of dukes Philippe le Hardi (the Bold), who as a boy had fought the English at Poitiers and been taken prisoner, Jean sans Peur (the Fearless), Philippe le Bon (the Good), who sold Joan of Arc to the English, and Charles le Téméraire (also the Bold). They used their tremendous wealth and power – especially their control of Flanders, the dominant manufacturing region of the age – to make Dijon one of the greatest centres of art, learning and science in Europe. It lost its capital status on incorporation into the kingdom of France in 1477, but has remained one of the country's pre-eminent provincial cities, especially since the rail and industrial booms of the mid-nineteenth century. Today, it's smart, modern and young, especially when the students are around.

Arrival, information and accommodation

Dijon is not an enormous city and the part you'll want to see is neatly confined to the eminently walkable centre. Whether you arrive by road or rail from either Paris and the north or Lyon and the south, you find yourself almost inevitably at the gare SNCF – the gare routière is next door.

From the stations a five-minute walk down avenue Maréchal-Foch takes you to place Darcy, and the tourist office (daily: May to mid-Oct 9am–7pm; mid-Oct to April 10am–6pm; ☎ 08.92.70.05.58, 🌐 www.dijon-tourism.com). There's also a smaller office at 34 rue des Forges (Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm). Both offer services such as hotel booking, money changing and guided tours of the city. They also sell the “Dijon card” which allows access to all the museums listed below, and includes free guided tours and public transport; you can buy it in 24-hour (€10), 48-hour (€15) or 72-hour (€20) versions.

Dijon has no shortage of reasonably priced hotels in the centre of town, but it's worth booking at least a week in advance if you plan to stay in the busy months of May, June, September and October. The city's hostel is inconveniently located on the northeast side of the city.

Hotels

Le Chambellan 92 rue Vannerie

☎ 03.80.67.12.67, 📧 hotelchambellan@aol.com.

Charming, old-fashioned hotel with friendly owners just east of the ducal palace. 2

 Hostellerie du Sauvage 64 rue Monge

☎ 03.80.41.31.21, 📧 hoteldusauvage@free.

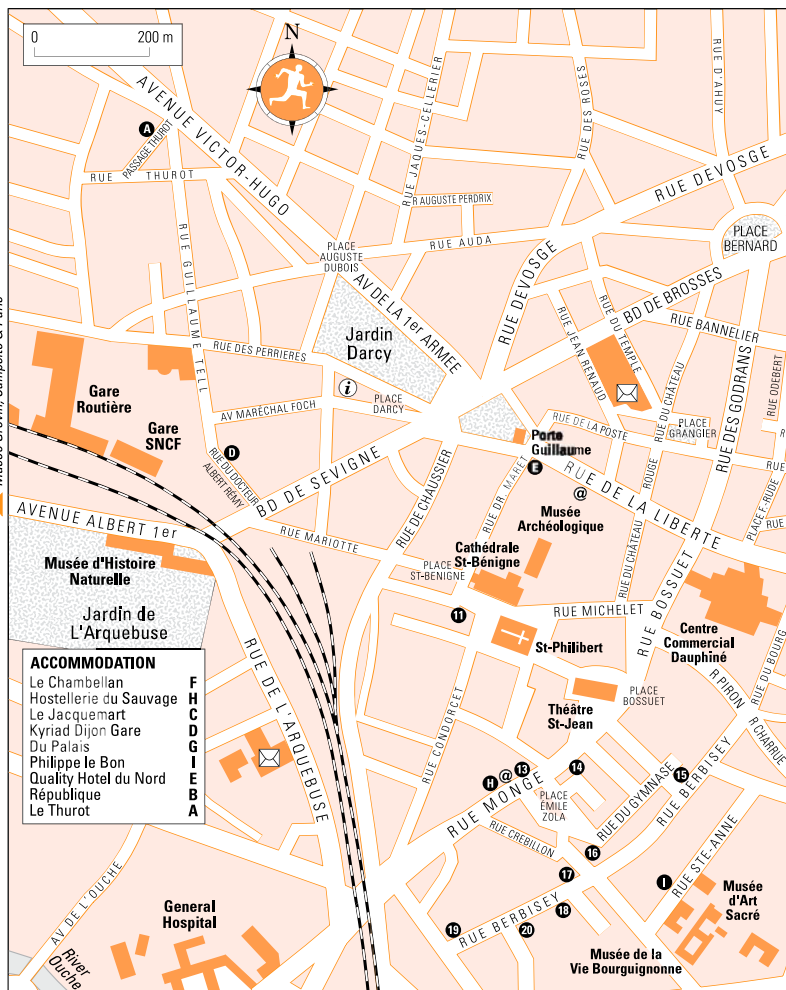

fr. Delightful and atmospheric, this former coaching inn has some rooms overlooking a vine-draped courtyard. There's also fine al fresco dining in its open-grill restaurant. Quiet, despite being in the liveliest quarter of town. Paid garage access. 3

Le Jacquemart 32 rue Verrerie

☎ 03.80.60.09.60, 🌐 www.hotel-lejacquemart.fr.

Elegant, high-ceilinged rooms, full of comfortable antique-style furniture. Close to the dukes' palace and cathedral, it offers rooms with or without bathrooms. 2–4

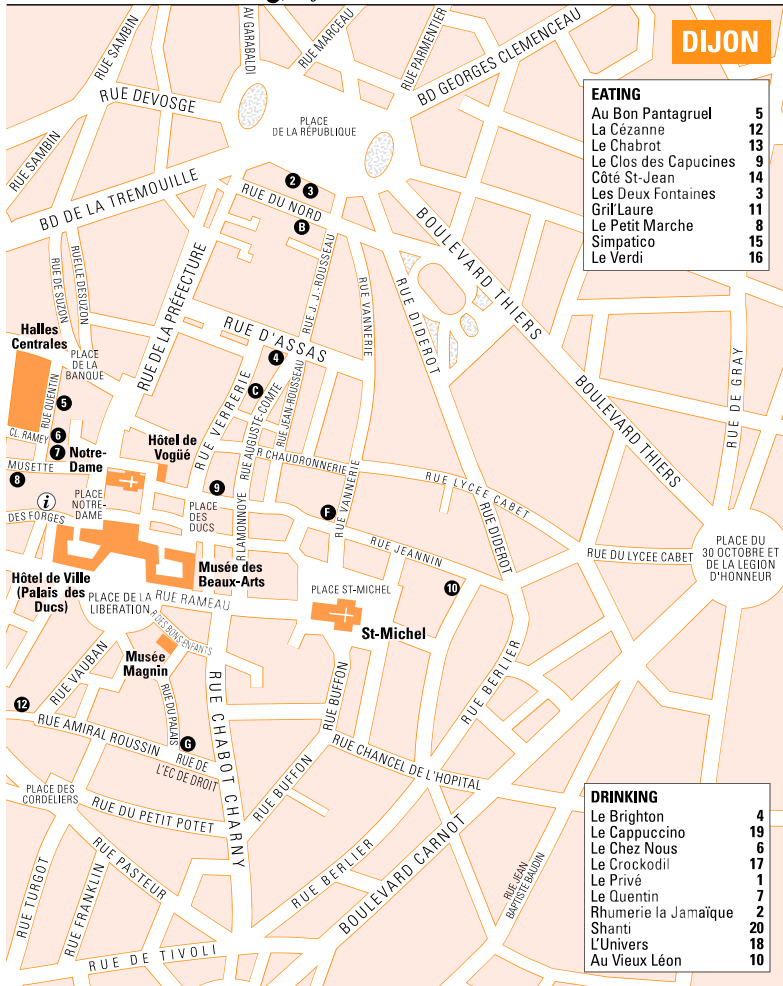

Kyriad Dijon Gare 7 rue Albert Remy
 ☎ 03.80.53.10.10, 🌐 www.kyriaddijon.com. Swish, stylish and carefully modernized by the huge Kyriad group but the bedrooms still feel like a chain hotel. Gorgeous indoor pool and sauna, wi-fi, garage and all the mod cons. Handy but unappealing location across the street from the train station, they have a sister hotel round the corner. 4

Quality Hotel du Nord place Darcy
 ☎ 03.80.50.80.50, 🌐 www.hotel-nord.fr. Housed in a lovely old building, this is one of Dijon's more upscale places, but has modern, slightly anonymous bedrooms. Central with a decent restaurant downstairs. 6

Du Palais 23 rue du Palais ☎ 03.80.67.16.26, 📧 hoteldupalais-dijon@orange.fr. Comfortable, high-ceilinged rooms have been carved out of this pleasant eighteenth-century townhouse, which stands on a quiet corner just south of the ducal palace. Friendly, polyglot owner. 8

Philippe le Bon 18 rue Sainte Anne ☎ 03.80.30.73.52, 🌐 www.hotelphilippebon.com. A grand, elegant old building set in an agreeable garden next to the Musée da la vie Bourguignonne and just outside of the city's hustle and bustle. The most expensive rooms are stunning; full of character and beautifully

DIJON

EATING
Au Bon Pantagruel	5
La Cézanne	12
Le Chabrot	13
Le Clos des Capucines	9
Côte St-Jean	14
Les Deux Fontaines	3
GriffLaure	11
Le Petit Marche	8
Simpatico	15
Le Verdi	16

7

BURGUNDY

Dijon

Beaune, Belfort & Dole

DRINKING
Le Brighton	4
Le Cappuccino	19
Le Chez Nous	6
Le Crocodil	17
Le Privé	1
Le Quentin	7
Rhumerie la Jamaïque	2
Shanti	20
L'Univers	18
Au Vieux Léon	10

restored, the others are plush but a little bland in comparison. 3-9

République 3 rue du Nord ☎03.80.73.36.76, ☎03.80.72.46.04. A pleasant hotel near place de la République with a skylit foyer, friendly staff and clean rooms. On a quiet side street. 4

Le Thurot 4-6 passage Thurot ☎03.80.43.57.46, ☎www.hotel-thurot.com. Calm, simple and modern hotel ten minutes' walk from the train station. Convenient car park. 8

Hostel and campsite

Camping du Lac Kir 3 bd Chanoine Kir, ☎03.80.43.54.72, ☎www.camping-dijon.com.

Appealing and popular site with a wealth of activities. Its about 1km out of town near Lake Kir: follow the signs for Paris, or take bus #3 from the train station, direction "Fontaine d'Ouche".

Centre de Rencontres Internationales 1 bd Champollion ☎03.80.72.95.20, ☎www.cri-dijon.com. An HI hostel in a modern complex 2km from the centre, with well-kept dorm rooms, a self-service canteen and sports facilities next door. Often teaming with adolescent school groups. Take bus #4, direction "Épirey", from rue des Godrans. The last bus back is at 9pm.

The City

The rue de la Liberté forms the spine of the town, running east from the wide, attractive place Darcy and the eighteenth-century triumphal arch of Porte Guillaume – once a city gate – past the palace of the dukes of Burgundy on the semicircular place de la Libération. From this elegant, Classical square, rue Rameau continues directly east to place du Théâtre, from where rue Vaillant leads on to the church of St Michel. Pedestrianized and lined with smart shops, mammoth department stores and elegant old houses, most places of interest are within ten minutes' walk to the north or south of this main axis.

The Palais des Ducs

The geographical focus of a visit to Dijon is inevitably the seat of its former rulers, the Palais des Ducs, which stands at the hub of the city. Facing the main courtyard, Mansart's serene place de la Libération was built towards the end of the seventeenth century (as place Royale) to show off a statue of the Sun King; these days it's something of a sun trap on a good day, and a decision to close it to traffic has stimulated a boom in café trade. The exterior of the palace has undergone so many alterations that the dukes themselves would only recognize it by the two surviving towers. The fourteenth-century Tour de Bar dominates the courtyard in front of the east wing, which now houses the Musée des Beaux-Arts, while the loftier, fifteenth-century Tour Philippe-le-Bon can be visited only on guided tours (April–Nov 11 tours daily, Dec–March Wed 3 tours at 1.30pm, 2.30pm & 3.30pm Sat & Sun 6 tours daily; €2.30). The view from the top is particularly worthwhile for the unobstructed views of the glazed Burgundian tiles of the Hôtel de Vogüé and the cathedral; on a clear day the Alps loom on the horizon.

Given the dukes' possessions in the Netherlands, it's hardly surprising that the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues: May–Oct 9.30am–6pm; Nov–April, free) boasts a Flemish collection. Amongst the highlights is the Nativity by the so-called Master of Flémalle, a shadowy figure who may have been the teacher of Rogier van der Weyden and who ranks with van Eyck as one of the first artists to break from the chilly stranglehold of International Gothic. There's also a room devoted to the intricate woodcarving of the sixteenth-century designer and architect Hugues Sambin, whose work appears throughout the old quarter of the city in the massive doors and facades of the aristocratic hôtels.

Visiting the museum also provides the opportunity to see the surviving portions of the original ducal palace, including the vast kitchen and the magnificent Salle des Gardes, richly appointed with panelling, tapestries and a minstrels' gallery. Here are displayed the lavish, almost decadent tombs from the Chartreuse de Champmol of Philippe le Hardi and Jean sans Peur and his wife, Marguerite de Bavière, with their startling, painted effigies of the dead, surrounded by gold-plated angels.

The Quartier Notre-Dame

Architecturally more interesting than the palace, and much more suggestive of the city's former glories, are the lavish townhouses of its rich burghers. These abound in the streets behind the palace: rue Verrerie, rue Vannerie, rue des Forges, rue Chaudronnière (look out for no. 28, Maison des Cariatides). Some are half-timbered, with storeys projecting over the street, others are in more formal and imposing Renaissance stone. Particularly fine are the Renaissance Hôtel de Vogüé, 12 rue de la Chouette, and at no. 34, the Hôtel

Chambellan (1490), housing one of Dijon's tourist offices. For a glimpse of what must be nearly genuine medieval character, take a walk in the cobbled alleys by the Tour St-Nicholas, off rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau.

Also in this quarter behind the dukes' palace, in the angle between rue de la Chouette and rue de la Préfecture, is the church of Notre-Dame, built in the early thirteenth century in the Burgundian Gothic style. In the south transept there is a ninth-century wooden “black” Virgin, one of the oldest in France. Known as “Our Lady of Good Hope”, she receives prayers for health and happiness written into the open book on a lectern in front of the altar. Outside on rue de la Chouette, in the north wall of the church, is a small sculpted owl – chouette – polished by the hands of passers-by who for centuries have touched it for luck and which gives the street its name.

From here rue de la Musette leads west, passing just south of the market square and the covered halles. The whole area is full of sumptuous displays of food and attractive cafés and restaurants, and is often thronged with people. Opening at 6am, the market operates on Tuesday and Friday mornings, and all day on Saturday; it spills over into the surrounding streets, with bric-a-brac in rue de Soissons on the north side and clothes in the beautiful little place François-Rude, named after the sculptor, and a favourite hangout, with its cafés and fountain graced by the bronze figure of a grape harvester.

South of the place de la Libération

On the south side of the place Darcy–church of St-Michel axis, and especially in the quartier behind place de la Libération, there’s a concentration of magnificent hôtels from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. These were built for the most part by men who had bought themselves offices and privileges with the Parliament of Burgundy, established by Louis XI in 1477 after the death of Duke Charles le Téméraire (the Bold) as a concession designed to win the compliance of this newly acquired frontier province. One of them, 4 rue des Bons-Enfants, houses the Musée Magnin (Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; €3.50), the building – a seventeenth-century hôtel particulier – complete with its original furnishings, is more interesting than the exhibition of paintings by good but lesser-known artists. Other noteworthy houses are to be found nearby in rue Vauban, some showing the marks of Hugues Sambin’s influence in their decorative details (lions’ heads, garlands of fruit, tendrils of ivy and his famous chou bourguignon, or “Burgundy cabbage”), notably, nos. 3, 12, 21 and 23.

Continuing south from Musée Magnin, rue Ste-Anne, near place des Cordeliers, contains two museums. The Musée de la Vie Bourguignonne at no. 17 (daily except Tues: May–Sept 9am–6pm; Oct–April 9am–noon & 2–6pm; free) is all about nineteenth-century Burgundian life, featuring costumes, furniture and domestic industries like butter-, cheese- and bread-making, along with a reconstructed kitchen. Practically next door at no. 15, the Musée d’Art Sacré (same hours Musée de la Vie Bourguignonne; free) contains an important collection of church treasures, including a seventeenth-century statue of St Paul, the first in the world to be restored using an extraordinary technique that involves injecting the stone with resin and then solidifying the resulting compound using gamma rays. Formerly crumbling to dust, the guinea-pig saint is now completely firm.

A little further to the west, the cathedral – the once great abbey church of St-Bénigne – is no longer of very great interest, although its garishly tiled roof and nineteenth-century spire dominate the skyline impressively enough. In a chestnut-shaded garden next to the cathedral, the Musée Archéologique, 5 rue Dr-Maret (Wed–Sun: mid-May to Sept 9am–6pm; Oct to mid-May 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; free), has some extremely interesting finds from the Gallo-Roman period, especially funerary bas-reliefs and a collection of ex votos from the source of the Seine, among them the little bronze of the goddess Sequana (Seine) upright in her bird-prowed boat. Also on show is Sluter's bust of Christ from the Chartreuse.

Eating, drinking and entertainment

Dijon has an inordinate number of pâtisseries, full of high-quality, tempting confectionery in which marzipan and fruit feature prominently. Some also promote the Dijon specialities: pain d'épices, a gingerbread made with honey and spices and eaten with butter or jam (from Mulot et Petitjean, 13 place Bossuet and other branches all over town), and cassissines – blackcurrant candies. Chocolate, best made on the premises, is another speciality – try Au Parrain Généreux, 21 rue du Bourg, southwest of the Palais. You can hardly forget that Dijon is also the high temple of mustard – there's the shop of leading producer Maille at 30 rue de la Liberté, selling a range from mild to cauterizing. To buy good but affordable wine: first and foremost, there's Nicot, 48 rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau, where you can taste, seek advice or take courses; alternatively, try La Cave du Clos, 3 rue Jeannin, or Nicolas, 6 rue François-Rude.

There are a large number of excellent restaurants in town. Lively rue Berbisey, rue Monge and place Émile Zola hold the most promise for both eating and drinking options. The nearby Théâtre du Parvis St-Jean (Mon–Fri 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.80.30.63.53), has innovative programmes of dance, theatre and performance art.

Restaurants

Au Bon Pantagruel place du Marché, 20 rue Quentin ☎03.80.30.68.69. A popular, lively bistro alongside the market, with a good range of regional specialities on a menu that changes with healthy frequency. Menus at €20, set lunch €11.50. Closed Sun.

La Cézanne 38 rue Amiral Roussin ☎03.80.58.91.92. One of a string of tiny restaurants whose tables are crammed into a narrow, atmospheric old street, with a Provençal-influenced menu (€17–46). Hugely popular. If that doesn't suit, then there's Italian, classic French and crêpes very close to hand. Closed Mon lunch, Sun & last two weeks of Aug.

Le Chabrot 36 rue Monge ☎03.80.30.69.61. Atmospheric, friendly restaurant with hundreds of wine bottles lining the walls. On the west side of place Émile-Zola it has a staunchly Burgundian menu at €21.50 and a more refined offering at €32. Doubles as a wine bar-cum-cellar; the superb wine list offers lots of help for amateurs. Closed second week in Aug.

Le Clos des Capucines 3 rue Jeannin, at the end of rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau ☎03.80.65.83.03. Housed in a beautiful medieval building, this restaurant serves very good traditional, rich Burgundy cuisine (jambon persillé, escargots, boeuf bourguignon) at very reasonable prices. Menus at €14–45. Closed Sun, Sat & first two weeks in August.

Côté St-Jean 13 rue Monge ☎03.80.50.11.77.

Elegant restaurant offering such delights as veal with chanterelle mushrooms and tarragon-scented chocolate cake. Menus €27.50–39, with good-value lunch menus: two courses for €12, three for €15.50. Closed Wed & Sat lunch, Tues & mid-July to mid-Aug.

Les Deux Fontaines 16 place de la République ☎03.80.60.86.45. A short walk from the centre, in the northeast corner of the old town, but worth it for the airy, garden-like atmosphere and fresh, Mediterranean-influenced daily specials (menu €14, plats €13–15).

Gril'Laure 8 place St-Bénigne ☎03.80.41.86.76. Popular with the business lunch crowd for its convenient cathedral-side location, and pizzas, pasta and grilled dishes hot out of the wood-fired oven. Menu at €18, plats €13.

Le Petit Marche 27 rue Musette ☎03.80.30.15.10. Serves home-made vegetarian and organic dishes. Reasonably priced with menus from €10 to €14. Closed Sun.

Simpatico 30 rue Berbisey ☎03.80.30.53.53. Excellent Italian restaurant with funky decor and an almost defiantly Italian wine list. Lunch menus at €11.40, dinners à la carte from around €20. Closed Sun, Mon & Aug.

Le Verdi 24 place Émile Zola ☎03.80.30.25.88. Wildly popular lunch menu (€10), and the outdoor seating on the square gets busy in the evening too. Menu includes grills, pizza, fish and good inexpensive escargots. Dinners in the €20–25 range. Closed Sun.

Cafés, bars and nightclubs

Dijon is an important university city as well as one of France's main conference centres, so nightspots and cultural centres at both ends of the range are worth exploring. Place Emile Zola and rue Berbisey are good places to start a night out. The English/Irish theme pubs are predictably popular, but there are plenty of alternatives. For information on bands and DJs, pick up a free Mag de la Nuit (📧 www.magdelanuit.net) at the tourist office or various establishments around the city.

Le Brighton 33 rue Auguste-Comte. English pub with 200 different kinds of beer, and dancing. Daily till around 3am or later.

Le Cappuccino 132 rue Berbisey. Speciality beers in a youthful, slightly bohemian bar. Daily till around 1.30am.

Le Chez Nous just behind rue Quentin. Tucked down a tiny alleyway just off rue Quentin, an authentic community bar with a proudly alternative ethos and a genuine atmosphere. Strip lighting, mismatched old tables, exhibitions and impromptu performances. Opening times and days vary, but usually daily till around 1am.

Le Crockodil 88 rue Berbisey. Pub-cum-café characterized by distressed chic. A good place for an afternoon coffee leading into an early evening drink. Mon–Sat till 2am.

Le Privé av Garibaldi. Large, traditional disco and pick-up joint, just off place de la République. Two rooms: one mainstream Euro-house, the other more retro. Wed–Sat till 5am.

Le Quentin rue Quentin. Relaxed café-bar on the southeast corner of the market square that's popular for its cheap bottles of wine, drunk early evening as an aperitif mixed with sirap de violettes – or any of a host of other sirap flavours.

Rhumerie la Jamaïque 14 place de la République. Popular with a trendy late-twenties/early-thirties crowd for its pricey cocktails and rock-opera decor; they have live bands on the weekend playing Caribbean music. Daily except Sun 3pm–3am. For something more Latin-based, traverse the square to Salsapelpa on rue Marceau, open daily until 2am.

Shanti 69 rue Berbisey. Great little hookah joint, decked out with divans in transcendental South Asian decor, serving delicious teas and flavoured sheesha (€7 for a tobacco pipe). Open until 2am.

L'Univers 47 rue Berbisey. Trendy and dark, this popular pub-bar has frequent blues, jazz and rock concerts in the cellar. Open till midnight and later.

Au Vieux Léon 52 rue Jeannin. Tiny, noisy, friendly little bar that's positively jumping with students. Decorated like an old-fashioned French café on acid.

Listings

Cinemas L'Eldorado, 21 rue Alfred-de-Musset (☎03.80.66.12.34; 🌐www.cinema-eldorado.com), is a three-screen arts cinema showing all films in original language with a concentration of foreign films. Devosge, 6 rue Devosge (☎03.80.30.74.79), shows some films in the original, and tries to deviate from the obvious classics.

Festivals The city has a good summer music season, with classical concerts throughout June in its Été Musical programme. L'Estivade, which takes place at various locations around the city between late June and mid-Aug, puts on endless music, dance and street theatre performances. The Fête de la Vigne, in the last week of Aug, is a traditional costume/folklore jamboree; while the Foire gastronomique, during the first two weeks of Nov, celebrates all things edible.

Internet Cybersp@ce21 (46 rue Monge; Mon–Sat 11am–midnight, Sun 2pm–midnight; €4/hr) is a good option in the centre of the old town.

Laundry 41 rue Auguste-Comte; daily 6am–9pm.

Markets From 6am Tues, Thurs (Les Halles only) & Fri mornings, and all day Sat along the four streets surrounding the covered market – rue Bannelier, rue Quentin, rue C. Ramey and rue Odebert.

Pharmacy Junction of rue Berbisey and rue Char-rue Mon–Sat 8.45am–7pm.

Swimming pool Oxygène-Parc Aquatique, Centre Commercial de la Toison d'Or (closed Nov–March; ☎03.80.74.16.16; adults €9, children €7.50; bus #16). Has a wave machine, Jacuzzi and water slides.

The Côte d'Or

South of Dijon, the attractive countryside of the Côte d'Or is characterized by the steep scarp of the côte, wooded along the top and cut by sheer little valleys called combes, where local rock climbers hone their skills (footpaths GR7 and GR76 run the whole length of the wine country as far south as Lyon). Spring is a good time to visit this region, when you avoid the crowds and the landscape is a dramatic symphony of browns – trees, earth and vines, along with millions of bone-coloured vine stakes wheeling past as you travel through, like crosses in a vast war cemetery.

The place names that line the N74 – Gevrey-Chambertin, Vougeot, Vosne-Romanée, Nuits-St-Georges, Pommard, Volnay, Meursault Beaune – are music to the ears of wine buffs. But apart from the busy tourist centre of Beaune, they turn out to be sleepy, dull though exceedingly prosperous villages, full of houses inhabited by well-heeled vignerons. You can make a very good living on a patch of four or five hectares, the average-sized plot, the proof being that none is ever up for sale.

There are numerous caves where you can taste (usually for a charge of €4.50–6) and buy the local elixir, but remember that the former is meant to be a prelude to the latter. And there's no such thing as a cheap wine here, red

The wines of Burgundy

Burgundy farmers have been growing grapes since Roman times, and their rulers, the dukes, frequently put their wines to effective use as a tool of diplomacy. Today they have never had it so good, which is why they're reticent about the quirks of soil and climate and the tricks of pruning and spraying that make their wines so special. Vines are temperamental: frost on the wrong day, sun at the wrong time, too much water or poor drainage, and they won't come up with the goods. And they like a slope, which is why so many wines are called "Côte [hill] de" somewhere. Burgundy's best wines come from a narrow strip of hillside called the Côte d'Or that runs southwest from Dijon to Santenay, and is divided into two regions, Côte de Nuits and Côte de Beaune. With few exceptions the reds of the Côte de Nuits are considered the best: they are richer, age better and cost more. Côte de Beaune is known particularly for its whites: Meursault, Montrachet and Puligny.

The single most important factor determining the "character" of wines is the soil. In the Côte d'Or, the relative mixture of chalk, flint and clay varies over very short distances, making for an enormous variety of taste. Chalky soil makes a wine virile or corsé, in other words "heady" – il y a de la mâche, they say, "something to bite on" – while clay makes it féminin, more agréable.

These and other more extravagant judgements are made after the hallowed procedure of tasting: in order to do it properly, by one account, you have to "introduce a draft of wine into your mouth, swill it across the tongue, roll it around the palate, churn it around, emitting the gargling sound so beloved of tasters, which is produced by slowly inhaling air through the centre of your mouth, and finally eject it". The ejection is what has to be learnt.

For an apéritif in Burgundy, you should try kir, named after the man who was both mayor and MP for Dijon for many years after World War II – two parts dry white wine, traditionally aligoté, and one part cassis or blackcurrant liqueur. To round the evening off there are many liqueurs to choose from, but Burgundy is particularly famous for its marcs, of which the best are matured for years in oak casks.

or white, €15–18 being the minimum price you'll pay for a bottle. The Hautes Côtes (Nuits and Beaune) – wines from the top of the slope – are cheaper, but they lack the connoisseur cachet of the big names.

Beaune

BEAUNE, the principal town of the Côte d'Or, manages to maintain its attractively ancient air, despite a near constant stream of tourists and rampant commercialism – this must be one of the few towns in France where most of the shops stay open at lunchtime. Narrow cobbled streets and sunny squares dotted with cafés make it a lovely spot to sample the region's wine, though you may find it cheaper and easier to use Dijon as a base for getting around in the area, as there are good connections by train and Transco buses, which service all the villages down the N74.

Beaune's town centre is a tightly clustered, rampart-enclosed vieille ville, and its chief attraction is the fifteenth-century hospital, the Hôtel-Dieu (daily: April to mid-Nov 9am–6.30pm; mid-Nov to March 9–11.30am & 2–5.30pm; €5.60), on the corner of place de la Halle. Here a cobbled courtyard is surrounded by a wooden gallery overhung by a massive roof patterned with diamonds of gaudy tiles – green, burnt sienna, black and yellow – and similarly multicoloured steep-pitched dormers and turrets. Inside is a vast paved hall with a glorious arched timber roof, the Grande Salle des Malades, which preserves the heavy, enclosed wooden beds used in the nineteenth century and beyond – patients were treated here up until 1971. Passing through two smaller, furnished wards, the kitchen and the pharmacy, you reach a dark chamber housing the splendid fifteenth-century altarpiece of the Last Judgement by Rogier van der Weyden. The painting was commissioned by Nicolas Rolin, who also founded the hospital in 1443 (King Louis XI commented: “It was only fair that a man who had made so many people poor during his life should create an asylum for them before his death”). A major wine auction takes place here during the annual Trois Glorieuses festival (see p.604), the prices paid setting the pattern for the season.

The private residence of the dukes of Burgundy on rue d'Enfer now contains the Musée du Vin (April–Nov daily 9.30am–6pm; Dec–March daily except Tues 9.30am–5pm; €4.50), with giant winepresses, a collection of traditional tools of the trade and a relief map of the vineyards that begins to make sense of it all. If you feel like visiting three museums in one day, a combined ticket into the Musée du Vin, the Hôtel-Dieu and the town's Musée de Beaux-Arts costs €9.60.

It's worth checking at the tourist office to see if the Musée Marey, in the Hôtel de Ville which is devoted to early movie photography, has re-opened after renovations.

Practicalities

Beaune's gare SNCF is five minutes' walk away from the old walls to the east of the centre on avenue du 8-Septembre, buses into town also stop there. The tourist office, 1 rue de l'Hôtel-Dieu (March–Nov daily 9/10am–noon & 1–6/7pm; ☎03.80.26.21.30, 🌐www.ot-beaune.fr), is opposite the Hôtel-Dieu, staff can advise on touring the region and tasting its wines. You can rent bikes from Bourgogne Randonnées at avenue de 8 Septembre by the gare (€3 per hour, €15 per day). For Internet, you'll need to head to the bibliothèque municipale at 11 place Marey (€2 per hour).

If you're going to stay in Beaune, be prepared to book well in advance and pay at least €40. There are only five hotels within the town walls: one of the less extravagantly priced is the bright and modern Central, right in the middle of things at 2 rue Victor-Millot (☎03.80.24.77.24, 📧hotel.central.beaune@orange.fr; 📍), with a good restaurant. The delightful Hôtel des Remparts, at 48 rue Thiers (☎03.80.24.94.94, 🌐www.webstore.fr/hotel-remparts; 📍–📍), is a wonderful place, sensitively restored and full of old beams and ancient stone. You can still see the ramparts that give it its name in some of the (admittedly more expensive) rooms. Set round a small cobbled courtyard it also has parking and Internet access in the rooms. Most of Beaune's hotels are found just outside the town walls to the southeast, around rue du Faubourg Madeleine and place Madeleine; La Cloche, at 40 rue du Faubourg Madeleine (☎03.80.24.66.33, 🌐www.hotel-cloche-beaune.com; 📍), with solid furnishings and an inner courtyard, is pleasant and reliable. Further out, Hôtel Grillon, 21 rte de Seurre, (☎03.80.22.44.25, 🌐www.hotel-grillon.fr; 📍) is set in gardens about 1km east of town, and has a small heated swimming pool. The pretty Les Cent Vignes campsite, 10 rue Auguste Dubois (☎03.80.22.03.91; mid-March to Oct), is about 1km north out of town, off rue du Faubourg-St-Nicolas (the N74 to Dijon), before the bridge over the autoroute; booking is advisable.

Eating out is an expensive business here, although there are simple but excellent plats such as steaks and salads to be had at the Bistrot Bourguignon, on the peatonal at 8 rue Monge (☎03.80.22.23.24; plats €14, midweek lunch menu €13), as well as a good range of wines by the glass. For something more sophisticated, try Le Gourmandin, 8 place Carnot (☎03.80.24.07.88, 🌐www.hotellegourmandin.com), with good menus at €28 and €32 and lunch at €11. Here a creaky spiral staircase leads up to two ultramodern, boutique-chic rooms (📍). There's also the decidedly upscale Bernard Morillon, 31 rue Maufoux (☎03.80.24.12.06; closed Mon & Tues lunch; plats from €36, menus €20–77), with high ceilings, beams and a delightful courtyard. Here they'll nestle your langoustines on walnuts, aubergine and tagliatelle. Just outside the town walls, Le Comptoir des Tontons, at 22 rue du Faubourg Madeleine (☎03.80.24.19.64; closed Sun & Mon), is stylish and unpretentious, with menus at €18–25.

7

Château du Clos-de-Vougeot

If you find French wine culture fascinating, it's worth visiting the Château du Clos-de-Vougeot to see the wine-making process (daily: April–Sept 9am–6.30pm; Oct–March 9–11.30am & 2–5.30pm, Sat closes 5pm; €3.60), 21km north of Beaune between Gévry-Chambertin and Nuits-St-Georges. Mammoth thirteenth-century winepresses installed by the Cistercian monks to whom these vineyards belonged for nearly 700 years until the Revolution, are still here. The château today is the home of a chivalrous order founded in 1934, the Conférie des Chevaliers du Tastevin. Chivalrous or not, the new monks continue the good wine work. After you've seen how it's made, you can taste it nearby on the N74 at La Grand Cave à Vougeot (9am–7pm). There's a three-day wine festival, Les Trois Glorieuses, on the third Saturday in November, starting in Vougeot and continuing in Beaune and Meursault.

BURGUNDY

The Saône valley

The Saône valley

The Saône valley is prosperous and modern, nourished by the autoroute, tourism, industry and the wine trade. But turn your back on the river and head west and immediately you enter a different Burgundy: of hilly pasture and woodland, utterly rural and more populated by cattle than people. This is the hinterland – the Deep South – of Burgundy, where every village clusters under the tower of a Romanesque church, spawned by the influence of Cluny in the 1000s and 1100s. It is only when you reach the Loire and encounter the main traffic routes again that you re-enter the modern world.

Its beautiful country for cycling, though there are few places from which to actually rent a bike. There are, however, plenty of bus and train connections.

Chalon-sur-Saône

CHALON, a sizeable port and bustling industrial centre on a broad meander of the Saône, is not normally worth a stop in itself, though its old riverside quarter does have an easy charm, and it makes a good base for exploring the more expensive areas of the Côte d'Or. You may be tempted to stay, though by the pre-Lent carnival (February or March) which features a parade of giant masks and a confetti battle, and the national festival of street artists and theatre in July.

The old town is just back from the river around Grande-Rue and rue du Châtelet, with several fifteenth-century timber-framed houses. Nearby, 200m to the west on place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville, is the Musée Denon (daily except Tues 9.30am–noon & 2–5.30pm; €3.10, free on Wed & first Sun of the month), whose most vaunted exhibit is the 18,000-year-old Volgu flint, rated one of the finest stone tools yet discovered. Look out too for the local furniture and a painting by Vuillard.

Your ticket also gets you into the more unusual Musée Niépce, 28 quai des Messageries (daily except Tues: July & Aug 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm; Sept–June 9.30–11.45am & 2–5.45pm; €3.10, free on Wed & first Sun of the month), just downstream from Pont St-Laurent. Nicéphore Niépce, who was born in Chalon, is credited with inventing photography in 1816 – though he named it “heliography”. The museum possesses a fascinating range of cameras, from the first machine ever to the Apollo moon mission’s equipment, plus a number of 007-type spy-camera devices, all attractively displayed.

The other interesting target in town is the Maison des Vins on Promenade Ste-Marie (Mon–Sat 9am–7pm), where you can taste and buy Côte Chalonnaise wines, chosen from the wines of 44 local villages by a choice committee of professional wine tasters.

Practicalities

The tourist office is just off the pedestrian walkway at boulevard de la République (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–noon & 4–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; ☎03.85.48.37.97, 🌐www.chalon-sur-saone.net), and gives out excellent listings. The gare SNCF is five minutes’ walk away at the end of avenue Jean-Jaurès; the bus to Cluny leaves from behind platform one.

The most attractive hotel in town is undoubtedly the lovely, airy St-Jean, right on the riverbank at 24 quai Gambetta (☎03.85.48.45.65, ☎03.85.93.62.69; 🍷), with classical-style rooms. The family run Hôtel de la Colombière (☎03.85.48.07.31; 🌐www.hotelcolombiere.com; 🍷) at 7 av Boucicaud, is five minutes’ walk from the train station down avenue Jean-Jaurès. Chalon’s Hôtel Kyriad (☎03.85.90.08.00, 🌐www.kyriad.com; 🍷) is comfortable, friendly and in the centre of town at 35 place de Beaune. If you’re looking for dirt-cheap without the dirt, you could walk twenty minutes east out of town to the Residences Chalon Jeunes at 18 av Pierre Nugue (☎03.85.46.44.90, 🌐www.etudiant-chalon.com), which has rooms for €16.50 a night and a cafeteria-style restaurant. Camping du Pont de Bourgogne (☎03.85.48.26.86; 📧campingchalon71@orange.fr), 2km out of town on the south bank of the Saône in St-Marcel, is accessible on bus #5 during the summer; if you’re walking, cross either Pont St-Laurent or Pont J.-Richard and head east.

Rue de Strasbourg, across Pont St-Laurent on the so-called île aux restos, is lined with excellent places to eat. Chez Jules at no. 11 (☎03.85.48.08.34, menus €18; closed Sat lunch and Sun) is one of the more refined choices. Also worthwhile is the bright and elegant L’air du Temps at no. 7 (☎03.85.93.39.01, closed Sun & Mon), which does standard French fare including the obligatory escargots – menus €17–33. Nearby at no. 31 there’s the tiny Le Bistrot (☎03.85.93.22.01; closed July & Aug & weekends) which offers a traditional evening menu from €27. Or if by now you crave Italian cuisine, da Nunzio, at no. 3 (☎03.85.48.39.83, closed Tues and Sat lunch), has fresh pasta menus from €12 at lunchtime, €27 in the evening. A handful of late-night bars can be found just off rue de Strasbourg, including the Boogie Blues Bar (Mon–Thurs till 2am, Fri & Sat till 3am) in the cross-street, rue d’Uxelles. In the centre, the place for cafés is place St-Vincent, with its lovely half-timbered houses. There are food markets on rue aux Fèvres and place St-Vincent between 8am and noon on Friday and Sunday.

Tournus

Graced by ancient, golden buildings TOURNUS is a beautiful little town on the banks of the Saône. 27km south of Chalon, 30km north of Mâcon and squeezed between the N6 and the river – the narrow huddled streets have the inward-looking, self-protecting feel of a Mediterranean town, belying a prosperous past when commercial traffic thronged the busy riverside quays. Those quays are quiet today, and Tournus's modern prosperity is based on agriculture, light industry and, increasingly, tourism.

Coming from the N6 you enter the town through a gateway flanked by medieval towers and are confronted by the old abbey church of St-Philibert, one of the earliest and most influential Romanesque buildings in Burgundy. The first construction dates back to around 900 AD and the foundation of the monastic community by monks fleeing Norman raids on their home community of Noirmoutier off the Atlantic coast. The present building dates to the first half of the eleventh century.

The facade of the church, with its powerful towers and simple decoration of Lombard arcading, has the massive qualities and clean, pared-down lines more associated with a fortress. A narrow staircase opposite the main entrance in the west front leads up to a high chapel that looks down into the body of the church, a vestige of the Carolingian tradition of church building which doubled as a defensive feature. The chapel's main arch is inset with two extraordinary sculptures that may represent the abbot responsible for the rebuilding (on the right, holding a hammer and giving a blessing) and possibly the sculptor himself (on the left, full-face), who may even be the "Gerlamus" of the inscription – in which case this may be one of the earliest self-portraits of the medieval period. The nave and transept below are surprisingly light and graceful for such an early church with three exquisitely carved arches at the far end of the choir. Steps in the north transept lead down to the crypt, where a well plunges down to the level of the Saône – useful in times of siege.

To the south of town the Hôtel Dieu (April–Oct daily except Tues 10am–6pm; €5.25) is one of the region's many charity hospitals, and one of the best preserved. The sisters of Saint Martha, an order established in the fifteenth century to serve the hospital in Beaune, worked as ward nurses from the hospital's inception in 1674 right up until it closed in 1978, tending to patients in the ordered rows of closed oak beds, set in high-ceilinged wards to allow the noxious air to circulate. It's worth visiting for the elaborate dispensary alone, complete with a host of faience pots and hand-blown glass jars.

Practicalities

The gare SNCF is on avenue Gambetta, across the road from the old town and a ten-minute walk from the tourist office at 2 place de l'Abbaye (June–Sept daily 10am–7pm; Oct–May Tues–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.85.27.00.20, 🌐www.tournugeois.fr), opposite the west front of the abbey church.

At the southern end of the old town is the established, slightly uniform, Hôtel aux Terrasses, 18 av du 23-Janvier (☎03.85.51.01.74, 🌐www.aux-terrasses.com; 🍷; closed Jan). It also has an excellent restaurant with menus at €27–56 (closed Jan, Sun eve through to Tues lunch). A stone's throw from the abbey church and right in the atmospheric heart of town Hôtel Gras, 2 rue Fénelon (☎03.85.51.07.25; 🍷; restaurant €13.50), is undeniably basic but also traditional, friendly and serves excellent home-cooked meals in the café-bar downstairs. Alternatively, up a couple of price brackets, the Hôtel de la Paix (☎03.85.51.01.85, 🌐www.hotel-de-la-paix.fr; 🍷) at 9 rue Jean-Jaurès, is fairly central and well kept if a little bland. On the other side of the river the Hôtel-Restaurant de Saône (☎03.85.51.20.65, ☎03.85.51.20.45; ③), has cheerful, modern, if small, rooms in a splendidly tranquil riverside location. Campers should head for Camping Municipal en Bagatelle on rue des Canes (☎03.85.51.16.58, ✉campingtournus@aol.com; May–Sept), a fifteen-minute walk north out of town, up rue René-Cassin.

For further eating possibilities outside of the hotels, there are a number of cafés and brasseries in and around place de l'Hôtel-de-Ville. For something more elegant try the very plush Hôtel de Greuze (☎03.85.51.13.42; rooms ④) – not to be confused with the very different Hôtel Gras – which blends traditional and contemporary styles and where menus start at €92, plats from €42.

Mâcon and around

MÂCON is a lively, prosperous place on the banks of the River Saône, 58km south of Chalon and 68km north of Lyon, with excellent transport connections between the two. It has no great sights, but despite being a centre for the wine trade does have a surprisingly sunny southern seaside feel, thanks to its long café-lined riverbank and free outdoor jazz concerts in late July–early August.

Lamartine, the nineteenth-century French Romantic poet (see box below), was born here in 1790 and his name is much in evidence. He is remembered in the handsome eighteenth-century mansion, the Hôtel Senecé, 41 rue Sigorgne, which houses the Musée Lamartine (Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; €2.50), part of which is dedicated to documents and other memorabilia to do with his personal, political and poetic lives. Nearby, on the corner of place des Herbes where a summertime fruit and veg market is held, stands the town's main tourist curiosity, an incredibly elaborate wooden house built around 1500 and known as the Maison du Bois Doré, with a wonderful bar/café downstairs that serves cocktails until 2 or 3am. The town also has a medieval art and Gallo-Roman archeological museum, the Musée des Ursulines, at 5 rue des Ursulines (Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm, Sun 2–6pm; €2.50), housed in a seventeenth-century convent.

The most enjoyable way to bone up on the Mâcon, Beaujolais and Chalonais wines is to head off on one of the much-signposted wine roads (🌐www.bourgogne-tourisme.com), which extend north into the Maconnais, and south into the Beaujolais, sampling as you go. If you don't have a car or a bike, however, you'll have to fall back on tasting with your meal. Alternatively,

Alphonse Lamartine (1790–1869)

Often referred to as the French Byron, Alphonse Lamartine is one of the best-known of the French Romantic poets. He was born and grew up in Milly, about 15km west of Mâcon, and published his first poetic work, Méditations poétiques, in 1820. In 1825 he published Le Dernier Chant du Pèlerinage d'Harold as a tribute to Byron.

After the 1830 Revolution in Paris, he became involved in politics, being elected to the Chambre des Députés in 1833 and quickly acquiring a reputation as a powerful orator on the weighty questions of the day, like the abolition of slavery and capital punishment. His finest hour was as the leading figure in the provisional government of the Second Republic, which was proclaimed from the Hôtel de Ville in Paris on February 23, 1848. He withdrew from politics when reactionary forces, under the leadership of General Cavaignac, let the army loose on the protesting workers of Paris and Marseille in June 1848, after which he retired to St-Point, continuing to write and publish until his death in 1869.

the Maison Mâconnaise des Vins, 484 av Lattre-de-Tassigny (☎03.85.22.91.18; daily 9am–7pm), can be found where the N6 comes into town along the river-side from Chalon – a ten-minute walk from the centre of town. It's little more than an outlet for a big producer, but they will arrange tastings of four wines for around €3.

Practicalities

The gare SNCF (adjacent to the gare routière) lies on rue Bigonnet at the southern end of rue Victor-Hugo, but TGV trains leave from Mâcon-Loché station 6km out of town – you'll have to make the connection by taxi. The tourist office, 1 place St Pierre (June–Sept Mon–Sat 10am–7pm, Sun 3–7pm; Oct–May Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎03.85.21.07.07, 🌐www.macon-tourism.com), has good maps and brochures covering the city and surrounding region.

There should be no difficulty finding a place to stay. Across the Pont de St-Laurent the Hôtel du Beaujolais, at 86 place République (☎03.85.38.42.06, ☎03.85.38.78.02; 📍), has very clean, simple rooms. For a touch of only-slightly-faded grandeur try the Hôtel d'Europe et d'Angleterre, on the river at 92 quai Jean-Jaurès (☎03.85.38.27.94, 🌐www.hotel-europeangleterre-macon.com; 📍). It once played host to Queen Victoria and has the feel of former times – high ceilings, marble staircases and impossibly tall windows. It's also not as pricey as you might think and the rooms are tasteful and comfortable. Nearer the station, the Inter-Hôtel de Bourgogne, on the north side of place de la Barre at 6 rue Victor-Hugo (☎03.85.21.10.23, 🌐www.hoteldebourgogne.com; 📍; restaurant from €22), has retained some character and a lively atmosphere despite being part of a chain. For more of a budget place, try La Promenade, 266 quai Lamartine (☎03.85.38.10.98; 📍), which looks right onto the Saône and houses a decent restaurant, Le Carline, with menus at €10–25. There's a campsite 3km north out of town on the N6 (☎03.85.38.16.22; closed Nov to mid-March).

Mâcon has no shortage of good restaurants to choose from. For cheap eats, head for the river: the pleasant Lamartine, 266 quai Lamartine (closed Mon eve through to Wed lunch), is popular for both meals and drinks, while the St Laurent, on quai Bouchacourt, just over the Pont de St-Laurent, has great views and menus from €17. Au Rocher de Cancale, 393 quai Jean-Jaurès (☎03.85.38.07.50; closed Sun eve & Mon), is a traditional restaurant serving excellent snails and Bresse chicken (menus €16–38). While the stylish Pierre, 7–9 rue Joseph Dufour (☎03.85.38.14.23; closed Sun eve, Mon & Tues afternoon, plus first three weeks in July), is well worth a splurge, not least for its menu gastronomique, which is strong on truffles (menus €33–72).

Brou and Bourg-en-Bresse

BROU is an uninteresting suburban village outside Bourg-en-Bresse, 32km east of Mâcon, which happens to have an early sixteenth-century church (daily; €6.50). If you're heading east to Geneva or the Alps, take a look, but don't lose a lift or miss a train for it. Aldous Huxley found it “a horrible little architectural nightmare”, its monuments “positively and piercingly vulgar”. Certainly, it was a very rich woman's expensive folly, crammed with virtuoso craftsmanship from the dying moments of the Gothic style; it was undertaken by Margaret of Austria after the death of her husband, Philibert, Duke of Savoy, as a mausoleum for the two of them and Philibert's mother. No longer a place of worship, it's interesting to see, but soulless, without a trace of vision or inspiration.

BOURG-EN-BRESSE is the place to base yourself if you want to visit Brou's church, just a short bus ride away (#5; every 30min), leaving from place Carriat. The tourist office (Mon–Sat 8.30am–noon & 2–6.30pm; ☎04.74.22.49.40, 🌐www.bourg-en-bresse.org) is in Centre Albert-Camus, 6 av Alsace-Lorraine, with an annexe by Brou church in summer. Wednesday is the local market day, held in Champ de Foire or if you want a real slice of French rural life try the livestock market, held every Tuesday afternoon at nearby Saint Denis Les Bourg. For somewhere to stay a good choice is the Logis de Brou (☎04.74.22.11.55, 🌐www.logisdebrou.com; 📍) at 132 bd de Brou; here there's genteel charm, cheery rooms and a terrace for breakfast. The municipal campsite (☎04.74.45.37.21; April to mid-Oct) is at 5 allée du Centre Nautique – the N83 northeast of town heading for Lons-le-Saunier.

The Mâconnais, Beaujolais and Charollais

West of the valley of the Saône lies a tract of hilly country that is best known for its produce: the white wines of the Mâconnais are justly renowned, while the fashion for drinking the young red wine of Beaujolais has spread far beyond France. Further west still, the handsome white cattle that luxuriate in the green fields of the Charollais are an obvious sign that this is serious beef country.

In the past, however, the region was famed for its religion, and many large and powerful abbeys were established in the eleventh and twelfth centuries under the influence of the great monastery at Cluny. Few monks remain, and Cluny itself is largely destroyed, but Romanesque churches are almost as thick on the ground as cattle, and few are more impressive than the great basilica at Paray-le-Monial.

The Mâconnais

The Mâconnais wine-producing country lies to the west of the Saône, a strip hardly 20km wide, stretching from Mâcon to Tournus. The land rises sharply into steep little hills and valleys, at its prettiest in the south, where the region's best white wines come from, around the villages of POUILLY, VINZELLES, PRISSÉ and FUISSÉ, at the last of which, should you yearn for rustic rest, the Hôtel La Vigne Blanche (☎03.85.35.60.50, 🌐www.vigne-blanche.com; 📍), will provide just the setting you're looking for, with simple rooms, good regional cooking (menus from €13) and of course the chance to sample some of the local wines.

Directly above these villages rises the distinctive and precipitous 500-metre rock of Solutré, which in prehistoric times – around 20,000 BC – served as an ambush site for hunters after migrating animals: the bones of 100,000 horses have been found in the soil beneath the rock, along with mammoth, bison and reindeer carcasses. The history and results of the excavations are displayed in a museum at the foot of the rock, the Musée Départemental de Préhistoire (daily: Fe, March, Oct & Nov 10am–noon & 2–5pm; April–Sept 10am–6pm; €3.50). A steep path climbs to the top of the rock, where you get a superb view as far as Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn on a clear day, as well as looking down on the huddled roofs of SOLUTRÉ-POUILLY, the slopes beneath you covered with the vines of the Chardonnay grape that makes the exquisite greenish Pouilly-Fuissé wine. The area is at its most enchanting in early spring when the earth still shows its terre-cuite colours, punctuated by bursts of white cherry blossom and the blue drift of bonfire smoke from prunings amid the neatly staked rows of vines.

Aside from the sheer pleasure of wandering about in such reposeful landscapes – not so, however, if you're trying to tackle this very hilly country on a bike – there are some specific places to make for. One such is the sleepy hamlet of ST-POINT, where the poet Lamartine (see box on p.607) spent much of his life in the little medieval Château de St-Point, now a museum dedicated to his memory (☎03.85.50.50.30; phone to arrange a visit; €5), next to the Romanesque church where he's buried. If you continue up the road behind the château you come to an utterly rural farm where you can buy goat's cheese. There is a well-equipped campsite by the Lac St-Point (☎03.85.50.52.31; April–Oct).

Cluny and around

The abbey of CLUNY is the major tourist destination of the region. The voice of its abbot once made monarchs tremble, as his power in the Christian world was second only to that of the pope. The monastery was founded in 910 in response to the corruption of the existing church, and it took only a couple of vigorous early abbots to build the power of Cluny into a veritable empire. Gradually its spiritual influence declined, and Cluny became a royal gift. Both Richelieu and Mazarin did stints in the monastery as abbot.

Now, although the reputation of the place still pulls in the tourist coaches, little remains apart from the very attractive village. Hugues de Semur's vast and influential eleventh-century church, the largest building in Christendom until the construction of St Peter's in Rome, was dismantled in the destruction that followed the Revolution. Now what you see of the former abbey (daily: May–Aug 9.30am–6.30pm; Sept–April 9.30am–noon & 1.30–5pm; €6.50 combined ticket with museum) is an octagonal belfry and the huge south transept. Standing amid this fragment of a huge construction gives a tangible and poignant insight into the Revolution's enormous powers of transformation. Access to the belfry leads through the Grand École des Ingénieurs, one of France's elite higher-education institutions, and you can often see the students in their gowns decorated with cabalistic signs. At the back of the abbey is one of France's national stud farms, Haras de Cluny (☎06.22.94.52.69; July & Aug Tues–Sun 2, 3.30 & 5pm; Sept–June phone to book; €5), which you can visit but only on a guided tour. The Musée d'Art et d'Archéologie (same hours and ticket as abbey), in the fifteenth-century palace of the last freely elected abbot, helps to flesh out the ruins with reconstructions and fragments of sculpture, while from the top of the Tour des Fromages (entrance through the tourist office; €1.25) you can picture it in the landscape below.

The tourist office is beside the Tours des Fromages, at 6 rue Mercière (April–June & Sept 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.45pm; July & Aug 10am–6.45pm; Oct–March 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–5pm; ☎03.85.59.05.34, 🌐www.cluny-tourisme.com). Bicycles can be rented at Ludisport, by the platform of the abandoned railway station, on the southeast edge of town. For accommodation, the Hôtel de Bourgogne, place de l'Abbaye (☎03.85.59.00.58, 🌐www.hotel-cluny.com; 📍; closed Dec & Jan), is beautifully furnished and has an irresistible location in what must have been the north aisle of the church. Packed full of history and charm the excellent-value 🍷 Le Potin Gourmand, at 4 place du Champ de Foire (☎03.85.59.02.06, 🌐www.potingourmand.com; 📍; closed Jan & Feb) is a five-minute walk west from the centre. Arranged around a flower-filled courtyard, each of its seven beguiling rooms somehow manages to blend French rustic with nuances of a different style, from four-poster medieval to Byzantine. A much more prosaic option is the reasonably central Hôtel du Commerce, 8 place du Commerce (☎03.85.59.03.09, 🌐www.hotelducommerce-cluny.com; ②–③), where the cheaper rooms have shared facilities; do be sure to call ahead as they are given to closing early. The municipal hostel, Cluny Séjour, is right by the town bus stop at 22 rue Porte-de-Paris (☎03.85.59.08.83; 📧cluny.sejour@orange.fr; closed Dec to mid-Jan), and occupies some of the former buildings of the Benedictine monastery. There's also a municipal camp-site, St-Vital (☎03.85.59.08.34; May to mid-Sept) across Pont de la Levée in the direction of Tournus.

For meals, there's good country cooking to be had at Le Potin Gourmand (evenings only, closed Sun; menus €23–30), while the Brasserie du Nord, right in the heart of things on the place de l'Abbaye, serves simple classics, with menus at €12–22. The bustling Café du Centre in rue Municipale, in a side street leading to the Abbey, is popular with students and serves excellent plats from €7.

Taizé

Another powerful attraction for the faithful might be the modern ecumenical community at TAIZÉ, 10km north of Cluny. It was founded in 1940 by the Swiss pastor Roger Schutz and centres around a restored Romanesque church and the new Church of Reconciliation. Hordes of youngsters come to take part in discussion groups and camp out. If you're seriously interested – and it's not likely to be to the taste of the merely curious – phone ☎03.85.50.30.02, write to The Taizé Community, 71250 Taizé, France or visit the website (🌐www.taize.fr), which gives full details. If you're passing through, you're more than welcome to visit the popular gift shop, where the brothers sell their wares, which include glazed dishware and musical recordings and writings translated into twenty languages.

The Beaujolais

Imperceptibly, as you continue south, the Mâconnais becomes the Beaujolais, a larger area of terraced hills producing lighter, fruity red wines, which it is now fashionable to drink very early. The Beaujolais grape is the Gamay, which, in contrast to other parts of Burgundy, thrives here on this granite soil. Of the four appellations of Beaujolais, the best are the crus, including Morgon and Fleurie, which come from the northern part of the region between St-Amour (the northernmost cru), and Brouilly in the south. If you have transport, you can follow the cru trail south from Mâcon by turning right at Crêches-sur-Saône up the D31 to St-Amour, and then south along the D68. Beaujolais Villages, which produces the most highly regarded nouveau, comes from the middle of the Beaujolais region, south of the cru belt, while plain Beaujolais and Beaujolais Supérieur are produced in the vineyards southwest of Villefranche.

The well-marked route de Beaujolais winds down through the wine villages to VILLEFRANCHE, not far from Lyon and a good base for the route. Here, the tourist office at 290 rue de Thizy (July & Aug daily 9.15am–12.15pm & 2–5.45pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 1.30–5.30pm; ☎04.74.07.27.40) has information about caves, visits and wine tours. There are numerous cheap hotels, almost all near the gare SNCF. One great option is Moulin à Vent at 81 rue d'Anse, just across from the gare (☎04.74.68.36.13, 📞04.74.65.09.70; ②), which has a five simple but pleasant, en-suite rooms branching off from a spiral staircase above a bustling café-bar. With less character, Hôtel Mercure (☎04.74.62.01.04; 🌐www.accorhotels.com; 📍) at 146 rue de la Sous-Préfecture is part of a chain and offers reliable, central accommodation. Most of the cafés on rue Nationale are good for snacks or cheap menus. If you want something more substantial Le Saladier (☎04.74.62.34.19; menus €15–29) at 579 rue Nationale is a good cafeteria-style restaurant with a courtyard terrace, while L'Épicerie (☎04.74.62.04.04, closed Sun) at 55 rue Thizy offers traditional menus at €12–23.

Paray-le-Monial

Fifty kilometres west of Cluny, across countryside that becomes ever gentler and flatter as you approach the broad valley of the Loire, is PARAY-LE-MONIAL, whose major attraction is its Basilique du Sacré-Coeur (daily 9am–7pm). Not only is it an exquisite building in its own right, with a marvellously satisfying arrangement of apses and chapels stacking up in sturdy symmetry to its fine octagonal belfry, it's the best place to get an idea of what the abbey of Cluny looked like, as it was built shortly afterwards in devoted imitation of the mother church.

The town itself is steeped in religion and straddles the slow waters of the River Bourbince and the Canal du Centre. The only thing that disturbs its calm is the arrival of pilgrims of the Sacré-Coeur, or “Sacred Heart”, a movement which originated here with Marguerite-Marie Alacoque, a local nun who received revelations advocating the worship of the sacred heart – and was later adopted by the entire Roman Catholic Church. The first pilgrimage took place in 1873, encouraged as a means of combating the socialist ideas espoused by the Paris Commune, and it raised the money to construct the church of the Sacré-Coeur on the hill of Montmartre in Paris. Paray is now second only to Lourdes as a pilgrim centre.

One secular building definitely worth a look, aside from just browsing down the main street – rue de la République/rue des Deux-Ponts/rue Victor-Hugo – is the highly ornamented Maison Jayet, now the Hôtel de Ville on place Guignaud, built in the 1520s.

Practicalities

The tourist office is on avenue Jean-Paul-II (July & Aug daily 9/10am–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 10am–noon & 2.30–6pm; also Sun April–June & Sept–Oct; ☎03.85.81.10.92). You can rent bikes here and from Cycles Kaiking, 24 rue de la République (☎03.85.88.85.15).

For accommodation, try the Hostellerie des Trois Pigeons, 2 rue Daugard, just beyond the Hôtel de Ville (☎03.85.81.03.77, 📧3p7103@inter-hotel.com; 📍; closed Dec–Feb; restaurant from €14), where comfortable furnishings mix well with old exposed stonework. There's also the less plush Hôtel aux Vendanges de Bourgogne, 5 rue Denis-Papin (☎03.85.81.13.43, 🌐www.auxvendangesdebourgogne.fr; 📍; closed mid-Nov to late Dec) with its popular, good-value restaurant (menu €14.50), on the south side of the Canal du Centre. The most attractive option, however, is the pleasantly old-fashioned yet well-appointed Grand Hôtel de la Basilique, 18 rue de la Visitation (☎03.85.81.11.13, 🌐www.hotelbasilique.com; 📍; closed Nov to April; restaurant from €13), with some rooms overlooking the basilica after which it's named. If you want to immerse yourself in the religious atmosphere of this town try the cavernous Au Foyer de Sacré Coeur next door at 14 rue de la Visitation (☎03.85.81.11.01, 🌐www.chez.com/fsc; 📍). It's bang opposite the chapel that stands on the spot where Ste Marguerite had her revelations, and is consequently occupied almost solely by pilgrims, who don't seem to mind the institutional albeit very friendly atmosphere. The Mambré campsite is on route du Gué-Léger (☎03.85.88.89.20; May to late Sept). For food as well as the hotel-restaurants above, rue Victor Hugo and place Guignault provide options for light meals.

To explore the little villages throughout the Mâconnais, there's no better base than the Merle family's organic farm at Vitry-en-Charollais (☎03.85.81.30.62; €40 with breakfast for two, dinner has to be booked ahead), with delicious home cooking, about 6km southwest of Paray.

The Charollais

The Charollais is cattle country, taking its name from the pretty little water-enclosed market town of CHAROLLES, with its 32 bridges, on the main N79 road, and in turn giving its name to one of the world's most illustrious breeds of cattle: the white, curly-haired, stocky Charollais, bred for its lean meat. Throughout this landscape, scattered across the rich farmland along the River Arconce, are dozens of small villages, all with more or less remarkable Romanesque churches, offspring of Cluny in its vigorous youth.

ANZY-LE-DUC, about 15km south of Paray off the main D982 to Roanne, boasts an exquisite complex of buildings: a perfect Romanesque church with jackdaw chatter echoing off the octagonal belfry, side by side with the remains of the old priory incorporated into a sort of fortified farm looking out over the Arconce valley, the whole built in a rich, warm stone. MONTCEAUX-L'ÉTOILE, a little nearer to Paray, has its special charm too: a quiet, worn church with beautiful sculptures adorning the porch, standing likewise above the Arconce valley, and, a little way down the village street, a curious tower-like house where a Marquis of Vichy is said to have practised alchemy with the notorious Italian wizard, Cagliostro.

Travel details

Trains

Autun to: Avallon (Mon–Sat 1–3 daily; 1hr 45min); Chalons-sur-Saône (1–2 daily; 1hr 10min–1hr 50min); Le Creusot-Ville (Mon–Sat 1–2 daily; 45min); Saulieu (2–6 daily; 50min).

Auxerre to: Avallon (4–6 daily; 1hr); Dijon (8–10 daily; 1hr 50min–2hr 20min); Joigny (9–11 daily; 35min); Paris (6–8 daily; 1hr 50min–2hr 30min); Sens (6–8 daily; 1hr).

Avallon to: Autun (1–2 daily; 1hr 45min); Auxerre (5–8 daily; 1hr 5min); Dijon (3 daily; 1hr 45min); Saulieu (4 daily; 50min–1hr).

Beaune to: Dijon (frequent; 25min); Lyon (10–12 daily; 1hr 50min–2hr 10min).

Bourg-en-Bresse to: Dijon (4–7 daily; 1hr 30min–2hr 10min); Lyon (frequent; 45min–1hr 30min); Mâcon (10 daily; 30–50min).

Dijon to: Auxerre (8–11 daily; 1hr 50min–2hr 20min); Beaune (frequent; 25min); Chalons-sur-Saône (frequent; 40min); Les Laumes-Alésia (frequent; 30–50min); Lyon (10–15 daily; 1hr 35min–2hr 10min); Mâcon (frequent; 1hr–1hr 20min); Montbard (8–11 daily; 30min); Nevers (3–6 daily; 2hr 10min–2hr 50min); Nuits-St-Georges (frequent; 15min); Paris (frequent; 1hr 40min–3hr 15min); Sens (6–9 daily; 1hr 45min–2hr 10min); Tonnerre (8–11 daily; 1hr–1hr 30min); Tournus (10 daily; 1hr); Villefranche (Mon–Sat frequent, Sun 5; 1hr 40min–2hr).

Mâcon to: Bourg-en-Bresse (10 daily; 30–50min); Dijon (frequent; 1hr–1hr 20min); Geneva (8–12 daily; 2hr 30min–3hr 30min); Lyon (frequent; 30min–1hr).

Nevers to: Autun (2–4 daily; 1hr 40min–2hr 20min); Chalons-sur-Saône (3 daily; 2hr 45min);

Clermont-Ferrand (7–8 daily; 1hr 30min–2hr 10min); Le Creusot (5–7 daily; 1hr 30min); Dijon (5–7 daily; 2hr 30min); Paris (frequent; 2–3hr).

Paray-le-Monial to: Chalon-sur-Saône (4–5 daily; 1hr 40min); Dijon (2–6 daily; 2hr 15min); Le Creusot (4 daily; 40min); Lyon (2–3 daily; 2hr); Moulins (3–5 daily; 1hr).

Sens to: Auxerre (4–6 daily; 30min–1hr 10min); Avallon (2–4 daily; 2hr); Dijon (9 daily; 1hr 50min–2hr 30min); Joigny (7–10 daily; 20min); Paris (9 daily; 1hr–1hr 30min); Tonnerre (9 daily; 1hr).

Tournus to: Chalon-sur-Saône (11–14 daily; 15min); Dijon (10 daily; 1hr); Mâcon (10 daily; 15min).

Buses

Autun to: Beaune (Mon–Fri 1 daily; 1hr 10min); Chalon-sur-Saône (2 daily; 1hr 30min); Château-Chinon (1–2 daily; 1hr); Le Creusot (3–5; 45min).

Auxerre to Clamecy (Mon–Sat 1–3; 1hr 15min).

Avallon to: Dijon (1–3 daily; 2hr–2hr 30min); Montbard (1–3 daily; 50min); Vézelay (summer only 1 daily; 30min).

Chablis to: Auxerre (winter Mon–Sat 1 daily, summer has to be booked 35min); Tonnerre (winter 1–2 daily, summer has to be booked; 1hr).

Châtillon-sur-Seine to: Dijon (3 daily; 1hr 30min–2hr); Montbard (3–6 daily; 40min).

Cluny to: Chalon-sur-Saône (2–4 daily; 1hr 30min); Charolles (2–5 daily; 45min); Mâcon (2–7 daily; 45min); Paray-le-Monial (1–5 daily; 1hr); Taizé (1–7 daily; 15min).

Dijon to: Autun (1 daily; 2hr 30min); Avallon (2–3 daily; 2hr 30min); Beaune (3–7 daily; 30min–1hr 30min); Châtillon-sur-Seine (2–4 daily; 1hr 30min–2hr); Saulieu (3 daily; 1hr 30min).

Mâcon to: Chalon-sur-Saône (4–7 daily; 2hr 15min); Charolles (2–5 daily; 2hr); Cluny (2–7 daily; 45min); Paray-le-Monial (2–5 daily; 2hr 20min).

Semur-en-Auxois to: Montbard (2–8 daily; 30min); Saulieu (2–6 daily; 35min); Venarey-les-Laumes for Alésia (Mon–Sat 3–11 daily; 20–30min).

Sens to: Joigny (1 daily; 1hr 10min); Troyes (3 daily; 1hr 45min).

Poitou-Charentes and the Atlantic coast

- * Marais Poitevin The “green Venice”, an intricate network of land and water that’s perfect to explore by bike. See p.628
- * La Rochelle This charming and unspoilt port town is the jewel of the west coast, with a well-preserved historic centre and some exquisite seafood restaurants. See p.631
- * Île d’Oléron France’s second biggest island is a centre for oysters, birds and hollyhocks. See p.644
- * Angoulême Wholly underrated, this enchanting old-school town hosts an animated nightlife and rightfully lays claim to some of the best restaurants in the region. See p.653
- * Bordeaux Lively, stylish city surrounded by some of the world’s best vineyards. See p.657
- * Côte d’Argent Endless beach stretched out between pine trees and wild Atlantic surf. See p.675

△ The River Sèvres at Coulon, Marais Poitevin

Poitou-Charentes and the Atlantic coast

Newsstands selling Sud-Ouest remind you where you are: this is not the Mediterranean, certainly, but in summer the quality of the light, the warm air, the fields of sunflowers and the shuttered siesta-silence of the farmhouses give you the first exciting promises of the south. The coast, on the other hand, remains unmistakably Atlantic – dunes, pine forest, reclaimed marshland and misty mud flats. While it has great charm in places, particularly out of season on the islands of Noirmoutier, Ré and Oléron, it's a family, camper-caravanner seaside, lacking the glamour and excitement of the Côte d'Azur. The principal port in the north, La Rochelle, is one of the prettiest and most distinctive towns in France. The sandy beaches are beautiful everywhere, though can occasionally be disappointing, especially the northern stretches, where the water is murky and shallow for a long way out. On the dune-backed Côte d'Argent, south of Bordeaux, however, the sea can be outright dangerous.

Inland, the valley of the slow and green River Charente epitomizes blue-overalled, Gauloise-smoking, peasant France. The towpath is accessible for long stretches, on foot or mountain bike, and there are boat trips from Saintes and Cognac. The Marais Poitevin, too, with its groves of poplars and island fields reticulated by countless canals and ditches, is both an unusual landscape and easy-going walking or cycling country.

But perhaps the most memorable aspect of the countryside – and indeed of towns like Poitiers and Angoulême – is the presence of exquisite Romanesque churches. This region formed a significant stretch of the medieval pilgrim routes across France and from Britain and northern Europe to the shrine of St Jacques (St James, or Santiago as the Spanish know him) at Compostela in northwest Spain, and was well endowed by its followers. The finest of the churches, among the best in all of France, are to be found in the countryside around Saintes and Poitiers: informal, highly individual and so integrated with their landscape they often seem as rooted as the trees.

Lastly, of course, remember that this is a region of seafood – fresh and cheap in every market for miles inland – and, around the modern, charismatic urban centre that is Bordeaux, some of the world's top vineyards.

POITOU-CHARENTES AND THE ATLANTIC COAST

8

POITOU-CHARENTES AND THE ATLANTIC COAST

618

SPAIN

Poitou

Most of the old province of Poitou comprises a huge expanse of rolling wheat fields and sunflower and maize plantations where the combines crawl and giant sprinklers shoot great arcs of white water over the fields in summertime, and villages are strung out along the valley floors. Heartland of the domains of Eleanor, Duchess of Aquitaine, whose marriage to King Henry II in 1152 brought the whole of southwest France under English control for 300 years, it is also the northern limit of the langue d'oc-speaking part of the country, whose Occitan dialect survives among the older generations even today.

West of Poitiers the open landscape of the Poitou plain gradually gives way to bocages – small fields enclosed by hedges and trees. The local farmers' co-operatives say that digging up woodland and creating vast windswept acreages in the name of efficiency and productivity is going out of fashion. And not just for aesthetic reasons: wind erosion has left scarcely 15cm of topsoil.

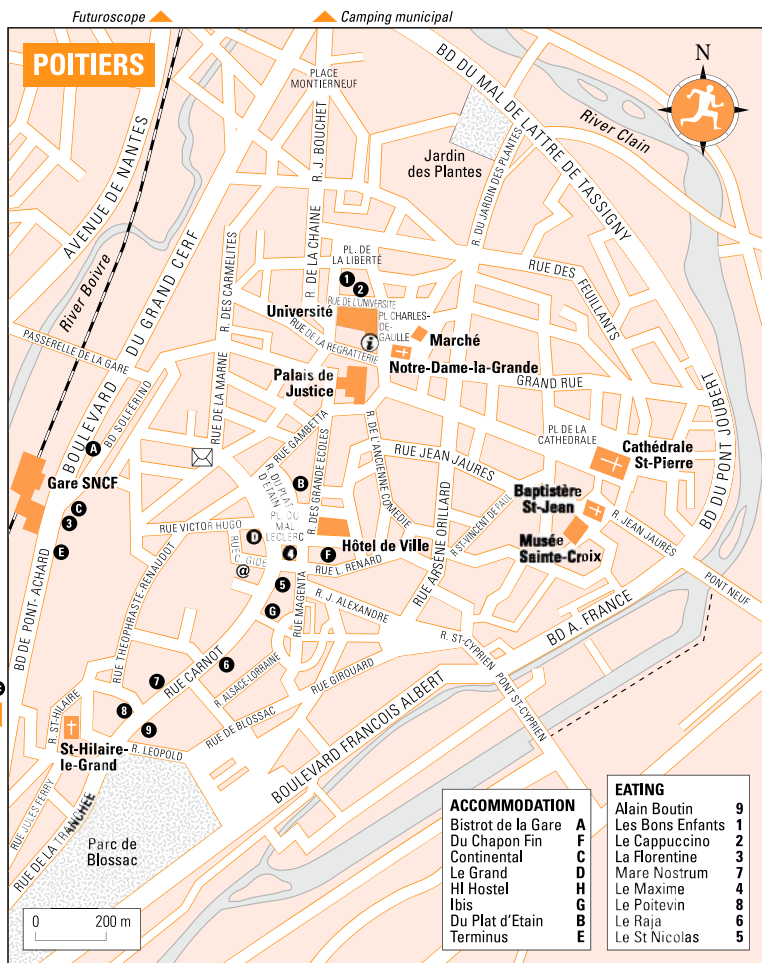

Poitiers

Heading south from Tours on the Autoroute de l'Aquitaine, you'd hardly be tempted by the cluster of towers and office blocks rising from the plain, which is all you see of POITIERS. But draw nearer and things look very different. Sitting on a hilltop overlooking two rivers, Poitiers is a country town with a unique charm that comes from a long and sometimes influential history – as the seat of the dukes of Aquitaine, for instance – discernible in the winding lines of the streets and the breadth of civic, domestic and ecclesiastical architectural fashions represented in its buildings. Its pedestrian precincts and wonderful central gardens make for comfortable sightseeing, while the large student population ensures a lively atmosphere in the restaurants and pavement cafés.

Arrival, information and accommodation

It's a short taxi ride (around €7) into the centre from Poitiers-Biard airport, located to the west of town, while the gare SNCF is on boulevard du Grand Cerf, part of the ring-road system that encircles the base of the hill on which Poitiers is built. There is no gare routière: out-of-town buses, run by Rapides de Poitou (☎05.49.46.27.45), leave from the train station. The tourist office is a fifteen-minute walk away at 45 place Charles-de-Gaulle (mid-June to mid-Sept daily 10am–10pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Mon–Sat 10am–6pm; ☎05.49.41.21.24, 🌐www.ot-poitiers.fr), and can supply walkers and cyclists with various guides to the regional opportunities: the GR364 sets out from here, reaching the Vendée coast via Parthenay.

Bikes can be rented from Cyclamen, 60 bd Pont-Achard (☎05.49.88.13.25), cars from outlets near the train station on boulevard du Grand Cerf, such as National/Citer at no. 48 (☎05.49.58.51.58). If you can hear yourself think over the hordes of teens playing computer games, you'll enjoy the fast Internet connection at Cybercorner at 18 rue Charles-Gide, just off rue Carnot (daily 10am–4am; €2 per hr). The art house and independent films featured at Le Théâtre, place du Maréchal-Leclerc (🌐www.letheatre-poitiers.com), are shown in their original language with French subtitles.

There are plenty of hotels along boulevard du Grand Cerf by the train station, but the area is not particularly salubrious and at night streetwalkers are not uncommon; for more agreeable surroundings it's only a short uphill walk – boulevard Solférino, then to the right up the steep steps – to the town centre on place du Maréchal-Leclerc.

Hotels

- Bistrot de la Gare 131 bd du Grand Cerf
 ☎ 05.49.58.56.30. Cheapest of the station hotels, with decent and reasonably priced rooms, though sometimes noisy. ①
- Du Chapon Fin 11 rue Lebasclès ☎ 05.49.88.02.97, 🌐 www.hotel-chaponfin.com. Very central location – some rooms look out onto

- place Maréchal-Leclerc. All are clean and spacious with en-suite showers. Closed mid-Dec to mid-Jan. ③
- Continental 2 bd Solférino ☎ 05.49.37.93.93, 🌐 www.continental-poitiers.com. Comfortable two-star opposite the train station, whose soundproofed rooms all have bath or shower and TV. ③

Le Grand 28 rue Carnot ☎05.49.60.90.60, www.grandhotelpoitiers.fr. The classiest hotel in Poitiers, with Art Deco-style furnishings and a swanky bar complete with sun terrace. The large rooms all have TV and minibar; some are air-conditioned. 5

Ibis 15 rue du Petit Bonneveau ☎05.49.88.30.42, www.ibishotel.com. One of the better deals in town, a central chain hotel with comfortable rooms. It fills up with businesspeople on week nights. 4

Du Plat d'Étain 7 rue du Plat d'Étain ☎05.49.41.04.80, hotelduplatdetain@orange.fr. An attractive, well-run hotel in a central quiet street just off the main shopping precinct. Closed mid-Dec to early Jan. 3

Terminus 3 bd Pont-Achard ☎05.49.62.92.30, ☎05.49.62.92.40. One of the better hotels around the train station. Rooms are very clean, modern and soundproofed. Worthwhile reductions available for students. 2

Hostel and campsite

HI Hostel 1 allée Roger-Tagault ☎05.49.30.09.70, ☎05.49.30.09.79. Large, modern hostel next to a swimming pool, often overrun with school groups. Take bus #7 from the gare SNCF to “Bellejouanne”, 3km away. Well signposted, it's to the right of the N10 Angoulême road.

Camping municipal rue du Porteau ☎05.49.41.44.88. Grassy site with clean facilities situated 2km north of town; bus #7 towards Le Porteau. June–Sept.

The Town

The two poles of communal life in Poitiers are the tree-lined place du Maréchal-Leclerc, with its popular cafés and lively outdoor culture, and place Charles-de-Gaule to the north, where a big and bustling food and clothes market takes place daily (7am–1pm). Between the two is a warren of prosperous streets – as far along as the half-timbered medieval houses of rue de la Chaîne. Rue Gambetta cuts north past the old Palais de Justice (Mon–Fri 9am–6pm; free), whose nineteenth-century facade hides a much older core, including the magnificent thirteenth-century Gothic grand hall.

The church of Notre-Dame-la-Grande

The Palais de Justice looks down upon one of the greatest and most idiosyncratic churches in France, Notre-Dame-la-Grande (daily 8.30am–7pm), begun in the twelfth-century reign of Eleanor and renovated most recently in the mid-nineties, due to concerns about the salt from the market stalls of fishmongers and salt merchants seeping into the ground and up into the church's facade.

The weirdest and most spectacular thing about the church is the west front, which is wonderfully transformed in a display of coloured lights at 11pm every evening in summer. You can't call the facade beautiful, at least not in a conventional sense, squat and loaded as it is with detail to a degree that the modern eye could regard as fussy. And yet it's this detail which is enthralling, ranging from the domestic to the disturbingly anarchic: in the blind arch to the right of the door, a woman sits in the keystone with her hair blowing out from her head; in the frieze above, Mary places her hand familiarly on Elizabeth's pregnant belly. You see the newborn Jesus admired by a couple of daft-looking sheep and gurgling in his bathtub. Higher still are images of the apostles, and at the apex, where the eye is carried deliberately and inevitably, Christ in Majesty in an almond-shaped inset. Such elaborate sculpted facades – and domes like pine cones on turret and belfry – are the hallmarks of the Poitou brand of Romanesque. The interior, which is crudely overlaid with nineteenth-century frescoes, is not nearly as interesting.

The cathedral and around

At the eastern edge of the old town stands the Cathédrale St-Pierre (daily: May–Sept 8am–7.30pm; Oct–April 8am–6pm), an enormous building on whose broad, pale facade pigeons roost and plants take root. Some of the stained glass dates from the twelfth century, notably the Crucifixion in the central window of the apse, in which the features of Henry II and Eleanor are supposedly discernible. The choir stalls, too, are full of characteristic medieval detail: a coquettish Mary and Child, a peasant killing a boar, the architect at work with his dividers, a baker with a basket of loaves. But it's the grand eighteenth-century organ, the Orgue Clicquot, which is the cathedral's most striking feature, often playing deafening tunes, with organized concerts in the summer.

Opposite – literally in the middle of rue Jean-Jaurès – you come upon a chunky, square edifice with the air of a second-rate Roman temple. It's actually the mid-fourth-century Baptistère St-Jean (April–Sept 10.30am–12.30pm & 3–6pm; Oct–March 2.30–4.30pm; closed Tues except July & Aug; €1), reputedly the oldest Christian building in France and, until the seventeenth century, the only place in town you could have a proper baptism. The “font” was the octagonal pool sunk into the floor. Water pipes uncovered in the bottom show the water could not have been more than 30–40cm deep, which casts doubt upon the popular belief that early Christian baptism was by total immersion. There are also some very ancient and faded frescoes on the walls, including one of the emperor Constantine on horseback, and a collection of Merovingian sarcophagi. Striking a post-modern note between the cathedral and baptistry is the small domed shape of Espace Mendès-France (daily 2–6pm; closed Mon July & Aug; closed Sun Sept–June; €5; @ www.maison-des-sciences.org), which presents exhibitions on science and technology mainly aimed at kids and contains a state-of-the-art planetarium (€6).

Next to the baptistry is the town museum, the Musée Sainte-Croix, 3bis rue Jean-Jaurès (June–Sept Mon 2–6pm, Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–6pm; Oct–May Tues–Fri 10am–noon & 1.15–5pm, Sat–Mon 1.15–5pm; €3.70, free on Tues and 1st Sun of the month; @ www.musees-poitiers.org), featuring an interesting collection of farming implements. There's also a good Gallo-Roman section with some handsome glass, pottery and sculpture, notably a white marble Minerva of the first century. Another possibility is to take a more relaxed walk along the riverside path – on the right across Pont Neuf – upstream to Pont St-Cyprien. On the far bank, you'll see a characteristic feature of every French provincial town: neat, well-manured potagers – vegetable gardens – coming down to the water's edge with a little mud quay at the end and a moored punt.

The Parc de Blossac and St-Hilaire

Towards the southern tip of the old town, where the hump of the hill narrows to a point, the Parc de Blossac is a great spot to sit among the clipped limes and gravelled walks, to watch the boules and munch a baguette. Nearby is a UNESCO world heritage site, the eleventh-century church of St-Hilaire-le-Grand on rue du Doyenné, which unbelievably was pruned of part of its nave in the nineteenth century, though the chevet from the outside is still a fine sight; the apse has a particularly beautiful group of chapels surrounding it.

Eating and drinking

Poitiers offers good opportunities for fine food whatever your culinary persuasions – there's a good range of ethnic options to try if you're bored with French cuisine. If you're really keen to make your money last, you can ask about student/youth offers at the Centre Information Jeunesse (CIJ), 64 rue Gambetta (@05.49.60.68.78). The town's nightlife is best around the university, particularly in the bars along rue Carnot and on place de la Liberté, and posters announcing live music and dancing are easy to spot throughout town.

Alain Boutin 65 rue Carnot ☎05.49.88.25.53. A good bet for regional dishes like cailles au pineau (quails cooked in a brandy liqueur), with a small, carefully chosen selection; menus from €21. Closed Sat & Mon lunch, all Sun & first half of Jan.

Les Bons Enfants 11bis rue Cloche Perse ☎05.49.41.49.82. Good value for money: serves lunchtime menu at €9 on weekdays, evenings from €18. Try the scrumptious house speciality of escargots melted in a parsley-buttered baked potato. Closed Sun evening & Mon.

Le Cappuccino 5 rue de l'Université ☎05.49.88.27.39. One of a number of Italian restaurants in this area, with menus starting at €16.50 and a wide range of ice cream. Closed Sun & Mon.

La Florentine 1 bd Pont-Achard ☎05.49.58.27.95. This smart Italian restaurant offers good pizza and pasta at decent prices. A solid choice if you're staying near the station and don't fancy the walk up the hill.

Mare Nostrum 74 rue Carnot ☎05.49.41.58.80. Mediterranean specialties including maussaka and kawage, a baked ratatouille-style dish with aubergine and haricots verts. Closed Sat & Sun lunch.

Le Maxime 4 rue St-Nicolas ☎05.49.41.09.55. Gastronomique cuisine at its finest: delicious dishes served in an elegant setting. Lunch here is popular with the well-to-do business crowd. Evening menus at €31 and €50. Closed Sat and Sun.

Le Poitevin 76 rue Carnot ☎05.49.88.35.04. Seasonal, local food at decent prices, in an attractive interior with log fire in winter. Menus from €22. Closed Sun evening.

Le Raja 49 rue Carnot ☎05.49.39.24.57. A good-value Indian restaurant with lunchtime menus from €12 and a good range of vegetarian options. Closed Sun evening.

Le St Nicolas 7 rue Carnot ☎05.49.41.44.48. Actually located on a small traffic-free lane off rue Carnot, meaning you can eat outside peacefully. Traditional food with a contemporary feel. Menus €16 & €20. Closed Wed & Sun lunch.

Around Poitiers

The area immediately surrounding Poitiers is dominated by the post-modern cinema theme park Futuroscope, to the north, though more traditional attractions can be found at nearby Chauvigny and St-Savin, which boast medieval centres and two fine Romanesque churches, with some great sculpture and frescoes. Less inspired are the small town of Parthenay and the larger city of Niort, neither of which is worth a special trip, though both make useful stopovers for provisions before you head further west into the verdant marshes of the Marais Poitevin.

Futuroscope

Poitiers' best-known attraction is the giant high-tech film theme park called Futuroscope: Le Parc Européen de l'Image (☎www.futuroscope.com), 8km north of the city, a collection of virtual-reality rides which draw onlookers into the action on screen, with the result that you feel you're being flung around or catapulted through the solar system in a vertigo-inducing 3-D nightmare. Futuroscope opens new attractions every year, and recent additions include various opportunities to interact with robots, taking the park a step beyond the virtual-reality films.

The futuristic cinema pavilions are set in several acres of greenery around a series of undulating lakes, and the 24 attractions take some getting around, with plenty of walking between them, so it's wise to arrive early to beat the huge queues. To see everything in the park in one day, with time off for lunch, takes about ten exhausting hours, and as well as taking in the screen entertainment, you should give yourself time to ride the oversized floating bicycles on

Futuroscope practicalities and attractions

The Paris Montparnasse–Poitiers TGV stops at Futuroscope; there are also regular buses (line #9; €1.20 return) from Poitiers' Hôtel de Ville or gare SNCF. The park is open all year apart from January, from 10am until shortly after sunset, when the laser show has finished. Tickets are valid for one or two days (adult one-day pass €31, child aged 5–16 €24; adult two-day pass €59, child €44) and in the summer you can get a ticket just for the evening laser show (adult €15, child €10). To avoid queues at the park, purchase tickets in advance from the Maison de Tourisme (the tourist office for the Vienne region) at 33 place Charles-de-Gaulle in Poitiers (☎05.49.37.48.48, 🌐www.tourisme-vienne.com). Food is predictably expensive inside, and a picnic lunch can cut costs substantially. There are various deals available that include admission plus a wide selection of accommodation on site, the cheapest of which costs €74 per adult in a four-bed room.

Attractions

Le Cinéma 360° Spain's contribution to Seville Expo '92 is now housed here permanently.

Cyber Avenue 72 multimedia kiosks with virtual games and video games.

Danse avec les Robots Brush up on your dance-floor moves, surrounded by robots showing you how it's done.

Le Défi d'Atlantis A virtual race through the underwater streets and houses of the lost city.

Destination Cosmos A vast planetarium brings the universe to life using images from the Hubble telescope.

Imax Solido An enormous screen, measuring 540 square metres, in conjunction with 3-D vision glasses brings you face to face with dinosaurs, animals or stunning landscapes – depending on what film is showing.

Zoo des Robots Six giant robotic animals parade around, allowing children to pet them and, apparently, learn more about the natural world.

the park's lakes. To orientate yourself, head first for La Gyrotour where a lift takes you to the top of the high rotating tower and you can get the full effect of the futuristic scenario.

All the films are in French, with English commentaries on headphones often available, but as these are not very effective, and as it's the visual impact that's most important anyway, it's better to do without. Apart from the films and robots, there's a laser show, "La Forêt des Rêves", a display of music, colour and effects focused on the park's dancing fountains (shows start daily just after sunset).

Chauvigny

Twenty-three kilometres east of Poitiers, CHAUVIGNY is a busy market town on the banks of the Vienne with half a dozen porcelain factories and lumber mills providing work for the area. Overlooking the bustling ville basse, the old town boasts five medieval castles whose imposing ruins stand atop a precipitous rock spur, but its pride and joy are the sculpted capitals in the Romanesque church of St-Pierre. If you take rue du Château, which winds up the spur from the central place de la Poste, you'll pass the ruins of the Château Baronial, which belonged to the bishops of Poitiers and now hosts displays by birds of prey, then the better-preserved Château d'Harcourt, before coming to the attractive and unusual east end of St-Pierre. A short walk away on the place du Donjon, there's an interesting Musée d'Archéologie (Mon–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm, Sat & Sun 2.30–6.30pm; €4.60), displaying well-preserved tools and pottery. The same ticket gets you into the twelfth-century tower, the Donjon de Gouzou (same hours as the museum) which has a stunning 360-degree panorama out over the town.

Inside, the church of St-Pierre is damp and a little shabby, but the choir capitals are a visual treat. Each one is different, evoking a terrifying, nightmarish world. Graphically illustrated monsters – bearded, moustached, winged, scaly, human-headed with manes of flame – grab hapless mortals – naked, upside-down and puny – ripping their bowels out and crunching their heads. The only escape offered is in the naively serene events of the Nativity. On the second capital on the south side of the choir, for instance, the Angel Gabriel announces Christ's birth to the shepherds while just around the corner the Archangel Michael weighs souls in hand-held scales and a devil tries to grab one for his dinner.

Coinciding your visit with the Saturday or Thursday market gives an extra dimension to a day-trip here. Held between the church of Notre-Dame and the river, it offers a mouthwatering selection of food – oysters, prawns, crayfish, cheeses galore and pâtés in aspic. The cafés are fun, too, bursting with noisy wine-flushed farmers.

There are five buses a day from Poitiers to Chauvigny, which will drop you in the ville basse. The tourist office is located in the old town at 5 rue St-Pierre (June & Sept Tues–Sun 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; July & Aug daily 10am–1pm & 2–7pm; Oct–March Tues–Fri 2–6pm, Sat 9am–noon – in the winter months the tourist office moves to a small booth on the arcade in front of the mairie; ☎05.49.46.39.01, 🌐www.chauvigny.cg86.fr). If you want to stay overnight, your best bet is Le Lion d'Or, 8 rue du Marché (☎05.49.46.30.28, ☎05.49.47.74.28; 🍷) which also has a restaurant with menus from €11. Chauvigny's municipal campsite is just east of the centre on rue de la Fontaine (☎05.49.46.31.94; 📞05.49.46.40.60; May–Sept). To eat, step down into La Bigorne, on place du Donjon next to the church; resembling a hobbit watering-hole, it serves excellent crêpes and omelettes.

St-Savin

You need to get an early start from Poitiers if you want to make a single day-trip by public transport to see both Chauvigny and ST-SAVIN, which is scarcely more than a hamlet in comparison with bustling Chauvigny.

The bus sets you down beside the abbey near the modern bridge over the poplar-lined River Gartempe; walk downstream a little way to the medieval bridge for a perfect view of the abbey church, now listed as a UNESCO monument of universal importance. Built in the eleventh century, possibly on the site of a church founded by Charlemagne, it rises strong and severe above the gazebos, vegetable gardens and lichened tile roofs of the houses at its feet. Inside, steps descend to the narthex and from there to the floor of the nave, stretching out to the raised choir: high, narrow, barrel-vaulted and flanked by bare round columns, their capitals deeply carved with interlacing foliage. The entire vault is covered with paintings, and, though colours are few, they're full of light and grace, depicting scenes from the stories of Genesis and Exodus. Some are instantly recognizable: Noah's three-decked ark, or Pharaoh's horses rearing at the engulfing waves of the Red Sea. Attached to the abbey is a fascinating multimedia museum of Romanesque art history with a number of innovative exhibits about medieval monastic life and architecture (Feb & March daily 1.30–5pm; April–June & Sept–Dec Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun

2–6pm; July & Aug daily 10am–7pm; 🌐 www.pays-montmorillonnais.com). Be warned, though, it is all in French.

You'll find rooms at the squeaky-clean Hôtel de France, 38 place de la République (☎05.49.48.19.03, 📧 hotel-saint-savin@orange.fr; 📍), which has a good restaurant serving menus from €17 (closed Sun eve & Mon except in July & Aug). There's a municipal campsite, too (☎05.49.48.18.02; mid-May to mid-Sept).

Parthenay and around

Directly west of Poitiers, and served by regular SNCF buses, the attractive small town of PARTHENAY was once an important stop on the pilgrim routes to Compostela and is now the site of a major cattle market every Wednesday. It's not a place to make a special detour for, but it's worth a stopover if you're heading north to Brittany or west to the sea.

Parthenay's medieval heart is well worth a look, even if nothing extraordinary stands out. Rue Jean-Jaurès and rue de la Saunerie cut in through the largely pedestrian shopping precinct to the Gothic Porte de l'Horloge, the fortified gateway to the old citadelle on a steep-sided neck of land above a loop of the River Thouet.

Through the gateway, on rue de la Citadelle, the attractively simple Romanesque church of Sainte-Croix faces the mairie across a small garden, which offers views over the ramparts and the gully of St-Jacques, with its medieval houses and vegetable plots climbing the opposite slope. Further along rue de la Citadelle is a handsome but badly damaged Romanesque door, all that remains of the castle chapel of Notre-Dame-de-la-Couldre. Of the castle itself, practically nothing is left, but from the tip of the spur where it once stood you can look down on the twin-towered gateway and the Pont St-Jacques, a thirteenth-century bridge through which the nightly flocks of pilgrims poured into the town for shelter and security. To reach it, turn left under the Tour de l'Horloge and down the medieval lane known as Vaux St-Jacques. The lane is highly evocative of that period, with crooked half-timbered dwellings crowding up to the bridge.

Practicalities

Finding your way around Parthenay is easy. From the gare SNCF, avenue de Gaulle leads directly west to the central square, the place du Drapeau, from where you can follow rue Jean-Jaurès to the medieval centre. The tourist office (Mon–Fri 8.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sat 2.30–6.30pm; ☎05.49.64.24.24, 🌐 www.cc-parthenay.fr) is on the far side of the citadelle at 8 rue de la Vau Saint-Jacques, right next to the old bridge.

If you're after accommodation, you'll find the smart two-star Hôtel du Nord, 86 av de Gaulle, opposite the station (☎05.49.94.29.11; 📍; restaurant from €14, closed Sat), or there is the newly renovated and very comfortable Saint Jacques, av de 114ème RI (☎05.49.64.33.33, 📧 hotel-saint-jacques@district-parthenay.fr; 📍). A hostel sits some way from the centre at 16 rue Blaise-Pascal (☎05.49.95.46.89), with a central annexe at 115 bd Meilleraye: phone first and they will let you into the annexe. Campers have to head to the four-star site at Le Bois Vert (☎05.49.64.78.43, 📧 bois-vert@orange.fr; April–Sept), part of the huge Base de Loisirs riverbank recreation area, about 3km west of Parthenay on the D949.

As for eating, Parthenay has the usual range of restaurants for a provincial town: Italian, Tunisian and Chinese, as well as traditional French. Best of the latter is Le Fin Gourmet, 28 rue Ganne (☎05.49.64.04.53; closed Sun eve, Mon & Wed lunch), where high-quality cuisine combines with a jovial atmosphere; menus range from €33 to €38. L'Esplanade, by the main square at 85 bd Meilleraye (☎05.49.64.00.16; closed Sat evening & Sun out of season) has good inexpensive menus from €9, which can be enjoyed sitting outside in the square.

Around Parthenay

There are three more beautiful Romanesque churches within easy reach of Parthenay. One – with a sculpted facade depicting a mounted knight hawking – is only a twenty-minute walk away on the Niort road, at Parthenay-le-Vieux. The others are at Airvault, 20km northeast of Parthenay and easily accessible on the Parthenay–Thouars SNCF bus route, and St-Jouin-de-Marnes, 9km northeast of Airvault (no public transport). A trip to St-Jouin can easily be combined with a visit to the sixteenth-century Château d'Oiron, 8.5km to the northwest. Alternatively, you could go on north to Thouars, 21km from Airvault or 16km from St-Jouin, to see the abbey church of St-Laon; here there are accommodation options in the form of cheap hotels and a municipal campsite.

Niort

NIORT, 50km southwest of Poitiers, and connected to it by regular trains, makes a useful stopover if your goal is the Marais Poitevin. The town itself has enough of interest to fill a pleasant morning's stroll, and it's the last place before the marshes to get a really wide choice of provisions. The most interesting part of the town is the mainly pedestrian area around rue Victor-Hugo and rue St-Jean, full of stone-fronted or half-timbered medieval houses. Coming from the gare SNCF, take rue de la Gare as far as avenue de Verdun, with the post office on the corner, then turn right into place de la Brèche. Rue Ricard leaves the square on the left; rue Victor-Hugo is its continuation, following the line of the medieval market in a gully separating the two small hills on which Niort is built. Up to the left, opposite the end of rue St-Jean, is the old town hall, a triangular building of the early sixteenth century with lantern, belfry and ornamental machicolations, perhaps capable of repelling drunken revellers but no match for catapult or sledgehammer.

At the end of the street is the river, the Sèvre Niortaise, with gardens and trees along the bank and, over the bridge, the ruins of a glove factory, the last vestige of Niort's once thriving leather industry. At the time of the Revolution, it kept more than thirty cavalry regiments in breeches. Today Niort's biggest industry is insurance: the most bourgeois town in France, so it's said, because of the prosperity brought by the large number of major insurance firms making their headquarters here. Accordingly, restaurants are usually packed at lunchtime, and well-heeled shoppers throng the pedestrianized streets, giving it a fairly lively, affluent feel.

Just downstream, opposite a riverside car park, is the market hall (with a café doing a good cheap lunch) and, beyond, vast and unmistakable on a slight rise, the keep of a castle (currently closed) begun by Henry II of England.

If you want to see the surrounding Marais area, the most pleasurable way is by bike – it's completely flat and small enough to cover pretty well in three days.

Practicalities

The gare SNCF is on rue Mazagran, with the gare routière just next door – though in reality it's no larger than a bus shelter, and local buses all leave from place de la Brèche anyway. The excellent tourist office at 16 rue de Petit St-Jean (July & Aug Mon–Fri 9.30am–7pm, Sat 10am–5pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9.30am–6.30pm, Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm; ☎05.49.24.18.79, 🌐www.niortourisme.com) has plenty of information about walking itineraries around the Marais and can help with reserving hotel rooms; for more rustic accommodation in the Marais itself, contact Gîtes de France, at 15 rue Thiers (☎05.49.24.00.42). You can rent cars at any of the agencies that line rue de la Gare by the station, for example Avis at no. 89 (☎05.49.24.36.98). Annoyingly, there is nowhere to rent bikes in Niort, but you’ll find several options in the Marais Poitevin (see below). Internet access is available at Médi@clac, 8 rue Porte St-Jean (Mon–Sat 2–7pm, €3 per hour).

Restaurants to head for include L’Atelier de Mets, on 247 av de la Rochelle (☎05.49.79.41.06; closed Sun), for traditional Marais Poitevin specialities (menus from €16), and, for lunches, Sucrée Salée, at 2 rue du Temple (☎05.49.24.77.16), which specializes in tarts and crumbles à l’anglaise; menus from €10.

8

Accommodation

There’s the usual crop of hotels close to the station, while more upmarket options are located on avenue de Paris, just off place de Verdun.

Ambassadeur 82 rue de la Gare
☎05.49.24.00.38, 🌐www.ambassadeur-hotel.com. A good deal, with quite luxurious rooms and a pleasant, simply furnished bar to relax in. ③

Grand 32 av de Paris ☎05.49.24.22.21, 🌐www.grandhotel-niort.com. A sparkling, newly renovated hotel, whose higher rooms look out over the town centre. Each room has been decorated with its own individual colour scheme. ⑤

De la Paix 107 rue de la Gare ☎05.49.24.17.90. A cheap option, right outside the train station, with comfortable rooms for the price – all have TV. ②

Le Paris 12 av de Paris ☎05.49.24.93.78, 🌐www.hotelparis79.com. A smart, well-run hotel, part of the Citotel chain. It has its own bar, and is in a handy location for various restaurant options. ③

 Saint Jean 21 av St-Jean-d’Angély
☎05.49.79.20.76, ☎05.49.35.03.27. Run by an extremely friendly and helpful couple, and offering simple rooms with TV. Showers and toilets on the landing are very clean, and it’s closer to the centre than the other options. ①

The Marais Poitevin

The Marais Poitevin is a strange, lazy landscape of fens and meadows, shielded by poplar trees and crisscrossed by an elaborate system of canals, dykes and slow-flowing rivers. Recently declared a regional park, it is known as “La Venise Verte” – the Green Venice – and indeed, farmers in this area frequently travel through the marshes in flat-bottomed punts as their fields lack dry-land access. A tourist industry of sorts has been developing around the villages, so it’s best to avoid weekends, when evidence of the transformation is all too clear.

Access to the eastern edge of the marsh is easiest at the whitewashed village of COULON, on the River Sèvre, just 11km from Niort. The two or three buses per day set you down outside the tourist office on rue Gabriel-Auchier (July & Aug daily 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 10am–1pm & 2–5.30pm; ☎05.49.35.99.29, 🌐www.marais-poitevin.fr). From there it’s a short walk to the central place de L’Eglise where punts can be rented, with or without a guide, from La Trigale (☎05.49.35.14.14, 🌐www.lemaraispoitevin.com), and bikes, tandems and pedal-powered family vehicles are all available from La Libellule (☎05.49.35.83.42, 🌐www.lalibellule.com).

There are two hotels in the village, both likely to be full in season: the family-run Central, 4 rue d’Autremont (☎05.49.35.90.20, 🌐www.hotel-lecentral-coulon.com; ④; closed Sun & Mon, and mid-Jan to early Feb), and the nicely situated Au Marais, 46–48 quai Louis-Tardiy (☎05.49.35.90.43, www.hotel-aumarais.com; 6; closed mid-Dec to late Jan). If you're camping, head for the attractively sited Camping Venise Verte (☎05.49.35.90.36; open April–Oct), in a meadow about 2km downstream (a 25-minute walk), or the municipal campsite La Niquière (☎05.49.35.81.19; May–Sept), north of Coulon on the road to Benet. The best eating option in Coulon is the regional cuisine served up at 🍷 Le Central's characterful restaurant; with generous servings, a well-deserved reputation and a menu from €17.50, it's wise to book.

An excellent place to rent bikes is La Bicyclette Verte (☎05.49.35.42.56, www.bicyclette-verte.com; €9 per day), on route de St Hilaire-la-Palud in the village of ARÇAIS, 10km west of Coulon; they also have children's bikes and tandems. If you're walking the marshes, it's best to stick to the lanes, since cross-country routes tend to end in fields surrounded by water, and you have to backtrack continually. Once you're away from the riverside road from Coulon to Arçais, there's practically no traffic, just meadows and cows. At the seaward end of the marsh – the area south of LUÇON – the landscape changes, becoming all straight lines and open fields of wheat and sunflowers. The villages cap low mounds that were once islands.

The Vendée

The northwest of the Poitou region falls within the rural département of the Vendée, whose main attraction is the eighty-kilometre stretch of coast between chic Les Sables-d'Olonne and the northernmost tip of the scenic Île de Noirmoutier. Inland, there is little of interest, aside from a marvellous summertime spectacle at Les Épesses.

Les Sables-d'Olonne

The area around LES SABLES-D'OLONNE and northwards has been heavily developed with Costa-style apartment blocks. If you're passing through, though, it's worth having a look at the surprisingly good modern art section in the Musée de l'Abbaye Sainte-Croix on rue Verdun (mid-June to Sept Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2.30–6.30pm; Oct to mid-June Tues–Sun 2.30–5.30pm; €4.60) and the collection of 150 classic autos and other vehicles at the Musée d'Automobile, 8km southeast of town on the road to Talmont (April, May, Sept & Oct daily 9.30am–noon & 2–6.30pm; June–Aug daily 9.30am–7pm; www.musee-auto-vendee.com; €7.80). The main reason to stay, though, is the town's vast curve of clean, beautiful beach, which lures hordes in the summer.

Hotels get booked up well in advance for July and August, but you could try Hôtel Antoine, 60 rue Napoléon (☎02.51.95.08.36, www.antoinehotel.com; open April–Oct; 4), with spacious, comfortable rooms. La Vague, a few blocks from the beach at 8 rue des Escoliers (☎ & ☎02.51.32.05.29; 2) is the cheapest stay in town and open year round. For a bit more money and comfort, try the Arundel (☎02.51.32.03.77, www.arundel-hotel.fr; 6–8) at 8 bd Franklin-Roosevelt just behind the tourist office; the more expensive rooms have Jacuzzi baths and (partial) views of the water; prices drop by up to forty percent out of season. The municipal campsite (☎02.51.95.10.42, www.chadotel.com; April–Oct) is on rue des Roses, 400m from the beach; there are several more campsites in the Pironnière district, 3km south of town on the D949. For more accommodation options, ask at the tourist office on 1 promenade Joffre (July & Aug daily 9am–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm, Sun 10.30am–noon; ☎02.51.96.85.85, 🌐www.lessablesdolonne-tourisme.com). The greatest selection of restaurants is on quai des Boucanniers, reached via the shuttle ferry which crosses the port channel (daily 6am–midnight; €0.85). There's Internet access at Mediafun 85, 52 av de Gaulle just next to the train station (Mon 2.30–7pm, Tues–Sat 9.30am–noon & 2–7pm; €3 per hour).

The Île de Noirmoutier

The twenty-kilometre-long Île de Noirmoutier, 60km north of Les Sables-d'Olonne on the D38, was an early monastic settlement of the seventh century; now it has bowed to pilgrims of a different type, serving as a relatively plush tourist resort. Although tourism is the island's main economy, it doesn't dominate everything. Salt marshes here are still worked, spring potatoes sown and fishes fished. The island can be reached in three hours by bus from Les Sables, and is connected to the shore by both bridge and the passage de gois, a channel across which you can drive your car when the tides are low.

Noirmoutier-en-L'Île

The island town, NOIRMOUTIER-EN-L'ÎLE, is a low-key place but has a twelfth-century castle, a church with a Romanesque crypt, an excellent market (Tues, Fri & Sun) in place de la République and most of the island's nightlife in the form of piano bars with longer-than-usual café hours. Campsites are dotted around the island – maps are available from the tourist office (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–1.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm, Sun 9am–1pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm.; ☎02.51.39.80.71, 🌐www.ile-noirmoutier.com) on the main road from the bridge at Barbatre. Bikes can be rented from Vel-hop, 55 av Joseph-Pineau in Noirmoutier (☎02.51.39.01.34).

Food options are pretty easy to come by, with a number of restaurants in the centre. Some good people-watching can be had on place St-Louis at Le Blé Noir, which serves excellent crêpes and galettes starting at €4.

Hotels

Bois de la Chaise 23 av de la Victoire
☎02.51.39.04.62, ☎02.51.39.11.89. A modern hotel with pleasant rooms, all with shower and TV. 4

Chez Bébert 37 av Joseph-Pineau
☎02.51.39.08.97. The place to head if you're on a tight budget. Rooms are small but clean and adequate. 1

Les Capucines 38 av de la Victoire
☎02.51.39.06.82, @capucineshotel@aol.com. An elegant option, just down the road from Bois de la Chaise. Rooms have all the trimmings and there's a good restaurant with menus from €23. 5
Fleur de Sel rue des Saulniers ☎02.51.39.09.07, 🌐www.fleurdesel.fr. The most upmarket hotel on the island, all rooms are luxurious, and the more expensive ones have private terraces. 7–8

The rest of the island

As for exploring the island, the western coast, with its great curves of sand, resembles the mainland, while the northern side dips in and out of little bays with rocky promontories between. Inland, were it not for the saltwater dykes, the horizon would suggest that you were far away from the sea. The more southerly resorts, though built up, have not been the main targets for developers; for accommodation in this part of the island, head for the village of Barbatre; Le Goéland, 15 rte du Gois (☎02.51.39.68.66, 🌐www.hotel-legoeland.fr.st; 4), is just 300m from the beach and has its own private outside terrace. In the village centres there are still the one-storey houses that you see throughout La Vendée and southern Brittany – whitewashed and ochre-tiled with decorative brickwork around the windows and S- or Z-shaped coloured bars on the shutters.

During the spring, the weather is fickle – sunny one moment, stormy the next – and the heat of the summer cultivates a vicious mosquito population.

Les Épesses

Some 80km inland from Les Sables (on the N160 if you're driving), at the ruined Château du Puy du Fou in the village of LES ÉPESSES, a remarkable lakeside extravaganza takes place during the summer months (June–Sept Fri & Sat 10.30pm; 1hr 45min; booking essential, ☎02.51.64.11.11, 🌐www.puydufou.com; €23). It's a weird affair: the enactment of the life of a local peasant from the Middle Ages to World War II, complete with fireworks, lasers, dances on the lake and Comédie Française voice-overs. The story, available in English through a headset translation (€7) is interesting but incidental – the massive spectacle itself is the real attraction, and all proceeds from the event go to charity.

To get to Les Épesses by public transport, you'll need to venture to Cholet (connected by train from Nantes) and take a bus south from there; Puy du Fou itself is 2.5km from Les Épesses on the D27 to Chambretaud. The tourist office in Cholet (☎02.41.49.80.00) can provide information about transport. There is one reasonably priced hotel in Les Épesses, La Crémaillère, 2 rue de la Libération (☎ & 📞02.51.57.30.01; 📍), and further accommodation options 10km west in Les Herbiers.

The coast around La Rochelle

The coast around La Rochelle – especially the islands – is great for young families, with miles of safe sandy beaches and shallow water. Be aware, however, that in August, unless you're camping or book in advance, accommodation is a near-insuperable problem. Out of season you can't rely on sunny weather, but that shouldn't deter you since the quiet misty seascapes and working fishing ports have a melancholy romance all their own. La Rochelle and Royan in the south are the best bases, and are both served by train. Away from these centres – if you're not driving – you'll have to take pot luck with the rather quirky bus routes.

La Rochelle and around

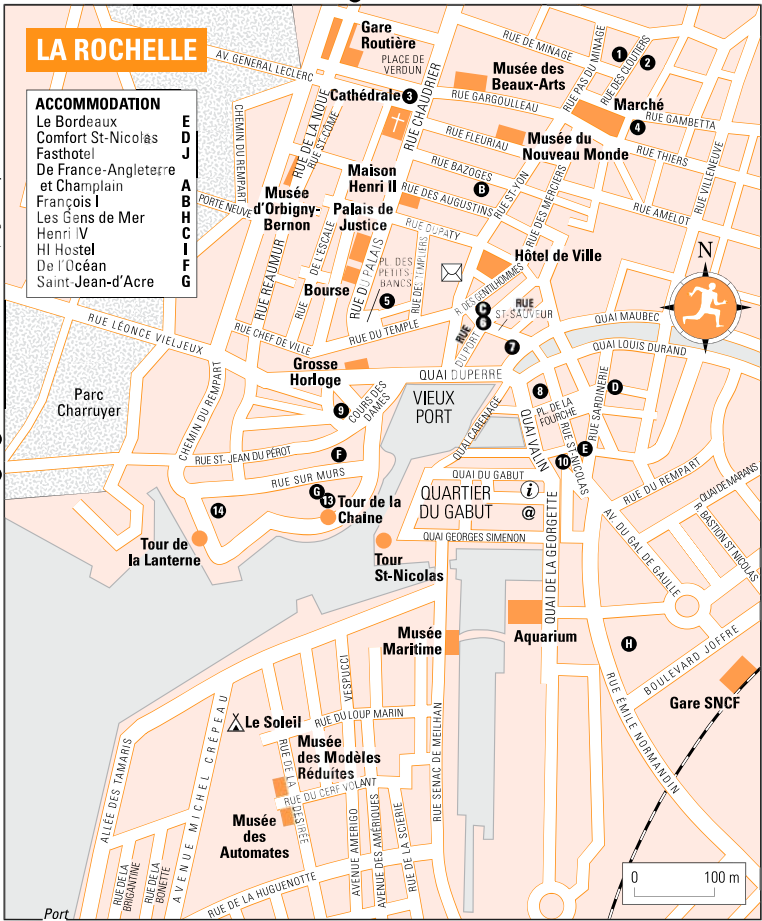

LA ROCHELLE is the most attractive and unspoilt seaside town in France. Thanks to the foresight of 1970s mayor Michel Crépeau, its historic seventeenth- to eighteenth-century centre and waterfront were plucked from the clutches of the developers and its streets freed of traffic for the delectation of

LA ROCHELLE

ACCOMMODATION

- Le Bordeaux
- Comfort St-Nicolas
- Fasthotel
- De France-Angleterre et Champlain
- François I
- Les Gens de Mer
- Henri IV
- HI Hostel
- De l'Océan
- Saint-Jean-d'Acres

- E
- D
- J
- A
- B
- H
- C
- I
- F
- G

EATING		DRINKING
Les 4 Sergents	14	Académie de la Bière	5
Café-Resto à la Villette	4	Cave de la Guignette	8
A Côté de Chez Fred	10	Corrigan's	2
Café Leffe	13	Mayflower	5
La Marie-Galante	15
La Moulinière	7
Café de la Paix	3
Pub Lutèce	6
Richard Coutanceau	11
Le soleil brille pour tout le monde	1
		L' Oxford	12
		Piano Pub	5
		Le Triolet	9

pedestrians. A real shock-horror outrage at the time, the policy has become standard practice for preserving old town centres across the country – more successful than Crépeau's picturesque yellow bicycle plan, designed to relieve the traffic problem.

La Rochelle has a long history, so you would expect of such a sheltered Atlantic port. Eleanor of Aquitaine gave it a charter in 1199, which released it from its feudal obligations, and it rapidly became a port of major importance, trading in salt and wine and skilfully exploiting the Anglo-French quarrels. The Wars of Religion, however, were particularly destructive for La Rochelle. It turned Protestant and, because of its strategic importance, drew the remorseless enmity of Cardinal Richelieu, who laid siege to it in 1627. To the dismay of the townspeople, who reasoned that no one could effectively blockade seasoned mariners like themselves, he succeeded in sealing the harbour approaches with a dyke. The English dispatched the Duke of Buckingham to their aid, but he was caught napping on the Île de Ré and badly defeated. By the end of 1628 Richelieu had starved the city into submission. Out of the pre-siege population of 28,000, only 5000 survived. The walls were demolished and the city's privileges revoked. La Rochelle later became the principal port for trade with the French colonies in the Caribbean Antilles and Canada. Indeed, many of the settlers, especially in Canada, came from this part of France.

▲ Vieux Port, La Rochelle

Arrival, information and transport

Ryanair now runs daily flights here from London's Stansted airport, which accounts for the large number of Brits who visit. Bus #7 runs every twenty minutes between the airport and town centre (Mon–Sat 7am–7.20pm; €1.20; 10min) Once in town, finding your way around La Rochelle is very straightforward. Arriving by train at the elaborate gare SNCF on boulevard Joffre, take avenue de Gaulle opposite to reach the town centre; on the left as you reach the waterfront you'll see the efficient tourist office, on quai du Gabut (April–June & Sept Mon–Sat 9am–6pm, Sun 10.30am–5.30pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–8pm, Sun 10.30am–5.30pm; Oct–March Mon–Sat 10am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, Sun 10am–1pm; ☎05.46.41.14.68, @www.larochelle-tourisme.com), which has excellent maps and a €6.60 museum pass covering the Nouveau Monde, the Origny-Bernon and the Beaux-Arts. The office also leads morning walking tours of the old town (July & Aug Mon–Sat 10.30am, Sept–June Tues, Sat & Sun 10.30am; €6), and rather more fun two-hour evening tours of the city, led by a local donning medieval garb (mid-June to mid-Sept Thurs 8.30pm; €8). In addition, the CDIJ Youth Centre, 2 rue des Gentilshommes (☎05.46.41.16.36), has an information service for young people. Most things you'll want to see are in the area behind the waterfront; in effect, between the harbour and the place de Verdun, where the gare routière is situated. If you need an Internet connection, head to Akromicro, rue de l'Aimable Nanette (10am–midnight; €3 per hour).

Transport

The bus terminal for the town's efficient public transport system is also located on place de Verdun, and once you've stowed your luggage at your hotel, you can use bikes to get around: there are two free municipal bike parks, heir to Michel Crépeau's original pick-up-and-leave scheme: one in place de Verdun by the gare routière (Mon–Sat 7.30am–7pm, Sun 1.15–7pm), the other on quai Valin near the tourist office (May–Sept only 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–7pm). You get two hours of free bike time after handing over ID; after this it's a generous €1 per hour. Car rental is available from Ada, 19 av de Gaulle (☎05.46.41.02.17), and Rent-a-car, 29 av de Gaulle (☎05.46.27.27.27). There is a nifty, fixed-rate taxi system, but it's only available to residents of La Rochelle; visitors who need a taxi should call ☎05.46.41.22.22 or 05.46.41.55.55. All town transport is coordinated by RTCR (☎05.46.34.02.22, 🌐www.rtc.fr).

La Rochelle is the area's hub for maritime transport, with boat tours of the town as well as services to the Île de Ré, Île d'Oléron, Île d'Aix and Fort Boyard. Companies with departures from the port here include Navipromer (☎05.46.01.52.96) and Interîles (☎08.25.13.55.00, 🌐www.inter-iles.com); times and prices vary seasonally, and weather and tides may affect crossings.

Accommodation

Accommodation in La Rochelle can be a bit of a problem, so you should be sure to book in advance from May until well into autumn, even if you're camping. In general you can expect to pay resort prices at most establishments, especially in season. Alternatively, you might try the self-catering apartments that abound, particularly around Les Minimes and its Village Informatique. The tourist office has a handy board of rented accommodation and is able to reserve hotel rooms for a small fee.

Hotels

Le Bordeaux 43 rue St-Nicolas ☎05.46.41.31.22, 🌐www.hotel-bordeaux-fr.com. Comfortable, friendly hotel in a characterful pedestrianized street between the train station and the port. Closed Dec. 4

Comfort St-Nicolas 13 rue Sardinerie ☎05.46.41.71.55, 🌐www.comforthotel-larochelle.com. A very attractive, modernized hotel in a pretty street 2min from the harbour. All rooms have air a/c and flat-screen TVs. 5

Fasthotel 20 rue Alfred-Kastler, Les Minimes ☎05.46.45.46.00, 🌐www.3y.fr/larochelle. Small, quiet hotel made up of modern bungalows, fifteen minutes from the port des Minimes and the beach. Larger rooms are available for families. 4

De France-Angleterre et Champlain 20 rue Rambaud ☎05.46.41.23.99, 🌐www.bw-fa-champlain.com. This chain hotel offers one of the best deals in town. The foyer is grand and elegant, with a marble staircase, and all rooms are luxurious and nicely decorated with paintings and drawings on the walls. 4–6

François I 15 rue Bazoges ☎05.46.41.28.46, 🌐www.hotelfrancois1er.fr. Well-maintained hotel in a historic building with a walled courtyard. It's been modernized since François himself used to stop off here – there's an Internet access terminal for guests, and all rooms have bath, TV and phone. Prices drop by up to 40 percent in the off season. Closed Dec. 6

Les Gens de Mer 20 av du Général-de-Gaulle ☎ 05.46.41.26.24, 🌐 www.lesgensdemer.fr. One of the cheaper options in town, right next to the train station. Modern, comfortable rooms, all with shower and TV. 3

Henri IV 31 rue des Gentilhommes ☎ 05.46.41.25.79, 📧 henri-iv@orange.fr. Recently renovated, this popular hotel has sparkling rooms right in the town centre on place de la Caille, a short stroll from the harbour front. 5

De l'Océan 36 cours des Dames ☎ 05.46.41.31.97, 🌐 www.hotel-ocean-larochelle.com. Comfortable two-star hotel in an enviable location, with air-conditioned rooms – many with views of the port. 6

Saint-Jean-d'Acre 4 place de la Chaîne ☎ 05.46.41.73.33, 🌐 www.hotel-la-rochelle.com. This modern, luxurious Inter-hôtel offers good-sized rooms with probably the city's best views of the towers and harbour. 6

Hostel and campsites

HI Hostel av des Minimes ☎ 05.46.44.43.11, 🌐 www.fuaj-aj-larochelle.fr.st. A big modern hostel overlooking the marina at Port des Minimes, a 10min walk from the beach, shops and restaurants, and with a self-service restaurant and bar. Shared dorm-style rooms here cost around €14. Catch bus #10 from place de Verdun to Les Minimes, or walk from the train station, following the signs to the left.

Camping municipal de Port-Neuf on the north-west side of town ☎ 05.46.43.81.20. Well-kept and shaded campsite about 40min walk from the town centre. Take bus #20 from place Verdun, direction "Port-Neuf". Open all year.

Camping Le Soleil av Michel Crépeau ☎ 05.46.44.42.53. In a great location near the hostel and close to the beaches, this site is often crowded with raucous young holiday-makers. Take bus #10 from place Verdun to Les Minimes. Open late June to late Sept.

The Town

The Vieux Port is very much the focus of the town, with pleasure boats moored in serried ranks in front of the two impressive towers guarding the entrance to the port. Leading north from the Porte de la Grosse Horloge, the rue du Palais runs towards the cathedral and several of the museums on rue Thiers. Between the harbour and the Port des Minimes, a new marina development 2km south of the town centre, there are several excellent museums for children and a large frigate (permanently moored) providing some insight into the town's sea-going past.

The Vieux Port

Dominating the inner harbour, the heavy Gothic gateway of the Porte de la Grosse Horloge straddles the entrance to the old town. The quays in front of it are too full of traffic to encourage loitering; for that, it's best to head out along the tree-lined cours des Dames towards the fourteenth-century Tour de la Chaîne (May–Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2–6.30pm; Oct–April daily except Mon 10am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; €5, or €10.50 for entry to all three towers), so called because of the heavy chain that was slung from here across to the opposite tower, Tour St-Nicolas, to close the harbour at night. Today the only night-time intruders are likely to be yachties from across the Channel, whose craft far outnumber the working boats – mainly garishly painted trawlers. Beyond the tower, steps climb up to rue Sur-les-Murs, which follows the top of the old sea wall to a third tower, the Tour de la Lanterne or Tour des Quatre Sergents, named after four sergeants imprisoned and executed for defying the Restoration monarchy in 1822 (same times and prices as at Tour de la Chaîne). There's a way up onto what's left of the city walls, planted with unkempt greenery. Beyond is the beach, backed by a casino, hot-dog stands and amusement booths, along with an extensive, truly beautiful belt of park that continues up the western edge of the town centre and along the avenue du Mail behind the beach, where the first seaside village was built by the Rochelais rich.

The rue du Palais and around

The real charm of La Rochelle lies on the city's main shopping street, rue du Palais, leading up from the Vieux Port to place de Verdun. Lining the street are eighteenth-century houses, some grey-stone, some half-timbered, with distinctive Rochelais-style slates overlapped like fish scales, while the shopfronts are set back beneath the ground-floor arcades. Among the finest are the Hôtel de la Bourse – actually the Chamber of Commerce – and the Palais de Justice with its colonnaded facade, both on the left-hand side. A few metres further on, in rue des Augustins, there is another grandiose affair built for a wealthy Rochelais in 1555, the so-called Maison Henri II, complete with loggia, gallery and slated turrets, where the regional tourist board has its offices. Place de Verdun itself is dull and characterless, with an uninspiring, humpbacked, eighteenth-century classical cathedral on the corner. Its only redeeming feature is the marvellously opulent belle-époque Café de la Paix (see p. 638).

To the west of rue du Palais, especially in rue de l'Escale, paved with granite sets brought back from Canada as ballast in the Rochelais cargo vessels, you get the discreet residences of the eighteenth-century shipowners and chandlers, veiling their wealth with high walls and classical restraint. A rather less modest gentleman once installed himself on the corner of rue Fromentin: a seventeenth-century doctor who adorned his house front with the statues of famous medical men – Hippocrates, Galen and others. In rue St-Côme closer to the town walls is the Musée d'Orbigny-Bernon (April–Sept Mon & Wed–Fri 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6pm, Sat & Sun 2.30–6pm; Oct–March Mon & Wed–Fri 9.30am–12.30pm & 1.30–5pm, Sat & Sun 2.30–6pm; €3.50, or part of the museum pass, see p.633), with an extensive section on local history, important collections of local faïence, porcelain from China and Japan and some handsome furniture.

East of rue du Palais, and starting out from place des Petits-Bancs, rue du Temple takes you up alongside the Hôtel de Ville (guided tours daily 3pm; €3.50), protected by a decorative but seriously fortified wall. It was begun around 1600 in the reign of Henri IV, whose initials, intertwined with those of Marie de Médicis, are carved on the ground-floor gallery. It's a beautiful specimen of Frenchified Italian taste, adorned with niches and statues and coffered ceilings, all done in a stone the colour of ripe barley. For quiet contemplation of these seemingly more gracious times, try the terrace of the Café de la Poste, in the small, traffic-free square outside. For more relaxed vernacular architecture nearly as ancient, carry on up rue des Merciers, the other main shopping area, to the cramped and noisy market square, where a food market takes place every morning, close to which you'll find the Musée du Nouveau Monde (same opening times and price as Musée d'Orbigny-Bernon, see above; included in the museum pass, see p.633), whose entrance is in rue Fleuriau. This museum occupies the former residence of the Fleuriau family, rich shipowners and traders who, like many of their fellow Rochelais, made fortunes out of the slave trade and Caribbean sugar, spices and coffee. There's a fine collection of prints, paintings and photos of the old West Indian plantations; seventeenth- and eighteenth-century maps of America; and an interesting display of aquatint illustrations for Marmontel's novel Les Incas – an amazing mixture of sentimentality and coy salaciousness. Nearby in rue Gargoulleau is the Musée des Beaux-Arts (opening times and prices as Musée d'Orbigny-Bernon; included in the museum pass, see p.633), whose works are centred around a few Rochelais artists and illustrate the history of art from the primitives to the present day.

Back towards the port, rue St-Nicolas and place de la Fourche boast several antique dealers and bookshops, and also share a flea market on Saturdays.

The quartier du Gabut and south to the Port des Minimes

On the east side of the old harbour behind the Tour St-Nicolas is the quartier du Gabut, the one-time fishermen's quarter of wooden cabins and sheds, now converted into bars, shops and eating places. Beyond it lies an extensive dock and the market and service buildings of the old fishing port. Right on the quayside is the spectacular aquarium (daily: April–June & Sept 9am–8pm; July & Aug 9am–11pm; Oct–March 10am–8pm; @ www.aquarium-larochelle.com; adults €12.50, children €9.50), whose pride and joy is an enormous shark tank containing twenty specimens. Opposite the aquarium is the Musée Maritime (@ www.museemaritimelaroche.fr), consisting of two ships: an old weather station and a trawler whose working days are behind it. Both vessels were due for an overhaul at the time of writing, with the museum expected to reopen by mid-2007; check at the tourist office for opening hours and prices.

A further ten-minute walk brings you to the Musée des Automates (daily: July & Aug 9.30am–7pm; Sept–June 10am–noon & 2–6pm; adults €7.50, children €5, or joint ticket with Musée des Modèles Réduits, adults €11, children €6.50; @ www.museedesautomates.com) on rue de la Désirée, a fascinating collection of three hundred automated puppets, drawing you into an irresistible fantasy world. Some of the puppets are interesting from a historical angle; others, like one that writes the name “Pierrot”, from a mechanical viewpoint. Further down the same street is the Musée des Modèles Réduits (same hours and ticket prices as the Automates). The prices may be a bit prohibitive for families – especially considering the whole tour takes barely half an hour – but this does combine well with a visit to the neighbouring Musée des Automates. Scale models of every variety and era are on show, starting with cars and including models of a submerged shipwreck and La Rochelle train station.

The Port des Minimes is a large modern marina development with mooring for thousands of yachts, about 2km south of the old harbour. Bus #10 from place Verdun will get you there, as will the more entertaining bus de mer, a small boat which runs from the old port to Port des Minimes, (April–June & Sept hourly 10am–7pm except 1pm; July & Aug half-hourly 9am–11.30pm; Oct–March Sat & Sun hourly 10am–6pm except 1pm; €1.50 one way), otherwise it's a thirty-minute walk along the waterfront. There are shops, restaurants, bars and apartments, and the young and gorgeous flock out here at weekends and on summer evenings to parade on the beautiful plage des Minimes.

Eating

For eating, try the rue du Port/rue St-Sauveur area just off the waterfront, or the attractive rue St-Jean-du-Pérot, which has everything from crêperies and pizzerias to expensive gourmet restaurants and several ethnic eateries including Indian and Chinese places. Particularly worth seeking out are the town's many excellent fish restaurants. Ernest Le Glacier, 15 rue du Port, and Olivier Glacier, 21 rue St-Jean-du-Pérot, both serve excellent ice cream well into the evening.

Les 4 Sergents 49 rue St-Jean-du-Pérot
☎ 05.46.41.35.80. Despite its smart appearance, the food here is not quite haute cuisine, but it's tasty nonetheless, and the restaurant has its own wine cave two doors down. Closed Mon lunch.

Café-Resto à la Villette 4 rue de la Forme, behind the market. Tiny, authentic place popular with locals; good plats du jour from €7.70.

Closed Sun.

A Côté de Chez Fred 30–32 rue St-Nicolas ☎ 05.46.41.65.76. A characterful corner restaurant decorated with watercolours of seaside scenes. A blackboard carte changes depending on what's in at Fred the fishmonger's next door. Fish and oyster dishes from €9; around €17 for a full meal. Booking advisable. Closed Sun.

Café Lefte 48 cours des Dames. Brilliantly situated next to the Tour de la Chaine, this brasserie is popular from breakfast through to late evening, serving sandwiches and ice cream all day.

La Marie-Galante 35 av des Minimes ☎ 05.46.44.05.54. Pretty blue awnings over the outdoor seating overlooking the yacht basin at Les Minimes. Fish of the day is €10; generous menus from €11 at lunch. Its three neighbours are also good value.

La Moulinière 24 rue St-Sauveur ☎ 05.46.41.18.16. This is the place to come for mussels, which are served no fewer than twelve different ways. The creative maritime decor makes it a pleasant place to eat as well. Menus from €15. Closed Sun, and Mon evening out of season.

Café de la Paix place de Verdun. All mirrors, gilt and plush, La Rochelle's ladies of means come here to sip lemon tea and nibble daintily at sticky cakes – and there is a tempting charcuterie and seafood shop next door.

Pub Lutèce 1bis rue St-Sauveur. Reasonably priced brasserie with outdoor tables smack in the middle of all the action. Serves crêpes all day long.

Richard Coutanceau plage de la Concurrency ☎ 05.46.41.48.19. Located on the seafront just to the west of the old harbour, with a perfect view out over the beach and sea, this place is a veritable palace of gastronomic excellence, renowned for its fish and seafood and specialities. Menus €45–85.

Le soleil brille pour tout le monde 13 rue des Cloutiers ☎ 05.46.41.11.42. Cheerful and colourful food in agreeable surroundings. The tartes (€7.50) are outstanding and, like almost everything else here, are made from fresh organic ingredients from the market down the road. Mostly vegetarian, though seafood and meat sometimes feature on the plats du jour. Very popular, so book or get here early. Closed Sun & Mon.

Bars, nightlife and entertainment

As well as the numerous brasseries round the old harbour, a popular daytime bar to hang out at is the dark and down-to-earth wine bar Cave de la Guignette at 8 rue St-Nicolas, offering great pitchers of sangria. For a bit more local colour, head away from the waterfront to the area around the market, which is less crowded and has some great establishments. By far the most authentic of La Rochelle's numerous Irish pubs is Corrigan's at 20 rue des Cloutiers, which has a relaxed and familiar atmosphere, enjoyed by a mainly local clientele. Barry, the affable owner, organizes regular live music, including Irish folk evenings most Sundays. Check out @www.corrigans.fr for more details.

To find out what's on, try the monthly magazine Sortir, available at the tourist office, with theatre, cinema and mainstream and classical music listings. For nightlife, head for the rue St-Nicolas: many bars line the streets, some offering live music and most with a lively atmosphere. An older crowd heads for the more relaxed atmosphere of rue des Templiers, where you'll find the Piano Pub, the Mayflower and the Académie de la Bière. Nightclubs worth checking out include L'Oxford, plage de la Concurrency (☎05.46.41.51.81), and Le Triolet, 8 rue des Carmes (☎05.46.41.03.58). La Rochelle is also host to the major festival of French-language music, Les Francofolies (@www.francofolies.fr), in mid-July, which features musicians from overseas as well as France and attracts the best part of 100,000 fans to the city.

The île de Ré

A half-hour drive west from La Rochelle, the île de Ré is a low, narrow island some 30km long, fringed by sandy beaches to the southwest and salt marshes and oyster beds to the northeast, with the interior a motley mix of small-scale vine, asparagus and wheat cultivation. All the buildings on Ré must abide by height restrictions and incorporate the typical local features of whitewashed walls, curly orange tiles and green-painted shutters, which gives the island villages a southern holiday atmosphere but unfortunately also makes them look nearly identical.

Out of season the island has a slow, misty charm, and life in its little ports revolves exclusively around the cultivation of oysters and mussels. In season, though, it's extraordinarily crowded, with upwards of 400,000 visitors passing through. The crowds mainly head for the southern beaches; those to the northeast are covered in rocks and seaweed, and the sea is too shallow for bathing.

The island is connected to the mainland at LA PALLICE, a suburb of La Rochelle, by a three-kilometre-long toll bridge (€16.50 round trip per car in high season, €9 in low season). La Pallice was once a big commercial port with important shipyards, and although it still serves as a naval base, times have changed. As you drive past, you'll notice some colossal weather-stained concrete sheds, submarine pens built by the Germans to service their Atlantic U-boat fleet during World War II. Too difficult to demolish, they are still in use. As an alternative to the toll-bridge connection, Interîles, 14 cours des Dames, La Rochelle (✉ www.inter-iles.com), also runs a passenger boat service to Sablonceaux on Ré (€15 return), and combined trips to the Îles de Ré and Oléron.

ST-MARTIN, the island's capital, is an atmospheric north-coast fishing port with whitewashed houses clustered around the stone quays of a well-protected harbour, from where trawlers and flat-bottomed oyster boats, piled high with cage-like devices used for "growing" oysters, slip out every morning on the muddy tide.

The military adventures of the Duke of Buckingham, who attacked the island unsuccessfully in 1627, are now only recalled by signs to the backstreet nightclub Le Bouquingam. However, to the east of the harbour, you can walk along the almost perfectly preserved fortifications – redesigned by Vauban in the late seventeenth century after Buckingham's attentions – to the citadelle, long used as a prison. From 1860 until 1938, it served as departure point for the bagnards – prisoners sentenced to hard labour in the penal colonies of French Guiana and New Caledonia. Most were headed for swift death and oblivion; one who wasn't was Henri Charrière, aka "Papillon", who floated away from Devil's Island on a sack of coconuts after nine escape attempts and thirteen years in the colonies, and went on to write a bestseller about it.

Practicalities

Rébus runs bus services all over the island from La Rochelle, leaving regularly from place Verdun via the train station; crossing to Sablonceaux just across the bridge costs €2.90. For frequent travelling, ten-trip cards are better value: La Rochelle–Sablonceaux costs €23.10, La Rochelle–St-Martin €43.20, La Rochelle to anywhere on the island €61.20, but the timetable can be awkward if you want to tour the island.

A great way to explore the island is on the excellent network of cycle paths which crisscross it. Bikes can be rented from Cyclosurf (☎05.46.30.19.51, ✉ www.cyclo-surf.fr) or Cycland (☎05.46.09.08.66, ✉ www.cycland.fr), who both have shops in all the towns on Ré and charge around €10 per day. Your best bet for Internet access is CybeRése@u at 15 cours Pasteur in St-Martin (Mon–Sat 11am–1pm & 3–6.30pm, longer hours in summer; €4 per hour).

Hotels are plentiful in all the island's villages, though packed in July and August. Most reasonably priced are the one-star Le Sénéchal, 6 rue Gambetta in Ars-en-Ré, in a protected bay on the western side of the island

The municipal campsite (☎05.46.82.67.70; March–Nov) is a long haul if you've arrived at the gare SNCF: take avenue du Président-Wilson and keep going straight, until you reach the bottom of rue Toufaire, where you turn right, then left – about half an hour all the way. Internet access is available at Cybernet Copy 17, 38 rue du Dr-Peltier (Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; €3 per hour). In July and August, bikes can be hired from the train station for a generous €1 per hour.

Hotels

Caravelle 34 rue Jaurès ☎05.46.99.02.53, www.hotel-lacaravelle-rochefort.com. This central hotel offers brightly coloured comfortable rooms, all equipped with TV and shower. ③

La Corderie Royale rue Audebert ☎05.46.99.35.35, www.corderieroyale.com. The smartest hotel in Rochefort, with luxurious rooms and its own swimming pool. It's situated in the lovely grounds of the ropeworks, a stone's throw from the banks of the Charente. Closed Feb. ⑦

Lafayette 10 av Lafayette ☎05.46.99.03.31, www.hotel-lafayette.fr. Excellent value – all the rooms are newly renovated, with soundproofed walls, TV and Internet points. Significantly larger rooms are available for families. ③

Le Welcome place Françoise-Dorléac ☎05.46.99.00.90, www.le-welcome-rochefort.com. The cheapest rooms in town, but still very acceptable; all have TV. There's also a garden and a good brasserie. ①

Hostel

HI Hostel 20 rue de la République ☎05.46.99.74.62. A basic hostel with clean rooms, communal kitchen and a pleasant garden area; no breakfast though. Dorm beds cost €13.

The Town

If you have a taste for the bizarre, then there's one good reason for visiting Rochefort – the house of the novelist Julien Viaud (1850–1923), alias Pierre Loti. Forty years a naval officer, he wrote numerous bestselling romances with exotic oriental settings and characters. The Maison Pierre Loti, at 141 rue Pierre-Loti (guided tours: July to mid-Sept daily every 30min from 10am; mid-Sept to June Mon & Wed–Sat 10.30am, 11.30am, 2pm, 3pm & 4pm; closed Tues Jan & public hols; €7.80; ☎05.46.99.16.88, reservations essential), is part of a row of modestly proportioned grey-stone houses, outwardly a model of petit-bourgeois conformity and respectability; inside an outrageous and fantastical series of rooms decorated to exotic themes. There's a medieval banqueting hall complete with Gothic fireplace and Gobelin tapestries; a monastery refectory with windows pinched from a ruined abbey; a Damascus mosque; and a Turkish room, with kilim wall-hangings and a ceiling made from an Alhambra mould. To suit the mood of the place, Loti used to throw extravagant parties: a medieval banquet with swan's meat and hedgehog and a fête chinoise with the guests in costumes he had brought back from China, where he took part in the suppression of the Boxer rebellion.

Also worth a quick look is the Centre International de la Mer (April–Sept 9am–7pm; Oct–March 10am–6pm; €5; www.corderie-royale.com) situated in the Corderie Royale, or the royal ropeworks, off rue Toufaire. At 372m, the Corderie is the longest building in France and a rare and splendid example of seventeenth-century industrial architecture, substantially restored after damage in World War II. From 1660 until the Revolution, it furnished the entire French navy with rope, and the building now houses an appropriate exhibition on ropes and rope-making, including machinery from the nineteenth century. If you don't fancy visiting the museum, it's definitely worth a wander around the extensive building and its lawns along the River Charente, whose reed-fringed banks support a garden made up of plants brought back from long-forgotten expeditions overseas. One such, financed by Michel Bégon, quartermaster of Rochefort in 1688, brought back the flower we know as the begonia. The small harbour, the Bassin Laperouse, next to the Corderie, is also worth a stroll.

Eating and drinking

Strolling through Rochefort, you should have no trouble finding somewhere to eat, though few establishments are culinary standouts. For inexpensive meals head to rue Toufaire, where there's 🍷 Le Galion, which offers high-quality menus from €13 to enjoy on a quiet terrace by the arsenal; or try the more than adequate Vietnamese/Chinese, L'Asie, at no. 45. Probably the most upmarket restaurant in Rochefort is Les Quatres Saisons, 76 rue Grimaux (☎05.46.83.95.12; closed Sun & Mon), with menus from €23. On place Colbert, Le Comptoir des Îles serves good beer and brasserie fare, while the Garden Ice Café on the corner of rue de la République is the liveliest of the bars later in the evening.

8

Fouras and the Île d'Aix

FOURAS, some 30km south of La Rochelle and accessible by regular Océcar and Kéolis Littoral buses, is the main embarkation point for the tiny Île d'Aix (see below), where Napoleon spent his last days in Europe. It's an uninspiring town, redeemed only by a clutch of popular beaches and the presqu'île, the peninsula that extends 3km out to sea from the town centre, terminating at the ferry dock, Pointe de la Fumée. The peninsula is bordered by oyster beds, and off its westernmost tip at low tide can be seen the bouchots à moules, lines of mussel-encrusted stumps of wood. At high tide this is a popular place to fish for crevettes (shrimp). The finger of land is hemmed by sea-dashed fortresses, originally intended to protect the Charente, and particularly La Rochelle, against Norman attack, and later employed against the Dutch in the seventeenth century and English in the eighteenth. The seventeenth-century Fort Vauban (daily 10am–7pm) now houses a small local history museum (€2.50), but its esplanade offers a magnificent panorama of neighbouring forts and islands, including the lesser visited Île Madame, which is accessible at low tide from Port des Barques, via the Passe aux Boeufs causeway.

Fouras's tourist office, which also serves the Île d'Aix, is situated on avenue du Bois Vert on the peninsula (mid-June to mid-Sept Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–6.30pm, Sun 9am–noon & 2–6pm; mid-Sept to mid-June Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 2–6pm; ☎05.46.84.60.69). As for places to stay, Fouras has a posse of overpriced hotels, many of which can be contacted online at @www.fouras.net, but first options should be the good-value Roseraie, at 2 rue Eric-Tabarly (☎05.46.84.64.89; 🍷), and the comfortable Grand Hotel des Bains, 15 rue Général-Brüncher (☎05.46.84.03.44, @www.grandhotel-desbains.com; 🍷), housed in an old post office with a lovely courtyard and a snazzy restaurant (menus €11.50–34). There are also three campsites around the town, the nicest off which is the three-star Cadoret, near plage Nord on boulevard de Chaterny (☎05.46.82.19.19), with a swimming pool and miniature golf course. The best-value food in town is probably from Restaurant La Jetée at Pointe de la Fumée (☎05.46.84.60.43; closed Dec & Tues out of season), which serves excellent seafood at affordable prices (menus €18.50–38).

Île d'Aix

Less frequented than the bigger islands, the crescent-shaped Île d'Aix (pronounced 'eel-dex') is small enough – just 2km long – to be walked around in about three hours, giving a greater sense of its island status than is felt on the Île de Ré.

The island is well defended, with a pair of forts and ramparts around its southern tip; the whole island, particularly Fort Liédot, served as a prison for members of the Paris Commune and later held prisoners of war in the Crimean and First World Wars. There's a museum (June–Sept daily, Oct–May daily except Tues: 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; €4.50; 🌐 www.musees-nationaux-napoleoniens.org) in the house constructed to Napoleon's orders. He lived in it for a week in 1815 while he was planning his escape to America, only to find himself en route to St Helena and exile, via Portsmouth. Extensive displays fill ten rooms with the emperor's works of art, clothing, portraits and arms. The white dromedary from which he conducted his Egyptian campaign is lodged nearby in the Musée Africain, with its entire collection devoted to African wildlife (same hours and prices as Musée Napoléon).

Access is by frequent ferry (half-hourly in season, according to tide schedule) from Pointe de la Fumée (☎05.46.84.26.77), or with Interiles from La Rochelle (May–Sept 2–4 daily). The only hotel on the island is the overpriced but somewhat charming Napoléon on rue Gourgaud (closed Dec & Jan, ☎05.46.84.66.02, 🌐 www.hotelnapoleon-aix.com; 📍), where you're obliged to pay for half-board. There's also a campsite, the Fort de la Rade (☎05.46.84.28.28; May–Sept).

Brouage and Marennes

Eighteen kilometres southwest of Rochefort, BROUAGE is another seventeenth-century military base, this time created by Richelieu after the siege of La Rochelle.

The way into Brouage is through the Porte Royale in the north wall of the mid-seventeenth-century fortifications, which remain totally intact. Locked within its 400 square metres, the town now seems abandoned and somnolent; even the sea has retreated, and all that's left of the harbour are the partly freshwater pools, or claires, where oysters are fattened in the last stage of their rearing (see box).

Within the walls, the streets are laid out on a grid pattern, lined with low two-storey houses. On the second cross-street to the right is a memorial to Samuel de Champlain, the local boy who founded the French colony of Québec in 1608. In the same century, Brouage witnessed the last painful pangs of a royal romance: here, Cardinal Mazarin, successor to Richelieu, locked up his niece, Marie

Oysters

Marennes' speciality is fattening the oysters known as creuses. It's a lucrative but precarious business, extremely vulnerable to storm damage, changes of temperature or salinity in the water, the ravages of starfish and umpteen other improbable natural disasters.

Oysters begin life as minuscule larvae, which are "born" about three times a year. When a birth happens, the oystermen are alerted by a special radio service, and they all rush out to place their "collectors" – usually arrangements of roofing tiles – for the larvae to cling to. There the immature oysters remain for eight or nine months, after which they are scraped off and moved to parcs in the tidal waters of the sea: sometimes covered, sometimes uncovered. Their last move is to the claires – shallow rectangular pools where they are kept permanently covered by water less salty than normal sea water. Here they fatten up and acquire the greenish colour the market expects. With "improved" modern oysters, the whole cycle takes about two years, as opposed to four or five with the old varieties.

Mancini, to keep her from her youthful sweetheart, Louis XIV. The politics of the time made the Infanta of Spain a more suitable consort for the King of France than his daughter – in his own judgement. Louis gave in, while Marie pined and sighed on the walls of Brouage. Returning from his marriage in St-Jean-de-Luz, Louis dodged his escort and stole away to see her. Finding her gone, he slept in her room and paced the walls in her footsteps.

Half a dozen kilometres south, on a narrow, drier spit of land, past the graceful eighteenth-century Château de la Gataudière with its unique interior and original furnishings (April–Oct Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €6) – built by the man who introduced rubber to France – you come to the village of MARENNES. This is the centre of oyster production for an area that supplies over sixty percent of France's requirements. If you want to visit the oyster beds and see how the business works, you can do so here; just ask at the tourist office on place Chasseloup-Laubat (April–June & Sept Tues–Sat 9.30am–noon & 2–5pm; July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–6.30pm; Oct–March Tues–Sat 10am–noon & 2–4pm; ☎05.46.85.04.36) – visits cost from around €6.

For accommodation in Marennes, try the inexpensive Hôtel du Commerce at 9 rue de la République (☎05.46.85.00.09; 📍), with a restaurant where you can eat generously and well from €14. A good alternative for eating is La Verte Ostréa at the end of the pier at La Cayenne, where oysters and shellfish form the basis of every menu (from €12).

The Île d'Oléron

The Île d'Oléron is France's largest island after Corsica and a favourite of day-trippers and families in the summer months for its beautiful sandy beaches. It's up the road from Marennes, joined to the mainland by a bridge. There are a couple of buses per day from Saintes, but the timings make a day-trip awkward. You're better off going from Rochefort on one of the five daily Kéolis Littoral buses; alternatively, take a guided excursion from La Rochelle.

Flat and more wooded than the Île de Ré, Oléron has plenty of greenery, with the extensive pine-studded Forêt des Saumonards in the northeast of the island; here you can eyeball a dazzling panorama of the surrounding parcs à huîtres and the mighty Fort Boyard stranded in the midst of the sea between Oléron and the Île d'Aix to the northeast. At the island's southern tip, the larger Forêt de St-Trojan creeps up the western coast along La Grande Plage, a popular spot but far enough from the main towns not to be too crowded. The island interior is pretty and distinctive. Waterways wind right into the land, their gleaming muddy banks overhung by round fishing nets suspended from ranks of piers. There are so many oyster claires that, from above, the island must look like an Afghan mirrored cushion; the stretch from Boyardville to St-Pierre – with its pines, tamarisks and woods of evergreen oak – is the most attractive.

The island's most interesting attraction is off the D126 between St-Pierre and Dolus, right in the middle of the island. The bird park of Le Marais aux Oiseaux (daily: April–June & Sept 10am–1pm & 2–6pm; July–Aug 10am–7pm; 🌐www.centre-sauvegarde-oleron.com; €4.50) was originally established as a hospital for injured birds found in the wild, but is now a breeding centre with many examples of rare or endangered species. Some 300 to 400 types of bird are given the freedom of twenty hectares of beautiful countryside, while sixty species are caged for observation alongside public walkways.

Most of the little towns on the island have inevitably been ruined by the development of hundreds of holiday homes – and it can be a real battle in the summer season to find a place to stay. There are a few places that still retain some amount of charm, however, not least of which is the main town in the south of the island, LE CHÂTEAU, named after the citadel that still stands, along with some seventeenth-century fortifications. The town thrives on its traditional oyster farming and boat-building, and there's a lively market in place de la République every morning. The chief town in the north – and most picturesque of the island's settlements – is ST-PIERRE, whose market square has an unusual thirteenth-century monument, La Lanterne des Morts. A few kilometres to the northeast, BOYARDVILLE has no interest except for the ranks of bouchots – stakes for growing mussels – along the shore. It's tempting to help yourself, but these are private property and you'll be in trouble if someone sees you. Instead, head to the major attraction around here: the superb stretch of sandy beach at LA BRÉE-LES-BAINS. Halfway down the west coast is the pretty fishing port of LA COTINIÈRE, with a daily morning fish market (except Sun), Crieé aux Poissons, where the fishermen traditionally cry out their wares.

Practicalities

The main tourist office is on place de la République in Le Château (July–Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2.30–7pm, Sun 10am–12.30pm; Sept–June closed Sun; ☎05.46.47.60.51, 🌐www.oleron.org), also the location of a couple of affordable restaurants. St-Pierre's tourist office is on place Gambetta (June–Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm; Sept–May Tues–Sat 9.15am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎05.46.75.32.84). Bikes can be rented from Vélos 17 (☎05.46.47.14.05, 🌐www.velos17loisirs.com), which has outlets in all the towns on the island.

Well-priced accommodation on the Île d'Oléron can be had at the modestly outfitted Hôtel de la Petite Plage at Domino, rue de l'Océan, St-Georges (☎05.46.76.52.28; 🍷); and smack on the rocky shore at L'Albatros, 11 bd du Dr-Pineau, St-Trojan-les-Bains (☎05.46.76.00.08, 🌐www.albatros-hotel-oleron.com; 🍷; closed Oct–Feb), both offering restaurant service. For some extreme luxury, venture out to the Novotel Thalassa Oléron, Plage de Gatseau in St-Trojan-les-Bains (☎05.46.76.02.46, 🌐www.accorthalassa.com; 🍷), a hotel-cum-spa offering every amenity under the sun to pacify body and mind. There are campsites all over the island: at La Brée, where the best beaches are, there's Pertuis d'Antioche (☎05.46.47.92.00; April–Sept), 150m from the beach off the D273. Further down the east coast, Signal at Boyardville (☎05.46.47.01.22, 🌐www.signal.com; April–Sept) is pleasantly sited near pine forests. If you want to stay a week or so, you could rent a holiday apartment, easy enough outside of July and August: ask for a list at any of the tourist offices, or contact the Agence Centrale Oléronaise (☎05.46.75.32.53).

Places to eat abound on the island, and St-Pierre has the greatest choice of restaurants and brasseries. One place worth mentioning is in La Cotinière: at L'Écailler, 65 rue du Port (☎05.46.47.10.31; closed Dec & Jan), you can have a slap-up, super-fresh seafood meal facing the port from €18.50.

Royan and around

Before World War II, ROYAN, at the mouth of the Gironde, was a fashionable resort for the bourgeoisie. It's still popular, if no longer exclusive, but the modern town has lost its elegance to the dreary rationalism of 1950s town planning: broad boulevards, car parks, shopping centres, planned greenery.

Ironically, the occasion for this planners' romp was provided by Allied bombing, an attempt to dislodge a large contingent of German troops who had withdrawn into the area after the D-Day landings. But the beaches – the most elegant and fashionable of which is in the suburb of Pontailiac to the northwest (reached by a regular bus service from place Charles-de-Gaulle) – are beautiful: fine pale sand, meticulously harrowed and raked near town, and wild, pine-backed and pounded by the Atlantic to the north.

Arrival, information and accommodation

The gare routière and gare SNCF are located on cours de l'Europe. The nearby tourist office (mid-June to Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7.30pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 3–6pm; Sept to mid-June Mon–Sat 9am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎05.46.05.04.71, 🌐www.royan-tourisme.com) and PTT lie close to the Rond-Point-de-la-Poste at the east end of the seafront. You can rent bikes from Royan Bicycles at 1 Galerie Botton (☎05.46.06.08.18); car rental is available from either Ada, 7 place du Dr-Gantier (☎05.46.02.88.88), or Avis, 75 av de Pontailiac (☎05.46.38.48.48).

Accommodation in Royan is expensive and in short supply in season, when your best bet is to camp up the coast to the north or visit for the day from Saintes or Rochefort. There are a number of campsites in the region and around Royan itself, including the Clairefontaine (☎05.46.39.08.11, 🌐www.camping-clairefontaine.com; June to mid-Sept), a fairly pricey site at 6 rue du Colonel-Lachaud, and the municipal La Triloterie (☎05.46.05.26.91, ☎05.46.39.07.92) off avenue d'Aquitaine – the road to Bordeaux.

Hotels

Les Bleuets 21 façade de Foncillon
☎05.46.38.51.79, 🌐www.hotel-les-bleuets.com.

An attractive, nautically themed hotel right on the seafront. All rooms have shower and TV, while for a little more money you can have a small balcony with a sea view. ④

La Colinette 16 av de la Grande Plage, Saint-Georges de Didonne ☎05.46.05.15.75, 📧info@colinette.fr. Situated 100m from the sea 3km southeast of Royan. It has its own restaurant and in summer, the owners may expect all guests to take meals here. ⑤

Le Crystal 1 bd Aristide-Briand ☎05.46.05.00.64, ☎05.46.05.32.41. A basic but satisfactory option right in the town centre, near the market and place de Gaulle. Showers are on the landing and cost €3. ①

Miramar 173 av de Pontailiac ☎05.46.39.03.64, 🌐www.miramar-pontailiac.com. Right opposite the beach, this well-run hotel has large, comfortable and sparkling rooms, while downstairs are an attractive bar and a breakfast terrace looking out over the sea. ⑤

De la Plage 26 Front de Mer ☎05.46.05.10.27, ☎05.46.38.37.79. Located centrally, the rooms are a bit drab but a good size for the price – and all have TV and shower. There is a restaurant downstairs which serves mainly seafood, menus from €13.50. ②

The Town

One sight worth seeing in Royan is the 1950s church of Notre-Dame, designed by Gillet and Hébrard, in a tatty square behind the main waterfront. Though the concrete has weathered badly, the overall effect is dramatic and surprising. Tall V-sectioned columns rise dramatically to culminate in a 65-metre bell tower, like the prow of a giant vessel. The interior is even more striking: using uncompromisingly modern materials and designs, the architects have succeeded in out-Gothicking Gothic. The stained-glass panels, in each of which a different tone predominates, borrow their colours from the local seascapes – oyster, sea, mist and murk – before a sudden explosion of colour in the Christ figure above the altar.

The most attractive area in Royan is around boulevard Garnier, which leads southeast from Rond-Point-de-la-Poste along the beach, and once housed Parisian high society in purpose-built, belle-époque holiday villas. Some of these have survived, including Le Rêve, 58 bd Garnier, where Émile Zola lived and wrote; Kosiki, 100 av du Parc (running parallel to bd Garnier), a nineteenth-century folly of Japanese inspiration; and Tanagra, 34 av du Parc, whose facade is covered in sculptures and balconies.

Various cruises are organized from Royan in season, including one to the Cordouan lighthouse, erected by Edward III's son, the Black Prince, and commanding the mouth of the Gironde River. There's a frequent thirty-minute ferry crossing (one way: pedestrians €3.10, bikes €1.50, motorbikes €9.50, cars €21.20) to the headland on the other side of the Gironde, the Pointe de Grave, from where a bicycle trail and the GR8 head down the coast through the pines and dunes to the bay of Arcachon.

Eating, drinking and nightlife

The best restaurant possibilities are all located near the seafront, whilst self-caterers should head to the large covered market (daily except Mon out of season) at the end of boulevard Aristide-Briand. Nightlife has sadly all but died in Royan, but various bars along the waterfront are lively until reasonably late, especially in summer. Some of the restaurants have music, although even then not very often.

Restaurants

Le Bistrot Marin 6 bd de la Grandière
 ☎ 05.46.05.04.90. A smart restaurant, with good-value meat and fish dishes starting at €9. Their speciality is lobsters, which spend their last hours displayed in a tank in the middle of the restaurant.

 Les Filets Bleus 14 rue Notre-Dame
 ☎ 05.46.05.74.00. Near the cathedral, this place serves up French specialities including seafood and foie gras; the decor has a muted maritime feel. A treat for all budgets, with menus from €16 to €58. Closed Sat lunch and Mon.

Le Régent Front de Mer ☎ 05.46.06.27.70. The best of the brasseries which line the waterfront.

They serve menus from €10, often involving oysters, and if you're lucky there might be some live jazz as entertainment.

Le Relais de la Mairie 1 rue du Chay
 ☎ 05.46.39.03.15. A bit of a walk from town off av de Pontailac, this restaurant offers imaginative mussel and oyster dishes, with menus starting at €12. Closed in the evenings Sun, Mon & Thurs.

Le Tiki You can't miss this huge establishment right on the beach by the tourist office. It is divided into different sections: a pizzeria, a brasserie and a more traditional restaurant, offering a higher level of gastronomic experience with menus from €16.

La Palmyre and Talmont

It's worth knowing about the zoo park in La PALMYRE (daily: April–Sept 9am–7pm; Oct–March 9am–6pm; ☎ www.zoo-palmyre.fr; €13), 10km northwest of Royan up the D25 coast road, especially if you're travelling with children; an exciting range of exotic species belies the slightly tacky advertising. To reach it, there are buses all day from Royan's gare routière and the place Charles-de-Gaulle.

An ideal bicycle or picnic excursion just over an hour's ride from Royan is to TALMONT, 16km up the Gironde on the GR360 – apart from a few ups and downs through the woods outside Royan, it's all level terrain. The low-crouching village clusters about the twelfth-century church of Ste-Radegonde, standing at the edge of a cliff above the Gironde. With gabled transepts, a squat tower and an apse simply but elegantly decorated with blind arcading – all in weathered tawny stone and pocked like a sponge – it stands magnificently against the forlorn brownish-grey seascapes typical of the Gironde. The entrance is through the north transept, where the rings of carving in the arched doorway depict acrobats standing on each other's shoulders and, in the outer braid, two tug-of-war teams hauling roped lions up the arch. The inside is as unpretentiously beautiful as the exterior.

The Charente

8

POITOU-CHARENTES AND THE ATLANTIC COAST

Saintes and around

It's hard to believe that the tranquil fertile valley of the River Charente was once a busy industrial waterway, bringing armaments from Angoulême to the naval shipyards at Rochefort. Today peaceful, low, ochre-coloured farms crown the valley slopes, with green swathes of vineyard sweeping up to the walls, and the graceful turrets of minor châteaux – properties of wealthy cognac-producers – poke up from out of the woods. The towns and villages may look old-fashioned, but the prosperous shops and classy new villas are proof that where the grape grows, money and modernity are not far behind.

The valley itself is easy to travel as the main road and train lines to Limoges run this way. North and south, Poitiers, Périgueux (for the Dordogne) and Bordeaux are also easily reached by train. Otherwise, for cross-country journeys, you're heavily reliant on your own transport.

Saintes and around

SAINTES was formerly much more important than its present size suggests. Today a busy market town for the surrounding region, it was capital of the old province of Saintonge and a major administrative and cultural centre in Roman times. It still retains some impressive remains from that period, as well as two beautiful Romanesque pilgrim churches and an attractive centre of narrow lanes and medieval houses. It also has the doubtful distinction of being the birthplace of Dr Guillotin, whose instrument of decapitation came into its own during the Revolution.

The Town

The abbey church, the Abbaye aux Dames (daily: April–Sept 10am–12.30pm & 2–7pm; Oct–March 1–6pm; entry €2, guided tour €3), is as quirky as

Pineau des Charentes

Roadside signs throughout the Charente advertise Pineau des Charentes, a sweet liqueur that's a blending of grape juice stopped in its fermentation by adding cognac from the same vineyard. It's best drunk chilled as an aperitif; the locals also like it with oysters and love cooking with it. Favourite dishes include moules au Pineau (mussels cooked with tomatoes, Pineau, garlic and parsley) and lapin à la saintongaise (rabbit casserole with Pineau rosé, shallots, garlic, tomatoes, thyme and bay leaves).

begins by 54 cours Reverseaux. The amphitheatre was dug into the end of the valley in around 40 AD, making it one of the oldest surviving examples in France. Although most of the seats are now grassed over, it's still an evocative spot.

On the way back from the amphitheatre, it's no extra trouble to take in the eleventh-century church of St-Eutrope (9am–7pm; free). The upper church, which lost its nave in 1803, has some brilliant capital-carving in the old choir, best seen from the gallery. But it's the crypt – entered from the street – which is most atmospheric and primitive: here massive pillars carved with stylized vegetation support the vaulting in semi-darkness, and there's a huge old font and the third-century tomb of Saintes' first bishop, Eutropius himself.

Practicalities

Saintes' gare SNCF is on avenue de la Marne at the east end of the main road, avenue Gambetta. The tourist office is housed in grand old Villa Musso, 62 cours National (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–1pm & 2–7pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–5.30pm; ☎05.46.74.23.82, 🌐www.ot-saintes.fr), and organizes boat trips on the Charente during the summer. Internet access is available until late into the evening at Le Satellite, 45 rue Berthonnière for a mere €1 per hour.

The municipal campsite (☎05.46.93.08.00; mid-April to mid-Oct) is to the right (if you are coming from the Arc de Germanicus) immediately after the bridge, along quai de l'Yser.

For eating, there's a good restaurant, the Chez Tartine (☎05.46.74.16.38; closed Sun dinner & Mon), by the river on place Blair, and the popular Crêperie de Victor Hugo, at 20 rue Victor-Hugo, off rue Alsace-Lorraine, the pedestrianized shopping street. Le Jardin du Rempart, 36 rue du Rempart (☎05.46.93.37.66; closed Tues dinner & Wed), serves top-value menus from €13.50, including salads, seafood and grills, while Les Plaisirs Gourmands (☎05.46.98.16.28; closed Sun & Mon) is another good bet with popular menus from €11.50. Out of town, the Restaurant de la Charente (☎05.46.91.03.17; closed Sun), 10km upstream at Chaniers, is the Sunday haunt of prosperous locals and makes a more expensive but fulfilling gastronomic experience.

Hotels

Bleu Nuit 1 rue Pasteur ☎05.46.93.01.72, 📧au-bleu-nuit@t3a.com. A short walk from the town centre, the rooms here are well sound-proofed and all have TV. ③

De France 56 rue Frédéric-Mestreau ☎05.46.93.01.16, 📧05.46.74.37.90. The best of the options near the train station, rooms are comfortable and come at various prices; you pay more for a larger room and a bath. ②

Les Messageries rue des Messageries ☎05.46.93.64.99, 🌐www.hotel-des-messageries.com. A good place for more comfort: most rooms are air-conditioned and all have TV and minibar. The location is great – very central but set back from the main street on its own quiet courtyard. ④

 Saveurs de l'Abbaye 1 place St-Pallais ☎05.46.94.17.91. A stylish and modern hotel with quiet and very comfortable rooms, all with TV, shower and warm, bright decor. There is an excellent restaurant downstairs as well, which serves stylish menus from €17.30. ③

Hostel

HI Hostel 2 place Geoffroy-Martel ☎05.46.92.14.92, 📧05.46.92.97.82. In a superb position in behind the Abbaye aux Dames, the facilities are modern and breakfast is included. Dorm beds are €13.

Around Saintes

If you have a car, you could explore several of the marvellous Romanesque churches within easy reach of Saintes. In FENIOUX, 29km to the north towards St-Jean-d'Angély, there's superb St-Eutrope with its mighty spire, while the church at RIOUX, 12km to the south, is well worth visiting for its detailed facade. There's also the fine Château of Roche-Courbon, 18km northwest off the Rochefort road – once described by Pierre Loti (see p.641) as the Sleeping Beauty's castle – with some stylish interiors and gardens.

One place worth any amount of trouble to get to is the twelfth-century pilgrim church of St-Pierre at AULNAY, 37km northeast of Saintes, and sadly not served by public transport, though you can get the bus as far as St-Jean-d'Angély. Aulnay church's finest sculpture is on the west front, the south transept and apse, with some more fine work inside. On the building's main facade, two blind arches flank the central portal. The tympanum of the right depicts Christ in Majesty; the left, St Peter, crucified upside down with two extraordinarily lithe and graceful soldiers balancing on the arms of his cross to get a better swing at the nails in his feet. The apse, too, is a beauty, framed by five slender columns and lit by three perfectly arched windows, the centre one enclosed by figures wrapped in the finest twining foliage. Inside, there is more extraordinary carving: capitals depicting Delilah cutting Samson's hair, devils pulling a man's beard, human-eared elephants bearing the Latin inscription Hic sunt elephants – “Here are elephants” – presumably for the edification of ignorant locals.

You might also like to visit Nuillé-sur-Boutonne, 9km west of Aulnay, which boasts another remarkable church; and, even nearer just down the D129 east of Aulnay, you can walk to Salles-les-Aulnay (20min), or St-Mandé (1hr), with humbler churches of the same period.

Cognac and around

Anyone who does not already know what COGNAC is about will quickly nose its quintessential air as they stroll about the medieval lanes of the town's riverside quarter. For here is the greatest concentration of chais (warehouses), where the high-quality brandy is matured, its fumes blackening the walls with tiny fungi. Cognac is cognac, from the tractor driver and pruning-knife wielder to the manufacturer of corks, bottles and cartons. Untouched by recession (eighty percent of production is exported), it is likely to thrive as long as the world has sorrows to drown – a sunny, prosperous, respectable, self-satisfied little place.

△ Cognac distillery

The Town

Cognac has a number of medieval stone and half-timbered buildings in the narrow streets of the old town, of which rue Saulnier and rue de l'Isle-d'Or make atmospheric backdrops for a stroll, and picturesque Grande-Rue winds through the heart of the old quarter to the chais. On the right is all that remains of the castle where King François I was born in 1494.

To the left are the chais and offices of the Hennessy Cognac Company (daily: March–Dec 10am–5pm; €7 for guided tour), a seventh-generation family firm and widely thought the best of the houses to visit. The first Hennessy, an officer in the Irish brigade serving with the French army, hailed from Ballymacnoy in County Cork and gave up soldiering in 1765 to set up a little business here. The visit begins with a film explaining what's what in the world of cognac. Only an eau de vie distilled from grapes grown in a strictly defined area can be called cognac, and this stretches from the coast at La Rochelle and Royan to Angoulême. It's all carefully graded according to soil properties – chalk essentially. The inner circle, from which the finest cognac comes – Grand Champagne and Petit Champagne (not to be confused with bubbly) – lies mainly south of the River Charente. Hennessy alone keeps 180,000 barrels in stock; the most attention-grabbing moment of the tour is a glimpse of the safeguarded barrels containing vintages from the late 1800s. All barrels are regularly checked and various coupages (blendings) made, of which only the best are kept – depending on the well-honed taste buds of the sober maître du chais.

Practicalities

From the very industrial gare SNCF, to get to the central place François-I, go down rue Mousnier, right on rue Bayard, past the PTT and up rue du 14-Juillet. The square is dominated by an equestrian statue of the king rising from a bed of begonias; in fine weather the cafés here teem with locals. The tourist office is on rue du 14-Juillet at no. 16 (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 10am–4pm; Sept–June Mon–Sat 10am–5pm; ☎ 05.45.82.10.71, 🌐 www.tourism-cognac.com), where you can ask about visiting the various chais, as well as get information on river trips. The town campsite (☎ 05.45.32.13.32; May–Oct) is next to the river on boulevard de Chatenay, while Internet access is available at Cyber@salle, 24 allée de la Corderie (€3 per hour).

For eating out, relaxed La Bonne Goule, 42 allée de la Corderie (from €11; ☎ 05.45.82.06.37; closed Sun evening), serves up excellent Charentais specialities at low prices, and there's a good list of local wines. Another possibility is Le Patio, 42 av Victor-Hugo (☎ 05.45.32.40.50; closed Sun & Mon), with a range of steak and duck dishes and a menu for €14.50. There's also good brasserie fare to be had at the Coq d'Or on the central place François-1er (☎ 05.45.82.02.56), which has huge seafood platters for €22.80.

Hotels

Le Cheval Blanc 6 place Bayard

☎ 05.45.82.09.55, 🌐 www.hotel-chevalblanc.fr. A simple, good-value hotel close to the town centre. Rooms are clean and soundproofed, if a little unimaginatively furnished. ③

Héritage 25 rue d'Angoulême ☎ 05.45.82.01.26, 🌐 www.hheritage.com. A creative hotel, with each room decorated according to a different theme; African, Chinese, pink and so on. It is very comfortable and has wireless Internet throughout. The restaurant features menus from €17.50 and the bar is open until midnight. ④

L'Oliveraie 6 place de la Gare ☎ 05.45.82.04.15, 🌐 www.oliveraie-cognac.com. Right outside the train station, this family-run hotel has large rooms for the price, and most are air-conditioned. ②

Les Pigeons Blancs 110 rue Jules-Brisson

☎ 05.45.82.16.36, 🌐 www.chateauxhotels.com/pigeonsblancs. Twenty minutes' walk from the town centre, set in lovely open grounds on top of a hill. Rooms are spacious and luxurious and there is a high-quality restaurant. ⑤

La Résidence 25 av Victor-Hugo

☎ 05.45.36.62.40, 🌐 www.hotellaresidence-cognac.com. Good-value, large rooms with shower or bath and TV. A nice feature is the family rooms, which are partially divided to give parents some space from children. ③

Around Cognac

The area around Cognac is gentle enough for some restful walks, taking in some pretty little Charentais villages. The best is the towpath or chemin de halage that follows the south bank of the Charente upstream to Pont de la Trèche, then on along a track to the village of BOURG-CHARENTE, with an excellent restaurant called 🍷 La Ribaudière (☎ 05.45.81.30.54, 🌐 www.laribaudiere.com; closed Sun evening, Mon & Tues lunch; menus €35–70), where you should most definitely try their speciality, matelote d'anguilles – eels cooked in wine sauce. From there, you can amble to the village's interesting castle and Romanesque church; the walk takes about three hours in all. A byroad leads back to ST-BRICE on the other bank, past sleepy farms and acres of shoulder-high vines. From there, another lane winds 3km up the hill and over to the ruined abbaie de La Châtre, abandoned amid brambles and fields. Alternatively, at the hamlet of RICHEMONT, 5km northwest of Cognac, you can swim in the pools of the tiny River Antenne below an ancient church on a steep bluff lost in the woods.

Further afield, 18km northwest of Cognac between the villages of Mignon and Authon, there's the fascinating Écomusée du Cognac (mid-June to mid-Sept daily 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm; rest of year by reservation; ☎ 05.46.94.91.16; free), which illustrates the history of the distillation process and the various tools involved, finishing off with a tasting of cognacs, liqueurs and cocktails; follow the D731 to St-Jean-d'Angély for 13km as far as Burie, then turn right onto the D131, 4km from Mignon.

A particularly beautiful excursion is upstream to JARNAC, from where you can take boat trips on the Charente from €7, arranged by the tourist office (🌐 www.jarnac-tourisme.com). In the town, the late President Mitterrand's modest grave has become a place of pilgrimage for elderly left-wingers, and you can also visit the Musée François-Mitterrand, 10 quai de l'Orangerie (July & Aug daily 10am–12.30pm & 2.30–6.30pm; Sept–June Wed–Sun 2–6pm; ☎ 05.45.81.38.88; €3.50), which houses a permanent exhibition on the public works carried out during Mitterrand's two terms of office.

Angoulême and around

The charming cathedral city of ANGOULÊME used to be dominated by paper mills that employed thousands of workers and bolstered the city's prosperity. The industry collapsed in the 1980s, and today only a couple of small, specialized mills still function. Since then the economy has picked up again, especially the tourist industry, and it's now a moderately prosperous place.

In the past, however, the former capital of the Angoumois province was a much-coveted city politically, being heavily fought over during the fourteenth-century Anglo-French squabbles and again in the sixteenth century during the Wars of Religion, when it was a Protestant stronghold. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, a good proportion of its citizens – among them many of its skilled papermakers – emigrated to Holland, never to return.

Arrival information and accommodation

Angoulême is easily accessible by train from Cognac, Limoges and Poitiers. From the gare SNCF, avenue Gambetta, with several cheap hotels, leads uphill to the town centre through place Pérot, a fifteen-minute walk. The gare routière is at the top of the hill on place Bouillaud, while the tourist office, 7 rue du Chat (July & Aug Mon–Sat 9.30am–7pm, Sun 10am–1pm & 2–5pm; Sept–June Mon–Fri 9am–12.30pm & 1.30–6pm, Sat 10am–noon & 2–5pm; ☎05.45.95.16.84, 🌐www.angouleme-toursime.com), is on place des Halles, opposite the large covered market. For information on walking in the area contact the Centre Info Rando on boulevard de Bury (📧www.lacharente.com). Internet access is available at 24 rue de Montmoreau for a reasonable €3 per hour.

The tourist office can help with accommodation; but if you go it alone you'll find a clutch of cheap hotels around the station and some more attractive options nearer the town centre.

Hotels

Le Crab 27 rue Kléber ☎05.45.93.02.93, 📧lec-rab.angouleme@orange.fr. The nicest of the hotels around the station, with clean and comfortable rooms, all with TV. The downstairs restaurant has menus from €10. ⑤

Européen 1 place G.-Pérot ☎05.45.92.06.42, 🌐www.europeenhotel.com. An upmarket option, with soundproofed air-conditioned rooms, all with cable TV and minibar. It's in a good position for exploring the town. ④

D'Orléans 133 av Gambetta ☎05.45.92.07.53, 🌐www.hotel-orleans16.com. The cheapest stay in town, and right opposite the train station. Rooms have TV and are acceptable for the price. ①

Du Palais 4 place Francis-Louvel

☎05.45.92.54.11, 📧hoteldupalais.angouleme@orange.fr. A charming hotel in an elegantly preserved former convent. Most rooms are old-style, with wooden floorboards, but decorated with bright colours. Higher-floor rooms have balconies which look out onto the central square. ⑤

La Palma 4 rampe d'Aguesseau ☎05.45.95.22.89, 🌐www.restaurant-hotel-palma.com. Newly decorated, featuring large rooms with a/c. There's a small rooftop terrace for sunbathing, and an extremely popular restaurant with menus from €11.50. ④

Hi Hostel parc des Bourgines ☎05.45.92.45.80, ☎05.45.95.90.71. A basic hostel with breakfast but no kitchens, situated on an island in the Charente. Take bus #7 from the town centre. Dorm beds €12.

The Town

The old town occupies a high steep-sided plateau overlooking a bend in the Charente, a natural fortress. It has many charms, if few notable sights. The labyrinthine streets to the north of the delightful place Louvel and the massive Hôtel de Ville have been largely restored and pedestrianized. It's here that the restaurants and bars are concentrated, while the eastern section, down rue Marango and rue St-Martial, has become the main commercial centre. On the southern edge of the plateau stands the cathedral, whose west front – like Notre-Dame at Poitiers – is a fascinating display board for some expressive and lively twelfth-century sculpture, culminating in a Risen Christ with angels and clouds about his head, framed in the usual blaze of a halo. The lively frieze beneath the tympanum to the right of the west door commemorates the recapture of Spanish Zaragoza from the Moors, showing a bishop transfixing a Moorish giant with his lance and Roland killing the Moorish king.

From the front of the cathedral, you can walk all around the ramparts encircling the plateau, with long views over the surrounding country, now largely filled with urban sprawl. There are public gardens below the parapet at the far end of the fortifications, and a gravelly esplanade by the lycée where locals gather to play boules.

Angoulême's most fascinating museum lies just below the city walls on the north side close to the River Charente: the Centre National de la Bande Dessinée, 121 rue de Bordeaux (Tues–Fri 10am–6pm, Sat & Sun 2–6pm; €5; bus #3 or #5; www.cnbd.fr), devoted entirely to comic strips. Housed in a hundred-year-old brewery, with contemporary high-rise and glass additions, the museum gets across the message that comics (“BD”) – from politics to pornography – are regarded as a serious art form in France. The museum owns a collection of some four thousand original drawings, which it displays in rotating exhibitions of about three hundred at a time. They range from the earliest stories with pictures and captions, the nineteenth-century images d'Épinal, through the introduction of the speech bubble in the 1920s to some of the darker contemporary productions. Astérix, Peanuts, Tintin and many other characters and artists are represented. There's also a vast library, much of it in English, where you're welcome to relax on cushions and flick through the comics.

Another riverfront museum close by is the Musée du Papier, 134 rue de Bordeaux (July & Aug noon–6.30pm; Sept–June Tues–Sun 2–6pm; free), located in a disused cigarette-paper factory – a fitting tribute to the declining Charentais paper industry. While exhibits get into the history and technicalities of paper-making, temporary exhibitions display paper's more artistic usages.

Eating

Angoulême has some wonderful restaurants, the best areas being rue de Genève, offering both traditional French and international options, and the narrow, pedestrianized rue Massillon.

L'Atlas Marocain 25 rue de la Cloche Verte
 ☎05.45.94.95.30. Serves menus including a glass of wine for €10 in the evening. Couscous is a speciality, and you'll be offered a second helping.

Le Bahia 13 place des Halles ☎05.45.95.94.55.
 A South American-themed brasserie opposite the market. Sangria and bottled Mexican beers are on offer, as are menus for around €16. There are salsa nights every Thursday out of season, and live music in summer. Closed Sun.

 Le Chat Noir 24 rue de Genève ☎05.45.95.26.27. Popular for its great-value salads and omelettes at lunchtime, and for its prize bruschetta and relaxed atmosphere in the evenings. On Thursday nights in summer it shares live music with Le Bahia next door. Closed Sun.

Chez Paul 8 place Francis-Louvel
 ☎05.45.90.04.61. A high-class restaurant serving mainly seafood, with a large terrace and garden. Inside there is a rather trendy bar which stays open until midnight.

La Ruelle 6 rue 3 Notre-Dame ☎05.45.95.15.19.
 A really fine restaurant, with impeccable service and some of the best food to be found in the region. Menus from €22, closed Sun & Mon.

Around Angoulême

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, 22km east of Angoulême, is the site of a huge Renaissance château on the banks of the River Tardoire, which still belongs to the family that gave its name to the town a thousand years ago. The stately pile, although still lived in, opens its elaborate portals to the public (Easter–Nov daily 10am–7pm; €6.10). In August it stages a massive son et lumière with a brigade-sized cast. If you want to stay, try the lovely old Auberge de la Carpe d'Or at 1 rue de Vitrac (☎05.45.62.02.72, ☎05.45.63.01.88; 📍). There's also a municipal campsite on rue des Flots beneath the château.

Further east, the country becomes hillier and more wooded, with buttercup pastures grazed by liver-coloured Limousin cattle. A good way to see it is to drive up the back roads along the River Vienne to the beautiful, if now rather touristy little town of CONFOLENS, about 40km northeast of La Rochefoucauld. Its ancient houses are stacked up a hillside above a broad brown sweep of the river, here crossed by a long narrow medieval bridge. The town's chief claim to fame today is the huge International Folklore Festival, held every year in the second week of August, when, of course, it's impossible to find anywhere to stay (festival information ☎05.45.84.00.77, 🌐www.festivaldeconfolens.com). There is a municipal campsite by the tributary River Goire.

Having come this far, it's worth continuing the extra 6km to the minuscule village of ST-GERMAIN-DE-CONFOLENS, huddled by the riverside beneath the romantic towers of its ruined castle, where you can eat good country fare at the Auberge de la Tour (closed Mon except in July & Aug) for as little as €11.50.

Aquitaine

In Roman times, Bordeaux was capital of the province of Aquitania Secunda. With the marriage of Eleanor of Aquitaine and King Henry II of England in 1152, it quickly became the principal English foothold for their three-hundred-year Aquitanian adventure, and it was to their presence, and particularly their taste for its red wines – imported back to England and termed “claret” – that the region owed its first great economic boom. The second boom, which financed the building of the gracious eighteenth-century centre of Bordeaux, came with the expansion of colonial trade.

The surrounding countryside is more notable for its wines and vineyards than its scenery, though the hills of Entre-Deux-Mers and the pretty town of St-Émilion are worth visiting in their own right. More interesting is the vast pine-covered expanse of Les Landes and the huge, wild Atlantic beaches of the Côte d'Argent to the south, but it's not a landscape that charms. Its appeal is more in its size and uniqueness – and you definitely need your own transport to explore it.

Bordeaux

The city of BORDEAUX is stunning when approached from the south along the river. It's big, with a population of over half a million, and obviously rich – as it has been since the Romans set up a lively trading centre here; even today it still functions as the regional transport hub for Aquitaine. Especially attractive is the relatively small eighteenth-century centre, paid for by the expansion of colonial trade. In addition, the city's brand-new space-age tram network gives it a modern, electric feel that juxtaposes nicely with its classical architecture. With a few sights worth checking out, plenty of cheap places to sleep and eat and a fantastic nightlife, Bordeaux's atmosphere is inviting and worth sticking around for.

Arrival, information and accommodation

Bordeaux-Mérignac airport is 12km west of the city and is connected by half-hourly shuttles to the main tourist office (45min; €6.50). Arriving by train, you'll find yourself at the gare St-Jean, with its own small tourist office (May–Oct Mon–Sat 9am–noon & 1–6pm, Sun 10am–noon & 1–3pm; Nov–April Mon–Fri 9.30am–12.30pm & 2–6pm; ☎05.56.91.64.70), right at the heart of a somewhat insalubrious area, nearly 3km south of the city centre; bus #16 runs into the centre, and tram line C will take you close by. There's no central gare routière, but most regional bus services terminate on the south side of the esplanade des Quinconces, on allées de Munich, where you'll also find the information centre (☎05.57.57.88.88, 🌐www.infotbc.com) for all local transport.

The billion-euro tram system, opened in late 2003, has changed much of the landscape of the city, making it more pedestrian-friendly. Services operate on the three lines frequently from 5am to 1am, and run throughout the city centre, extending several kilometres into Bordeaux's suburbs. You can purchase either single-ride tickets (€1.30) or carnets of ten (€10), available from the machines at tram stops (coins only) or at tabacs all over the city. Tickets are valid for unlimited connections within an hour on any type of city transport (tram, bus or navette), and must be punched each time you begin a journey. Though the city is certainly walkable, some sights are a fair distance away from each other, and if you're going to be here for a few days, it pays to buy an unlimited-use pass, available for between one and seven days. Bordeaux's efficient electric navette buses run daily every 10–15 minutes between place de la Victoire and place de la Quinconces, with stops in between at Gambetta, St.-Pierre and St.-Michel; tickets (the same ones used for the trams) can be purchased on board. For car drivers, there should be ample parking in the numerous underground car parks in the town centre, though it's cheaper to use the car parks next to the tram stations on the east bank of the Garonne: buy a round-trip park-and-ride ticket (€2.60), and hop on a tram into the centre.

Bordeaux's main tourist office, near the Grand Théâtre on 12 cours du 30-Juillet (May–Oct Mon–Sat 9am–7pm, Sun 9.30am–6.30pm; Nov–April Mon–Sat 9am–6.30pm, Sun 9.45am–4.30pm; ☎05.56.00.66.00, 🌐www.bordeaux-tourisme.com), can book accommodation free of charge, and it has useful information on the city and surrounding vineyards, to which it also arranges tours (see box on p.668 for details). The tourist office for the Gironde region is at 21 cours de l'Intendance (☎05.56.52.61.40, 🌐www.tourisme-gironde.fr).

The area right by the station – particularly rue Charles-Domercq and cours de la Marne – is full of one- and two-star hotels, though the dodgy shopfronts make this a less appealing area to stay than the city centre, where there's a good choice, from the basic to the luxurious. Rooms are generally not difficult to come by, with the notable exception of the week of the Vinexpo trade fair (in odd-numbered years) and Fête du Vin (in even-numbered years) in June, when Bordeaux is packed to the gulleys.

Hotels

De la Boétie 4 rue de la Boétie ☎ 05.56.81.76.68, ☎ 05.56.51.24.72. A good bargain, with shower and TV in all rooms, this cheap and central one-star hotel is on a quiet backstreet. Owned by the Bristol (see below), it shares its reception. ①

Bristol 4 rue Bouffard ☎ 05.56.81.85.01, 📧 bristol@hotel-bordeaux.com. Comfortable, relaxed two-star hotel just south of place Gambetta; its well-equipped, en-suite rooms are decently sized and stylishly decorated. ②

Dauphin 82 rue du Palais Gallien ☎ 05.56.52.24.62, 📧 dauphinhotel@orange.fr. Though a little out of the action, this fabulously decorated, old-fashioned hotel is justifiably popular; its recent renovation has added parquet floors and snazzy paint jobs in nearly all the rooms. The more spacious, top-price rooms, with their huge windows and high ceilings, offer best value for money. ③

Gambetta 66 rue Porte-Dijeaux ☎ 05.56.51.21.83, 📧 hotgambetta@aol.com. Brilliantly positioned for exploring the old town, just off place Gambetta. All rooms have TV, phone and bathroom, and there is also a living room area for guests. ④

De Normandie 7 cours du 30-Juillet ☎ 05.56.52.16.80, 📧 www.hotel-de-normandie-bordeaux.com. Large, nicely furnished rooms with minibar, wireless Internet and all other mod cons. The top-floor rooms boast private balconies with unbeatable views of the city. ⑤

Notre-Dame 36 rue Notre-Dame ☎ 05.56.52.88.24, 📧 www.hotelnotredame.free.fr. Quiet, refined establishment in an interesting area of old streets just north of esplanade des Quinconces. A/c comes as standard, and for inspiration, rooms are decorated with posters of Bordeaux. Especially good rates available for families; they will put two rooms together for just €70. ⑥

De la Presse 6–8 rue Porte Dijeaux ☎ 05.56.48.53.88, 📧 www.hoteldelapresse.com. With very friendly staff, this well-kept family-run hotel in the pedestrian heart of Bordeaux is excellent value. Its light, bright rooms are well proportioned, with big beds to match, and provide three-star comforts such as minibar, air conditioning, and Internet access in the rooms. Closed one week at Christmas. ⑦

Des Quatre Soeurs 6 cours du 30-Juillet ☎ 05.57.81.19.20, 📧 4soeurs.free.fr. Popular, efficient and friendly hotel in an ideal spot next to the tourist office. The rooms are cheerfully coloured, though some are a touch boxy for the price. ⑧

Regina 34 rue Charles-Domercq ☎ 05.56.91.66.07, 📧 www.hotelreginabordeaux.com. The best option near the train station, the Regina offers simple, spruce rooms of a good size. The cheapest have a shower but no toilet and, while all rooms are equipped with phones, only some have TVs. Ask for a quieter room at the back. ⑨

Studio 26 rue Huguerie ☎ 05.56.48.00.14, 📧 studio@hotel-bordeaux.com. Easily the best deal in town, offering simple single rooms with bath and TV for a paltry €18, so very popular with backpackers. There's not much soundproofing though, so your night's sleep is slightly pot-luck. ⑩

De la Tour Intendance 14–16 rue de la Vieille-Tour ☎ 05.56.44.56.56, 📧 www.hotel-tour-intendance.com. Located just off place Gambetta, the rooms here are large and cool, with wooden paneling and simple decoration, while the reception area and breakfast room are also particularly attractive. They have a garage for parking overnight (€8). ⑪

Tulip Inn Bayonne Etche-Ona 15 cours de l'Intendance ☎ 05.56.48.00.88, 📧 www.bordeaux-hotel.com. Occupying two large buildings on quiet streets in behind the main road, this Best Western hotel has all the luxury you would expect, including CD players and flat-screen TVs in all rooms. They also have a suite available. ⑫

Hostel

Hostel 22 cours Barbey ☎ 05.56.91.59.51. Situated off cours de la Marne, the hostel is a 10min walk from gare St-Jean, or take bus #16. Kitchen and laundry facilities, breakfast included. Dorm beds are €21.40, but note that it's not usually possible to reserve in advance.

The City

Bordeaux is reasonably spread out along the western side of the River Garonne, with the eighteenth-century old town lying between the place de la Comédie to the north, the imposing buildings of the riverbank and the cathedral to the west. North of the centre is the vast open square of the esplanade des Quinconces, and further still, the Jardin Public, containing some very scant remains of Bordeaux's Roman past.

Vieux Bordeaux

The elegant, eighteenth-century city centres on the quartier St-Pierre and stretches up to the Grand Théâtre to the north, the cathedral to the west and the cours Victor-Hugo to the south. The narrow streets are lined with grand mansions from Bordeaux's glory days, and much of the area has been done up over recent years, though some of the streets remain seedy in anticipation of the restorer's touch.

The social hub of the eighteenth-century city was the impeccably classical Grand Théâtre on place de la Comédie at the northern end of rue Ste-Catherine. Built on the site of a Roman temple by the architect Victor Louis in 1780, this lofty building is faced with an immense colonnaded portico topped by twelve Muses and Graces. Inside, the interior is likewise opulently decorated with trompe l'oeil paintings; the best way to see it is to attend one of the operas or ballets staged throughout the year, with seats in the gods from as little as €8 (☎05.56.00.85.95 for info & bookings), or ask at the tourist office about the guided tours they offer (July & Aug Mon–Sat 11am; €5.50). Smart streets radiate from here: the city's main shopping street, rue Ste-Catherine, running south and partially pedestrianized to ease the consumer flow; the ritzy cours de l'Intendance running west; and the sandy, tree-lined allées de Tourny running northwest, commemorating the Marquis Louis Aubert de Tourny – the eighteenth-century administrator who was prime mover of the city's "Golden Age" and supervised much of the rebuilding. Back in the narrow streets of the old town, the harmonious place du Parlement and place St-Pierre are both lined with typical Bordelais mansions and peppered with wrought-iron balconies and arcading, making impressive examples of town planning.

The riverfront was also given the once-over by early eighteenth-century planners, with the imposing place de la Bourse creating a focal point on the quayside. The impressive bulk of the old customs house of 1733 contains the Musée des Douanes (Tues–Sun 10am–6pm; €3), which gives a rundown on Bordeaux's port and seafaring past and retraces the history of the administration and work of French Customs. The square is balanced by the Palais de la Bourse (stock exchange) looking out over the quayside and the broad River Garonne. Further south along the riverbank, the fifteenth-century Porte Cailhau takes its name from the stones (cailoux – cailhau in dialect) unloaded on the neighbouring quay to be used as ballast for boats. Crossing the river just south of here, the only testimony to a nobler past is the impressive Pont de Pierre – "Stone Bridge", though in fact it's mostly brick – built at Napoleon's command during the Spanish campaigns, with seventeen arches in honour of his victories. The views of the river and quays from here are memorable, particularly when floodlit at night.

Place Gambetta, the cathedral and around

Cours de l'Intendance, a street lined with chic shops, links place de la Comédie with café-lined place Gambetta, a pivotal square for the city's museums, shops and the cathedral. In the middle of place Gambetta's arcaded house fronts, a valiant attempt at an English garden adds some welcome relief, belying the fact that the guillotine lopped three hundred heads off here at the time of the Revolution. In one corner stands the eighteenth-century arch of the Porte Dijeaux, an old city gate.

South of place Gambetta is the Cathédrale St-André (Mon–Sat 7.30–11.30am & 2–6/6.30pm), whose most eye-catching feature is the great upward sweep of the twin steeples over the north transept, an effect heightened by the adjacent but separate bell tower, the fifteenth-century Tour Pey-Berland (June–Sept daily 10am–6pm; Oct–May Tues–Sun 10am–noon & 2–5pm; €5). The interior of the cathedral, begun in the twelfth century, is vast and impressive, even if there's not much of artistic interest apart from the choir, which provides one of the few complete examples of the florid late Gothic style known as Rayonnant, and the north transept door and the Porte Royale to the right, which feature some fine carving.

The cream of Bordeaux's museums is to be found scattered in the streets around the cathedral. Directly behind the classical Hôtel de Ville, formerly Archbishop Rohan's palace, the Musée des Beaux-Arts (daily except Tues 11am–6pm; permanent museum free; temporary exhibitions €5) has a small but worthy selection of European fine art, featuring works by Reynolds, Titian, Rubens, Matisse and Marquet (a native of the city), as well as Delacroix's superb painting of La Grèce sur les ruines de Missolonghi. More engaging, however, is the Musée des Arts Décoratifs (daily except Tues 2–6pm; same price system), two blocks north on rue Bouffard and housed in a handsome eighteenth-century house. The extensive collection includes some beautiful, mainly French, porcelain and faïence, period furniture, glass, miniatures, Barye animal sculptures and prints of the city in its maritime heyday.

Continuing to circle clockwise round the cathedral, you'll pass the Centre National Jean-Moulin (Tues–Sun 2–6pm; free), an interesting museum dedicated to the local Resistance, featuring a history of the occupation of Bordeaux and a harrowing permanent exhibit of Holocaust-inspired paintings by French artist J.J. Morran, before reaching the imaginatively laid-out Musée d'Aquitaine, on cours Pasteur (Tues–Sun 11am–6pm; temporary exhibitions €5), one of the city's best museums. A stimulating variety of objects and types of display emphasizes regional ethnography, and drawings and writings reveal the maritime, commercial and agricultural prowess of eighteenth-century Bordeaux. It's also worth taking a look at the section on the wine trade before venturing off on a vineyard tour in the region. A couple of blocks east, rue St-James is straddled by a heavy Gothic tower, the fifteenth-century Grosse Cloche, originally part of the medieval town hall.

North of the centre

North of the Grand Théâtre, cours du 30-Juillet leads into the bare, gravelly – and frankly unattractive – expanse of the esplanade des Quinconces, said to be Europe's largest municipal square. At the quayside end are two tall columns, erected in 1829 and topped by allegorical statues of Commerce and Navigation; at the opposite end of the esplanade is the Monument aux Girondins, a glorious fin-de-siècle ensemble of statues and fountains built in honour of the influential local deputies to the 1789 Revolutionary Assembly, later purged by Robespierre as moderates and counter-revolutionaries. During World War II, in a fit of anti-French spite, the occupying Germans made plans to melt the monument down, only to be foiled by the local Resistance, who got there first and, under cover of darkness, dismantled it piece by piece and hid it in a barn in the Médoc for the duration of the war.

To the northwest is the beautiful formal park, the Jardin Public (daily April–Oct 7am–8/9pm; Nov–March 7am–6pm; free), containing the city's botanical gardens as well as a small natural history museum (Mon & Wed–Fri 11am–6pm, Sat & Sun 2–6pm; temporary exhibitions €5). Behind it, to the west and north, lies a quiet, provincial quarter of two-storey stone houses. Concealed among the narrow streets, on rue du Dr-Albert-Barraud, is a large chunk of brick and stone masonry, the so-called Palais Gallien, in fact a third-century arena that's all that remains of Burdigala, Aquitaine's Roman capital. Nearby, on place Delorme, the unusual round market hall makes a focus for a stroll through the quarter. To the east of the gardens, closer to the river, the Musée d'Art Contemporain on rue Ferrère (Tues & Thurs–Sun 11am–6pm, Wed 11am–8pm; €5) occupies a converted nineteenth-century warehouse for colonial imports. The vast, arched hall provides a magnificent setting for the mostly post-1960 sculpture and installation-based work by artists such as Richard Long, Daniel Buren and Sol LeWitt. Few pieces from the permanent collection are on display at any one time, the main space being filled by temporary exhibitions, so it's hit and miss as to whether you'll like what's on offer. However, there's a superb collection of glossy art books in the library and an elegant café-restaurant on the roof (lunch only).

▲ Place du Parlement, Bordeaux

Eating and drinking

Bordeaux is packed with numerous restaurants, many of them top-notch, and due to its position close to the Atlantic coast, fresh seafood features prominently on many a Bordelais menu. The best place to look for restaurants is around place du Parlement and place St-Pierre, where you'll find something to satisfy all tastes and budgets. There are numerous sandwich bars and fast-food outlets all along rue Ste-Catherine and spilling into studenty place de la Victoire. In the summer, guinguettes – open-air riverside stalls selling shrimps, king prawns and other seafood snacks – set up along the quai des Chartrons. For picnic fodder, there's a marvellous, round market in the place des Grands-Hommes, and on rue de Montesquieu, just off the square, Jean d'Alos runs the city's best fromagerie, with dozens of farm-produced cheeses.

The student population ensures a collection of young, lively bars, a host of which are found on and around place de la Victoire. Several offer live music and all are packed on Thursday nights. There's also a clutch of English, Irish and antipodean pubs now in Bordeaux and a low-key gay scene concentrated at the south end of rue des Remparts and around the town hall.

Cafés and restaurants

Café des Arts 138 cours Victor-Hugo. This café-brasserie on the corner of rue Ste-Catherine is one of the city's few old-style cafés, its unique ambience created from faded relics of the 1940s. The food is good, too, with a plat du jour for around €9, and the kitchens stay open till 1am.

Baud et Millet 19 rue Huguerie ☎05.56.79.05.77.

The ultimate cheese-and-wine feast consumed around a few tables at the back of a wine shop where you choose your own bottle from the shelves. Portions are generous and the food rich, so one dish goes a long way. You can have a cheese and salad buffet for €19.50, and raclette is another option. Closed Sun.

Le Bistrot d'Édouard 16 place du Parlement. ☎05.56.81.48.87. In a great position on a lovely square, with outdoor seating in summer, this is as good value as you'll find anywhere. There is a three-course menu for €12, with lots of choice – their salads are particularly worth trying.

Le Bistrot des Quinconces 4 place des Quinconces ☎05.56.52.84.56. Lively daytime and evening bistro. In fine weather locals vie for the outdoor tables, in a great spot facing the fountains. The modern, eclectic carte includes oysters and steak tartare, as well as a three-course weekday lunch menu at €15.

Café Dijeaux 14 place Gambetta. A great place to sit and watch the world go by, in the shadow of the city gate. Food is available all day and very reasonably priced.

Chez Dupont 45 rue de Notre-Dame ☎05.56.81.49.59. Bustling, old-fashioned restaurant in the Chartrons district, with wooden floors, old posters and waiters sporting colourful waistcoats. Prices are very reasonable, with main courses costing €12–18. The house sangria is also recommended.

Le Mably 12 rue Mably ☎05.56.44.30.10. Informal, friendly and popular restaurant with a warm, homely atmosphere. The food is of excellent quality and very traditional, most dishes featuring either duck or rabbit. Menus from €22. Closed Sun, Mon & three weeks in August.

Café Régent 46 place Gambetta. The place to be seen in Bordeaux, with plush leather seats and crimson upholstery. The bar is open for drinks all day, or you can get three courses for €15 at lunch or dinner.

Bars

L'Alligator 3 place du Général-Sarraïl. Out of season, this bar is full to the rafters with student-types enjoying a party atmosphere, with a dance-floor downstairs. In summer, it's more chilled out; the music gets turned down a few notches and the terrace is a great place to enjoy a drink in the sun.

Calle Ocho 24 rue des Piliers-de-Tutelle ☎05.56.48.08.68. Bordeaux's best-known salsa bar has an unrivalled party atmosphere and is packed out most nights till 2am. They serve real Cuban rum and mojitos, and the self-inebriating barstaff frequently showers the crowds with water sprayed from the bar tap.

Connemara 18 cours d'Albret. For the homesick pining for a pint of Guinness, this is Bordeaux's liveliest Irish pub, with free concerts or some other event most nights, plus cheap bar snacks, such as fish and chips, beef and Guinness pie and apple crumble. Happy hour is 6–8pm daily.

Dick Turpin's 72 rue du Loup. Opposite the wisteria-filled courtyard of the municipal archives, this is a pretty good rendition of an English town pub with a quiet, relaxed atmosphere and an international clientele. There's the standard range of beers – Guinness, Bass and Newcastle Brown. Happy hour 5.30–8.30pm.

Bar de l'Hôtel de Ville (BHV) 4 rue de l'Hôtel-de-Ville. Friendly little gay café-bar which stages a variety of free events every other Sunday (10.30pm).

Le Plana 22 place de la Victoire. One of the more relaxed student hangouts around the square, though, like everywhere else, it's jumping on Thursday nights. Free live music on Sun (jazz), Mon & Tues (various).

Nightlife and entertainment

Since Bordeaux's dance clubs are constantly changing it's best to ask around for the latest hotspots. There are one or two discos in the city centre, such as Le Monseigneur, at 42 allées d'Orléans, next to the tourist office (☎05.56.44.29.91), but the majority of clubs are spread out along southerly quai du Paludate, where things don't really get going until one in the morning and continue till closing time at four. Bear in mind that there isn't always the most welcoming atmosphere down at the quayside, and it can be hard to get in to some clubs if the bouncers don't recognize you. The places to head for are La Plage at no. 40, a fun disco in a tropical-beach setting, and the wonderfully Baroque Shadow Lounge, 5 rue Cabannac, which plays house and techno. For alternative music from reggae to hip-hop, your best bet is 4 Sans at 40 rue d'Armagnac, which often hosts good DJs.

To find out the latest events and happenings in and around Bordeaux, get hold of a copy of the regional newspaper Sud-Ouest. Alternatively there are the free Bordeaux Plus and Clubs & Concerts, detailing the city's current favourite clubs. The tourist office issues Bordeaux Magazine, a free monthly in French with coverage of more highbrow cultural events around town. To buy tickets for city and regional events, contact the venue direct or head for the box office (☎05.56.48.26.26) in the nineteenth-century Galerie Bordelaise arcade, wedged between rue Ste-Catherine and rue des Piliers-de-Tutelle. Virgin Megastore (☎05.56.56.05.55) on place Gambetta also has a ticket outlet, as does the FNAC on rue Ste-Catherine (☎05.56.00.21.30).

Jazz and blues fans should head south down the river to the respected Comptoir du Jazz, 57 quai de Paludate (☎05.56.85.98.85); entry is free but you're expected to buy at least one drink. The Café des Arts (see p.665) is also worth a try. There's no shortage of more contemporary music, either. Bordeaux's home of rock music is the Rock School Barbey, 18 cours Barbey (☎05.56.33.66.00) which hosts recognized international bands quite regularly. Another place to check out is the more central El Inca, 28 rue Ste-Colombe, which has live rock or jazz most evenings.

Listings

Airlines Air France ☎08.20.82.08.20; British Airways ☎08.25.82.54.00.

